With warbling eunuchs fill our * silenc'd stage,
And lull to servitude a thoughtless age. [hold ?

Heroes, proceed ! what bounds your pride shall
What check restrain your thirst of pow'r and gold ?
Behold rebellious virtue quite o'erthrown,
Behold our fame, our wealth, our lives your own.

To such, the plunder of a land is giv'n,
When public crimes inflame the wrath of heav'n :
(b) But what, my friend, what hope remains for me,

Who start at theft, and blush at perjury ?
Who scarce forbear, though Britain's court he sing,
To pluck a titled poet's borrow'd wing ;
A statesman's logic unconvin'd can hear,
And dare to slumber o'er the † Gazetteer ;
Despise a fool in half his pension dress'd,
And strive in vain to laugh at Clodio's jest.

(i) Others with softer smiles, and subtler art,
Can sap the principles, or taint the heart ;
With more address a lover's note convey,
Or bribe a virgin's innocence away.
Well may they rise, while I, whose rustic tongue
Ne'er knew to puzzle right, or varnish wrong,
Spurn'd as a beggar, dreaded as a spy,
Live unregard'd, unlamented die.

(k) For what but social guilt the friend endears ?
Who shares Orgilio's crimes, his fortune shares.

(l) But thou, should tempting villany present
All Marlborough hoarded, or all Villiers spent,
Turn from the glittering bribe thy scornful eye,
Nor sell for gold, what gold could never buy,
The peaceful slumber, self-approving day,
Unfilled fame, and conscience ever gay.

(m) The cheated nation's happy fav'rites, see !
Mark whom the great carefs, who frown on me !
London ! the needy villain's gen'ral home,
The common-sewer of Paris, and of Rome ;
With eager thirst, by folly or by fate,
Sucks in the dregs of each corrupted state.

(o) Illustrious Edward ! from the realms of day ;
The land of heroes and of saints survey ;
Nor hope the British lineaments to trace,
The rustic grandeur, or the furly grace,
But lost in thoughtless ease, and empty show,
Behold the warrior dwindled to a beau ;
Sense, freedom, piety, refin'd away,
Of France the mimic, and of Spain the prey.

All that at home no more can beg or steal,
Or like a gibbet better than a wheel ;
His'd from the stage, or hooted from the court ;
Their air, their dress, their politics import ;
(p) Obsequious, artful, voluble and gay,
On Britain's fond credulity they prey.
No gainful trade their industry can 'scape,
(q) They sing, they dance, clean shoes, or cure a clap :

All sciences a fasting Monsieur knows,
And bid him go to hell, to hell he goes.

(r) Ah ! what avails it, that, from slav'ry far,
I drew the breath of life in English air ;
Was early taught a Briton's right to prize,
And sip the tale of Henry's victories ;
If the gull'd conqueror receives the chain,
And flattery prevails when arms are vain ?

(s) Stodious to please, and ready to submit,
The supple Gaul was born a parasite :
Still to his int'rest true, where'er he goes,
Wit, brav'ry, worth, his lavish tongue bestows ;
In ev'ry face a thousand graces shine,
From ev'ry tongue flows harmony divine.

(t) These arts in vain our rugged natives try,
Strain out with fault-ring diffidence a lie,
And get a kick for awkward flattery. }

Besides, with justice, this discerning age
Admires their wond'rous talents for the stage :

(u) Well may they venture on the mimic's art,
Who play from morn to night a borrow'd part ;
Præcis'd their master's notions to embrace,
Repeat his maxims, and reflect his face ;
With ev'ry wild absurdity comply,
And view its object with another's eye ;
To shake with laughter ere the jest they hear,
To pour at will the counterfeited tear ;
And as their patron hints the cold or heat,
To shake in Dog-days, in December sweat.

(v) How, when competitors like these contend,
Can surly virtue hope to fix a friend ?

And lie without a blush, without a smile;
Exalt each trifle, ev'ry vice adore,
Your taste in snuff, your judgment in a whore;
Can Balbo's eloquence applaud, and swear
He gropes his breeches with a monarch's air.

For arts like these prefer'd, admir'd, carefs'd,
They first invade your table, then your breast;
(x) Explore your secrets with insidious art,
Watch the weak hour, and ransack all the heart;
Then soon your ill-plac'd confidence repay,
Commence your lords, and govern or betray.

(y) By numbers here from shame or censure free,
All crimes are safe but hated poverty.

This, only this, the rigid law pursues,
This, only this, provokes the snarling muse.

The sober trader at a tatter'd cloak,
Wakes from his dream, and labours for a joke;
With brisker air the silken courtiers gaze,
And turn the varied taunt a thousand ways.

Sure the most bitter is a scornful jest;
Fate never wounds more deep the gen'rous heart,

Sustain the approaching fire's tremendous light;
Swift from pursuing horrors take your way,
And leave your little all to flames a prey; [roam,

While all neglect, and most insult your woe.

(d) Should Heaven's just bolts Orgilio's wealth
confound,

And spread his flaming palace on the ground,
Swift o'er the land the dismal rumour flies,
And public mournings pacify the skies;
The laureat tribe in vernal verse relate,
How virtue wars with persecuting fate;

(e) With well-feign'd gratitude the pension'd band
Refund the plunder of the beggar'd land.

See! while he builds, the gaudy vassals come,
And crowd with sudden wealth the rising dome;

The price of boroughs and of souls restore;
And raise his treasures higher than before:

Now bless'd with all the haubles of the great,
The polish'd marble, and the shining plate,

(f) Orgilio sees the golden pile aspire,
And hopes from angry Heav'n another fire.

(g) Could'st thou resign the park and play content,

For the fair banks of Severn or of Trent;
There might'st thou find some elegant retreat,

Some hireling senator's deserted seat;
And stretch thy prospects o'er the smiling land,

For less than rent the dungeons of the Strand;
There prune thy walks, support thy drooping flow'rs,

Direct thy rivulets, and twine thy bow'rs;
And, while thy grounds a cheap repast afford,

Despise the dainties of a venal lord:
There ev'ry bush with nature's music rings,

There ev'ry breeze bears health upon its wings;
On all thy hours security shall smile.

And bless thine evening walk and morning toil.

(b) Prepare for death if here at night you roam,
And sign your will before you sup from home.

(i) Some fiery sop, with new commission vain,
Who sleeps on brambles till he kills his man;

Some frolic drunkard, reeling from a feast,
Provokes a broil, and stabs you for a jest.

Flush'd as they are with folly, youth, and wine,
Their prudent insults to the poor confine;
Afar they mark the flambeau's bright approach,
And shun the shining train, and golden coach.

(l) In vain these dangers pass, your doors you close,

And hope the balmy blessings of repose:
Cruel with guilt, and daring with despair,
The midnight murd'rer bursts the faithless bar;
Invades the sacred hour of silent rest,
And leaves, unseen, a dagger in your breast.

(m) Scarce can our fields, such crowds at Tyburn die,
With hemp the gallows and the fleet supply.

Whose ways and means support the sinking land;

(n) A single gaol, in Alfred's golden reign,
Could half the nation's criminals contain;
Fair justice then, without constraint ador'd,
Held high the steady scale, but snatch'd the sword;
No spies were paid, no special juries known,
Blest age! but ah! how distant from our own!

(o) Much could I add,---but see the boat at hand,
The tide retiring, calls me from the land:

(p) Farewel!---When youth, and health, and fortune spent,

Thou fly'st for refuge to the wilds of Kent;
And tir'd like me with follies and with crimes,
In angry numbers warn't succeeding times,
Then shall thy friend, nor thou refuse his aid,
Still foe to vice, forsake his Cambrian shade;
In virtue's cause once more exert his rage,
Thy satire point, and animate thy page.

‡ Ver. I.---II.

Remark each anxious toil, each eager strife,
And watch the busy scenes of crowded life;
Then say how hope and fear, desire and hate,
O'erspread with snares the clouded maze of fate,
Where wav'ring man, betray'd by vent'rous pride,
To tread the dreary paths without a guide;
As treach'rous phantoms in the mist delude,
Shuns fancied ills, or chafes airy good.
How rarely reason guides the stubborn choice,
Rules the bold hand, or prompts the suppliant voice.

How nations sink, by darling schemes oppress'd,
When vengeance listens to the fool's request.
Fate wings with ev'ry wish th' afflictive dart,
Each gift of nature, and each grace of art,
With fatal heat impetuous courage glows,
With fatal sweetness elocution flows,
Impeachment stops the speaker's pow'ful breath,
And restless fire precipitates on death.

* But scarce observ'd, the knowing and the bold,
Fall in the gen'ral massacre of gold;
Wide-wasting pest! that rages unconfin'd,
And crowds with crimes the records of mankind;
For gold his sword the hireling ruffian draws,
For gold the hireling judge distorts the laws;
Wealth heap'd on wealth, nor truth nor safety buys,

The dangers gather as the treasures rise.

Let hist'ry tell where rival kings command,
And dubious title shakes the madd'd land,
When statutes glean the refuse of the sword,
How much more safe the vassal than the lord;
Low sculcs the hind beneath the rage of pow'r,
And leaves the wealthy traitor in the Tow'r,
Untouch'd his cottage, and his slumbers sound,
Though confiscation's vultures hover round.

The needy traveller, Terene and gay,
Walks the wild heath, and sings his toil away.
Does envy seize thee? crush th' upbraiding joy,
Increase his riches and his peace destroy,
Now fears in dire vicissitude invade,
The rustling brake alarms, and quiv'ring shade,
Nor light nor darkness bring his pain relief,
One shows the plunder, and one hides the thief.

Yet † still one gen'ral cry the skies assails,
And gain and grandeur load the tainted gales;
Few know the toiling statesman's fear or care,
Th' insidious rival and the gaping heir.

Once † more, Democritus, arise on earth,
With cheerful wisdom and instructive mirth,
See motley life in modern trappings dress'd,
And feed with varied fools th' eternal jest:
Thou who couldst laugh where want enchain'd ca-price,

Toil crush'd conceit, and man was of a piece;
Where wealth unlov'd without a mourner dy'd;
And scarce a sycophant was fed by pride;
Where ne'er was known the form of mock debate,
Or seen a new-made mayor's unwieldy state;
Where change of fav'rites made no change of laws,

And senates heard before they judg'd a cause;
How wouldst thou shake at Britain's modish tribe,
Dart the quick taunt, and edge the piercing gibe?

* Ver. 12.---22.

† Ver. 23.---27.

‡ Ver. 28.---55

Attentive truth and nature to descry,
And pierce each scene with philosophic eye.
To thee were solemn toys or empty show,
The robes of pleasure and the veils of woe:
All aid the farce, and all thy mirth maintain,
Whose joys are causeless, or whose griefs are vain.

Such was the scorn that fill'd the sage's mind,
Renew'd at every glance on human kind;
How just that scorn ere yet thy voice declare,
Search every state, and canvass ev'ry pray'r.

* Unnumber'd suppliant's crowd preferment's gate,

A thirst for wealth, and burning to be great;
Delusive fortune hears th' incessant call,
They mount, they shine, evaporate, and fall.
On ev'ry stage the foes of peace attend,
Hate dogs their slight, and insult mocks their end.
Love ends with hope, the sinking statesman's door
Pours in the morning worshipping no more;
For growing names the weekly scribbler lies,
To growing wealth the dedicator flies;
From ev'ry room descends the painted face,
That hung the bright palladium of the place,
And smok'd in kitchens, or in auctions sold,
To better features yields the frame of gold;
For now no more we trace in ev'ry line
Heroic worth, benevolence divine:
The form distorted justifies the fall,
And detestation rids th' indignant wall.

But will not Britain hear the last appeal,
Sign her foes doom, or guard her fav'rites zeal?
Through freedom's sons no more remonstrance rings,

Degrading nobles and controuling kings;
Our supple tribes repress their patriot throats,
And ask no questions but the price of votes;
With weekly libels and septennial ale,
Their wish is full to riot and to rail.

In full-blown dignity, see Wolfey stand,
Law in his voice, and fortune in his hand:
To him the church, the realm, their pow'rs con-
sign,

Through him the rays of regal bounty shine,
Turn'd by his nod the stream of honour flows,
His smile alone security bestows:
Still to new heights his restless wishes tow'r;
Claim leads to claim, and pow'r advances pow'r;
Till conquest-unresisted ceas'd to please,
And rights submitted, left him none to seize.
At length his sov'reign frowns---the train of state
Mark the keen glance, and watch the sign to hate
Where-e'er he turns he meets a stranger's eye,
His suppliants scorn him, and his followers fly;
Now drops at once the pride of awful state,
The golden canopy, the glitt'ring plate,
The regal palace, the luxurious board,
The liv'ried army, and the menial lord.
With age, with cares, with maladies oppress'd,
He seeks the refuge of monastic rest.
Grief aids disease, remember'd folly stings,
And his last sighs reproach the faith of kings.

Speak thou, whose thoughts at humble peace
repine,
Shall Wolfey's wealth, with Wolfey's end be thine?

* Ver. 56---107.

Or liv'st thou now, with safer pride content,
The wisest justice on the banks of Trent?
For why did Wolfey near the steeps of fate,
On weak foundations raise th' enormous weight?
Why but to sink beneath misfortune's blow,
With louder ruin to the gulfs below?

What *gave great Villiers to the assassin's knife,

And fix'd disease on Harley's closing life?
What murder'd Wentworth, and what exile'd Hyde,

And pow'r too great to keep, or to resign?

Are these thy views? proceed, illustrious youth,
And virtue guard thee to the throne of truth!
Yet should thy soul indulge the gen'rous heat,
Till captive science yields her last retreat;
Should reason guide thee with her brightest ray,
And pour on misty doubt resistless day;
Should no false kindness lure to loose delight,
Nor praise relax, nor difficulty fright;
Should tempting novelty thy cell refrain,
And sloth effuse her opiate fumes in vain;
Should beauty blunt on fops her fatal dart,
Nor claim the triumph of a letter'd heart;
Should no disease thy torpid veins invade,
Nor melancholy's phantoms haunt thy shade;
Yet hope not life from grief or danger free,
Nor think the doom of man revers'd for thee:
Deign on the passing world to turn thine eyes,
And pause a while from learning, to be wise;
There mark what ill the scholar's life assails,
Toil, envy, want, the patron, and the jail.
See nations slowly wise, and meanly just,
To buried merit raise the tardy bust.

‡ There is a tradition, that the study of Friar Bacon, built on an arch over the bridge, will fall, when a man greater than Bacon shall pass under it.

§ A very learned divine and mathematician, fellow of New College Oxford, and rector of Okertox near Banbury. He wrote, among many others, a Latin Treatise De Natura Cæli, &c. in which he attacked the sentiments of Scaliger and Aristotle; not bearing to hear it urged that some things are true in philosophy and false in divinity. He made above six hundred sermons on the harmony of the Evangelists. Being unsuccessful in publishing his works, he lay in the prison of Bocardo at Oxford, and the King's-Bench; till Bishop Usher, Dr. Laud, Sir William Boswell, and Dr. Pink, released him by paying his debts. He petitioned King Charles I. to be sent into Ethiopia, &c. to procure MSS. Having spoke in favour of monarchy and bishops, he was plundered by the parliament forces, and twice carried away prisoner from his rectory; and afterwards had not a shirt to shift him in three

Nor deem, when learning her last prize bestows,

See when the vulgar 'scapes, despis'd or aw'd,
Rebellion's vengeful talons seize on Laud.
From meaner minds, though smaller fines content
The plunder'd palace or sequester'd rent;
Mark'd out by dang'rous parts he meets the shock,
And fatal learning leads him to the block:
Around his tomb let art and genius weep,
But hear his death, ye blockheads, hear and sleep.

The * festal blazes, the triumphal show,
The ravish'd standard, and the captive foe,
The senate's thanks, the gazette's pompous tale,
With force resistless o'er the brave prevail.
Such bribes the rapid Greek o'er Asia whirl'd,
For such the steady Romans shook the world;
For such in distant lands the Britons shine,
And stain with blood the Danube or the Rhine;
This pow'r has praise, that virtue scarce can warm,
Till fame supplies the universal charm.
Yet reason frowns on war's unequal game,
Where wasted nations raise a single name,
And mortgag'd states their grandfires wreaths regret,

From age to age in everlasting debt;
Wreaths which at last the dear-bought right convey
To rust on medals, or on stones decay.

Unconquer'd lord of pleasure and of pain;
No joys to him pacific sceptres yield,
War sounds the trump, he rushes to the field;
Behold surrounding kings their pow'r combine,
And one capitulate, and one resign;
Peace courts his hand, but spreads her charms in
vain;

“ Think nothing gain'd, he cries, till nought re-
“ On Moscow's walls till Gothic standards fly,
“ And all be mine beneath the polar sky.”
The march begins in military state,
And nations on his eye suspended wait;
Stern famine guards the solitary coast,
And winter barricades the realms of frost;
He comes, nor want nor cold his course delay;—
Hide, blushing glory, hide Pultowa's day:
The vanquis'd hero leaves his broken bands,
And shows his miseries in distant lands;
Condemn'd a needy supplicant to wait,
While ladies interpose, and slaves debate.
But did not chance at length her error mend?
Did no subverted empire mark his end?
Did rival monarchs give the fatal wound?
Or hostile millions press him to the ground?
His fall was destin'd to a barren strand,
A petty fortreis, and a dubious hand;
He left the name, at which the world grew pale,
To point a moral, or adorn a tale.

In gay hostility, and barb'rous pride,
With half mankind embattled at his side,
Great Xerxes comes to seize the certain prey,
And starves exhausted regions in his way;
Attendant flatt'ry counts his myriads o'er,
Till counted myriads sooth his pride no more;
Fresh praise is try'd till madness fires his mind,
The waves he lashes, and enchains the wind;
New pow'rs are claim'd, new pow'rs are still bestow'd,

Till rude resistance lops the spreading god;
The daring Greeks deride the martial show,
And heap their valleys with the gaudy foe;
Th' insulted sea with humbler thoughts he gains,
A single skiff to speed his flight remains;
Th' encumber'd oar scarce leaves the dreaded coast
Through purple billows and a floating host.

The bold Bavarian, in a luckless hour,
Tries the dread summits of Cæsarean pow'r,
With unexpected legions bursts away,
And sees defenceless realms receive his sway;
Short sway! fair Austria spreads her mournful
charms,

The queen, the beauty, sets the world in arms;
From hill to hill the beacons rousing blaze
Spreads wide the hope of plunder and of praise;
The fierce Croation, and the wild Huffar,
With all the sons of savage crowd the war;
The baffled prince in honour's flatt'ring bloom
Of haity greatness finds the fatal doom,
His foes derision, and his subjects blame,
And steals to death from anguish and from shame.

Enlarge * my life with multitude of days,
In health, in sickness, thus the suppliant prays;
Hides from himself his state, and shuns to know,
That life protracted, is protracted woe.
Time hovers o'er, impatient to destroy,
And shuns up all the passages of joy:
In vain their gifts the bounteous seasons pour,
The fruit autumnal, and the vernal flow'r,
With lifeless eyes the dotard views the store,
He views, and wonders that they please no
more;

Now pall the tasteless meats, and joyless wines,
And luxury with sighs her slave resigns.
Approach, ye minstrels, try the soothing strain,
Diffuse the tuneful lenitives of pain:
No sounds, alas! would touch th' impervious ear,
Though dancing mountains witness'd Orpheus

Nor lute nor lyre his feeble pow'rs attend,
Nor sweeter music of a virtuous friend,
But everlasting dictates crowd his tongue,
Perversely grave, or positively wrong.
The still returning tale, and ling'ring jest,
Perplex the fawning niece and pamper'd guest,
While growing hopes scarce awe the gather'ing
sneer,

And scarce a legacy can bribe to hear;
The watchful guests still hint the last offence,
The daughter's petulance, the son's expence,
Improve his heady rage with treach'rous skill,
And mould his passions till they make his will:

Unnumber'd maladies his joints invade,
Lay siege to life, and press the dire blockade;

* Ver. 188---288.

But unextinguish'd av'rice still remains,
And dreaded losses aggravate his pains;
He turns, with anxious heart and crippled hands,
His bonds of debt, and mortgages of lands;
Or views his coffers with suspicious eyes,
Unlocks his gold, and counts it till he dies.

But grant, the virtues of a temp'rate prime
Bless with an age exempt from scorn or crime;
An age that melts with unperceiv'd decay,
And glides in modest innocence away;
Whose peaceful day benevolence endears,
Whose night congratulating conscience cheers;
The gen'ral favourite as the gen'ral friend:
Such age there is, and who shall wish its end?

Yet ev'n on this her load misfortune flings,
To press the weary minutes flagging wings;
New sorrow rises as the day returns,
A sister sickens, or a daughter mourns.
Now kindred merit fills the sable bier,
Now lacerated friendship claims a tear.
Year chafes year, decay pursues decay,
Still drops some joy from with'ring life away;
New forms arise, and diff'rent views engage,
Superfluous lags the vet'ran on the stage,
Till pitying nature signs the last release,
And bids afflicted worth retire to peace.

But few there are whom hours like these await,
Who set uncloded in the gulfs of fate.
From Lydia's monarch should the search descend,
By Solon caution'd to regard his end,
In life's last scene what prodigies surprize,
Fears of the brave, and follies of the wise?
From Marlborough's eyes the streams of dotage
flow,

And Swift expires a driv'ler and a show.

The * teeming mother, anxious for her race,
Begs for each birth the fortune of a face:
Yet Vane could tell what ills from beauty spring;
And Sedley curs'd the form that pleas'd a king.
Ye nymphs of rosy lips and radiant eyes,
Whom pleasure keeps too busy to be wise,
Whom joys with soft varieties invite,
By day the frolic, and the dance by night,
Who frown with vanity, who smile with art,
And ask the latest fashion of the heart,
What care, what rules your heedless charms shall save,

Each nymph your rival, and each youth your slave?
Against your fame with fondness hate combines,
The rival batters, and the lovers mines.
With distant voice neglected virtue calls,
Less heard and less, the faint remonstrance falls;
Tir'd with contempt, she quits the slipp'ry reign,
And pride and prudence take her seat in vain.
In crowd at once, where none the pass defend,
The harmless freedom, and the private friend.
The guardians yield, by force superior ply'd;
To int'rest, prudence; and to flattery, pride.
Here beauty falls betray'd, despis'd, distress'd;
And hissing infamy proclaims the rest.

Where † then shall hope and fear their objects find?

Must dull suspense corrupt the stagnant mind?
Must helpless man, in ignorance sedate,
Roll darkling down the torrent of his fate?

Must no dislike alarm, no wishes rise,
No cries invoke the mercies of the skies?
Inquirer, cease, petitions yet remain,
Which Heav'n may hear, nor deem religion vain.
Still raise for good the supplicating voice,
But leave to Heav'n the measure and the choice.
Safe in his pow'r, whose eyes discern afar
The secret ambush of a specious pray'r.
Implore his aid, in his decisions rest,
Secure whate'er he gives, he gives the best.
Yet when the sense of sacred presence fires,
And strong devotion to the skies aspires,
Pour forth thy fervours for a healthful mind,
Obedient passions, and a will resign'd;
For love, which scarce collective man can fill;
For patience, sov'reign o'er transmut'd ill;
For faith, that panting for a happier seat,
Counts death kind nature's signal of retreat:
These goods for man the laws of heav'n ordain,
These goods he grants, who grants the pow'r to
gain;
With these celestial wisdom calms the mind,
And makes the happiness she does not find.

PROLOGUE SPOKEN BY MR. GARRICK,

AT THE OPENING OF THE THEATRE ROYAL,
DRURY-LANE, 1747.

WHEN learning's triumph o'er her barbarous foes
First rear'd the stage, immortal Shakspeare rose;
Each change of many-colour'd life he drew,
Exhausted worlds, and then imagin'd new:
Existence saw him spurn her bounded reign,
And panting time toil'd after him in vain.
His powerful strokes presiding truth impress'd,
And unresist'd passion storm'd the breast.

Then Jonson came, instructed from the school,
To please in method, and invent by rule;
His studious patience and laborious art,
By regular approach essay'd the heart:
Cold approbation gave the lingering bays;
For those who durst not censure, scarce could praise.

A mortal born, he met the gen'ral doom,
But left, like Egypt's kings, a lasting tomb.

The wits of Charles found easier ways to fame,
Nor wish'd for Jonson's art, or Shakspeare's flame.
Themselves they studied; as they felt, they writ:
Intrigue was plot, obscenity was wit.
Vice always found a sympathetic friend;
They pleas'd their age, and did not aim to mend.
Yet bards like these aspir'd to lasting praise,
And proudly hop'd to pimp in future days.
Their cause was gen'ral, their supports were strong;
Their slaves were willing, and their reign was long:

Till shame regain'd the post that sense betray'd,
And virtue call'd oblivion to her aid.

Then crush'd by rules, and weaken'd as rein'd,
For years the pow'r of tragedy declin'd;
From bard to bard the frigid caution crept,
Till declamation roar'd whilst passion slept;
Yet still did virtue deign the stage to tread,
Philosophy remain'd though nature fled.
But forc'd, at length, her ancient reign to quit,
She saw great Faustus lay the ghost of wit;

* Ver. 289.---345. † Ver. 346.---366.

Exulting folly hail'd the joyous day,
 And pantomime and song confirm'd her sway.
 But who the coming changes can preface,
 And mark the future periods of the stage?
 Perhaps if skill could distant times explore,
 New Behns, new Durseys, yet remain in store;
 Perhaps where Lear has rav'd, and Hamlet dy'd,
 On flying cars new forcerers may ride;
 Perhaps (for who can guess th' effects of chance)
 Here Hunt may box, or Mahomet * may dance.
 Hard is his lot that here by fortune plac'd,
 Must watch the wild vicissitudes of taste;
 With every meteor of caprice must play,
 And chafe the new-blown bubbles of the day.
 Ah! let not censure term our fate our choice,
 The stage but echoes back the public voice;
 The drama's laws, the drama's patrons give,
 For we that live to please, must please to live.

Then prompt no more the follies you decry,
 As tyrants doom their tools of guilt to die;
 'Tis yours, this night, to bid the reign commence
 Of rescu'd nature, and reviving sense;
 To chafe the charms of sound, the pomp of show,
 For useful mirth and salutary woe;
 Bid scenic virtue from the rising age,
 And truth diffuse her radiance from the stage.

PROLOGUE

Spoken by Mr. Garrick, April 5. 1750, before the Masque of Comus, acted at Drury-Lane Theatre, for the benefit of Milton's grand-daughter.

Ye patriot crowds who burn for England's fame,
 Ye nymphs whose bosoms beat at Milton's name,
 Whose generous zeal, unbought by flatter'ing rhymes,

Shames the mean pensions of Augustan times;
 Immortal patrons of succeeding days,
 Attend this prelude of perpetual praise;
 Let wit condemn'd the feeble war to wage,
 With close malevolence, or public rage;
 Let study, worn with virtue's fruitless lore,
 Behold this theatre, and grieve no more.
 This night, distinguish'd by your smiles, shall tell
 That never Britain can in vain excel;
 The slighted arts futurity shall trust,
 And rising ages hasten to be just.

At length our mighty bard's victorious lays
 Fill the loud voice of universal praise;
 And baffled spite, with hopeless anguish dumb,
 Yields to renown the centuries to come;
 With ardent haste each candidate of fame,
 Ambitious catches at his tow'ring name;
 He sees, and pitying sees, vain wealth bestow
 Those pageant honours which he scorn'd below,
 While crowds aloft the laureat bust behold,
 Or trace his form on circulating gold.
 Unknown—unheeded, long his offspring lay,
 And want hung threat'ning o'er her slow decay.
 What though the shine with no Miltonian fire,
 No favouring muse her morning dreams inspire?
 Yet softer claims the melting heart engage,
 Her youth laborious, and her blameless age;

* Hunt a famous boxer on the stage: Mahomet, a rope dancer, who had exhibited at Covent-Garden theatre the winter before, said to be a Turk.

Hers the mild merits of domestic life,
 The patient sufferer, and the faithful wife.
 Thus grac'd with humble virtue's native charms
 Her grandfire leaves her in Britannia's arms;
 Secure with peace, with competence to dwell,
 While tutelary nations guard her cell.
 Yours is the charge, ye fair, ye wife, ye brave!
 'Tis yours to crown desert—beyond the grave.

PROLOGUE

TO THE COMEDY OF THE GOOD-NATURED MAN 1769.

Prest by the load of life, the weary mind
 Surveys the general toil of human kind,
 With cool submission joins the lab'ring train,
 And social sorrow loses half its pain;
 Our anxious bard without complaint may share
 This bustling season's epidemic care;
 Like Cæsar's pilot dignify'd by fate,
 To sit in one common storm with all the great;
 Distress alike the statesman and the wit,
 When one a borough courts, and one the pit.
 The busy candidates for power and fame
 Have hopes, and fears, and wishes just the same;
 Disabled both to combat, or to fly,
 Must hear all taunts, and hear without reply.
 Uncheck'd on both, loud rabbles vent their rage,
 As mongrels bay the lion in a cage.

Th' offended burgeshs hoards his angry tale,
 For that blest year when all that vote may rail
 Their schemes of spite the poet's foes dismiss,
 Till that glad night when all that hate may hiss.
 "This day the powder'd curls and golden coat,"
 Says swelling Crispin, "begg'd a cobbler's vote;"
 "This night our wit," the pert apprentice cries,
 "Lies at my feet; I hiss him, and he dies."
 The great 'tis true, can charm th' electing tribe,
 The bard may supplicate, but cannot bribe.
 Yet judg'd by those whose voices ne'er were sold
 He feels no want of ill-persuading gold;
 But confident of praise, if praise be due,
 Trusts without fear to merit and to you.

PROLOGUE

*To the Comedy of a Word to the Wife , spoken by Mr. Hull.

This night presents a play which public rage,
 Or right, or wrong, once heated from the stage †.
 From zeal or malice, now no more we dread,
 For English vengeance wars not with the dead.
 A generous foe regards with pitying eye
 The man whom fate has laid, where all must lie.
 To wit reviving from its author's dust,
 Be kind ye judges, or at least be just.
 For no renew'd hostilities invade
 Th' oblivious grave's inviolable shade.
 Let one great payment every claim appease,
 And him who cannot hurt, allow to please;

* Performed at Covent-Garden theatre in 1777.
 for the benefit of Mrs. Kelly, widow of Hugh Kelly,
 Esq. (the author of the play) and her children.

† Upon the first representation of this play, 1770,
 a party assembled to damn it, and succeeded.

To please by scenes unconscious of offence,
 By harmless merriment, or useful sense.
 Where aught of bright, or fair the piece displays,
 Approve it only—'tis too late to praise.
 If want of skill, or want of care appear,
 Forbear to hiss—the poet cannot hear.
 By all like him must praise and blame be found,
 At best a fleeting gleam, or empty sound.
 Yet then shall calm reflection bless the night,
 When liberal pity dignify'd delight;
 When pleasure fir'd her torch at virtue's flame,
 And mirth was bounty with an humbler name.

SPRING,

AN ODE.

STERN Winter now, by Spring repress'd,
 Forbears the long continued strife;
 And nature on her naked breast,
 Delights to catch the gales of life,

Now o'er the rural kingdom roves
 Soft pleasure with her laughing train,
 Love warbles in the vocal groves,
 And vegetation plants the plain.

Unhappy! whom to beds of pain,
 Arthritic * tyranny consigns;
 Whom smiling nature courts in vain,
 Though rapture sings and beauty shines,

Yet though my limbs disease invades,
 Her wings imagination tries,
 And bears me to the peaceful shades
 Where ——'s humble turret's rise.

Here stop, my soul, thy rapid flight,
 Nor from the pleasing groves depart,
 Where first great nature charm'd my sight,
 Where wisdom first inform'd my heart.

Here let me through the vales pursue
 A guide—a father—and a friend,
 Once more great nature's works renew,
 Once more on wisdom's voice attend.

From false carcasses, causeless strife,
 Wild hope, vain fear, alike remov'd;
 Here let me learn the use of life;
 When best enjoy'd—when most improv'd.

Teach me, thou venerable bower,
 Cool meditation's quiet seat,
 The generous scorn of venal power,
 The silent grandeur of retreat.

When pride by guilt to greatness climbs,
 Or raging faction's rush to war,
 Here let me learn to shun the crimes
 I can't prevent, and will not share.

But lest I fall by subtler foes,
 Bright wisdom teach me Curio's art,
 The swelling passions to compose,
 And quell the rebels of the heart.

MIDSUMMER,

AN ODE.

O PHOEBUS! down the western sky,
 Far hence diffuse thy burning ray,

* The author being ill of the gout

Thy light to distant worlds supply,
 And wake them to the cares of day.

Come gentle eve, the friend of care,
 Come Cynthia, lovely queen of night!
 Refresh me with a cooling breeze,
 And cheer me with a lambent light.

Lay me, where o'er the verdant ground
 Her living carpet nature spreads;
 Where the green bower with roses crown'd,
 In showers its fragrant foliage sheds.

Improve the peaceful hour with wine,
 Let music die along the grove;
 Around the bowl let myrtles twine,
 And every strain be tun'd to love.

Come, Stella, queen of all my heart!
 Come, born to fill its vast desires!
 Thy looks perpetual joys impart,
 Thy voice perpetual love inspires.

While all my wish and thine complete,
 By turns we languish and we burn,
 Let sighing gales our sighs repeat,
 Our murmurs—murmuring brooks return.

Let me when nature calls to rest,
 And blushing skies the morn foretell,
 Sink on the down of Stella's breast,
 And bid the waking world farewell.

AUTUMN,

AN ODE.

ALAS! with swift and silent pace,
 Impatient time rolls on the year;
 The seasons change, and nature's face
 Now sweetly smiles, now frowns severe.

'Twas Spring, 'twas Summer, all was gay,
 Now Autumn bends a cloudy brow;
 The flowers of Spring are swept away,
 And Summer fruits desert the bough.

The verdant leaves that play'd on high,
 And waltz'd on the western breeze,
 Now trod in dust neglected lie,
 As Boreas strips the bending trees.

The fields that wav'd with golden grain,
 As russet heaths are wild and bare;
 Not moist with dew, but drench'd in rain,
 Nor health, nor pleasure wanders there.

No more while through the midnight shade,
 Beneath the moon's pale orb I stray,
 Soft pleasing woes my heart invade,
 As Progne pours the melting lay.

From this capricious clime she soars,
 O! would some god but wings supply!
 To where each morn the Spring restores,
 Companion of her flight I'd fly.

Vain wish! me fate compels to bear
 The downward seasons iron reign,
 Compels to breathe polluted air,
 And shiver on a blasted plain.

What blifs to life can Autumn yield,
If glooms, and showers, and storms prevail;
And Ceres flies the naked field,
And flowers, and fruits, and Phœbus fail?

Oh! what remains, what lingers yet,
To cheer me in the darkening hour?
The grape remains! the friend of wit,
In love, and mirth, of mighty power.

Haste—press the clusters, fill the bowl;
Apollo! shoot thy parting ray:
This gives the sunshine of the soul,
This god of health, and verse, and day.

Still—still the jocund strain shall flow,
The pulse with vigorous rapture beat;
My Stella with new charms shall glow,
And every blifs in wine shall meet.

WINTER,

AN ODE.

No more the morn, with tepid rays,
Unfolds the flower of various hue;
Noon spreads no more the genial blaze,
Nor gentle eve distils the dew.

The lingering hours prolong the night,
Usurping darkness shares the day;
Her mists restrain the force of light,
And Phœbus holds a doubtful sway.

By gloomy twilight half reveal'd,
With sighs we view the hoary hill,
The leafless wood, the naked field,
The snow-topt cot, the frozen rill.

No music warbles through the grove,
No vivid colours paint the plain;
No more with devious steps I rove
Through verdant paths now sought in vain.

Around the driving tempest roars,
Congeal'd, impetuous flowers descend;
Haste, close the windows, bar the doors,
Fate leaves me Stella, and a friend.

In nature's aid let art supply
With light and heat my little sphere;
Rouze, rouze the fire, and pile it high,
Light up a constellation here.

Let music sound the voice of joy!
Or mirth repeat the jocund tale;
Let love his wanton wiles employ,
And o'er the season wine prevail.

Yet time life's dreary winter brings,
When mirth's gay tale shall please no more;
Nor music charm—though Stella sings;
Nor love, nor wine, the spring restore.

Catch then, O! catch the transient hour,
Improve each moment as it flies;
Life's a short summer—man a flower,
He dies—alax! how soon he dies!

THE WINTER'S WALK.

Hold, my fair, where'er we rove,
What dreary prospects round us rise;

The naked hill, the leafless grove,
The hoary ground, the frowning skies!

Not only thought the wasted plain,
Stern Winter in thy force confess'd
Still wider spreads thy horrid reign,
I feel thy power usurp my breast.

Enlivening hope, and fond desire,
Resign the heart to spleen and care
Scarce frighted love maintains her fire,
And rapture saddens to despair.

In groundless hope and causeless fear,
Unhappy man! behold thy doom;
Still changing with the changeful year,
The slave of sunshine and of gloom.

Tir'd with vain joys, and false alarms,
With mental and corporeal strife,
Snatch me, my Stella, to thy arms,
And screen me from the ills of life.

TO MISS *****

*On her giving the Author a Gold and silk Net-work
Perfè of her own weaving*.*

THOUGH gold and silk their charms unite
To make thy curious web delight,
In vain the varied work would shine,
If wrought by any hand but thine;
Thy hand that knows the subtler art,
To weave those nets that catch the heart.
Spread out by me, the roving coin
Thy nets may catch, but not confine;
Nor can I hope thy silken chain
The glittering vagrants shall restrain.
Why, Stella, was it then decreed
The heart once caught should ne'er be freed?

TO MISS *****

On her playing upon the Harpsicord in a Room hung with Flower-pieces of her own Painting.*

WHEN Stella strikes the tuneful string
In scenes of imitated Spring,
Where beauty lavishes her powers
On beds of never-fading flowers,
And pleasure propagates around
Each charm of modulated sound;
Ah! think not in the dangerous hour,
The nymph fictitious as the flower,
But slun, rash youth, the gay alcove,
Nor tempt the snares of wily love.
When charms thus press on every sense,
What thought of flight, or of defence?
Deceitful hope, and vain desire,
For ever flutter o'er her lyre,
Delighting as the youth draws nigh,
To point the glances of her eye,
And forming with unerring art
New chains to hold the captive heart.
But on those regions of delight
Might truth intrude with daring flight.
Could Stella, sprightly, fair, and young,
One moment hear the moral song,

* Printed among Mrs. Williams's Miscellanies.

Instruction with her flowers might spring,
And wisdom warble from her string.

Mark when from thousand mingled dyes
Thou seest one pleasing form arise,
How active light, and thoughtful shade,
In greater scenes each other aid.
Mark when the different notes agree
In friendly contrariety,
How passions well accorded strife,
Gives all the harmony of life;
Thy pictures shall thy conduct frame,
Consistent still, though not the same;
Thy music teach the nobler art,
To tune the regulated heart.

EVENING,

AN ODE. TO STELLA.

EVENING now from purple wings
Sheds the grateful gifts she brings;
Brilliant drops bedeck the mead,
Cooling breezes shake the reed;
Shake the reed, and curl the stream
Silver'd o'er with Cynthia's beam;
Near the chequer'd, lonely grove,
Hears, and keeps thy secrets, love.
Stella, thither let us stray!
Lightly o'er the dewy way.
Phœbus drives his burning car,
Hence, my lovely Stella, far;
In his steed, the queen of night
Round us pours a lambent light;
Light that seems but just to show
Breasts that beat, and cheeks that glow;
Let us now, in whisper'd joy,
Evening's silent hours employ,
Silence best, and conscious shades,
Pleas'd the hearts that love invade,
Other pleasures give them pain,
Lovers all but love disdain.

TO THE SAME.

WHETHER Stella's eyes are found,
Fix'd on earth, or glancing round,
If her face with pleasure glow,
If she sigh at others woe,
If her easy air express
Conscious worth or soft distress,
Stella's eyes, and air, and face,
Charm with undiminish'd grace.
If on her we see display'd
Pendant gems, and rich brocade,
If her chintz with less expence
Flows in easy negligence;
Still she lights the conscious flame,
Still her charms appear the same;
If she strikes the vocal strings,
If she's silent, speaks, or sings,
If she sit, or if she move,
Still we love, and still approve.
Vain the casual, transient glance,
Which alone can please by chance,
Beauty, which depends on art,
Changing with the changing art,
Which demands the toilet's aid,
Pendant gems and rich brocade,

I those charms alone can prize,
Which from constant nature rise,
Which nor circumstance, nor dress,
E'er can make, or more, or less.

TO A FRIEND.

No more thus brooding o'er yon heap,
With avarice painful vigils keep;
Still unenjoy'd the present store,
Still endless sighs are breath'd for more.
O! quit the shadow, catch the prize,
Which not all India's treasure buys!
To purchase heaven has gold the power?
Can gold remove the mortal hour?
In life can love be bought with gold?
Are friendship's pleasures to be sold?
No—all that's worth a wish—a thought.
Fair virtue gives unbrib'd, unbought.
Cease then on trash thy hopes to bind,
Let nobler views engage thy mind.

With science tread the wondrous way,
Or learn the muses moral lay;
In social hours indulge thy soul,
Where mirth and temperance mix the bowl;
To virtuous love resign thy breast,
And be, by blessing beauty—blest.

Thus taste the feast by nature spread,
Ere youth and all its joys are fled;
Come taste with me the balm of life,
Secure from pomp, and wealth and strife.
I boast what'er for man was meant,
In health, and Stella, and content;
And scorn! Oh! let that scorn be thine!
Mere things of clay, that dig the mine.

STELLA IN MOURNING.

WHEN lately Stella's form display'd
The beauties of the gay brocade,
The nymphs who found their power decline,
Proclaim'd her not so fair as fine.
"Fate! snatch away the bright disguise,
"And let the goddesses trust her eyes."
Thus blindly pray'd the fretful fair,
And fate malicious heard the pray'r;
But brighten'd by the fable dress,
As virtue rises in distress,
Since Stella still extends her regin,
Ah! how shall envy sooth her pain?
Th' adoring youth and envious fair,
Henceforth shall form one common prayer;
And love and hate alike implore
The skies—"That Stella mourn no more."

TO STELLA.

NOT the soft sighs of vernal gales,
The fragrance of the flowery vales,
The murmurs of the crystal rill,
The vocal grove, the verdant hill;
Not all their charms, though all unite,
Can touch my bosom with delight.

Not all the gems on India's shore,
Not all Peru's unbounded store,
Not all the power, nor all the fame,
That heroes, kings, or poets claim;

Nor knowledge which the learn'd approve,
To form one with my soul can move.

Yet nature's charms allure my eyes,
And knowledge, wealth, and fame I prize;
Fame, wealth, and knowledge I obtain,
Nor seek I nature's charms in vain;
In lovely Stella all combine,
And, lovely Stella! thou art mine.

VERSES,

*Written at the Request of a Gentleman to whom a Lady had given a Sprig of Myrtle **

WHAT hopes—what terrors does this gift create!
Ambiguous emblem of uncertain fate.
The myrtle (ensign of supreme command,
Consign'd to Venus by Melissa's hand)
Not less capricious than a reigning fair,
Oft favours, oft rejects a lover's prayer.
In myrtle shades oft sings the happy swain,
In myrtle shades despairing ghosts complain.
The myrtle crowns the happy lovers heads,
The unhappy lovers graves the myrtle spreads.
Oh! then, the meaning of thy gift impart,
And ease the throbbings of an anxious heart.
Soon must this sprig, as you shall fix its doom,
Adorn Philander's head, or grace his tomb.

TO LADY FIREBRACE *,

AT BURY ASSIZES.

AT length must Suffolk beauties shine in vain,
So long renown'd in B——n's deathless strain?
Thy charms at least, fair Firebrace, might inspire
Some zealous bard to wake the sleeping lyre;

* These verses were first printed in a Magazine for 1768, under the name of Hammond, and have frequently been ascribed to Mr. Derrick. According to the statement of Miss Seward and Mr. White of Litchfield, they were written by Johnson, when a school-boy, and addressed to Lucy Porter, the first object of his early love, whose mother he married; and afterwards given to Mr. Hector of Birmingham, in 1731, for his friend Mr. Morgan Graves, without thinking it material to avow their pre-existence. Lucy Porter was then on a visit to her aunt, Mrs. Hunter, brother of Mr. Porter of Birmingham, and second wife of Mr. Hunter, Johnson's schoolmaster. She was four years younger than Johnson; and uniformly said, that the verses were addressed to "herself, when he was a lad," on her having given him some myrtle. See "Gentleman's Magazine," for 1793, 1794.

† *This lady was Bridget, third daughter of Philip Bacon, Esq. of Ipswich, and relict of Philip Evers, Esq. of that town; she became the second wife of Sir Cordell Firebrace, the last Baronet of that name (to whom she brought a fortune of 25,000*l.), July 26. 1737. Being again left a widow in 1759, she was a third time married, April 7. 1762, to William Campbell, Esq. uncle to the present Duke of Argyll, and died July 3. 1782.

For such thy beauteous mind and lovely face,
Thou seem'st at once, bright nymph, a muse and grace.

TO LYCE,

AN ELDERLY LADY.

YE nymphs whom starry rays invest,
By flattering poets given,
Who shine by lavish lovers drest,
In all the pomp of heaven;

Engross not all the beams on high,
Which gild a lover's lays,
But as your sister of the sky,
Let Lyce share the praise.

Her silver locks display the moon,
Her brows a cloudy show,
Strip'd rainbows round her eyes are seen,
And showers from either flow.

Her teeth the night with darkness dyes,
She's starr'd with pimples o'er;
Her tongue like nimble lightning plies,
And can with thunder roar.

But some Zelinda, while I sing,
Denies my Lyce shines;
And all the pens of Cupid's wing
Attack my gentle lines.

Yet spite of fair Zelinda's eye,
And all her bards express,
My Lyce makes as good a sky,
And I but flatter less.

ON THE DEATH OF MR. ROBERT LEVETT,

A PRACTISER IN PHYSIC.

CONDEMN'D to hope's delusive mine,
As on we toil from day to day,
By sudden comforts, or slow decline,
Our social comforts drop away.

Well try'd through many a varying year,
See Levett to the grave descend,
Officious, innocent, sincere,
Of every friendless name the friend.

Yet still he fills affection's eye,
Obscurely wise and coarsely kind;
Nor letter'd arrogance deny
Thy praise to merit unrefin'd.

When fainting nature call'd for aid,
And hovering death prepar'd the blow,
His vigorous remedy display'd
The power of art without the show.

In misery's darkest cavern known,
His useful care was ever nigh,
Where hopeless anguish pour'd his groan,
And lonely want retir'd to die.

No summons mock'd by chill delay,
No petty gain disdain'd by pride;
The modest wants of every day
The toil of every day supply'd.

His virtues walk'd their narrow round,
Nor made a pause, nor left a void;
And sure th' Eternal Master found
The single talent well employ'd.

The busy day—the peaceful night,
Unfelt, uncounted, glided by;
His frame was firm—his powers were bright,
Though now his eightieth year was nigh.

Then with no fiery throbbing pain,
No cold gradations of decay,
Death broke at once the vital chain,
And freed his soul the nearest way.

EPITAPH

ON CLAUDE PHILLIPS,
An Itinerant Musician.*

PHILLIPS! whose touch harmonious could remove
The pangs of guilty pow'r and hapless love,
Rest here, distress'd by poverty no more,
Find here that calm thou gav'st so oft before;
Sleep undisturb'd within this peaceful shrine,
Till angels wakè thee with a note like thine.

* These lines are among Mrs. Williams's Miscellanies. They were written by Johnson almost extempore, upon Garrick's repeating an Epitaph on Phillips, by a Dr. Wilkes, in these words:

" Exalted soul! whose harmony could please
" The love-sick virgin, and the gouty ease;
" Could jarring discord, like Amphion, move
" To beauteous order, and harmonious love,
" Rest here in peace, till angels bid thee rise,
" And meet thy blessed Saviour in the skies.

Phillips was a travelling fiddler up and down Wales, and was greatly celebrated for his performance.

PARAPHRASE OF THE ABOVE EPITAPH.

BY DR. JOHNSON*.

THOU who survey'st these walls with curious eye,
Pause at this tomb where HANMER's ashes lie;
His various worth through varied life attend,
And learn his virtues while thou mourn'st his end.

His force of genius burn'd in early youth,
With thirst of knowledge, and with love of truth;
His learning, join'd with each endearing art,
Charm'd ev'ry ear, and gain'd on ev'ry heart.

Thus early wise, th' endanger'd reign to aid,
His country call'd him from the studious shade;
In life's first bloom his public toils began,
At once commenc'd the senator and man.

In business dext'rous, weighty in debate,
Thrice ten long years he labour'd for the state;
In every speech persuasive wisdom glow'd,
In every act resplendent virtue glow'd:
Suspended faction ceas'd from rage and strife,
To hear his eloquence, and praise his life.

Retialess merit fix'd the senate's choice,
Who hail'd him Speaker with united voice.

* This Paraphrase is inserted in Mrs. Williams's Miscellanies. The Latin is there said to be written by Dr. Friend. Of the person whose memory it celebrates, a copious account may be seen in the Appendix to the Supplement to the Biographia Britannica.

Illustrious age! how bright thy glories shone,
While Hanmer fill'd the chair—and Anne the throne!

Then when darkartobscur'd each fierce debate,
When mutual frauds perplex'd the maze of state,
The moderator firmly mild appear'd—
Beheld with love—with veneration heard.

This task perform'd—he fought no gainful post,
Nor wish'd to glitter at his country's cost;
Strict on the right he fix'd his steadfast eye,
With temperate zeal and wife anxiety;
Nor e'er from virtue's paths was lur'd aside,
To pluck the flow'rs of pleasure, or of pride.
Her gifts despis'd, corruption blush'd and fled,
And fame pursu'd him where conviction led.

Age call'd, at length, his active mind to rest,
With honour sated, and with cares oppress'd;
To letter'd ease retir'd and honest mirth,
To rural grandeur and domestic worth:
Delighted still to please mankind, or mend,
The patriot's fire yet sparkled in the friend.

Calm conscience then, his former life survey'd,
And recollected toils endear'd the shade,
Till nature call'd him to the general doom,
And virtue's sorrow dignified his tomb.

TO MISS HICKMAN *

PLAYING ON THE SPINNET.

BRIGHT Stella, form'd for universal reign,
Too well you know to keep the slaves you gain;
When in your eyes resistless lightnings play,
Aw'd into love our conquer'd hearts obey,
And yield reluctant to despotic sway;
But when your music sooths the raging pain,
We bid propitious Heav'n prolong your reign,
We bless the tyrant, and we hug the chain.

When old Timotheus struck the vocal string,
Ambition's fury fir'd the Grecian king:
Unbounded projects lab'ring in his mind,
He pants for room in one poor world confin'd.
Thus wak'd to rage, by music's dreadful pow'r
He bids the sword destroy, the flame devour.
Had Stella's gentle touches mov'd the lyre,
Soon had the monarch felt a nobler fire:
No more delighted with destructive war,
Ambitious only now to please the fair;
Resign'd his thirst of empire to her charms,
And found a thousand worlds in Stella's arms.

PARAPHRASE

OF PROVERBS, CHAP. VI. VERSES 6.—II.

"Go to the Ant, thou Sluggard†."

TURN on the prudent ant thy heedless eyes,
Observe her labours, sluggard, and be wise:

* These lines, which have been communicated by Dr. Turton, son to Mrs. Turton, the lady to whom they are addressed by her maiden name of Hickman, must have been written at least as early as the year 1734, as that was the year of her marriage: at how much earlier a period of Johnson's life they may have been written, is not known.

† In Mrs. Williams's Miscellanies, but now printed from the original in Johnson's own handwriting.

No stern command, no monitory voice
Prescribes her duties, or directs her choice;
Yet timely provident, she hastes away,
To snatch the blessings of the plenteous day;
When fruitful Summer loads the teeming plain,
She crops the harvest, and she stores the grain.
How long shall sloth usurp thy usefless hours,
Unnerve thy vigour, and enchain thy pow'rs?
While artful shades thy downy couch enclose,
And soft solicitation courts repose.
Amidst the drowsy charms of dull delight,
Year chafes year with unremitted flight,
Till want now following, fraudulent and slow,
Shall spring to seize thee like an ambush'd foe.

HORACE,

LIB. IV. ODE VII. TRANSLATED.

THE snow dissolv'd, no more is seen,
The fields and woods, behold! are green.
The changing year renews the plain,
The rivers know their banks again,
The sprightly nymph and naked grace
The mazy dance together trace.
The changing year's successive plan
Proclaims mortality to man.
Rough Winter's blasts to Spring give way,
Spring yields to Summer's sovereign ray;
Then Summer sinks in Autumn's reign,
And Winter chills the world again:
Her losses soon the moon supplies,
But wretched man, when once he lies
Where Priam and his sons are laid,
Is nought but ashes and a shade.
Who knows if Jove, who counts our score,
Will tofs us in a morning more?
What with our friend you nobly share
At least you rescue from your heir.
Not you Torquatus, boast of Rome,
When Minos once has fix'd your doom,
Or eloquence, or splendid birth,
Or virtue, shall restore to earth.
Hippolytus, unjustly slain,
Diana calls to life in vain;
Nor can the might of Theseus rend
The chains of hell that hold his friend.

November 1784.

ON SEEING A BUST OF MRS. MONTAGUE.

HAD this fair figure which this frame displays,
Adorn'd in Roman time the brightest days,
In every dome, in every sacred place,
Her statue would have breath'd an added grace,
And on its basis would have been enroll'd,
"This is Minerva, cast in virtue's mould."

The following Translations, Parodies, and Burlesque Verses, most of them extempore, are taken from Anecdotes of Dr. Johnson, published, by Mrs. Piozzi, (formerly Mrs. Thrale) in 8vo, 1785.

ANACREON, ODE IX.

LOVELY courier of the sky,
Whence and whither dost thou fly?

Scatt'ring, as thy pinions play,
Liquid fragrance all the way:
Is it business? is it love?
Tell me, tell me, gentle dove.
Soft Anacreon's vows I hear,
Vows to Myrtale the fair;
Grac'd with all that charms the heart,
Blushing nature, smiling art.
Venus, courted by an ode,
On the bard her dove bestow'd:
Vest'd with a master's right,
Now Anacreon rules my flight;
His the letters that you see,
Weighty charge, consign'd to me:
Think not yet my service hard,
Joyless talk without reward;
Smiling at my master's gates,
Freedom my return awaits;
But the liberal grant in vain.
Tempt me to be wild again.
Can a prudent dove decline
Blissful bondage such as mine?
Over hills and fields to roam,
Fortune's guest without a home;
Under leaves to hide one's head,
Slightly shelter'd, coarsely fed:
Now my better lot bestows
Sweet repast, and soft repose;
Now the generous bowl I sip
As it leaves Anacreon's lip:
Void of care, and free from dread,
From his fingers snatch his bread;
Then with luscious plenty gay,
Round his chamber dance and play;
Or from wine as courage springs,
O'er his face extend my wings;
And when feast and frolic tire,
Drop asleep upon his lyre.
This is all, be quick and go,
More than all thou canst not know;
Let me now my pinions ply,
I have chatter'd like a pyc.

LINES

Written in ridicule of certain Poems, published in 1777.

WHERESOEVER I turn my view,
All is strange, yet nothing new;
Endless labour all along,
Endless labour to be wrong;
Phrase that time has flung away,
Uncouth words in disarray,
Trick'd in antique ruff and bonnet,
Ode, and elegy, and sonnet.

PARODY OF A TRANSLATION

FROM THE MEDEA OF EURIPIDES.

ERR shall they not, who resolute explore
Times gloomy backward with judicious eyes;

And scanning right the practices of yore,
Shall deem our hoar progenitors unwise.

They to the dome where smoke with curling play
Announc'd the dinner to the regions round,
Summon'd the finger blythe, and harper gay,
And aided wine with dulcet-streaming found.

The better use of notes, or sweet or shrill,
By quivering string or modulated wind;
Trumpet or lyre—to their harsh bosoms chill,
Admission ne'er had fought, or could not find.

Oh! send them to the fullen mansions dun,
Her baleful eyes where sorrow rolls around;
Where gloom-enamour'd mischief loves to dwell,
And murder, all blood-bolter'd, schemes the wound.

When cates luxuriant pile the spacious dish,
And purple nectar glads the festive hour;
The guest, without a want, without a wish,
Can yield no room to music's soothing pow'r.

BURLESQUE

Of the Modern Versifications of Ancient Legendary Tales.

AN IMPROMPTU.

THE tender infant meek and mild,
Fell down upon the stone;
The nurse took up the squealing child,
But still the child squeal'd on.

TRANSLATION

Of the Two First Stanzas of the Song "Rio verde, Rio verde," printed in Bishop Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry.

AN IMPROMPTU.

GLASSY water, glassy water,
Down whose current clear and strong,
Chiefs confus'd in mutual slaughter,
Moor and Christian roll along.

IMITATION OF THE STYLE OF

HERMIT hoar, in solemn cell
Wearing out life's evening gray;
Strike thy bosom sage, and tell
What is bliss, and which the way.

This I spoke, and speaking sigh'd,
Scarce repress'd the starting tear,
When the hoary sage reply'd,
Come, my lad, and drink some beer.

BURLESQUE

Of the following Lines of Lopez de Vega.

AN IMPROMPTU.

SE acuien, los leones vence
Vence una muger hermosa

O el de flaco averguence
O ella di fer mas furiofa.

If the man who turnips cries
Cry not when his father dies,
'Tis a proof that he had rather
Have a turnip than his father.

TRANSLATION

Of the following Lines at the End of Baretto's Easy Phraseology.

AN IMPROMPTU.

VIVA viva la padrona,
Tutta bella, e tutta buona,
La padrona è un angiolella
Tutta buona e tutta bella;
Tutta bella e tutta buona;
Viva! viva la padrona!

LONG may live my lovely Hetty!
Always young and always pretty,
Always pretty, always young,
Live my lovely Hetty long!
Always young and always pretty,
Long may live my lovely Hetty!

IMPROVISO TRANSLATION

Of the following Distich on the Duke of Modena's running away from the Comet in 1742 or 1743.

SE al venir vostro i principi se n' vanno
Dch venga ogni di—durate un ann.

If at your coming princes disappear,
Comets! come every day—and stay a year.

IMPROVISO TRANSLATION

Of the following Lines of Mons. Benferade "à son "lit."

THEATRE des ris, et des pleurs,
Lit! ou je nais, et ou je meurs,
Tu neus fais voir comment voisins,
Sont nos plaisirs, et nos chagrins.

IN bed we laugh, in bed we cry,
And born in bed, in bed we die;
The near approach a bed may show
Of human bliss to human woe.

EPITAPH FOR MR. HOGARTH.

THE hand of him here torpid lies,
That drew th' essential form of grace;
Here clos'd in dearth th' attentive eyes,
That saw the manners in the face.

TRANSLATION

Of the following Lines written under a Print representing Persons Skating.

SUR un mince chrystal l'hiver conduit leurs pas
Le precipice est sous la glace;
Telle est de nos plaisirs la legere surface,
Glissez mortels; n' appuyez pas.

O'ER ice the rapid skater flies,
With sport above and death below;
Where mischief lurks in gay disguise,
Thus lightly touch and quickly go.

IMPROMPTU TRANSLATION

Of the Same.

O'ER crackling ice, o'er gulfs profound,
With nimble glide the skaters play;
O'er treacherous pleasure's flow'ry ground
Thus lightly skim, and haste away.

TO MRS. THRALE,

On her completing her Thirty-fifth Year.

AN IMPROMPTU.

ORT in danger, yet alive,
We are come to thirty-five;
Long may better years arrive,
Better years than thirty-five.
Could philosophers contrive
Life to stop at thirty-five,
Time his hours should never drive
O'er the bounds of thirty-five.
High to soar, and deep to dive,
Nature gives at thirty-five.
Ladies, stock and tend your hive,
Trifle not at thirty-five;
For, howe'er we boast and strive,
Life declines from thirty-five:
He that ever hopes to thrive
Must begin by thirty-five;
And all who wisely wish to wive,
Must look on Thrale at thirty-five.

IMPROMPTU

On bearing Miss Thrale consulting with a Friend about a Gown and Hat she was inclined to wear.

WEAR the gown, and wear the hat,
Snatch thy pleasures while they last;
Hadst thou nine lives, like a cat,
Soon those nine lives would be past.

IMPROMPTU TRANSLATION

Of an Air in the Clemenza de Tito of Metastasio, beginning, "Dch se piacermi vuoi."

WOULD you hope to gain my heart,
Bid your teasing doubts depart;
He who blindly trusts, will find
Faith from every generous mind:
He who still expects deceit,
Only teaches how to cheat.

TRANSLATION

*Of a Speech of Aquileio, in the Adriano of Me-tastasio, beginning, "Tu che in Corte inve-
"chiaffi."*

GROWN old in courts, thou art not surely one
Who keeps the rigid rules of ancient honour;

Well skill'd to foother a foe with looks of kindness,
To sink the fatal precipice before him,
And then lament his fall with seeming friendship:
Open to all, true only to thyself,
Thou know'st those arts which blast with envious
praise,

Which aggravate a fault with feign'd excuses,
And drive discountenanc'd virtue from the throne:
That leave the blame of rigour to the prince,
And of his ev'ry gift usurp the merit;
That hide in seeming zeal a wicked purpose,
And only build upon another's ruin.

pieces now first collected into Johnson's works,

2 vols. 4to. 1791.*

TRANSLATION OF VIRGIL.

PASTORAL I.

Melibæus.

Now, Tityrus, you, supine and careless laid,
Play on your pipe beneath this beechen shade;
While wretched we about the world must roam,
And leave our pleasing fields and native home,
Here at your ease you sing your amorous flame,
And the wood rings with Amarillis' name.

Tityrus.

Those blessings, friend, a deity bestow'd,
For I shall never think him less than God;
Oft on his altar shall my firstlings lie,
Their blood the consecrated stones shall dye:
He gave my flocks to graze the flowery meads,
And me to tune at ease th' unequal reeds.

Melibæus.

My admiration only I express,
(No spark of envy harbours in my breast)
That when confusion o'er the country reigns,
To you alone this happy state remains.
Here I, though faint myself, must drive my goats,
Far from their ancient fields and humble cots.
This scarce I lead, who left on yonder rock
Two tender kids, the hopes of all the flock.
Had we not been perverse and careless grown,
This dire event by omens was foreshown;
Our trees were blasted by the thunder stroke,
And left-hand crows, from an old hollow oak,
Foretold the coming evil by their dismal croak.

TRANSLATION OF HORACE,

BOOK I. ODE XXII.

THE man, my friend, whose conscious heart
With virtue's sacred ardour glows,
Nor taints with death the envenom'd dart,
Nor needs the guard of Moorish bows:

Though Scythia's icy cliffs he treads,
Or horrid Afric's faithless sands;
Or where the fam'd Hydaspes spreads
His liquid wealth o'er barbarous lands.

For while by Chloe's image charm'd,
Too far in Sabine woods I stray'd;
Me singing, carelefs and unarm'd,
A grisly wolf surpris'd, and fled.

No savage more portentous stain'd
Apulia's spacious wilds with gore;
None fiercer Juba's thirsty land,
Dire nurse of raging lions, bore.

Place me where no soft summer gale
Among the quivering branches sighs;
Where clouds condens'd for ever veil
With horrid gloom the frowning skies:

Place me beneath the burning line,
A clime deny'd to human race;
I'll sing of Chloe's charms divine,
Her heav'nly voice, and beauteous face.

TRANSLATION OF HORACE,

BOOK II. ODE IX.

CLOUDS do not always veil the skies,
Nor showers immerse the verdant plain;
Nor do the billows always rise,
Or storms afflict the ruffled main.

Nor, Valgius, on th' Armenian shores
Do the chain'd waters always freeze;
Not always furious Boreas roars,
Or bends with violent force the trees.

But you are ever drown'd in tears,
For Mytes dead you ever mourn;
No setting Sol can ease your care,
But finds you sad at his return.

The wife experienc'd Grecian sage,
Mourn'd not Antiochus so long;
Nor did King Priam's hoary age
So much lament his slaughter'd son.

Leave off, at length, these woman's sighs,
Augustus' numerous trophies sing;
Repeat that prince's victories,
To whom all nations tribute bring.

Niphates rolls an humbler wave,
At length the undaunted Scythian yields,
Content to live the Romans' slave,
And scarce forsakes his native fields.

Translation of part of the Dialogue between Hector and Andromache; from the sixth Book of Homer's Iliad.

SHE' ceas'd: then godlike Hector answer'd
kind,—

(His various plumage sporting in the wind)
That post, and all the rest, shall be my care;
But shall I, then, forsake the unfinish'd war?
How would the Trojans brand great Hector's
name!

And one base action fully all my fame,
Acquir'd by wounds, and battles bravely fought!
Oh! how my soul abhors to mean a though

Long have I learn'd to flight this fleeting breath,
And view with cheerful eyes approaching death.
The inexorable fifters have decreed
That Priam's house, and Priam's self shall bleed:
The day shall come, in which proud Troy shall yield,

And spread its smoking ruins o'er the field.
Yet Hecuba's, nor Priam's hoary age,
Whose blood shall quench some Grecian's thirsty
rage,

Nor my brave brothers that have bit the ground;
'Their souls dismiss'd through many a hastily wound,
Can in my bosom half that grief create,
As the sad thought of your impending fate:
When some proud Grecian dame shall talks impose,
Mimic your tears, and ridicule your woes:
Beneath Hyperia's waters shall you sweat,
And, fainting, scarce support the liquid weight:
Then shall some Argive loud insulting cry,
Behold the wife of Hector, guard of Troy!
Tears, at my name, shall drown those beauteous
eyes,

And that fair bosom heave with rising sighs!
Before that day, by some brave hero's hand,
May I lie slain, and spurn the bloody sand!

TO A YOUNG LADY,

ON HER BIRTH-DAY*.

THIS tributary verse, receive, my fair,
Warm with an ardent lover's fondest prayer.
May this returning day for ever find
Thy form more lovely, more adorn'd thy mind;
All pains, all cares, may favouring Heav'n remove,
All but the sweet solitudes of love!
May powerful nature join with grateful art,
To point each glance, and force it to the heart!
O then, when conquer'd crowds confess thy sway,
When even proud wealth and prouder wit obey,
My fair, be mindful of the mighty trust,
Alas! 'tis hard for beauty to be just.
Those sovereign charms with strictest care employ;
Nor give the generous pain, the worthless joy:
With his own form acquaint the forward fool,
Shown in the faithful glass of ridicule;
'Teach mimic censure her own faults to find,
No more let coquettes to themselves be blind,
So shall Belinda's charms improve mankind.

THE YOUNG AUTHOR †.

WHEN first the peasant, long inclin'd to roam,
Forfakes his rural sports and peaceful home,
Pleas'd with the scene the smiling ocean yields;
He scorns the verdant meads and flow'ry fields;
Then dances jocund o'er the watery way,
While the breeze whispers, and the streamers play:

* This was made almost impromptu, in the presence of Mr. Hector.

† Alterations in the copy printed in the "Gentleman's Magazine," 1743.

Ver. 2, 3, 4, 5.
Forfakes his rural seats and peaceful home,
Charm'd with the scene the smiling ocean yields,
He scorns the flow'ry vales and verdant fields;
Jocund he dances o'er the wat'ry way.

Unbounded prospects in his bosom roll;
And future millions lift his rising soul;
In blissful dreams he digs the golden mine,
And raptur'd sees the new-found ruby shine. 10
Joys insincere! thick clouds invade the skies,
Loud roar the billows, high the waves arise;
Sick'ning with fear, he longs to view the shore,
And vows to trust the faithless deep no more.
So the young author, panting after fame,
And the long honours of a lasting name,
Intrusts his happiness to human kind,
More false, more cruel, than the seas or wind.
"Toil on, dull crowd, in ecstasies he cries,
For wealth or title, perishable prize; 20
While I those transitory blessings scorn,
Secure of praise from ages yet unborn." [late,
This thought once form'd, all counsel comes too
He flies to press, and hurries on his fate;
Swiftly he fees the imagin'd laurels spread,
And feels the unfading wreath surround his head.
Warn'd by another's fate, vain youth, be wise,
Those dreams were Settle's once, and Ogilby's!
The pamphlet spreads, incessant hisses rise,
To some retreat the baffled writer flies; 30
Where no four critics snarl, no sneers molest,
Safe from the tart lampoon, and stinging jest;
There begs of Heav'n a less distinguish'd lot,
Glad to be hid, and proud to be forgot.

EPILOGUE,

Intended to have been spoken by a Lady, who was to personate the Ghost of Hermione.

YE blooming train, who give despair or joy,
Bless with a smile, or with a frown destroy;
In whose fair cheeks destructive Cupids wait,
And with unerring shafts distribute fate;
Whose snowy breasts, whose animated eyes,
Each youth admires, though each admirer dies;
Whilst you deride their pangs in barb'rous play,
Unpitying see them weep, and hear them pray,
And unrelenting sport ten thousand lives away; }
For you, ye fair, I quit the gloomy plains,
Where sable night in all her horror reigns;

Ver. 12.

Loud roars the tempest, high the billows rise.

Ver. 15, 16.

So the young author panting for a name,
And fir'd with pleasing hope of endless fame.

Ver. 19.

"Toil on, dull crowd, in ecstasy, he cries.

Ver. 21, 22.

"While I these transitory blessings scorn, Secure of praise from nations yet unborn."

Ver. 24.

He flies the press, and hurries on his fate.

Ver. 26.

He feels th' unfading wreath surround his head.

Ver. 28.

These dreams were Settle's once and Ogilby's.

Ver. 31, 32.

Where no four critics damn, nor sneers molest,
Safe from the keen lampoon and stinging jest.

† Some young ladies at Litchfield having proposed to act "The Distressed Mother," Johnson wrote this, and gave it to Mr. Hector to convey privately to them.

No fragrant bowers, no delightful glades,
 Receive th' unhappy ghosts of scornful maids.
 For kind, for tender nymphs the myrtle blooms,
 And weaves herbending boughs in pleasing glooms;
 Perennial roses deck each purple vale,
 And scents ambrosial breathe in every gale:
 Far hence are banish'd vapours, spleen, and tears,
 Tea, scandal, ivory teeth, and languid airs;
 No pug, nor favourite Cupid there enjoys
 The balmy kifs, for which poor Thyrsis dies;
 Form'd to delight, they use no foreign arms,
 Nor torturing whalebones pinch them into charms;
 No conscious blushes there their cheeks inflame,
 For those who feel no guilt can know no shame;
 Unfaded still their former charms they show,
 Around them pleasures wait, and joys for ever new.
 But cruel virgins meet severer fates;
 Expell'd and exil'd from the blissful seats,
 To dismal realms, and regions void of peace,
 Where furies ever howl, and serpents hiss,
 O'er the sad plains perpetual tempests sigh;
 And pois'nous vapours, black'ning all the sky,
 With livid hue the fairest face o'ercast,
 And every beauty withers at the blast:
 Where'er they fly their lover's ghosts pursue,
 Inflicting all those ills which once they knew;
 Vexation, fury, jealousy, despair,
 Vex ev'ry eye, and ev'ry bosom tear;
 Their foul deformities by all describ'd,
 No maid to flatter, and no paint to hide.
 Then melt, ye fair, while crowds around you sigh,
 Nor let disdain sit lowring in your eye;
 With pity soften every awful grace,
 And beauty smile auspicious in each face;
 To ease their pains exert your milder power,
 So shall you guiltless reign, and all mankind adore.

FRIENDSHIP:

— AN ODE.

Printed in the "Gentleman's Magazine." 1743.

FRIENDSHIP, peculiar boon of heaven,
 The noble mind's delight and pride,
 To men and angels only given,
 To all the lower world deny'd.

While love, unknown among the blest,
 Parent of thousand wild desires,
 The savage and the human breast
 Torments alike with raging fires.

With bright, but oft destructive gleam,
 Alike o'er all his lightnings fly,
 Thy lambent glories only beam
 Around the fav'rites of the sky.

Thy gentle flows of guiltless joys
 On fools and villains ne'er descend

In vain for thee the tyrant sighs,
 And hugs a flatterer for a friend.

Directress of the brave and just,
 O guide us through life's darksome way!
 And let the tortures of mistrust
 On selfish bosoms only prey.

Nor shall thine ardours cease to glow,
 When souls to peaceful climes remove:
 What rais'd our virtue here below,
 Shall aid our happiness above.

MA †.

ANGLIACUS inter pulcherrima Laura puellas,
 Mox uteri pondus depositura grave,
 Adsit, Laura, tibi facilis Lucina dolenti,
 Neve tibi noceat pranitauisse Dea.

O QUI perpetuâ mundum ratione gubernas,
 Terrarum cœlique sator! —
 Disjice terrenæ nubulas et pondera molis,
 Atque tuo splendore mica! Tu namque serenum,
 Tu requies tranquilla piis. Te cernere finis,
 Principium, vector, dux, semita, terminus, idem.

O THOU whose power o'er moving worlds presides,
 Whose voice created, and whose wisdom guides,
 On darkling man in pure effulgence shine,
 And cheer the clouded mind with light divine.
 'Tis thine alone to calm the pious breast,
 With silent confidence and holy rest;
 From thee, great God! we spring, to thee we tend,
 Path, motive, guide, original, and end.

EPIGRAM

ON GEORGE II. AND COLLEY CIBBER, ESQ.
POET LAUREAT.

AUGUSTUS still survives in Maro's strain,
 And Spenser's verse prolongs Eliza's reign,
 Great George's acts let tuneful Cibber sing;
 For nature form'd the poet for the king.

* Miss Molly Aston.

† Mr. Hector was present when this epigram was made impromptu. The first line was proposed by Dr.
 James, and Johnson was called upon by the company to finish it, which he instantly did.

PROLOGUE.

YE glitt'ring train ! whom lace and velvet blefs,
Suspend the soft folicitudes of drefs;
From grov'ling bufinefs and fuperfluous care,
Ye fons of avarice ! a moment fpare :
Vot'ries of fame and worfhippers of pow'r !
Difmifs the pleafing phantoms for an hour.
Our daring bard, with fpirit unconfin'd,
Spreads wide the mighty moral of mankind.
Learn here how heav'n fupports the virtuous mind,
Daring, though calm ; and vigorous, though re-
fig'n'd.

Learn here what anguish racks the guilty breaft,
In pow'r dependent, in fuccefs depreft.
Learn here that peace from innocence muft flow ;
All elfe is empty found, and idle fhow.

If truths like thefe with pleafing language join ;
Ennobled, yet unchang'd, if nature fhine :
If no wild draught depart from reafon's rules,
Nor gods his heroes, nor his lovers fools ;
Intriguing wits ! his artlefs plot forgive ;
And fpare him, beauties ! though his lovers live.

Be this at leaft his praife ; be this his pride ;
To force applaufe no modern arts are try'd.
Should partial cat-calls all his hopes confound,
He bids no trumpet quell the fatal found.
Should welcome fleep relieve the weary wit.
He rolls no thunders o'er the drowfy pit.
No fnares to captivate the judgment fpreads ;
Nor bribes your eyes to prejudice your heads.
Unmov'd though wittlings fneer and rivals rail ;
Studious to pleafe, yet not afham'd to fail.
He fcorns the meek addrefs, the fuppliant ftrain,
With merit needlefs, and without it vain.

In reafon, nature, truth he dares to truft :
Ye fops, be filent ! and ye wits, be juft !

ACT I.—SCENE I.

DEMETRIUS and LEONTIUS in Turkish Habits.

Leontius.

AND is it thus Demetrius meets his friend,
Hid in the mean difguife of Turkish robes,
With fervile fecrecy to lurk in fhades,
And vent our fuff'rings in claudefterine groans ?

Demetrius.

Till breathlefs fury refted from deftruction
Thefe groans were fatal, thefe difguifes vain :
But now our Turkish conquerors have quench'd
Their rage, and pall'd their appetite of murder ;
No more the glutt'd fabre thirfts for blood,
And weary cruelty remits her tortures.

Leontius.

Yet Greece enjoys no gleam of tranfient hope,
No foothering interval of peaceful forrow ;
The luft of gold fucceeds the rage of conqueft,
The luft of gold, unfeeling and remorselefs !
The laft corruption of degenerate man !
Urg'd by th' imperious foldier's fierce command,
The groaning Greeks break up their golden ca-
v'erns [envy]
Pregnant with ftores, that India's mines might
Th' accumulated wealth of toiling ages.

Demetrius.

That wealth, too good for their country's ufe !
That wealth, too pleafing to be loft for freedom !

That wealth, which granted to their weeping prince,
Had rang'd embattled nations at our gates:
But thus reserv'd to lure the wolves of Turkey,
Adds shame to grief, and infamy to ruin.
Lamenting av'rice now too late discovers
Her own neglected, in the public safety.

Leontius.

Reproach not misery—The sons of Greece,
Ill-fated race! so oft besieg'd in vain,
With false security beheld invasion.
Why should they fear?—That power that kindly spreads

The clouds, a signal of impending show'rs,
To warn the wand'ring linnet to the shade,
Beheld without concern expiring Greece,
And not one prodigy foretold our fate.

Demetrius.

A thousand horrid prodigies foretold it.
A feeble government, eluded laws,
A factious populace, luxurious nobles,
And all the maladies of sinking states.
When public villany, too strong for justice,
Shows his bold front, the harbinger of ruin,
Can brave Leontius call for airy wonders,
Which cheats interpret, and which fools regard?
When some neglected fabric nods beneath
The weight of years, and totters to the tempest,
Must heaven dispatch the messengers of light,
Or wake the dead to warn us of its fall?

Leontius.

Well might the weakness of our empire sink
Before such foes of more than human force;
Some pow'r invisible, from heav'n or hell,
Conducts their armies and asserts their cause.

Demetrius.

And yet, my friend, what miracles were wrought
Beyond the power of constancy and courage?
Did unresisted lightning aid their cannon?
Did roaring whirlwinds sweep us from the ramparts?

'Twas vice that shook our nerves, 'twas vice,
Leontius,

That froze our veins, and wither'd all our powers.

Leontius.

Whate'er our crimes, our woes demand compassion.

Each night, protected by the friendly darkness,
Quitting my close retreat, I range the city,
And weeping, kiss the venerable ruins:
With silent pangs I view the tow'ring domes,
Sacred to prayer, and wander through the streets;

Where commerce lavish'd unexhausted plenty,
And jollity maintain'd eternal revels.—

Demetrius.

—How chang'd, alas!—Now ghastly desolation
In triumph sits upon our shatter'd spires;
Now superstition, ignorance, and error,
Usurp our temples, and profane our altars.

Leontius.

From ev'ry palace burst a mingled clamour,
The dreadful dissonance of barb'rous triumph,
Shrieks of affright, and wailings of distress.
Oft when the cries of violated beauty
Arose to heav'n, and pierc'd my bleeding breast,
I felt thy pains, and trembled for Aspasia.

Demetrius.

Aspasia! spare that lov'd, that mournful name:
Dear hapless maid—tempestuous grief o'erbears
My reasoning pow'rs—Dear, hapless, lost Aspasia!

Leontius.

Suspend the thought.

Demetrius.

All thought on her is madness:
Yet let me think—I see the helpless maid,
Behold the monsters gaze with savage rapture,
Behold how lust and rapine struggle round her.

Leontius.

Awake, Demetrius, from this dismal dream,
Sink not beneath imaginary sorrows:
Call to your aid your courage, and your wisdom;
Think on the sudden change of human scenes;
Think on the various accidents of war;
Think on the mighty pow'r of awful virtue;
Think on that providence that guards the good.

Demetrius.

O Providence! extend thy care to me,
For courage droops unequal to the combat,
And weak philosophy denies her succours.
Sure some kind fate in the heat of battle,
Ere yet the foe found leisure to be cruel,
Dismiss'd her to the sky.

Leontius.

Some virgin martyr,
Perhaps, enamour'd of resembling virtue,
With gentle hand restrain'd the streams of life,
And snatch'd her timely from her country's fate.

Demetrius.

From those bright regions of eternal day,
Where now thou shin'st among thy fellow-saints,
Array'd in purer light, look down on me:
In pleasing visions, and assuasive dreams,
O sooth my soul, and teach me how to lose thee.

Leontius.

Enough of unavailing tears, Demetrius;
I came obedient to thy friendly summons,
And hop'd to share thy counsels, not thy sorrows:
While thus we mourn the fortune of Aspasia,
To what are we reserv'd?

Demetrius.

To what I know not:
But hope, yet hope, to happiness and honour;
If happiness can be without Aspasia.

Leontius.

But whence this new-sprung hope!

Demetrius.

From Cali Bassa:

The chief, whose wisdom guides the Turkish counsels.

He, tir'd of slav'ry, though the highest slave,
Projects at once our freedom and his own;
And bids us thus disguis'd await him here.

Leontius.

Can he restore the state he could not save?
In vain, when Turkey's troops assail'd our walls,
His kind intelligence betray'd their measures;
Their arms prevail'd, though Cali was our friend.

Demetrius.

When the tenth sun had set upon our sorrows,
At midnight's private hour a voice unknown
Sounds in my sleeping ear, "Awake, Demetrius,
"Awake, and follow me to better fortunes;"
Surpris'd I start, and bless the happy dream;

Then rousing know the fiery Chief Abdalla,
 Whose quick impatience seiz'd my doubtful hand,
 And led me to the shore where Cali stood,
 Penfivè and list'ning to the beating surge.
 There in soft hints and in ambiguous phrase,
 With all the diffidence of long experience,
 That oft had practis'd fraud, and oft detected,
 The vet'ran courtier half reveal'd his project.
 By his command, equipp'd for speedy flight,
 Deep in a winding creek a galley lies,
 Selected by my care, a hardy band,
 That long to hail thee chief.

Leontius.

But what avails
 So small a force? or why should Cali fly?
 Or how can Cali's flight restore our country?

Demetrius.

Reserve these questions for a safer hour,
 Or hear himself, for see the Bassa comes.

SCENE II.

DEMETRIUS, LEONTIUS, CALI BASSA.

Cali.

Now summon all thy soul, illustrious Christian!
 Awake each faculty that sleeps within thee,
 The courtier's policy, the sage's firmness,
 The warrior's ardour, and the patriot's zeal;
 If chasing past events with vain pursuit,
 Or wand'ring in the wilds of future being,
 A single thought now rove, recal it home.
 But can thy friend sustain the glorious cause,
 The cause of liberty, the cause of nations?

Demetrius.

Observe him closely with a statesman's eye,
 Thou that hast long perus'd the draughts of nature,

And know'st the characters of vice and virtue,
 Left by the hand of heav'n on human clay.

Cali.

His mien is lofty, his demeanour great,
 Nor sprightly folly wantons in his air,
 Nor dull serenity becalms his eyes.
 Such had I trusted once as soon as seen,
 But cautious age suspects the flatt'ring form,
 And only credits what experience tells.
 Has silence press'd her seal upon his lips?
 Does adamantinè faith invest his heart?
 Will he not bend beneath a tyrant's frown?
 Will he not melt before ambition's fire?
 Will he not soften in a friend's embrace?
 Or slow dissolving in a woman's tears?

Demetrius.

Sooner these trembling leaves shall find a voice,
 And tell the secrets of their conscious walks;
 Sooner the breeze shall catch the flying sounds,
 And shock the tyrant with a tale of treason.
 Your slaughter'd multitudes that swell the shore,
 With monuments of death proclaim his courage;
 Virtue and liberty engross his soul,
 And leave no place for perfidy or fear.

Leontius.

I scorn a trust unwillingly repos'd;
 Demetrius will not lead me to dishonour;
 Consult in private, call me when your scheme
 Is ripe for action, and demands the sword. [Going.

Demetrius.

Leontius, stay.

Cali.

Forgive an old man's weakness,
 And share the deepest secrets of my soul,
 My wrongs, my fears, my motives, my designs.—
 When unsuccessful wars, and civil factions,
 Embroil'd the Turkish state—our sultan's father
 Great Amurath, at my request, forsook
 The cloister's ease, resum'd the tott'ring throne,
 And snatch'd the reigns of abdicated pow'r
 From giddy Mahomet's unskilful hand.
 This fir'd the youthful king's ambitious breast,
 He murmurs vengeance at the name of Cali,
 And dooms my rash fidelity to ruin.

Demetrius.

Unhappy lot of all that shine in courts;
 For forc'd compliance, or for zealous virtue,
 Still odious to the monarch or the people.

Cali.

Such are the woes when arbitrary pow'r,
 And lawless passion hold the sword of justice.
 If there be any land, as fame reports,
 Where common laws restrain the prince and subject,

A happy land, where circulating pow'r
 Flows through each member of th' embodied state,
 Sure, not unconscious of the mighty blessing,
 Her grateful sons shine bright with ev'ry virtue;
 Untainted with the lust of innovation,
 Sure all unite to hold her league of rule
 Unbroken as the sacred chain of nature,
 That links the jarring elements in peace.

Leontius.

But say, great Bassa, why the sultan's anger,
 Burning in vain, delays the stroke of death?

Cali.

Young, and unsettled in his father's kingdoms,
 Fierce as he was, he dreaded to destroy
 The empire's darling, and the soldier's boast;
 But now confirm'd, and swelling with his conquests,
 Secure he tramples my declining fame,
 Frowns unrestrain'd, and dooms me with his eyes.

Demetrius.

What can reverse thy doom?

Cali.

The tyrant's death.

Demetrius.

But Greece is still forgot.

Cali.

On Asia's coast,

Which lately blest'd my gentle government,
 Soon as the sultan's unexpected late
 Fills all th' astonish'd empire with confusion,
 My policy shall raise an easy throne;
 The Turkish pow'rs from Europe shall retreat,
 And harass Greece no more with wasteful war.
 A galley mann'd with Greeks, thy charge Le-ontius,
 Attends to waft us to repose and safety.

Demetrius.

That vessel, if observ'd, alarms the court,
 And gives a thousand fatal questions birth;
 Why stor'd for flight? and why prepar'd by Cali?

Cali.

This hour I'll beg, with unsuspected face,
 Leave to perform my pilgrimage to Mecca;

Which granted, hides my purpose from the world,
And, though refus'd, conceals it from the sultan.

Demetrius.

How can a single hand attempt a life
Which armies guard, and citadels enclose?

Cali.

Forgetful of command, with captive beauties,
Far from his troops, he toys his hours away.
A roving soldier seiz'd in Sophia's temple
A virgin shining with distinguish'd charms,
And brought his beauteous plunder to the Sultan.

Demetrius.

In Sophia's temple!—What alarm!—Proceed.

Cali.

The sultan gaz'd, he wonder'd, and he lov'd;
In passion lost, he bade the conqu'ring fair
Renounce her faith, and be the queen of Turkey;
The pious maid, with modest indignation,
Threw back the glittering bribe.

Demetrius.

Celestial goodness!

It must, it must be she; her name?

Cali.

Aspasia.

Demetrius.

What hopes, what terrors rush upon my soul!
O lead me quickly to the scene of fate;
Break through the politician's tedious forms,
Aspasia calls me, let me fly to save her.

Leontius.

Did Mahomet reproach or praise her virtue?

Cali.

His offers oft repeated, still refus'd,
At length rekindled his accusom'd fury, [whisper
And chang'd th' endearing smile and am'rous
To threats of torture, death, and violation.

Demetrius.

These tedious narratives of frozen age
Distract my soul, dispatch thy ling'ring tale;
Say, did a voice from heaven restrain the tyrant?
Did interposing angels guard her from him?

Cali.

Just in the moment of impending fate,
Another plund'rer brought the bright Irene;
Of equal beauty, but of softer mien,
Fear in her eye, submission on her tongue,
Her mournful charms attracted his regards,
Disarm'd his rage, and in repeated visits
Gain'd all his heart; at length his eager love
To her transferr'd the offer of a crown.

Leontius.

Nor found again the bright temptation fail?

Cali.

Trembling to grant, nor daring to refuse,
While heav'n and Mahomet divide her fears,
With coy carefles and with pleasing wiles
She feeds his hopes, and soothes him to delay.
For her repose is banish'd from the night
And business from the day. In her apartments
He lives.

Leontius.

And there must fall.

Cali.

But yet th' attempt

Is hazardous.

Leontius.

Fortbear to speak of hazards;

What has the wretch that has surviv'd his country,
His friends, his liberty, to hazard?

Cali.

Life.

Demetrius.

Th' inestimable privilege of breathing!
Important hazard! What's that airy bubble
When weigh'd with Greece, with virtue, with Aspasia?

A floating atom, dust that falls unheeded
Into the adverse scale, nor shakes the balance.

Cali.

At least this day be calm.—If we succeed,
Aspasia's thine, and all thy life is rapture.—
See! Mustapha, the tyrant's minion, comes;
Invest Leontius with his new command;
And wait Abdalla's unsuspected visits:
Remember freedom, glory, Greece, and love.

[Exeunt Demetrius and Leontius.]

SCENE III.

CALI, MUSTAPHA.

Mustapha.

By what enchantment does this lovely Greek
Hold in her chains the captivated sultan?
He tires his fav'rites with Irene's praise,
And seeks the shades to muse upon Irene;
Irene steals unheeded from his tongue,
And mingles unperceiv'd with ev'ry thought.

Cali.

Why should the sultan slun the joys of beauty,
Or arm his breast against the force of love?
Love, that with sweet vicissitude relieves
The warrior's labours, and the monarch's cares.
But will she yet receive the faith of Mecca?

Mustapha.

Those pow'rful tyrants of the female breast,
Fear and ambition, urge her to compliance;
Dress'd in each charm of gay magnificence,
Alluring grandeur courts her to his arms,
Religion calls her from the wish'd embrace,
Paints future joys, and points to distant glories.

Cali.

Soon will th' unequal contest be decided.
Prospects obscur'd by distance faintly strike;
Each pleasure brightens at its near approach,
And every danger shocks with double horror.

Mustapha.

How shall I scorn the beautiful apostate!
How will the bright Aspasia shine above her!

Cali.

Should she, for profelytes are always zealous,
With pious warmth receive our prophet's law—

Mustapha.

Heav'n will condemn the mercenary fervour,
Which love of greatness, not of truth, inflames.

Cali.

Cease, cease thy censures, for the sultan comes
Alone, with am'rous haste to seek his love.

SCENE IV.

MAHOMET, CALI BASSA, MUSTAPHA.

Cali.

Hail, terror of the monarchs of the world,
Unshaken be thy throne as earth's firm base,

Live till the sun forgets to dart his beams,
And weavy planets loiter in their courses.

Mahomet.

But, Cali, let Irene share thy prayers;
For what is length of days without Irene?
I come from empty noise, and tasteless pomp,
From crowds that hide a monarch from himself,
To prove the sweets of privacy and friendship,
And dwell upon the beauties of Irene.

Cali.

O may her beauties last unchang'd by time,
As those that bless the mansions of the good.

Mahomet.

Each realm where beauty turns the graceful shape,
Swells the fair breast or animates the glance,
Adorns my palace with its brightest virgins;
Yet unacquainted with these soft emotions
I walk'd superior, through the blaze of charms,
Prais'd without rapture, left without regret.
Why rove I now, when absent from my fair,
From solitude to crowds, from crowds to solitude,
Still restless, till I clasp the lovely maid,
And ease my loaded soul upon her bosom?

Mustapha.

Forgive, great sultan, that intrusive duty
Inquires the final doom of Menodorus,
The Grecian counsellor.

Mahomet.

Go see him die;

His martial rhet'ric taught the Greeks resistance;
Had they prevail'd, I ne'er had known Irene.

[Exit Mustapha.]

SCENE V.

MABOMET, CALI.

Mahomet.

Remote from tumult, in th' adjoining palace,
Thy care shall guard this treasure of my soul;
There let Aspasia, since my fair entreats it,
With converse chase the melancholy moments.
Sure, chill'd with sixty winter camps, thy blood
At sight of female charms will glow no more.

Cali.

These years, unconquer'd Mahomet, demand
Desires more pure, and other cares than love.
Long have I wish'd, before our prophet's tomb,
To pour my prayers for thy successful reign,
To quit the tumults of the noisy camp,
And sink into the silent grave in peace.

Mahomet.

What! think of peace while haughty Scanderbeg,
Elate with conquest, in his native mountains,
Provols o'er the wealthy spoils of bleeding Turkey?
While fair Hungaria's unexhausted valleys
Pour forth their legions, and the roaring Danube
Rolls half his floods unheard through shouting camps?

Nor could'st thou more support a life of sloth
Than Amurath—

Cali.

Still full of Amurath!

[Aside.]

Mahomet.

Than Amurath, accusom'd to command,
Could bear his son upon the Turkish throne.

Cali.

This pilgrimage our lawgiver ordain'd—

Mahomet.

For those who could not please by nobler service.—
Our warlike prophet loves an active faith,
The holy flame of enterprising virtue,
Mocks the dull vows of solitude and penance,
And scorns the lazy hermit's cheap devotion;
Shine thou distinguish'd by superior merit,
With wonted zeal pursue the task of war,
Till every nation reverence the Koran,
And ev'ry suppliant lift his eyes to Mecca.

Cali.

This regal confidence, this pious ardour,
Let prudence moderate, though not suppress.
Is not each realm that smiles with kinder suns,
Or boasts a happier soil, already thine?
Extended empire, like expanded gold,
Exchanges solid strength for feeble splendour.

Mahomet.

Preach thy dull politics to vulgar kings, [ness,
Thou know'st not yet thy master's future great-
His vast designs, his plans of boundless pow'r.

When ev'ry storm in my domain shall roar,
When ev'ry wave shall beat a Turkish shore,
Then, Cali, shall the toils of battle cease,
Then dream of prayer, and pilgrimage, and peace.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.—SCENE I.

ASPASIA, IRENE.

Irene.

ASPASIA, yet pursue the sacred theme;
Exhaust the stores of pious eloquence,
And teach me to repel the sultan's passion.
Still at Aspasia's voice a sudden rapture
Exalts my soul, and fortifies my heart.
The glitt'ring vanities of empty greatness,
The hopes and fears, the joys and pains of life,
Dissolve in air, and vanish into nothing.

Aspasia.

Let nobler hopes and juter fears succeed,
And bar the passes of Irene's mind
Against returning guilt.

Irene.

When thou art absent

Death rises to my view, with all his terrors;
Then visions horrid as a murderer's dreams
Chill my resolves, and blast my blooming virtue:
Stern torture shakes his bloody scourge before me,
And anguish gnashes on the fatal wheel.

Aspasia.

Since fear predominates in every thought,
And fears thy breast with absolute dominion,
Think on th' insulting scorn, the conscious pangs,
The future miseries that wait the apostate;
So shall timidity assist thy reason,
And wisdom into folly turn thy frailty.

Irene.

Will not that pow'r that form'd the heart of woman,

And wove the feeble texture of her nerves,
Forgive those fears that shake the tender frame?

Aspasia.

The weakness we lament, ourselves create;
Instructed from our infant years to court
With counterfeited fears the aid of man,
We learn to shudder at the rustling breeze,

Start at the light, and tremble in the dark;
Till affectation, rip'ning to belief,
And folly, frighted at her own chimeras,
Habitual cowardice usurps the soul.

Irene.

Not all like thee can brave the shocks of fate,
Thy foul by nature great, enlarg'd by knowledge,
Soars unencumber'd with our idle cares,
And all Aspasia, but her beauty, 's man.

Aspasia.

Each generous sentiment is thine, Demetrius,
Whose soul, perhaps, yet mindful of Aspasia,
Now hovers o'er this melancholy shade,
Well pleas'd to find thy precepts not forgotten.
O! could the grave restore the pious hero,
Soon would his art or valour set us free,
And bear us far from servitude and crimes.

Irene.

He yet may live.

Aspasia.

Alas! delusive dream?

Too well I know him, his immo'd rate courage,
Th' impetuous sallies of excessive virtue,
Too strong for love, have hurried him on death.

SCENE II.

ASPASIA, IRENE, CALI, ABDALLA.

Cali to Abdalla, as they advance.

Behold our future sultaness, Abdalla;
Let artful flat'ry now, to lull suspicion,
Glide through Irene to the sultan's ear.
Wouldst thou subdue th' obdurate cannibal
To tender friendship, praise him to his mistress.

To Irene.

Well may those eyes that view these heav'nly
charms

Reject the daughters of contending kings;
For what are pompous titles, proud alliance,
Empire or wealth, to excellence like thine?

Abdalla.

Receive th' impatient sultan to thy arms;
And may a long posterity of monarchs,
The pride and terror of succeeding days,
Rise from the happy bed; and future queens
Diffuse Irene's beauty through the world.

Irene.

Can Mahomet's imperial hand descend
To clasp a slave? or, can a soul like mine,
Unus'd to power, and form'd for humbler scenes,
Support the splendid miseries of greatness?

Cali.

No regal pageant deck'd with casual honours,
Scorn'd by his subjects, trampled by his foes;
No feeble tyrant of a petty state
Courts thee to shake on a dependent throne;
Born to command, as thou to charm mankind,
The sultan from himself derives his greatness.
Observe, bright maid, as his resistless voice
Drives on the tempest of destructive war,
How nation after nation falls before him.

Abdalla.

At his dread name the distant mountains shake
Their cloudy summits, and the sons of fierceness,
That range unciviliz'd from rock to rock,
Distrust th' eternal fortresses of nature,
And wish their gloomy caverns more obscure.

Aspasia.

Forbear this lavish pomp of dreadful praise;
The horrid images of war and slaughter
Renew our sorrows, and awake our fears.

Abdalla.

Cali, methinks yon waving trees afford
A doubtful glimpse of our approaching friends;
Just as I mark'd them, they forsook the shore,
And turn'd their hasty steps towards the garden.

Cali.

Conduct these queens, Abdalla, to the palace:
Such heav'nly beauty form'd for adoration,
The pride of monarchs, the reward of conquest.
Such beauty must not shine to vulgar eyes.

SCENE III.

Cali solus.

How heav'n, in scorn of human arrogance,
Commits to trivial chance the fate of nations!
While with incessant thought laborious man
Extends his mighty schemes of wealth and pow'r,
And tow'rs and triumphs in ideal greatness;
Some accidental gust of opposition
Blasts all the beauties of his new creation,
O'erturns the fabric of presumptuous reason,
And whelms the swelling architect beneath it.
Had not the breeze untwin'd the meeting boughs,
And through the parted shade disclos'd the Greeks
Th' important hour had pass'd unheeded by,
In all the sweet oblivion of delight,
In all the fopperies of meeting lovers;
In sighs and tears, in transports and embraces,
In soft complaints, and idle protestations.

SCENE IV.

CALI, DEMETRIUS, LEONTIUS.

Cali.

Could omens fright the resolute and wise,
Well might we fear impending disappointments.

Leontius.

Your artful suit, your monarch's fierce denial,
The cruel doom of hapless Menodorus.—

Demetrius.

And your new charge, that dear, that heav'nly maid.—

Leontius.

All this we know already from Abdalla.

Demetrius.

Such slight defeats but animate the brave
To stronger efforts and maturer counsels.

Cali.

My doom confirm'd establishes my purpose:
Calmly he heard, till Amurath's resumption
Rose to his thought, and set his soul on fire:
When from his lips the fatal name burst out,
A sudden pause th' imperfect sense suspended,
Like the dread stillness of condensing storms.

Demetrius.

The loudest cries of nature urge us forward;
Despotic rage pursues the life of Cali;
His groaning country claims Leontius' aid;
And yet another voice, forgive me, Greece,
The pow'rful voice of love inflames Demetrius.
Each ling'ring hour alarms me for Aspasia.

Cali.

What passions reign among thy crew, Leontius?
Does cheerless diffidence oppress their hearts?

Or sprightly hope exalt their kindling spirits?
Do they with pain repress the struggling shout,
And listen eager to the rising wind?

Leontius.

All there is hope, and gaiety, and courage,
No cloudy doubts, or languishing delays;
Ere I could range them on the crowded deck,
At once a hundred voices thunder'd round me,
And every voice was liberty and Greece.

Demetrius.

Swift, let us rush upon the careless tyrant,
Nor give him leisure for another crime.

Leontius.

Then let us now resolve, nor idly waste
Another hour in dull deliberation.

Cali.

But see, where destin'd to protract our counsels,
Comes Mustapha.—Your Turkish robes conceal
you,
Retire with speed, while I prepare to meet him
With artificial smiles, and seeming friendship.

SCENE V.

CALI AND MUSTAPHA.

Cali.

I see the gloom that low'rs upon thy brow,
These days of love and pleasure charm not thee;
Too slow these gentle constellations roll,
Thou long'st for stars that frown on human kind,
And scatter discord from their baleful beams.

Mustapha.

How blest art thou, still jocund and serene,
Beneath the load of business, and of years.

Cali.

Sure by some wond'rous sympathy of souls,
My heart still beats responsive to the sultan's;
I share, by secret instinct, all his joys,
And feel no sorrow while my sov'reign smiles.

Mustapha.

The sultan comes, impatient for his love;
Conduct her hither, let no rude intrusion
Molest these private walks, or care invade
These hours assign'd to pleasure and Irene.

SCENE VI.

MAHOMET, MUSTAPHA.

Mahomet.

Now, Mustapha, pursue thy tale of horror.
Has treason's dire infection reach'd my palace?
Can Cali dare the stroke of heav'nly justice,
In the dark precincts of the gaping grave,
And load with perjuries his parting soul?
Was it for this, that sick'ning in Epirus,
My father call'd me to his couch of death,
Join'd Cali's hand to mine, and fault'ring cry'd,
Restrain the fervour of impetuous youth
With venerable Cali's faithful counsels?
Are these the counsels? This the faith of Cali?
Were all our favours lavish'd on a villain?
Confess?—

Mustapha.

Confess by dying Menodorus.
In his last agonies the gasping coward,
Amidst the tortures of the burning steel,
Still fond of life, groan'd out the dreadful secret,
Held forth this fatal scroll, then sunk to nothing.

Mahomet, examining the paper.

His correspondence with our foes of Greece!
His hand! His seal! The secrets of my soul
Conceal'd from all but him! All! all conspire
To banish doubt, and brand him for a villain.
Our schemes for ever cross'd, our mines discover'd,
Betray'd some traitor lurking near my bosom.
Oft have I rag'd, when their wide-waisting cannon
Lay pointed at our batt'ries yet unform'd,
And broke the meditated lines of war.
Detested Cali too, with artful wonder,
Would shake his wily head, and closely whisper,
Beware of Mustapha, beware of treason.

Mustapha.

The faith of Mustapha disdains suspicion;
But yet, great emperor, beware of treason.
Th' insidious Bassa fir'd by disappointment—

Mahomet.

Shall feel the vengeance of an injur'd king.
Go, seize him, load him with reproachful chains;
Before th' assembled troops proclaim his crimes;
Then leave him stretch'd upon the ling'ring rack,
Amidst the camp to howl his life away.

Mustapha.

Should we before the troops proclaim his crimes,
I dread his arts of seeming innocence,
His bland address, and sorcery of tongue;
And should he fall unheard, by sudden justice,
Th' adoring soldiers would revenge their idol.

Mahomet.

Cali, this day with hypocritic zeal,
Implor'd my leave to visit Mecca's temple;
Struck with the wonder of a statesman goodness,
I rais'd his thoughts to more sublime devotion.
Now let him go, pursu'd by silent wrath,
Meet unexpected daggers in his way,
And in some distant land obscurely die.

Mustapha.

There will his boundless wealth, the spoil of Asia,
Heap'd by your father's ill-plac'd bounties on him,
Disperse rebellion through the Eastern world;
Bribe to his cause and lift beneath his banners
Arabia's roving troops, the sons of swiftness,
And arm the Persian heretic against thee;
There shall he waste thy frontiers, check thy conquests,
And though at length subdued, elude thy vengeance.

Mahomet.

Elude my vengeance! no—My troops shall range
Th' eternal snows that freeze beyond Meotis,
And Afric's torrid sands, in search of Cali.
Should the fierce North upon his frozen wings
Bear him aloft above the wond'ring clouds,
And seat him in the Pleiads' golden chariots,
Thence should my fury drag him down to tortures;

Wherever guilt can fly, revenge can follow.

Mustapha.

Wilt thou dismiss the savage from the toils,
Only to hunt him round the ravag'd world?

Mahomet.

Suspend his sentence—Empire and Irene
Claim my divided soul. This wretch, unworthy
To mix with nobler cares, I'll throw aside
For idle hours, and crush him at my leisure.

Mustapha.

Let not th' unbounded greatness of his mind
Betray my king to negligence of danger.

Perhaps the clouds of dark conspiracy
Now roll full fraught with thunder o'er your head.
Twice since the morning rose I saw the Bassa,
Like a fell adder swelling in a brake,
Beneath the covert of this verdant arch
In private conference; beside him stood
Two men unknown, the partners of his bosom;
I mark'd them well, and trac'd in either face
The gloomy resolution, horrid greatness,
And stern composure of despairing heroes;
And, to confirm my thought, at sight of me,
As blasted by my presence, they withdrew
With all the speed of terror and of guilt.

Mabomet.

The strong emotions of my troubled soul
Allow no pause for art or for contrivance;
And dark perplexity distracts my counsels.
Do thou resolve: For see Irene comes!
At her approach each ruder gust of thought
Sinks like the sighing of a tempest spent,
And gales of softer passion fan my bosom.
[Call enters with Irene, and exit with Mustapha

SCENE VII.

MAHOMET, IRENE.

Mabomet.

Wilt thou descend, fair daughter of perfection,
To hear my vows, and give mankind a queen?
Ah! cease, Irene, cease those flowing sorrows,
That melt a heart impregnable till now,
And turn thy thoughts henceforth to love and empire.

How will the matchless beauties of Irene,
Thus bright in tears, thus amiable in ruin,
With all the graceful pride of greatness heighten'd,
Amidst the blaze of jewels and of gold,
Adorn a throne, and dignify dominion.

Irene.

Why all this glare of splendid eloquence,
To paint the pageantries of guilty state?
Must I for these renounce the hope of heav'n,
Immortal crowns and fullness of enjoyment?

Mabomet.

Vain raptures all—For your inferior natures
Form'd to delight, and happy by delighting,
Heav'n has reserv'd no future Paradise,
But bids you rove the paths of bliss, secure
Of total death and careles of hereafter;
While heav'n's high minister, whose awful volume
Records each act, each thought of sovereign man,
Surveys your plays with inattentive glance,
And leaves the lovely triller unregarded.

Irene.

Why then has nature's vain munificence
Profusely pour'd her bounties upon woman?
Whence then those charms thy tongue has deign'd to flatter,

That air resistless and enchanting blush,
Unless the beauteous fabric was design'd
A habitation for a fairer soul?

Mabomet.

Too high, bright maid, thou rat'st exterior grace:
Not always do the fairest flow'rs diffuse
The richest odours, nor the speckled shells
Conceal the gem; let female arrogance

Observe the feather'd wand'ers of the sky;
With purple varied and bedropp'd with gold,
They prune the wing, and spread the glossy plumes,
Ordain'd, like you, to flutter and to shine,
And cheer the weary passenger with music.

Irene.

Mean as we are, this tyrant of the world
Implores our smiles, and trembles at our feet:
Whence flow the hopes and fears, despair and rap-
ture,

Whence all the bliss and agonies of love?

Mabomet.

Why, when the balm of sleep descends on man,
Do gay delusions, wand'ring o'er the brain,
Sooth the delighted soul with empty bliss?
To want give affluence? and to slav'ry freedom?
Such are love's joys, the lenitives of life,
A faucy'd treasure, and a waking dream.

Irene.

Then let me once, in honour of our sex,
Assume the boastful arrogance of man.
Th' attractive softness, and th' endearing smile,
And pow'rful glance, 'tis granted, are our own;
Nor has impartial nature's frugal hand
Exhausted all her nobler gifts on you;
Do not we share the comprehensive thought,
Th' enlivening wit, the penetrating reason?
Beats not the female breast with gen'rous passions,
The thirst of empire, and the love of glory?

Mabomet.

Illustrious maid, new wonders fix me thine,
Thy soul completes the triumphs of thy face.
I thought, forgive my fair, the noblest aim,
The strongest effort of a female soul,
Was but to choose the graces of the day;
To tune the tongue, to teach the eyes to roll,
Dispose the colours of the flowing robe,
And add new roses to the faded cheek.
Will it not charm a mind like thine exalted,
To shine the goddess of applauding nations,
To scatter happiness and plenty round thee,
To bid the prostrate captive rise and live,
To see new cities tow'r at thy command,
And blasted kingdoms flourish at thy smile?

Irene.

Charm'd with the thought of blessing human kind,
Too calm I listen to the flatter'ing sounds.

Mabomet.

O seize the power to bliss—Irene's nod
Shall break the fetters of the groaning Christian;
Greece, in her lovely patroness secure,
Shall mourn no more her plunder'd palaces.

Irene.

Forbear—O do not urge me to my ruin!

Mabomet.

To state and pow'r I court thee, not to ruin:
Smile on my wishes, and command the globe.
Security shall spread her shield before thee,
And love enfold thee with his downy wings.

If greatness please thee, mount th' imperial seat;
If pleasure charm thee, view this soft retreat;
Here ev'ry warbler of the sky shall sing;
Here ev'ry fragrance breathe of ev'ry spring:
To deck these bow'rs each region shall combine,
And ev'n our prophet's gardens envy thine:
Empire and love shall share the blissful day,
And varied life steal unperceiv'd away.

ACT III.—SCENE I.

CALI, ABDALLA.

Cali enters with a discontented air; to him enters Abdalla.

Cali.

Is this the fierce conspirator Abdalla?
Is this the restless diligence of treason?
Where hast thou linger'd while th' encumber'd hours
Fly lab'ring with the fate of future nations,
And hungry slaughter scents imperial blood?

Abdalla.

Important cares detain'd me from your counsels.

Cali.

Some petty passion! some domestic trifle;
Some vain amusement of a vacant soul!
A weeping wife perhaps, or dying friend,
Hung on your neck, and hinder'd your departure.
Is this a time for softness or for sorrow?
Unprofitable, peaceful, female virtues!
When eager vengeance shows a naked foe,
And kind ambition points the way to greatness.

Abdalla.

Must then ambition's votaries infringe
The laws of kindness, break the bonds of nature?
And quit the names of brother, friend, and father?

Cali.

This sovereign passion, scornful of restraint,
Ev'n from the birth affects supreme command,
Swells in the breast, and with resistless force
O'erbears each gentler motion of the mind.
As when a deluge overspreads the plains,
The wand'ring rivulet, and silver lake,
Mix undistinguish'd with the gen'ral roar.

Abdalla.

Yet can ambition in Abdalla's breast
Claim but the second place: there mighty love
Has fix'd his hopes, iniquities, and fears,
His glowing wishes, and his jealous pangs.

Cali.

Love is indeed the privilege of youth;
Yet, on a day like this, when expectation
Pants for the dread event—But let us reason—

Abdalla.

Hast thou grown old amidst the crowd of courts,
And turn'd th' instructive page of human life,
To cant, at last, of reason to a lover?
Such ill-tim'd gravity, such serious folly,
Might well best the solitary student,
Th' unpractis'd dervise, or sequester'd faquir.
Know'st thou not yet, when love invades the soul,
That all her faculties receive his chains?
That reason gives her sceptre to his hand,
Or only struggles to be more enslav'd!
Aspasia, who can look upon thy beauties?
Who hear thee speak, and not abandon reason?
Reason! the hoary dotard's dull direstrefs,
That loses all because the hazards nothing:
Reason! the tim'rous pilot, that to shun
The rocks of life, for ever flies the port.

Cali.

But why this sudden warmth?

Abdalla.

Because I love:
Because my slighted passion burns in vain!

Why roars the lioness distress'd by hunger?
Why foam the swelling waves when tempests rise?
Why shakes the ground, when subterraneous fires
Fierce through the burbling caverns rend their way?

Cali.

Not till this day thou saw'st this fatal fair;
Did ever passion make so swift a progress?
Once more reflect, suppress this infant folly.

Abdalla.

Gross fires, enkindled by a mortal hand,
Spread by degrees, and read th' oppressing stream;
The subtler flames emitted from the sky,
Flash out at once, with strength above resistance.

Cali.

How did Aspasia welcome your address?
Did you proclaim this unexpected conquest?
Or pay with speaking eyes a lover's homage?

Abdalla.

Confounded, aw'd, and lost in admiration,
I gaz'd, I trembled; but I could not speak:
When ev'n as love was breaking off from wonder,
And tender accents quiver'd on my lips,
She mark'd my sparkling eyes, and heaving breast,
And smiling, conscious of her charms, withdrew.

Enter Demetrius and Leontius.

Cali.

Now be some moments master of thyself,
Nor let Demetrius know thee for a rival.
Hence! or be calm—To disagree is ruin.

SCENE II.

CALI, DEMETRIUS, LEONTIUS, ABDALLA.

Demetrius.

When will occasion smile upon our wishes,
And give the tortures of suspense a period?
Still must we linger in uncertain hope?
Still languish in our chains, and dream of freedom,
Like thirly failors gazing on the clouds,
Till burning death shoots through their wither'd limbs?

Cali.

Deliverance is at hand; for Turkey's tyrant,
Sunk in his pleasures, confident and gay,
With all the hero's dull security,
Trusts to my care his mistress and his life,
And laughs and wantons in the jaws of death.

Leontius.

So weak is man, when destin'd to destruction,
The watchful slumber, and the crazy trust.

Cali.

At my command yon iron gates unfold;
At my command the sentinels retire;
With all the licence of authority,
Through bowing slaves, I range the private rooms,
And of to-morrow's action fix the scene.

Demetrius.

To-morrow's action! Can that hoary wisdom
Borne down with years, still doat upon to-morrow?

That fatal mistress of the young, the lazy,
The coward and the fool, condemn'd to lose
An useless life in waiting for to-morrow,
To gaze with longing eyes upon to-morrow,
Till interposing death destroys the prospect!
Strange! that this gen'ral fraud from day to day
Should fill the world with wretches undetected.

The soldier lab'ring through a winter's march,
Still sees to-morrow drest in robes of triumph;
Still to the lover's long-expecting arms,
To-morrow brings the visionary bride.
But thou, too old to bear another cheat,
Learn, that the present hour alone is man's.

Leontius.

The present hour with open arms invites,
Seize the kind fair, and press her to thy bosom.

Demetrius.

Who knows, ere this important morrow rise,
But fear or mutiny may taint the Greeks?
Who knows if Mahomet's awaking anger
May spare the fatal bow-string till to-morrow?

Abdalla.

Had our first Asian foes but known this ardour,
We still had wander'd on Tartarian hills.
Rouse, Cali, shall the sons of conquer'd Greece
Lead us to danger, and abash their victors?
This night with all her conscious stars be witness,
Who merits most.—Demetrius or Abdalla.

Demetrius.

Who merits most!—I know not we were rivals.

Cali.

Young man, forbear—The heat of youth, no more—

Well,—'tis decreed—This night shall fix our fate.
Soon as the veil of evening clouds the sky,
With cautious secrecy, Leontius steer,
Th' appointed vessel to yon shaded bay,
Form'd by this garden jutting on the deep;
There, with your soldiers arm'd, and sails expanded,
Await our coming, equally prepar'd
For speedy flight, or obstinate defence.

[Exit Leont.

SCENE III.

CALI, ABDALLA, DEMETRIUS.

Demetrius.

Now pause, great Bassa, from the thoughts of blood,

And kindly grant an ear to gentler sounds.
If e'er thy youth has known the pangs of absence,
Or felt th' impatience of obstructed love,
Give me, before th' approaching hour of fate,
Once to behold the charms of bright Aspasia,
And draw new virtue from her heav'nly tongue.

Cali.

Let prudence, ere the suit be farther urg'd,
Impartial weigh the pleasure with the danger.
A little longer, and she's thine for ever.

Demetrius.

Prudence and love conspire in this request,
Lest, unacquainted with our bold attempt,
Surprise o'erwhelm her, and retard our flight.

Cali.

What I can grant, you cannot ask in vain—

Demetrius.

I go to wait thy call; this kind consent
Completes the gift of freedom and of life.

[Exit. Dem.

SCENE IV.

CALI, ABDALLA.

Abdalla.

And this is my reward—to burn, to languish,
To rave unheeded, while the happy Greek,

VOL. XI.

The refuse of our swords, the dross of conquest,
Throws his fond arms about Aspasia's neck,
Dwells on her lips, and sighs upon her breast;
Is't not enough, he lives by our indulgence,
But he must live to make his masters wretched?

Cali.

What claim hast thou to plead?

Abdalla.

The claim of pow'r,
Th' unquestion'd claim of conquerors, and kings!

Cali.

Yet in the use of pow'r remember justice.

Abdalla.

Can then th' assassin list his treach'rous hand
Against his king, and cry, remember justice.
Justice demands the forfeit life of Cali;
Justice demands that I reveal your crimes;
Justice demands—But see th' approaching sultan.
Oppose my wishes, and—Remember justice.

Cali.

Disorder sits upon thy face—retire.

[Exit Abdalla, Enter Mahomet.

SCENE V.

CALI, MAHOMET.

Cali.

Long be the sultan blest'd with happy love;
My zeal marks gladness dawning on thy cheek,
With raptures such as fire the pagan crowds,
When pale, and anxious for their years to come,
They see the sun surmount the dark eclipse,
And hail unanimous their conquer'ing god.

Mahomet.

My vows, 'tis true, she hears with less aversion,
She sighs, she blushes, but she still denies.

Cali.

With warmer courtship press the yielding fair,
Call to your aid with boundless promises
Each rebel wish, each traitor inclination
That raises tumults in the female breast,
The love of pow'r, of pleasure, and of show.

Mahomet.

These arts I try'd, and to inflame her more,
By hateful business hurried from her sight,
I bade a hundred virgins wait around her,
Sooth her with all the pleasures of command,
Applaud her charms, and court her to be great.

[Exit Mahomet.

SCENE VI.

Cali solus.

He's gone—Here rest, my soul, thy fainting wing,
Here recollect thy dissipated pow'rs.—

Our distant int'rests, and our different passions
Now haste to mingle in one common centre,
And fate lies crowded in a narrow space.

Yet in that narrow space what dangers rise!—
Far more I dread Abdalla's fiery folly,

Than all the wisdom of the grave divan.

Reason with reason fights on equal terms,
The raging madman's unconnected schemes

We cannot obviate, for we cannot guess.
Deep in my breast be treasured this resolve,

When Cali mounts the throne, Abdalla dies,
Too fierce, too faithless for neglect or trust.

[Enter Irène with Attendants.

SCENE VII.

CALI, IRENE, ASPASIA, &c.

Cali.

Amidst the splendor of encircling beauty,
Superior majesty proclaims the queen,
And nature justifies our monarch's choice.

Irene.

Reserve this homage for some other fair,
Urge me not on to glittering guilt, nor pour
In my weak ear th' intoxicating sounds.

Cali.

Make haste, bright maid, to rule the willing world;

Aw'd by the rigour of the sultan's justice,
We court thy gentleness.

Aspasia.

Can Cali's voice

Concur to press a helpless captive's ruin?

Cali.

Long would my zeal for Mahomet and thee
Detain me here. But nations call upon me,
And duty bids me choose a distant walk,
Nor taint with care the privacies of love.

SCENE VIII.

IRENE, ASPASIA, Attendants.

Aspasia.

If yet this shining pomp, these sudden honours,
Swell not thy soul beyond advice or friendship,
Nor yet inspire the follies of a queen,
Or tune thine ear to soothing adulation,
Suspend a while the privilege of pow'r
To hear the voice of truth; dismiss thy train,
Shake off th' encumbrances of state a moment,
And lay the towering sultaness aside,

[Irene signs to her attendants to retire.]

While I foretel thy fate; that office done,—
No more I boast th' ambitious name of friend,
But sink among thy slaves without a murmur.

Irene.

Did regal diadems invest my brow,
Yet should my soul, still faithful to her choice,
Esteem Aspasia's breast the noblest kingdom.

Aspasia.

The soul once tainted with so foul a crime,
No more shall glow with friendship's hallow'd ar-
dour:

Those holy beings, whose superior care
Guides erring mortals to the paths of virtue,
Astrighted at impiety like thine,
Resign their charge to baseness and to ruin.

Irene.

Upraid me not with fancy'd wickedness,
I am not yet a queen, or an apostate.
But should I sin beyond the hope of mercy,
If, when religion prompts me to refuse,
'The dread of instant death restrains my tongue?

Aspasia.

Reflect that life and death, affecting sounds,
Are only varied modes of endless being;
Reflect that life, like ev'ry other blessing,
Derives its values from its use alone;
Not for itself but for a nobler end
'Th' Eternal gave it, and that end is virtue.
When inconsistent with a greater good,
Reason commands to cast the less away;

Thus life, with loss of wealth is well prefer'd,
And virtue cheaply sav'd with loss of life.

Irene.

If built on settled thought, this constancy
Not idly flutters on a boastful tongue,
Why, when destruction rag'd around our walls,
Why fled this haughty heroine from the battle?
Why then did not this warlike Amazon
Mix in the war, and shine among the heroes?

Aspasia.

Heav'n, when its hand pour'd softness on our limbs,

Unfit for toil, and polish'd into weakness,
Made passive fortitude the praise of woman:
Our only arms are innocence and meekness.
Not then with raving cries I fill'd the city,
But while Demetrius, dear lamented name!
Pour'd storms of fire upon our fierce invaders,
Implor'd th' eternal power to shield my country,
With silent forrows, and with calm devotion.

Irene.

O! did Irene shine the Queen of Turkey, [jected.
No more should Greece lament those prayers re-
Again should golden splendour grace her cities,
Again her prostrate palaces should rise,
Again her temples sound with holy music:
No more should danger fright, or want distress
The smiling widows, and protected orphans.

Aspasia.

Be virtuous ends pursued by virtuous means,
Nor think th' intention sanctifies the deed:
That maxim publish'd in an impious age,
Would loose the wild enthusiast to destroy,
And fix the fierce usurper's bloody title.
Then bigotry might send her slaves to war,
And bid success become the test of truth;
Unpitied massacre might waste the world,
'And pericution boast the call of heav'n.

Irene.

Shall I not wish to cheer afflicted kings,
And plan the happiness of mourning millions?

Aspasia.

Dream not of pow'r thou never canst attain:
When social laws first harmonis'd the world,
Superior man possess'd the charge of rule,
The scale of justice, and the sword of pow'r,
Nor left us aught but flattery and state.

Irene.

To me my lover's fondness will restore,
Whate'er man's pride has ravish'd from our sex.

Aspasia.

When soft security shall prompt the sultan,
Freed from the tumults of unsettled conquest,
To fix his court and regulate his pleasures,
Soon shall the dire seraglio's horrid gates
Close like th' eternal bars of death upon thee,
Immur'd, and buried in perpetual sloth,
That gloomy slumber of the stagnant soul;
There shalt thou view from far the quiet cottage,
And sigh for cheerful poverty in vain:
There wear the tedious hours of life away,
Beneath each curse of unrelenting heav'n,
Despair, and slav'ry, solitude, and guilt.

Irene.

There shall we find the yet untasted bliss
Of grandeur and tranquillity combin'd.

Aspasia.

Tranquillity and guilt, disjoin'd by heav'n,

Still stretch in vain their longing arms afar;
Nor dare to pass th' insuperable bound.
Ah! let me rather seek the convent's cell;
There when my thoughts, at interval of pray'r,
Descend to range these mansions of misfortune,
Oft' shall I dwell on our disastrous friendship,
And shed the pitying tear for lost Irene.

Irene.

Go languish on in dull obscurity;
Thy dazzled soul, with all its boasted greatness,
Shrinks at th' o'erpow'ring gleams of regal state,
Stoops from the blaze like a degenerate eagle,
And flies for shelter to the shades of life.

Aspasia.

On me, should Providence, without a crime;
The weighty charge of royalty confer;
Call me to civilize the Russian wilds,
Or bid soft science polish Britain's heroes:
Soon shouldst thou see, how false thy weak reproach.

My bosom feels, enkindled from the sky,
The lambent flames of mild benevolence,
Untouch'd by fierce ambition's raging fires.

Irene.

Ambition is the stamp, impress'd by heav'n
To mark the noblest minds; with active heat
Inform'd they mount the precipice of pow'r,
Grasp at command, and tow'r in quest of empire;
While vulgar souls compassionate their cares,
Gaze at their height and tremble at their danger:
Thus meaner spirits with amazement mark
The varying seasons, and revolving skies,
And ask, what guilty pow'r's rebellious hand
Rolls with eternal toil the ponderous orbs:
While some archangel, nearer to perfection,
In easy state presides o'er all their motions,
Directs the planets with a careless nod,
Conducts the sun, and regulates the spheres.

Aspasia.

Well may'st thou hide in labyrinths of sound
The cause that shrinks from reason's powerful voice.
Stoop from thy flight, trace back th' entangled
thought,

And set the glittering fallacy to view.
Not pow'r I blame, but pow'r obtain'd by crime,
Angelic greatness is angelic virtue.
Amidst the glare of courts, the shout of armies,
Will not th' apostate feel the pangs of guilt,
And wish too late for innocence and peace?
Curst as the tyrant of th' infernal realms,
With gloomy state and agonizing pomp.

SCENE IX.

IRENE, ASPASIA, MAID.

Maid.

A Turkish stranger, of majestic mien,
Asks at the gate admission to Aspasia,
Commission'd, as he says, by Cali Bassa.

Irene.

Whoe'er thou art, or whatsoever thy message, [Aside
Thanks for this kind relief—With speed admit him.

Aspasia.

He comes, perhaps, to separate us for ever;
When I am gone remember, O! remember,
That none are great, or happy, but the virtuous.
[Exit Irene, Enter Demetrius.

SCENE X.

ASPASIA, DEMETRIUS.

Demetrius.

'Tis she—my hope, my happiness, my love!
Aspasia! do I once again behold thee?
Still, still the same—unclouded by misfortune!
Let my blest eyes for ever gaze——

Aspasia.

Demetrius!

Demetrius.

Why does the blood forsake thy lovely cheek?
Why shoots this chillness through thy shaking nerves?

Why does thy soul retire into herself?
Recline upon my breast thy sinking beauties:
Revive—Revive to freedom and to love.

Aspasia.

What well-known voice pronounc'd the grateful sounds

Freedom and love? Alas! I'm all confusion,
A sudden mist o'ercasts my darken'd soul,
The present, past, and future swim before me,
Lost in a wild perplexity of joy.

Demetrius.

Such ecstacy of love! such pure affection,
What worth can merit? or what faith reward?

Aspasia.

A thousand thoughts, imperfect and distracted,
Demand a voice, and struggle into birth;
A thousand questions press upon my tongue,
But all give way to rapture and Demetrius.

Demetrius.

O say, bright being, in this age of absence,
What fears, what griefs, what dangers hast thou
known?

Say, how the tyrant threaten'd, flatter'd, sigh'd,
Say, how he threaten'd, flatter'd, sigh'd in vain!
Say, how the hand of violence was rais'd,
Say, how thou call'dst in tears upon Demetrius!

Aspasia.

Inform me rather, how thy happy courage
Stem'd in the breach the deluge of destruction,
And pass'd uninjur'd through the walks of death?
Did savage anger, and licentious conquest,
Behold the hero with Aspasia's eyes?
And thus protected in the gen'ral ruin,
O say, what guardian pow'r convey'd thee hither.

Demetrius.

Such strange events, such unexpected chances,
Beyond my warmest hope, or wildest wishes,
Concur'd to give me to Aspasia's arms,
I stand amaz'd, and ask, if yet I clasp thee.

Aspasia.

Sure heav'n, for wonders are not wrought in vain,
That joins us thus, will never part us more.

SCENE XI.

DEMETRIUS, ASPASIA, ABDALLA.

Abdalla.

It parts you now—The hasty sultan sign'd
The laws unread, and flies to his Irene.

Demetrius.

Fix'd and intent on his Irene's charms,
He envies none the converse of Aspasia.

Abdalla.

Aspasia's absence will inflame suspicion;
She cannot, must not, shall not linger here,
Prudence and friendship bid me force her from you.

Demetrius.

Force her! profane her with a touch, and die.

Abdalla.

'Tis Greece, 'tis freedom calls Aspasia hence,
Your careless love betrays your country's cause.

Demetrius.

If we must part—

Aspasia.

No! let us die together.

Demetrius.

If we must part—

Abdalla.

Dispatch; th' increasing danger
Will not admit a lover's long farewell,
The long-drawn intercourse of sighs and kisses.

Demetrius.

Then—O my fair, I cannot bid thee go;
Receive her, and protect her, gracious Heav'n!
Yet let me watch her dear departing steps,
If fate pursues me, let it find me here.

Reproach not, Greece, a lover's fond delays,
Nor think thy cause neglected while I gaze;
New force, new courage, from each glance I
gain,

And find our passions not insus'd in vain.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.—SCENE I.

DEMETRIUS, ASPASIA, enter as talking.Aspasia.

ENOUGH—resifless reason calms my soul—
Approving justice smiles upon your cause,
And nature's rights entreat th' asserting sword.
Yet when your hand is lifted to destroy,
Think—but excuse a woman's needless caution,
Purge well thy mind from ev'ry private passion,
Drive int'rest, love, and vengeance from thy thoughts,

Fill all thy ardent breast with Greece and virtue,
Then strike secure, and Heav'n assist the blow!

Demetrius.

Thou kind assistant of my better angel,
Propitious guide of my bewilder'd soul,
Calm of my cares, and guardian of my virtue!

Aspasia.

My soul, first kindled by thy bright example
To noble thought and gen'rous emulation,
Now but reflects those beams that flow'd from thee.

Demetrius.

With native lustre and unborrow'd greatness,
Thou shin'st, bright maid, superior to distress;
Unlike the trifling race of vulgar beauties,
Those glitt'ring dew-drops of a vernal morn,
That spread their colours to the genial beam,
And sparkling quiver to the breath of May;
But when the tempest with sonorous wing
Sweeps o'er the grove, forsake the lab'ring bough,
Dipers'd in air, or mingled with the dust.

Aspasia.

Forbear this triumph—full new conflicts wait us,

5

Foes unforseen, and dangers unsuspected.
Oft when the fierce besieger's eager host
Beholds the fainting garrison retire,
And rushes joyful to the naked wall,
Destruction flashes from th' insidious mine,
And sweeps th' exulting conqueror away:
Perhaps in vain the sultan's anger spar'd me,
To find a meaner fate from treach'rous friendship—

Abdalla!—

Demetrius.

Can Abdalla then dissemble?

That fiery chief, renown'd for gen'rous freedom,
For zeal unguarded, undissembled hate,
For daring truth, and turbulence of honour?

Aspasia.

This open friend, this undesigning hero,
With noisy falsehoods forc'd me from your arms,
To shock my virtue with a tale of love.

Demetrius.

Did not the cause of Greece restrain my sword,
Aspasia should not fear a second insult.

Aspasia.

His pride and love by turns inspir'd his tongue,
And intermix'd my praises with his own;
His wealth, his rank, his honours he recounted,
Till, in the midst of arrogance and fondness,
Th' approaching sultan forc'd me from the palace;
Then while he gaz'd upon his yielding mistress,
I stole unheeded from their ravish'd eyes,
And sought this happy grove in quest of thee.

Demetrius.

Soon may the final stroke decide our fate,
Left baneful discord crush our infant scheme,
And strangled freedom perish in the birth!

Aspasia.

My bosom, haras'd with alternate passions,
Now hopes, now fears—

Demetrius.

Th' anxieties of love.

Aspasia.

Think how the sov'reign arbiter of kingdoms
Detests thy false associates' black designs,
And frowns on perjury, revenge and murder.
Embark'd with treason on the seas of fate,
When heav'n shall bid the swelling billows rage,
And point vindictive lightnings at rebellion,
Will not the patriot share the traitor's danger?
Oh could thy hand unaided free thy country,
Nor mingled guilt pollute the sacred cause!

Demetrius.

Permitted oft, though not inspir'd by heav'n,
Successful treasons punish impious kings.

Aspasia.

Nor end my terrors with the sultan's death;
Far as futurity's untravell'd waste
Lies open to conjecture's dubious ken,
On ev'ry side confusion, rage and death;
Perhaps the phantoms of a woman's fear,
Beset the treacherous way with fatal ambush;
Each Turkish bosom burns for thy destruction,
Ambitious Cali dreads the statesman's arts,
And hot Abdalla hates the happy lover.

Demetrius.

Capricious man! to good and ill inconstant,
Too much to fear, or trust, is equal weakness.
Sometimes the wretch unaw'd by heav'n or hell,
With mad devotion idolizes honour.

The Bassa, reeking with his master's murder,
Perhaps may start at violated friendship.

Aspasia.

How soon, alas! will int'rest fear, or envy,
O'erthrow such weak, such accidental virtue,
Nor built on faith, nor fortify'd by conscience!

Demetrius.

When desp'rate ills demand a speedy cure,
Distrust is cowardice, and prudence folly.

Aspasia.

Yet think a moment, ere you court destruction,
What hand, when death has snatch'd away Demetrius,

Shall guard Aspasia from triumphant lust.

Demetrius.

Dismiss these needless fears—a troop of Greeks
Well known, long try'd, expect us on the shore.
Borne on the surface of the smiling deep,
Soon shalt thou scorn, in safety's arms repos'd,
Abdalla's rage and Cali's stratagems.

Aspasia.

Still, still distrust sits heavy on my heart.
Will e'er an happier hour revisit Greece?

Demetrius.

Should Heav'n yet unappeas'd refuse its aid,
Disperse our hopes, and frustrate our designs,
Yet shall the conscience of the great attempt
Diffuse a brightness on our future days;
Nor will his country's groans reproach Demetrius.
But how canst thou support the woes of exile?
Canst thou forget hereditary splendours,
To live obscure upon a foreign coast,
Content with science, innocence, and love?

Aspasia.

Nor wealth, nor titles, make Aspasia's bliss,
O'erwhelm'd and lost amidst the public ruins,
Unmov'd I saw the glitt'ring trifles perish,
And thought the petty dross beneath a sigh.
Cheerful I follow to the rural cell,
Love be my wealth, and my distinction virtue.

Demetrius.

Submissive and prepar'd for each event,
Now let us wait the last award of Heav'n,
Secure of happiness from flight or conquest,
Nor fear the fair and learn'd can want protection.
The mighty 'Tuscan courts the banish'd arts
To kind Italia's hospitable shades;
There shall soft leisure wing th' excurive soul,
And peace propitious smile on fond desire;
There shall despotic eloquence resume
Her ancient empire o'er the yielding heart;
There poetry shall tune her sacred voice,
And wake from ignorance the western world.

SCENE II.

DEMETRIUS, ASPASIA, CALI.

Cali.

At length th' unwilling sun resigns the world
To silence and to rest. The hours of darkness,
Propitious hours to stratagem and death,
Pursue the last remains of ling'ring light.

Demetrius.

Count not these hours as parts of vulgar time,
Think them a sacred treasure lent by Heav'n,
Which squander'd by neglect, or fear, or folly,
No pray'r recalls, no diligence redeems;

To-morrow's dawn shall see the Turkish king
Stich'd in the dust, or tow'ring on his throne;
The sport of his dawn shall see the mighty Cali
"ranny, or lord of nations.

Then waste no long Cali.
In soft endearments, these important moments
Nor lose in love the patriot's gentle murmurs,
Demetrius. 'he hero.

'Tis love combin'd with guilt alone,
The soften'd soul to cowardice and flatterer melts
But virtuous passion prompts the great resolve.
And fans the slumb'ring spark of heav'nly fire.
Retire, my fair; that pow'r that smiles on goodness
Guide all thy steps, calm ev'ry stormy thought,
And still thy bosom with the voice of peace!

Aspasia.

Soon may we meet again, secure and free,
To feel no more the pangs of separation! [Exit.]

DEMETRIUS, CALI.

Demetrius.

This night alone is ours—Our mighty foe,
No longer lost in am'rous solitude,
Will now remount the slighted seat of empire,
And show Irene to the shouting people:
Aspasia left her sighing in his arms,
And list'ning to the pleasing tale of pow'r,
With soften'd voice the dropp'd the faint refusal,
Smiling consent the sat, and blushing love.

Cali.

Now, tyrant, with satiety of beauty
Now feast thine eyes, thine eyes that ne'er hereafter
Shall dart their am'rous glances at the fair,
Or glare on Cali with malignant beams.

SCENE III.

DEMETRIUS, CALI, LEONTIUS, ABDALLA.

Leontius.

Our bark unseen has reach'd th' appointed bay,
And where yon trees wave o'er the foaming surge
Reclines against the shore: our Grecian troop
Extends its lines along the sandy beach,
Elate with hope, and panting for a foe.

Abdalla.

The fav'ring winds assist the great design,
Sport in our sails, and murmur o'er the deep.

Cali.

'Tis well—A single blow completes our wishes:
Return with speed, Leontius, to your charge;
The Greeks, disorder'd by their leader's absence,
May droop dismay'd, or kindle into madness.

Leontius.

Suspected still?—What villain's pois'nous tongue
Dares join Leontius' name with fear or falsehood?
Have I for this preserv'd my guiltless bosom,
Pure as the thoughts of infant innocence?
Have I for this defy'd the chiefs of Turkey,
Intrepid in the flaming front of war?

Cali.

Hast thou not search'd my soul's profoundest
thoughts?
Is not the fate of Greece and Cali thine?

Leontius.

Why has thy choice then pointed out Leontius,

Unfit to share this night's illustrious toils?
To wait remote from action and from honour,
An idle list'ner to the distant cries
Of slaughter'd infidels, and clash of arms!
Tell me the cause, that while th-

trius, wings of glory,
Shall soar triumphant on; thus must descend
Despis'd and curs'd, a proverbial coward,
Through hissings, and the scorn of fools?
The tale of - Demetrius.

Leontius be the slave of glory!
Cali, the casual gift of thoughtless crowds!
Glory, the bribe of avaricious virtue!
Be but my country free, be thine the praise;
I ask no witness, but attesting conscience,
No records, but the records of the sky.

Leontius.
Wilt thou then head the troop upon the shore,
While I destroy th' oppressor of mankind?

Demetrius.
What canst thou boast superior to Demetrius?
Ask to whose sword the Greeks will trust their cause,

My name shall echo through the shouting field;
Demand whose force yon Turkish heroes dread,
The shudd'ring camp shall murmur out Demetrius.

Cali.
Must Greece, still wretched by her children's folly,
For ever mourn their avarice or factions?
Demetrius justly pleads a double title,
The lover's interest aids the patriot's claim.

Leontius.
My pride shall ne'er protract my country's woes;
Succeed, my friend, unenvied by Leontius.

Demetrius.
I feel new spirit shoot along my nerves,
My soul expands to meet approaching freedom.
Now hover o'er us with propitious wings,
Ye sacred shades of patriots and of martyrs;
All ye, whose blood tyrannic rage effus'd,
Or persecution drank, attend our call;
And from the mansions of perpetual peace
Descend, to sweeten labours once your own.

Cali.
Go then, and with united eloquence
Confirm your troops; and when the moon's fair beam
Plays on the quiv'ring waves, to guide our flight,
Return, Demetrius, and be free for ever.

[Exeunt Dem. and Leon.]

SCENE IV.

CALI, ABDALLA.

Abdalla.

How the new monarch, swell'd with airy rule,
Looks down, contemptuous, from his fancy'd height,
And utters fate, unmindful of Abdalla!

Cali.
Far be such black ingratitude from Cali;
When Asia's nations own me for their lord,
Wealth, and command, and grandeur, shall be thine

Abdalla.
Is this the recompence reserv'd for me?
Dar'st thou thus dally with Abdalla's passion?

Henceforward hope no more my slighted friendship,
Wake from thy dream of pow'r to death and tor-
And bid thy visionary throne farewell.

Cali.
Name, and enjoy thy wish—
Abdalla.

I need not name it;
Aspasia's lovers know but one desire,
Nor hope, nor wish, nor live, but for Aspasia.

Cali.
That fatal beauty plighted to Demetrius,
Heav'n makes not mine to give.

Abdalla.
Nor to deny,
Cali.
Obtain her and possess, thou know'st thy rival.

Abdalla.
Too well I know him, since on Thracia's plains
I felt the force of his tempestuous arm,
And saw my scatter'd squadrons fly before him,
Nor will I trust th' uncertain chance of combat;
The rights of princes let the sword decide,
The petty claims of empire and of honour:
Revenge and subtle jealousy shall teach
A surer passage to his hated heart.

Cali.
O spare the gallant Greek, in him we lose
The politician's arts, and hero's flame.

Abdalla.
When next we meet, before we storm the palace,
The bowl shall circle to confirm our league,
Then shall these juices taint Demetrius's draught,
[Showing a phial.]
And stream destructive through his freezing veins:
Thus shall he live to strike th' important blow,
And perish ere he tastes the joys of conquest.

SCENE V.

MAHOMET, MUSTAPHA, CALI, ABDALLA.

Mahomet.
Henceforth for ever happy be this day,
Sacred to love, to pleasure, and Irene;
The matchless fair has bless'd me with compliance;
Let every tongue resound Irene's praise,
And spread the general transport through mankind.

Cali.
Bless'd prince, for whom indulgent Heav'n ordains
At once the joys of paradise and empire,
Now join thy people's, and thy Cali's prayers,
Suspend thy passage to the seats of bliss,
Nor wish for hours in Irene's arms.

Mahomet.
Forbear—I know the long-try'd faith of Cali.

Cali.
O, could the eyes of kings, like those of Heav'n,
Search to the dark recesses of the soul,
Oft would they find ingratitude and treason,
By smiles, and oaths, and praises ill disguis'd!
How rarely would they meet, in crowded courts,
Fidelity so firm, so pure, as mine!

Mustapha.
Yet, ere we give our loosen'd thoughts to rapture,
Let prudence obviate an impending danger
Tainted by sloth, the parent of sedition,

The hungry janizary burns for plunder,
And growls in private o'er his idle fabre.

Mahomet,

To still their murmurs, ere the twentieth sun
Shall shed his beams upon the bridal bed,
I rouse to war, and conquer for Irene.
Then shall the Rhodian mourn his sinking tow'rs,
And Buda fall, and proud Vienna tremble,
Then shall Venetia feel the Turkish pow'r,
And subject seas rear round their queen in vain.

Abdalla.

Then seize fair Italy's delightful coast,
To fix your standard in imperial Rome.

Mahomet.

Her sons malicious clemency shall spare,
To form new legends, sanctify new crimes,
To canonize the slaves of superstition,
And fill the world with follies and impostures,
Till angry Heav'n shall mark them out for ruin,
And war o'erwhelm them in their dream of vice.
O could her fabled saints, and boasted prayers,
Call forth her ancient heroes to the field,
How should I joy, 'midst the fierce shock of nations,
To cross the tow'rings of an equal soul,
And bid the master genius rule the world!
Abdalla, Cali, go—proclaim my purpose.

[Exeunt Cali and Abdalla.]

SCENE VI.

MAMOMET, MUSTAPHA.

Mahomet.

Still Cali lives, and must he live to-morrow?
That fawning villain's forc'd congratulations
Will cloud my triumphs, and pollute the day.

Mustapha.

With cautious vigilance, at my command,
Two faithful captains, Hasan and Caraza,
Pursue him through his labyrinths of treason,
And wait your summons to report his conduct.

Mahomet.

Call them—but let them not prolong their tale,
Nor press too much upon a lover's patience.

[Exit Mustapha.]

SCENE VII.

Mahomet solus.

Whome'er the hope, still blasted, still renew'd,
Of happiness, lures on from toil to toil,
Remember Mahomet, and cease thy labour.
Behold him here, in love, in war successful,
Behold him wretched in his double triumph;
His fav'rite faithless, and his mistress base.
Ambition only gave her to my arms,
By reason not convinc'd, nor won by love.
Ambition was her crime, but meaner folly
Dooms me to loathe at once, and doat on falsehood,
And idolize th' apostate I condemn.
If thou art more than the gay dream of fancy,
More than a pleasing sound without a meaning,
O happiness! sure thou art all Aspasia's.

SCENE VIII.

MAMOMET, MUSTAPHA, HASSAN, AND CARAZA.

Mahomet.

Caraza, speak—have ye remark'd the Bassa?

Caraza.

Cloze, as we might unseen, we watch'd his steps;
His air disorder'd, and his gait unequal,

Betray'd the wild emotions of his mind.

Sudden he stops, and inward turns his eyes,
Absorb'd in thought; then starting from his trance,
Constrains a sullen smile, and shoots away.
With him Abdalla we beheld—

Mustapha.

Abdalla!

Mahomet.

He wears of late refinement on his brow,
Deny'd the government of Serbia's province.

Caraza.

We mark'd him forming in excess of fury,
And heard, within the thicket that conceal'd us,
An undistinguish'd sound of threat'ning rage.

Mustapha.

How guilt once harbour'd in the conscious breast,
Intimidates the brave, degrades the great!
See Cali, dread of kings, and pride of armies,
By treason levell'd with the dregs of men!
Ere guilty fear depress'd the hoary chief,
An angry murmur, a rebellious frown,
Had stretch'd the fiery boaster in the grave.

Mahomet.

Shall monarchs fear to draw the sword of justice,
Aw'd by the crowd, and by their slaves restrain'd?
Seize him this night, and through the private passage

Convey him to the prison's inmost depths,
Reserv'd to all the pangs of tedious death.

[Exeunt Mahomet and Mustapha.]

SCENE IX.

HASAN, CARAZA.

Hasan.

Shall then the Greeks, unpunish'd and conceal'd,
Contrive, perhaps, the ruin of our empire,
League with our chiefs, and propagate sedition?

Caraza.

Whate'er their scheme, the Bassa's death defeats it,
And gratitude's strong ties restrain my tongue.]

Hasan.

What ties to slaves? what gratitude to foes?

Caraza.

In that black day when slaughter'd thousands fell
Around these fatal walls, the tide of war
Bore me victorious onward, where Demetrius
Tore unresisted from the giant hand
Of stern Sehalias, the triumphant crescent,
And dash'd the might of Asen from the ramparts.
There I became, nor blush to make it known,
The captive of his sword. The coward Greeks,
Enrag'd by wrongs, exulting with success,
Doom'd me to die with all the Turkish captains;
But brave Demetrius scorn'd the mean revenge,
And gave me life—

Hasan.

Do thou repay the gift,
Lest unrewarded mercy lose its charms.
Profuse of wealth, or bounteous of success,
When Heav'n bestows the privilege to bless;
Let no weak doubt the generous hand refrain,
For when was pow'r beneficent in vain? [Exit.]

ACT V.—SCENE I.

Aspasia solus.

In these dark moments of suspended fate,
While yet the future fortune of my country

Lies in the womb of Providence conceal'd,
 And anxious angels wait the mighty birth;
 O grant thy sacred influence, pow'rful virtue!
 Attention rise, survey the fair creation,
 Till, conscious of th' encircling deity,
 Beyond the mists of care thy pinion tow'rs.
 This calm, these joys, dear innocence, are thine,
 Joys ill exchange'd for gold, and pride, and empire.

[Enter Irene and attendants.]

SCENE II.

ASPASIA, IRENE, ATTENDANTS.

Irene.

See how the moon through all th' unclouded sky
 Spreads her mild radiance, and descending dews
 Revive the languid flow'rs; thus nature shone
 New from the Maker's hand, and fair array'd
 In the bright colours of primæval Spring;
 When purity, while fraud was yet unknown,
 Play'd fearless in th' inviolated shades.
 This elemental joy, this gen'ral calm,
 Is sure the smile of unoffending Heav'n.
 Yet! why——

Maid.

Behold, within th' embow'ring grove
 Aspasia stands——

Irene.

With melancholy mien,
 Pensive, and envious of Irene's greatness.
 Steal unperceiv'd upon her meditations—
 But see, the lofty maid, at our approach,
 Refumes th' imperious air of haughty virtue.
 Are these th' unceasing joys, th' unmingled pleasures
 For which Aspasia scorn'd the Turkish crown?
 Is this th' unshaken confidence in Heav'n?
 Is this the boasted bliss of conscious virtue?
 When did content sigh out her cares in secret?
 When did felicity repine in deserts?

Aspasia.

Ill suits with guilt the gaeties of triumph;
 When daring vice insults eternal justice,
 The ministers of wrath forget compassion,
 And snatch the flaming bolt with hasty hand.

Irene.

Forbear thy threats, proud prophets of ill,
 Vers'd in the secret counsels of the sky.

Aspasia.

Forbear—But thou art sunk beneath reproach;
 In vain affected raptures flush the cheek,
 And songs of pleasure warble from the tongue,
 When fear and anguish labour in the breast,
 And all within is darkness and confusion;
 Thus on deceitful Ætna's flow'ry side,
 Unfading verdure glads the roving eye,
 While secret flames, with unextinguish'd rage,
 Insatiate on her wasted entrails prey,
 And melt her treach'rous beauties into ruin.

[Enter Demetrius.]

SCENE III.

ASPASIA, IRENE, DEMETRIUS.

Demetrius.

Fly, fly, my love, destruction rushes on us,
 The rack expects us, and the sword pursues.

Aspasia.

Is Greece deliver'd? is the tyrant fall'n?

Demetrius.

Greece is no more, the prosp'rous tyrant lives,

Reserv'd, for other lands, the scourge of Heav'n.

Aspasia.

Say, by what fraud, what force were you defeated?
 Betray'd by falsehood, or by crowds o'erborn?

Demetrius.

The pressing exigence forbids relation,
 Abdalla——

Aspasia.

Hated name! his jealous rage
 Broke out in perfidy—Oh curs'd Aspasia,
 Born to complete the ruin of her country!
 Hide me, oh hide me from upbraiding Greece!
 Oh, hide me from myself!

Demetrius.

Be fruitless grief

The doom of guilt alone, nor dare to seize
 The breast where virtue guards the throne of peace.
 Devolve, dear maid, thy sorrows on the wretch,
 Whose fear, or rage, or treachery, betray'd us.

Irene aside.

A private station may discover more;
 Then let me rid them of Irene's presence:
 Proceed, and give a loose to love and treason.

[Withdraws.]

Aspasia.

Yet tell.

Demetrius.

To tell, or hear, were waste of life.

Aspasia.

The life, which only this design supported,
 Were now well lost, in hearing how you fail'd.

Demetrius.

Or meanly fraudulent, or madly gay,
 Abdalla, while we waited near the palace,
 With ill-tim'd mirth propos'd the bowl of love.
 Just as it reach'd my lips, a sudden cry
 Urg'd me to dash it to the ground untouched,
 And seize my sword with disencumber'd hand.

Aspasia.

What cry? The stratagem? Did then Abdalla——

Demetrius.

At once a thousand passions fir'd his cheek!
 Then all is past, he cried——and darted from us;
 Nor at the call of Cali deign'd to turn.

Aspasia.

Why did you stay? Deserted and betray'd?
 What more could force attempt, or art contrive?

Demetrius.

Amazement seiz'd us, and the hoary Bassa
 Stood torpid in suspense; but soon Abdalla
 Return'd with force that made resistance vain,
 And bade his new confederate seize the traitors,
 Cali disarm'd, was borne away to death;
 Myself escap'd, or favour'd, or neglected.

Aspasia.

O Greece! renown'd for science and for wealth,
 Behold thy boasted honours snatch'd away.

Demetrius.

Though disappointment blast our general scheme,
 Yet much remains to hope. I shall not call
 The day disastrous that secures our flight;
 Nor think that effort lost which rescues thee.

[Enter Abdalla.]

SCENE IV.

IRENE, ASPASIA, DEMETRIUS, ABDALLA.

Abdalla.

At length the prize is mine—The haughty maid
 That bears the fate of empires in her air,

Henceforth shall live for me; for me alone
 Shall plume her charms, and, with attentive watch,
 Steal from Abdalla's eye the sign to smile.

Demetrius:

Cease this wild roar of savage exultation;
 Advance, and perish in the frantic boast.

Aspasia.

Forbear Demetrius, 'tis Aspasia calls thee;
 Thy love, Aspasia, calls; refrain thy sword;
 Nor rush on useless wounds with idle courage.

Demetrius.

What now remains?

Aspasia.

It now remains to fly?

Demetrius.

Shall then the savage live, to boast his insult;
 Tell how Demetrius shunn'd his single hand,
 And stole his life and mistress from his sabre?

Abdalla.

Infatuate loiterer, has fate, in vain,
 Unclasp'd his iron gripe to set thee free?
 Still dost thou flutter in the jaws of-death;
 Snar'd with thy fears, and maz'd in stupefac-
 tion!

Demetrius.

Forgive, my fair, 'tis life, 'tis nature calls,
 Now, traitor, feel the fear, that chills my hand.

Aspasia.

'Tis madness to provoke superfluous danger,
 And cowardice to dread the boast of folly.

Abdalla.

Fly, wretch, while yet my pity grants thee flight;
 The power of Turkey waits upon my call.
 Leave but this maid, resign a hopeless claim,
 And drag away thy life in scorn and safety,
 Thy life, too mean a prey to lure Abdalla.

Demetrius.

Once more I dare thy sword; behold the prize,
 Behold, I quit her to the chance of battle!

[Quitting Aspasia.

Abdalla.

Well may'st thou call thy master to the combat,
 And try the hazard, that hath nought to stake;
 Alike my death, or thine, is gain to thee;
 But soon thou shalt repent: another moment
 Shall throw th' attending janizaries round thee.

[Exit hastily Abdalla.

SCENE V.

ASPASIA, DEMETRIUS.

Irene.

Abdalla fails, now fortune all is mine. [Aside.
 Haste, Murza, to the palace, let the sultan

[To one of her attendants.

Dispatch his guards to stop the flying traitors,
 While I protract their stay. Be swift and faithful.

[Exit Murza.

This lucky stratagem shall charm the Sultan, [Aside.
 Secure his confidence, and fix his love.

Demetrius.

Behold a boaster's worth! Now snatch, my fair,
 The happy moment, hasten to the shore,
 Ere he return with thousands at his side.

Aspasia.

In vain I listen to th' inviting call
 Of freedom and of love: My trembling joints,
 Relax'd with fear, refuse to bear me forward.

Depart, Demetrius, lest my fate involve thee;
 Forsake a wretch abandon'd to despair,
 To share the miseries herself has caus'd.

Demetrius.

Let us not struggle with th' eternal will,
 Nor languish o'er irreparable ruins;
 Come, haste and live—Thy innocence and truth
 Shall bless our wand'rings, and propitiate Heav'n.

Irene.

Press not her flight, while yet her feeble nerves
 Refuse their office, and uncertain life
 Still labours with imaginary woe;
 Here let me tend her with officious care,
 Watch each unquiet flutter of the breast,
 And joy to feel the vital warmth return,
 To see the cloud forsake her kindling cheek,
 And hail the rosy dawn of rising health.

Aspasia.

Oh! rather scornful of flagitious greatness,
 Resolve to share our dangers and our toils,
 Companion of our flight, illustrious exile,
 Leave slav'ry, guilt, and infamy behind.

Irene.

My soul attends thy voice, and banish'd virtue
 Strives to regain her empire of the mind:
 Assist her efforts with thy strong persuasion;
 Sure 'tis the happy hour ordain'd above,
 When vanquish'd vice shall tyrannize no more.

Demetrius.

Remember, peace and anguish are before thee,
 And honour and reproach, and heav'n and hell.

Aspasia.

Content with freedom, and precarious greatness.

Demetrius.

Now make thy choice, while yet the pow'r of choice

Kind Heaven affords thee, and inviting mercy
 Holds out her hand to lead thee back to truth.

Irene.

Stay—in this dubious twilight of conviction,
 The gleams of reason, and the clouds of passion,
 Irradiate and obscure my breast by turns:
 Stay but a moment, and prevailing truth
 Will spread resistless light upon my soul.

Demetrius.

But since none knows the danger of a moment,
 And Heav'n forbids to lavish life away,
 Let kind compulsion terminate the contest.

[Seizing her hand.

Ye Christian captives, follow me to freedom:
 A galley waits us, and the winds invite.

Irene.

Whence is this violence?

Demetrius.

Your calmer thought

Will teach a gentler term.

Irene.

Forbear this rudeness,

And learn the reverence due to Turkey's queen:
 Fly, slaves, and call the sultan to my rescue.

Demetrius.

Farewell, unhappy maid: May ev'ry joy
 Be thine, that wealth can give, or guilt receive!

Aspasia.

And when, contemptuous of imperial pow'r,
 Disease shall chase the phantoms of ambition,
 May penitence attend thy mournful bed,
 And wing thy latest prayer to pitying Heav'n!

[Exit Dem. Asp. with part of the attendants.

SCENE VI.

Irene walks at a distance from her attendants.

After a pause.

Against the head which innocence secures,
Insidious malice aims her darts in vain;
Turn'd backwards by the powerful breath of Heav'n.

Perhaps ev'n now the lovers unpurfu'd
Bound o'er the sparkling waves. Go, happy bark,
Thy sacred freight shall still the raging main.
To guide thy passage shall th' aerial spirits
Fill all the starry lamps with double blaze;
Th' applauding sky shall pour forth all its beams,
To grace the triumph of victorious virtue.
While I, not yet familiar to my crimes,
Recoil from thought, and shudder at myself.
How am I chang'd! How lately did Irene
Fly from the busy pleasures of her sex,
Well pleas'd to search the treasures of remembrance,

And live her guiltless moments o'er anew!
Come, let us seek new pleasures in the palace,
Till soft fatigue invite us to repose.

[To her attendants, going off.]

SCENE VII.

Enter Mustapha, meeting and stopping her.

Mustapha.

Fair falsehood stay.

Irene.

What dream of sudden power
Has taught my slave the language of command!
Henceforth be wife, nor hope a second pardon.

Mustapha.

Who calls for pardon from a wretch condemn'd?

Irene.

Thy look, thy speech, thy action, all is wildness—
Who charges guilt on me?

Mustapha.

Who charges guilt!

Ask of thy heart; attend the voice of conscience—
Who charges guilt! lay by this proud resentment
That fires thy cheek, and elevates thy mien,
Nor thus usurp the dignity of virtue.
Review this day.

Irene.

Whate'er thy accusation,

The sultan is my judge.

Mustapha.

That hope is past;

Hard was the strife of justice and of love;
But now 'tis o'er, and justice has prevail'd. [trius?
Know'st thou not Cali? know'st thou not Deme-
Irene.

Bold slave, I know them both—I know them traitors.

Mustapha. [traitors.

Perfidious!—yes—too well thou know'st them
Irene.

Their treason throws no stain upon Irene.

This day has prov'd my fondness for the sultan;
He knew Irene's truth.

Mustapha.

The sultan knows it,

He knows how near apostacy to treason—

But 'tis not mine to judge—I scorn and leave thee.
I go, lest vengeance urge my hand to blood,

To blood, too mean to stain a soldier's fabre.

[Exit Mustapha.

Irene to her attendants.

Go, blust'ring slave.—He has not heard of Murza.
That dext'rous message frees me from suspicion.

SCENE VIII.

Enter Hafan, Caraza, with Mutes, who throw the black rope upon Irene, and sign to her attendants to withdraw.

Hafan.

Forgive, fair excellence, th' unwilling tongue,
The tongue that, forc'd by strong necessity,
Bids beauty, such as thine, prepare to die.

Irene.

What wild mistake is this? Take hence with speed
Your robe of mourning, and your dogs of death.
Quick from my sight, you inauspicious monsters,
Nor dare henceforth to shock Irene's walks.

Hafan.

Alas! they come, commanded by the sultan,
Th' un pitying ministers of Turkish justice,
Nor dare to spare the life his frown condemns.

Irene.

Are these the rapid thunderbolts of war,
That pour with sudden violence on kingdoms,
And spread their flames resistless o'er the world?
What sleepy charms benumb these active heroes,
Depress their spirits, and retard their speed?
Beyond the fear of ling'ring punishment,
Aspasia now within her lover's arms
Securely sleeps, and, in delightful dreams,
Smiles at the threat'nings of defeated rage.

Caraza.

We come, bright virgin, though relenting nature
Shrinks at the hated task, for thy destruction;
When, summon'd by the sultan's clam'rous fury,
We ask'd, with tim'rous tongue, th' offender's
name,

He struck his tortur'd breast, and roar'd Irene:
We started at the sound, again inquir'd,
Again his thund'ring voice return'd Irene.

Irene.

Whence is this rage? what barb'rous tongue has wrong'd me? [cense?

What fraud misleads him? or what crimes in-

Hafan.

Expiring Cali nam'd Irene's chamber,
The place appointed for his master's death.

Irene.

Irene's chamber! From my faithful bosom
Far be the thought—But hear my protestation.

Caraza.

'Tis ours, alas, to punish, not to judge;
Not call'd to try the cause, we heard the sentence,
Ordain'd the mournful messengers of death.

Irene.

Some ill-designing statesman's base intrigue!
Some cruel stratagem of jealous beauty!
Perhaps yourselves the villains that defame me,
Now haste to murder, ere returning thought
Recal th' extorted doom.—It must be so,
Confess your crime, or lead me to the sultan,
There dauntless truth shall blast the vile accuser
Then shall you feel what language cannot utter,
Each piercing torture, every change of pain,
That vengeance can invent, or pow'r inflict.

[Enter Abdalla, he stops short and listens.

SCENE IX.

IRENE, HASAN, CARAZA, ABDALLA.

Abdalla aside.

All is not lost, Abdalla, see the queen,
See the last witness of thy guilt and fear
Enrob'd in death—Dispatch her and be great.

Caraza.

Unhappy fair! compassion calls upon me
To check this torrent of imperious rage;
While unavailing anger crowds thy tongue
With idle threats and fruitless exclamation,
The fraudulent moments ply their silent wings,
And steal thy life away. Death's horrid angel
Already shakes his bloody fabre o'er thee.
The raging sultan burns till our return,
Curfes the dull delays of ling'ring mercy,
And thinks his fatal mandates ill obey'd.

Abdalla.

Is then your sov'reign's life so cheaply rated,
That thus you parley with detected treason?
Should he prevail to gain the sultan's presence,
Soon might her tears engage a lover's credit;
Perhaps her malice might transfer the charge,
Perhaps her pois'nous tongue might blast Abdalla.

Irene.

O let me but be heard, nor fear from me
Or flights of pow'r, or projects of ambition!
My hopes, my wishes, terminate in life,
A little life for grief, and for repentance.

Abdalla.

I mark'd her wily messenger afar,
And saw him skulking in the clofetest walks:
I guess'd her dark designs, and warn'd the sultan,
And bring her former sentence new confirm'd.

Hasan.

Then call it not our cruelty, nor crime,
Deem us not deaf to woe, nor blind to beauty,
That, thus constrain'd, we speed the stroke of death.

[Beckons the mutes.]Irene.

O name not death! Distrac'tion and amazement,
Horror and agony, are in that sound!
Let me but live, heap woes on woes upon me,
Hide me with murderers in the dungeon's gloom,
Send me to wander on some pathless shore,
Let shame and hooting infamy pursue me,
Let slav'ry harass, and let hunger gripe.

Caraza.

Could we reverse the sentence of the sultan,
Our bleeding bosoms plead Irene's cause.
But cries and tears are vain, prepare with patience
To meet that fate we can delay no longer.

[The mutes at the sign lay bold of her.]Abdalla.

Dispatch, ye ling'ring slaves, or nimbler hands
Quick at my call shall execute your charge;
Dispatch, and learn a fitter time for pity.

Irene.

Grant me one hour, O grant me but a moment,
And bounteous Heaven repay the mighty mercy
With peaceful death, and happiness eternal!

Caraza.

The prayer I cannot grant—I dare not hear.
Short be thy pains. [Signs again to the mutes.]

Irene.

Unutterable anguish!
Guilt and despair! pale spectres, grin around me,
And stun me with the yellings of damnation!

O, hear my pray'rs! [Mutes] all-pitying Heaven,
These tears, these pangs, [Mutes] ^{these} last remains of life,
Nor let the crimes of this detested day
Be charg'd upon my soul. O mercy! [Mutes] ^{mercy!}
[Mutes force her out.]

SCENE X.

ABDALLA, HASAN, CARAZA.

Abdalla aside.

Safe in her death, and in Demetrius' flight,
Abdalla, bid thy troubled breast be calm;
Now shalt thou shine the darling of the sultan,
The plot all Cali's, the detection thine.

Hasan to Caraza.

Does not thy bosom, for I know thee tender,
A stranger to th' oppressor's savage joy,
Melt at Irene's fate, and share her woes?

Caraza.

Her piercing cries yet fill the loaded air,
Dwell on my ear, and sadden all my soul;
But let us try to clear our clouded brows,
And tell the horrid tale with cheerful face;
The stormy sultan rages at our stay.

Abdalla.

Frame your report with circumspective art,
Inflame her crimes, exalt your own obedience,
But let no thoughtless hint involve Abdalla.

Caraza.

What need of caution to report the fate
Of her the sultan's voice condemn'd to die?
Or why should he, whose violence of duty
Has serv'd his prince so well, demand our silence?

Abdalla.

Perhaps my zeal too fierce, betray'd my prudence;
Perhaps my warmth exceeded my commission;
Perhaps I will not stoop to plead my cause;
Or argue with the slave that sav'd Demetrius.

Caraza.

From his escape learn thou the pow'r of virtue,
Nor hope his fortune while thou want'st his worth.

Hasan.

The sultan comes, still gloomy, still enrag'd.

SCENE XI.

HASAN, CARAZA, MABOMET, MUSTAPHA, ABDALLA.

Mabomet.

Where's this fair trait'reis? Where's this smiling mischief?

Whom neither vows could fix, nor favours bind?

Hasan.

Thine orders, mighty sultan, are perform'd,
And all Irene now is breathless clay.

Mabomet.

Your hasty zeal defrauds the claim of justice,
And disappointed vengeance burns in vain;
I came to heighten tortures by reproach,
And add new terrors to the face of death. [pire!]
Was this the maid whose love I bought with em-
True, she was fair; the smile of innocence
Play'd on her cheek—So shone the first apostate—
Irene's chamber! Did not roaring Cali,
Just as the rack forc'd out his struggling soul,
Name for the scene of death Irene's chamber?

Mustapha.

His breath prolong'd but to detect her treason,
Then in short sighs forsook his broken frame.

Mabomet.
 Deceiv'd to perish in Irene's chamber!
 There had she lov'd me with endearing falsehoods,
 Clasp'd in her arms, or slumb'ring on her breast,
 And bar'd my bosom to the ruffian's dagger.

SCENE XII.

HASAN, CARAZA, MAHOMET, MUSTAPHA, MURZA, ABDALLA.

Murza.

Forgive, great sultan! that by fate prevented,
 I bring a tardy message from Irene.

Mabomet.

Some artful wile of counterfeited love!
 Some soft decoy to lure me to destruction!
 And thou, the curs'd accomplice of her treason,
 Declare thy message, and expect thy doom.

Murza.

The queen requested that a chosen troop
 Might intercept the traitor Greek, Demetrius,
 Then ling'ring with his captive mistress here.

Mustapha.

The Greek, Demetrius! whom th' expiring Bassa
 Declar'd the chief associate of his guilt.

Mabomet.

A chosen troop—to intercept—Demetrius—
 The queen requested.—Wretch, repeat the message;

And if one varied accent prove thy falsehood,
 Or but one moment's pause betray confusion,
 Those trembling limbs—Speak out, thou shiv'ring traitor.

Murza.

The queen requested—

Mabomet.

Who? the dead Irene?

Was she then guiltless! Has my thoughtless rage
 Destroy'd the fairest workmanship of Heav'n!
 Doom'd her to death unpy'd and unheard,
 Amidst her kind solitudes for me!
 Ye slaves of cruelty, ye tools of rage,

[To Hasan and Caraza.]

Ye blind officious ministers of folly, [der.]
 Could not her charms repress your zeal for murder? Could not her prayers, her innocence, her tears,
 Suspend the dreadful sentence for an hour?
 One hour had freed me from the fatal error,
 One hour had sav'd me from despair and madness.

Caraza.

Your fierce impatience forc'd us from your presence,

Urg'd us to speed, and bade us banish pity,
 Nor trust our passions with her fatal charms.

Mabomet.

What hadst thou lost by slighting those commands?
 Thy life perhaps—Were but Irene spar'd,
 Well if a thousand lives like thine had perish'd;
 Such beauty, sweetness, love, were cheaply bought,
 With half the grov'ling slaves that load the globe.

Mustapha.

Great is thy woe! but think, illustrious sultan,
 Such ills are sent for souls like thine to conquer.
 Shake off this weight of unavailing grief,
 Rush to the war, display thy dreadful banners,
 And lead thy troops victorious round the world.

Mabomet.

[umph,
 Robb'd of the maid with whom I wish'd to tri-

No more I burn for fame, or for dominion;
 Success and conquest now are empty sounds,
 Remorse and anguish seize on all my breast;
 Those groves, whose shades embower'd the dear
 Irene,

Heard her last cries, and fann'd her dying beauties,
 Shall hide me from the tasteless world for ever.

[Mahomet goes back and returns.

Yet, ere I quit the sceptre of dominion,
 Let one just act conclude the hateful day.

Hew down, ye guards, those vassals of distraction,
 [Pointing to Hasan and Caraza.]
 Those hounds of blood, that catch the hint to kill;
 Bear off with eager haste th' unfinish'd sentence,
 And speed the stroke, lest mercy should o'ertake them.

Caraza.

Then hear, great Mahomet, the voice of truth:

Mabomet.

Hear! shall I hear thee! didst thou hear Irene?

Caraza.

Hear but a moment.

Mabomet.

Hadst thou heard a moment,
 Thou might'st have liv'd, for thou hadst spar'd
 Irene.

Caraza.

I heard her, pitied her, and wish'd to save her.

Mabomet.

And wish'd—Be still thy fate to wish in vain.

Caraza.

I heard, and soften'd, till Abdalla brought
 Her final doom, and hurried her destruction.

Mabomet.

Abdalla brought her doom! Abdalla brought it!
 The wretch, whose guilt declar'd by tortur'd Cali,
 My rage and grief had hid from my remembrance;
 Abdalla brought her doom!

Hasan.

Abdalla brought it,
 While yet she begg'd to plead her cause before thee.

Mabomet.

O seize me, madness—Did she call on me!

I feel, I see the ruffian's barb'rous rage.
 He seiz'd her melting in the fond appeal,
 And stopp'd the heav'nly voice that call'd on me.
 My spirits fail, a while support me, vengeance—
 Be just, ye slaves, and, to be just, be cruel,
 Contrive new racks, imbitter every pang,
 Inslit whatever treason can deserve,
 Which murder'd innocence that call'd on me.

[Exit Mahomet.

[Abdalla is dragged off.]

SCENE XIII.

MAHOMET, HASAN, CARAZA, MUSTAPHA, MURZA.

Mustapha to Murza.

What plagues, what tortures are in store for thee,
 Thou sluggish idler, dilatory slave?
 Behold the model of consummate beauty,
 Torn from the mourning earth by thy neglect.

Murza.

Such was the will of Heav'n—A band of Greeks
 That mark'd my course, suspicious of my purpose,
 Rush'd out and seiz'd me, thoughtless and unarm'd,
 Breathless, amaz'd, and on the guarded beach
 Detain'd me till Demetrius set me free.

Musæpba.

So sure the fall of greatness rais'd on crimes,
So fix'd the justice of all-conscious Heav'n.
When haughty guilt exults with impious joy,
Mistake shall blast, or accident destroy;
Weak man with erring rage may throw the dart,
but Heav'n shall guide it to the guilty heart.

EPILOGUE.

MARRY a Turk! a haughty, tyrant king,
Who thinks us women born to dress and sing,
To please his fancy—see no other man—
Let him persuade me to it—if he can:
Besides, he has fifty wives; and who can bear
To have the fiftieth part her paltry share?
'Tis true, the fellow's handsome, strait, and tall;
But how the devil should he please us all!

My swain is little—true—but be it known,
My pride's to have that little all my own.
Men will be ever to their error's blind,
Where woman's not allow'd to speak her mind;
I swear this eastern pageantry is nonsense,
And for one man—one wife's enough in conscience.
In vain proud man usurps what's woman's due;
For us alone, they honour's paths pursue:
Inspir'd by us, they glory's heights ascend;
Woman the source, the object, and the end.
Though wealth, and pow'r, and glory they receive,
These all are trifles, to what we can give.
For us the statesman labours, hero fights,
Bears toilsome days, and wakes long tedious nights:
And when blest peace has silenc'd war's alarms,
Receives his full reward in beauty's arms.

Tristis et atra quies, et tardæ tædiæ vitæ.

Nascuntur curis curæ, vexatque dolorum
Importuna cohors, vacuæ mala fomina mentis.
Nunc clamosa juvant nocturnæ gaudia mensæ,
Nunc loca sola placent; frustra te, Somne, recum-
bens

Alme voco, impatiens noctis metuensque diei
Omnia percurro trepidus, circum omnia lustro,
Si qua usquam pateat melioris femita vitæ,
Nec quid agam invenio, meditatæ grandia, cogor
Notior ipse mihi fieri, incultumque fateri
Pectus, et ingenium vano se robore jactans.

Ingenium nisi materiem doctrina ministrat,
Cessat inops rerum, ut torpet, si marmoris absit
Copia, Phidiaci sæcunda potentia cœli.
Quicquid agam, quocunque ferar, conatibus
obstat

Res angusta domi, et macræ penuria mentis.

Non rationis opes animus, nunc parta recensens
Conspicit aggestas, et se miratur in illis,
Nec sibi de gaza præfens quod postulat usus
Summus adesse jubet celsa dominator ab arce;
Non, operum ferie seriem dum computat ævi,
Præteritis fruitur, lætos aut sumit honores
Ipse sui iudex, actæ bene munera vitæ;
Sed sua regna videns, loca nocte silentia late
Horret, ubi vanæ species, umbræque fugaces,
Et rerum volitant raræ per inane figuræ.

Quid faciam? tenebrisne pigram damnare senectam

Restat? an accingar studiis gravioribus audax?
Aut, hoc si nimium est, tandem nova lexica pos-
cam?

AD THOMAM LAURENCE,

MEDICUM DOCTISSIMUM.

Cum filium peregre agentem desiderio nimis tristi prosequeretur.

FATERIS ergo, quod populus solet
Crepare vœcors, nil sapientiam
Prodesse vitæ, literasque;
In dubiis dare terga rebus

Tu, queis laborat fors hominum, mala,
Nec vincis acer, nec pateris pius,
Te mille succorum potentem
Defuit medicina mentis.

Per cæca noctis tædia turbidæ,
Pigræ per horas lucis inutiles,
Torpesque, languescisque, curis
Solicitius nimis heu! paternis.

Tandem dolori plus fatis est datum,
Exurge fortis, nunc animis opus,
Te, docta, Laurenti; vetustas,
Te medici revocant labores.

Permitte summo quicquid habes patri,
Permitte fidens, et mulcibribus,
Amice, majorem quietelis
Redde tuis, tibi redde, mentem.

IN THEATRO, MARCH 8, 1771.

TERTIO verso quater orbe lustris,
Quid theatrales tibi, Cripe, pompæ?
Quam decet canos male literatos
Sera voluptas?

Tene mulceri fidibus canoris?
Tene cantorum modulis stupere?
Tene per pictas oculo elegante
Currere formas?

Inter æquales, sine selle liber,
Codices, veri studiosus, inter
Rectius vives. Sua quisque carpat
Gaudia gratus.

Lausibus gaudet puer otiosus,
Luxus oblectat juvenem theatri,
At seni fluxo sapienter uti
Tempore restat.

INSULA KENNETHI, INTER HEBRIDAS.

PARVA quidem regio, sed religione priorum
Clara Caledonia panditur inter aquas.
Voce ubi Cennethus populos domuiss feroces
Dicitur, et vanos dedocuiss deos.
Huc ego delatus placido per cærula cursu,
Scire locus velui quid daret iste novi.
Illuc Leniades humili regnabat in aula,
Leniades, magnis nobilitatus avis.
Una duas cepit causa cum genitore puellas,
Quas Amor undarum crederet esse deas.
Nec tamen inculti gelidiss latuere sub antris,
Accola Danubii qualia sævus habet.
Mollia non desunt vacuæ solatia vitæ
Sive libros, poscant otia, sive lyram.

Fulferat illa dies, legis qua docta supernæ
 Spes hominum et curas gens procul esse jubet.
 Ut precibus justas avertat numinis iras
 Et summi accendat pectus amore boni.
 Ponti inter strepitus non sacri munera cultus
 Cessarunt, pietas hic quoque cura fuit.
 Nil opus est eris sacra de turre sonantis
 Admonitu, ipsa suas nunciat hora vices.
 Quid, quod sacrifici versavit fœmina libros?
 Sint pro legitimis pura labella sacris.
 Quo vagor ulterius? quod ubique requiritur hic
 est,
 Hic fecura quies, hic et honestus amor.

SKIA.

PONTI profundis clausa recessibus,
 Strepens procellis, rupibus obîta,
 Quam grata defesso virentem,
 Skia, sinum nebulosa pandis!

His, cura, credo, sedibus exulat;
 His blanda certe pax habitat locis;
 Non ira, non mœror quietis
 Insidias meditatur horis.

At non cavatâ rupe latefcere,
 Mentî nec ægræ montibus aviis
 Prodest vagari, nec frementes
 In specula numerare fluctus.

Humana virtus non sibi sufficit;
 Dator nec æquum cuique animum sibi
 Parare posse, utcunque jactet
 Grandiloquus nimis alta Zeno.

Exæstuantis pectoris impetum
 Rex summe, solus tu regis, arberis;
 Mentisque, te tollente, fluctus;
 Te, refident, moderante fluctus.

ODE, DE SKIA INSULA.

PERMEO terras ubi nuda rupes
 Saxeas miscet nebulis ruinas,
 Torva ubi ridet steriles coloni
 Rura labores.

Pervagor gentes hominum ferorum,
 Vita ubi nullo decorata cultu
 Squallet informis, tigurisque fumis
 Fœda latefcit.

Inter erroris salebrofa longi,
 Inter ignotæ strepitus loquelæ,
 Quot modis, mecum, quid agat, requiro,
 Thralia dulcis?

Sen viri curas, pia nupta mulcet,
 Seu fovet mater sobolem benigna,
 Sive cum libris novitate pacit
 Sedula mentem.

Sit memè nostri, fideique solvat
 Fida mercedem, meritoque blandum
 Thraliæ discant resonare nomen
 Littora Skiæ.

SPES.

Apr. 16, 1783.

HORA sic peragit citata cursum;
 Sic diem sequitur dies fugacem!

 Spondens omnia credulis homullis;
 Spes ludit stolidas, metuque cæco
 Lux angit, miseris ludens homullis.

MESSIA.

Ex alieno ingenio poeta, ex suo tantum versificator."

Scalig. Poet.

TOLLITE concentum, Solymæe tollite nymphæ!
Nil mortale loquor; cœlum mihi carminis alta
Materies; poëunt gravius cœlestia plectrum.
Mucosi fontes, sylvestria tecta valete,
Aonidesque Deæ, et mendacis somnia Pindi:
Tu, mihi, qui flammâ movisti pectora sancti
Sidereâ Isaiæ, dignos accende furores!

Immatura calens rapitur per secula vates
Sic orsus—Qualis rerum mihi nascitur ordo!
Virgo! virgo parit! felix radicibus arbor
Jesûis surgit, mulcentisque æthera flores
Cœlestes lambunt animæ, ramiq; columba,
Nuncia sacra Dei, plaudentibus insidet alis.
Nectaris rores, alimentaque mitia cœlum
Præbeat, et tacite fecundus irriget imbres.
Huc, sædat qui nos lepra, urit quos febris, adeste,
Dia salutare spiritus medicamina rami;
Hic requies fessis; non sacra sævit in umbra
Vis Boreæ gelida, aut rapidi violentiæ solis.
Irrita vaneicent prisca vestigia fraudis
Justitiæque manus pretio intemerata bilancem
Attollet reducis; bellis prætedunt olivas
Compositis pax alma suas, terræque revivens
Sedatas niveo virtus lucebit amictu:
Volvantur celeres anni! lux purpurei ortum
Expectata diu! nature claustra refringens,
Nascere, magne puer! tibi primas, ecce, corollas
Deproperat tellus, fundit tibi munera, quicquid
Carpit Arabs, hortis quicquid frondecît Eois.
Altius, en! Lebanon gaudentia culmina tollit,
En! fummo exultant nutantes vertice sylvæ.
Mittit aromáticas vallis Saronica nubes,
Et juga Carmeli recreant fragrantia cœlum.
Deserti lætâ! mollescent aspera voce
Auditur Deus! ecce Deus! reboantia circum
Saxa sonant, Deus; ecce Deus! deflectitur æther,
Demissumque Deum tellus capit; ardua cœdrus,
Gloria sylvarum, dominum inclinata salutet.
Surgite convalles, tumidi subsidite montes!
Sternite saxa viam, rapidi discedite fluctus:
En! quem turba diu eccinerunt thesæ, vates
En! salvator adest; nunc cursu provocat euros.
Divinos, surdos sacra vox permulceat aures.
Ille cutim spissam visus hebetare vetabit,
Reclusisque oculis infundet amabile lumen;
Obstrictasque diu linguas in carmina solvet
Ille vias vocis pandet, flexusque liquentis
Harmoniæ purgata novos mirabitur aures.
Accrescunt teneris tactu nova robora nervis:
Consuetus sulcro innixus reptare bacilli
Nunc saltu capreas, nunc cursu provocat euros.
Non planctus, non mœsta sonant suspiria; pectus
Surgitans mulcet, lachrymantes tergit ocellos.
Vincla coercebunt luctantem adamantina mortem,
Æternoque Orci dominator vulnere languens
Invældi raptos sceptri plorabit honores.
Ut qua dulce strepit scatebræ, qua lata virescunt
Pascua, qua blandum spirat purissimus aer,
Pastor agit pecudes, teneros modo suscipit agnos
Et gremio fatis selectas porrigit herbas,
Amisissas modo querit oves, revocatque vagantes;
Fidus adest custos, seu nox furat horrida nimbis,

VOL. XI.

Sive dies medius morientia torreat arva.
Postera sic pastor divinus secla beabit,
Et curas felix patrias testabitur orbis.
Non ultra infestis concurrent agmina signis,
Hostiles oculis flammæ jaculantia torvis;
Non litui accendent bellum, non campus ahenis
Triste coruscabit radiis; dabit hasta recusa
Vomerem, et in falcem rigidus curvabitur ensis.
Atria, pacis opus, surgent, sinemque caduci
Natus ad optatum perducet cæpta parentis.
Qui duxit fulcos, illi teret area messëm,
Si feræ textent vites umbracula proli.
Actoniti dumeta vident inculta coloni
Suave rubere rosis, sitientesque inter arenas
Garfule mirantur salientis murmura rivi.
Per saxa, ignivomi nuper spelææ draconis,
Canna viret, juncique tremat variabilis umbra.
Horruit implexo qua vallis sente, figuræ
Surgit amans abies teretis, buxique sequaces
Artificis frondent dextræ; palmique rubeta
Aspera, odorata cœdunt mala gramina myrto.
Per valles sociata lupo lasciviet agna,
Cumque leone petet tutus præsepe juvencus.
Floreæ mansuetæ petulantibus vincula tigris
Per ludum pueri injicient, et fessâ colubri
Membra viatoris recreabunt frigore linguæ.
Serpentes teneris nil jam lethale micantes
Tractabit palmis insans, motusque trifidæ
Ridebit linguæ innocuos, liquamisque virentes
Aureaque admirans rutilantis fulgura cristæ.
Indue reginam, turritæ frontis honores
Tolle Salema sacros, quam circum gloriæ pennas
Explicat, incinctam radiatæ luce tiaræ!
En! formosa tibi spatiosa per atria, proles
Ordinibus surgit densis, vitamque requirit
Impatiens, lenteque fluentes increpat annos.
Ecce peregrinis servant tua limina turbis;
Barbarus en! clarum divino lumine templum
Ingreditor, cultuque tuo manufecere gaudet.
Cinnamæos cumuios, Nabathæi munera veris;
Ecce cremant genibus tritæ regalibus aræ!
Solis Ophyriæ crudum tibi montibus aurum
Maturant radii; tibi balsama sudat Idume.
Ætheris eu portas sacro fulgore micantes
Cœlicolæ pandunt, torrentis aurea lucis
Flumina prorumpunt; non posthac sole rubescet
India nascenti, placidæve argenteæ noctis
Luna vices revehet; radios pater ipse dei
Proferet archetypos; cœlestis gaudia lucis
Ipso fonte bibes, que circumfusa beatam
Regiam inundabit, nullis defestata tenebris.
Littora desubiens arenia deseret æquor;
Sidera sumabunt, diro labefacta tremore
Saxa cadent, solidique liquefcent robora montis;
Tu secura tamen confusa elementa videbis,
Lætata Messia semper dominabere rege,
Pollicitis firmata Dei, stabilita ruinis.

PRIMA parit terras ætas, sicque secunda,
Evocat Abramum dein tertia; quarta relinquit
Ægyptum; templo Solomonis quinta superstit;
Cyram sexta timet; lætatur septima Christo.

* The above is a version of a Latin epigram on the famous John Duke of Marlborough, by the Abbe
Salvini, which is as follows:

Haud alio vultu, fremuit Mars acer in armis;
Haud alio, Cypriam percussit ore Deum.

The Duke was, it seems, remarkably handsome in his person, to which the second line has reference.

* His Tempelmani numeris describeris orbem.
 (a) Cum sex centuriis Judæo millia septem.
 Myrias (b) Ægypto cœssit bis septima pingui.
 Myrias adsciscit sibi nonagesima septem
 Imperium qua Turca (c) serox exercet iniquum.
 Undecies binas decadas et millia septem
 Sortitur (d) Pelopis tellus quæ nomine gaudet.
 Myriades decies septem numerare jubebit
 Pastor (a) Arabs: decies octo sibi Persa (d) requirat.
 Myriades sibi pulcra duas, duo millia poscit
 Parthenope (d). (e) Novies vult tellus mille Sicana.
 (f) Papa suo regit imperio ter millia quinque.

* To the above lines (which are unfinished, and can therefore be only offered as a fragment), in Johnson's manuscript, are prefixed the words "Geographica Metrica." As we are referred, in the first of the verses, to Templeman, for having furnished the numerical computations that are the subject of them, his work has been accordingly consulted, the title of which is, "A new Survey of the Globe," and which professes to give an accurate mensuration of all the empires, kingdoms, and other divisions thereof, in the square miles that they respectively contain. On comparison of the several numbers in these verses, with those set down by Templeman, it appears that nearly half of them are precisely the same; the rest are not so exactly done.—For the convenience of the reader it has been thought right to subjoin each number, as it stands in Templeman's work, to that in Johnson's verses which refers to it.

(a) In this first article that is versified, there is an accurate conformity in Johnson's number to Templeman's; who sets down the square miles of Palestine at 7,600.

(b) The square miles of Egypt are, in Templeman, 140,700.

(c) The whole Turkish empire, in Templeman, is computed at 960,057 square miles.

(d) In the four following articles, the numbers, in Templeman and in Johnson's verses, are alike.—We find, accordingly, the Morea, in Templeman, to be set down at 7,220 square miles—Arabia, at 700,000.—Persia, at 800,000.—and Naples, at 22,000.

(e) Sicily, in Templeman, is put down at 9,400.

(f) The Pope's dominions, at 14,868.

Cum sex centuriis numerat sex millia Tuscus (g.)
 Centuriâ Liguræ (b) augent duo millia quartâ.
 Centuriæ octavam decadem addit Lucca (i) secundæ.

Ut dicas, spatium quam latius imperet orbi
 (k) Russia, myriadas ter denas adde trecentis:

(l) Sardiniam cum sexcentis sex millia complent.

 Vicenis quinas, Asiam (n) metata celebrem.

Se quinquagenis octingentesima jungit
 Myrias, ut menti pateat tota Africa (o) doctæ.

Myriadas septem decies Europa (p) ducentis
 Et quadragenis quoque per tria millia jungit.

Ter sex centurias Hollandia (t) jactat opima
 Undecimum Camber (t) vult septem millibus addi.

.. .. .

(g) Tuscany, at 6,640.

(b) Genoa in Templeman, as in Johnson likewise, is set down at 2,400.

(i) Lucca, at 286.

(k) The Russian empire, in the 29th plate of Templeman, is set down at 3,303,485 square miles.

(l) Sardinia, in Templeman, as likewise in Johnson, 6,600.

(m) The habitable world, in Templeman, is computed, in square miles, at 30,666,806.

(n) Asia, at 10,257,487.

(o) Africa, at 8,506,208.

(p) Europe, at 2,749,349.

(q) The British dominions, at 105,634.

(r) England, as likewise in Johnson's expression of the number, at 49,450.

(s) Ireland, at 27,457.

(t) In the three remaining instances, which make the whole that Johnson appears to have rendered into Latin verse, we find the numbers exactly agreeing with those of Templeman; who makes the square miles of the United Provinces, 954—of the Province of Holland, 1800—and of Wales, 7011.

endured with patience and concealed with decency,
the daily tortures of gradual death;
continued to divide the hours not allotted to devotion, between the cares of her family, and the converse of her friends;

rewarded the attendance of duty,
and acknowledged the offices of affection;
and while she endeavoured to alleviate by cheerfulness, her husband's sufferings and sorrows,
increased them by her gratitude for his care,
and her sollicitude for his quiet.

To the memory of these virtues,
more highly honoured as more familiarly known,
this monument is erected by

ON THE DEATH OF STEPHEN GREY, F. R. S.

THE ELECTRICIAN †.

LONG hast thou borne the burthen of the day,
Thy task is ended, venerable Grey!
No more shall art thy dextrous hand require,
To break the sleep of elemental fire:
To rouse the powers that actuate nature's frame,
The momentaneous shock, th' electric flame;
The flame, which first, weak pupil of thy lore,
I saw, condemn'd alas! to see no more.
Now, hoary sage, pursue thy happy flight
With swifter motion, haste to purer light,
Where Bacon waits, with Newton and with Boyle,
To hail thy genius and applaud thy toil,
Where intuition breathes through time and space,
And mocks experiment's successive race;
Sees tardy science toil at nature's laws,
And wonders how th' effect obscures the cause.
Yet not to deep research or happy guess,
Is view'd the life of hope, the death of peace;
Unblest the man, whom philosophic rage
Shall tempt to lose the Christian in the sage;
Not art but goodness pour'd the sacred ray
That cheer'd the parting hours of humble Grey.

Accept, with that combin'd, his lateſt lays,
Where ſtill young fancy ſports in diſtion clear;
And may propitious fate their merit bear,
To times when taſte ſhall weave the wreaths of praife,
By modes diſdain'd in theſe fantaſtic days,
Such wreaths as claſſic heads were proud to wear.
But if no future ear applauds his ſtrain,

THE LIFE OF W. WHITEHEAD.

WILLIAM WHITEHEAD was born in the parish of St. Botolph, Cambridge, in February 1714-15. He was the second son of Richard Whitehead, a baker, who lived in the parish of St. Botolph, and who, in that capacity, served the neighbouring College of Pembroke-Hall. He was of a very careless disposition, attending little to business, and employing his time chiefly in ornamenting, rather than cultivating, a few acres of land near the neighbouring village of Grantchester, which still goes by the name of Whitehead's Folly. At his death, he left considerable debts, which his son very honourably discharged, by the profits arising from his theatrical productions. His mother was a very amiable, pious, prudent, and exemplary woman. Their eldest son, John, who was born fifteen years before the poet, was educated for the church, and by the interest of Mr. Bromley, afterwards Lord Montfort, obtained the living of Pershore, in the diocese of Worcester. They had also one daughter, who died in infancy.

He received the first rudiments of his education at some common school in Cambridge; but at the age of fourteen, he was removed to Winchester, having obtained a nomination into that college, by means of Mr. Bromley, July 6. 1728.

At school, according to the information of Dr. Balguy, he was always of a delicate turn; and though obliged to go to the hills with the other boys, he spent his time there in reading either plays or poetry, and was also particularly fond of the "Atalantes," and all other books of private history in character. He very early exhibited his taste for poetry; for while other boys were contented with showing up twelve or fourteen lines, he would fill half a sheet, but always with English verse. At sixteen he wrote a whole comedy.

In the winter of the year 1732, he is said to have acted a female part in the "Andria," under Dr. Burton's direction. It is certain, that he acted Marcia, in the tragedy of "Cato," with much applause.

In 1733, the Earl of Peterborough, having Pope at his house, near Southampton, carried him to Winchester, to show him the college, &c. The Earl gave ten guineas, to be disposed of in prizes among the boys, and Pope set them a subject to write upon, viz. PETERBOROUGH. Prizes of a guinea each were given to six of the boys, among whom Whitehead was one. The remaining sum was laid out for other boys, in subscriptions to Pine's Horace, then about to be published.

He never excelled in writing epigrams, nor did he make any considerable figure in Latin verse, though he understood the classics very well, and had a good memory. He was, however, employed to translate into Latin the first epistle of the "Essay on Man;" and the translation is still extant in his own hand. Dobson's success in translating Prior's "Solomon," had put this project into Pope's head; and he set various persons to work upon it.

His school friendships were usually contracted, either with noblemen or gentlemen of large fortune, such as Lord Drumlanrig, Sir Charles Douglas, Sir Robert Burdett, Mr. Tryon, Mr. Munday of Leicesterham, and Sir Bryan Broughton, to whom, after he removed to Oxford, he sent a Poetical Epistle from Winchester. The choice of these persons was imputed by some of his school-fellows to vanity, by others, to prudence; but it might be owing to his delicacy, as this would make him early disgusted with the coarser manners of ordinary boys.

He was school-tutor to Mr. Wallop, afterwards Lord Lymington, father to the present Earl of Portsmouth. He enjoyed, for some little time, a lucrative place in the college, that of prepositor of the hall.

He had not resided at Winchester above two years, before his father died. However, by his own frugality, and what small assistance his mother could give him, he was enabled to continue at school till he could appear a candidate for an election to New College.

At the election, in September 1735, he was treated with singular injustice; for, through the force of superior interest, he was placed so low on the roll, that it was scarcely possible for him to succeed to New College. Young, several years before, experienced the same fate.

Being now superannuated, he left Winchester of course, deriving no other advantage from the college than a good education, which he gratefully acknowledges, in the beautiful elegy addressed To the Rev. Dr. Lowth, on his "Life of William of Wykeham."

From the same fount, with reverence let me boast,
The classic streams with early thirst I caught,
What time, they say, the muses revell'd most,
When BIGG presided, and when BURTON taught.

Two months after his disappointment at Winchester, he removed to the place of his nativity, where the peculiar circumstances of his being the orphan son of a baker of Cambridge, gave him an unquestionable claim to one of the scholarships, founded at Clare-Hall, by Mr. Thomas Pyke, of that trade and town. His mother accordingly admitted him a sizer of this college, under the tuition of Messrs. Curling, Goddard, and Hopkinson, November 26. 1735; and the scholarship, though it amounted only to four shillings a-week, was in his circumstances a desirable object.

The notice which Pope had taken of him at school, prevented the inferiority of his station from being any hindrance to his introduction into the best company. The ease and the natural politeness of his manners, added to an agreeable and pleasing countenance, would also facilitate the reception of a young man, who had only his ingenuity to recommend him. It was likewise very fortunate for him to find many persons who have since figured highly in the literary and great world, contemporary students in the university. Among the number of his immediate contemporaries were the Hon. Charles Townshend, Dr. Powell, Dr. Balguy, Dr. Ogden, Dr. Stebbing, and Dr. Hurd, the present Bishop of Worcester, with all of whom he cultivated a particular intimacy.

The poetical faculties of Whitehead now began to make a rapid progress; and he has himself explained the cause, in his Elegy to Dr. Lowth. He insinuates that he thought it rather fortunate than otherwise, that he was not removed from Winchester to Oxford, on account of the society of such men as it was his felicity to find contemporary students at Cambridge.

And sure in Granta's philosophic shade,
Truth's genuine image beam'd upon my sight,
And slow-ey'd reason lent her sober aid,
To form, deduce, compare, and judge aright.
Yes, ye sweet fields! beside your oler'd stream,
Full many an Attic hour my youth enjoy'd,
Full many a friendship form'd, life's happiest dream,
And treasur'd many a bliss which never cloy'd:

The first pieces he published, were verses on public occasions, the Marriage of the Prince of Wales, in 1736, and the birth of his son, the present king, 1738, inserted in the Cambridge Graduations. They little excel the prize-verses he wrote at school, which have but little merit, if we deduct from them that of mere easy versification, which he seems to have acquired by sedulously imitating Pope's manner. Neither his fancy nor judgment appear to have risen in any degree equal to what in common progress might be expected from a mind, which, a very few years after, exhibited both these qualities so strikingly. Among the many pieces written at that early period, the Vision of Solomon is the only one that seems to indicate the future poet.

This, perhaps, would not have been the case, had he taken the versification of Spenser, Fairfax, Milton, and poets similar to them, for his model, rather than the close and condensed complets of Pope; for in that way of writing, his fancy would have developed itself earlier, and perhaps have obtained greater strength and powers of exertion. But though he had read Spenser in his childhood with avidity, and was fully capable, as appears by the Vision of Solomon, of catching his manner; yet the fashion of the time led him to exercise himself in that mode of composition, which was then esteemed the best. He began to write verses first before the school of Milton rose in emulation of the school of Pope, and had even become an author before Collins, Akenfide, Gray, Warton, Mason, and some others, had diffused just ideas of a more perfect species of poetry, by substituting fiction and fancy, picturesque description and romantic imagery, for wit and rhyme, sentiment and satire, polished numbers, sparkling couplets, and pointed periods.

In 1741, he published his beautiful epistle On the Danger of writing Verse, with which he only first commenced a poet. It exhibited such a specimen of elegant versification, such close and condensed expression, so much sense, enlivened with all the fancy the didactic species of its composition would admit, that it obtained general admiration, and was highly approved by Pope himself, of whose preceptive manner it is surely one of the most happy imitations extant.

In June 1742, he was elected Fellow of Clare-Hall, about a year before he commenced Master of Arts. His mother dying the April before, had not the satisfaction of seeing her son thus fixed in a situation which was probably the height of her ambition. Yet his irreproachable conduct as a collegiate, his great proficiency as a scholar, and his rising reputation as a poet, must have sufficiently removed her fears concerning his future advancement. To her, and indeed to both his parents, he seems always to have born the truest filial affection, as appears from the first of his epistolary poems To the Honourable Charles Townshend, and the Verses to his Mother, on her Birth-day, which place his moral qualities in a pleasing light. A mother who impressed upon her son that early sense of a God and a providence, which he retained through life, affords an example worthy of imitation.

In 1743, he published Atys and Adrastus, a pleasing and pathetic tale, taken from Herodotus, in which, with equal judgment, though not with equal force, he copied the narrative style of Dryden, in his "Fables."

The same year, he published an epistle in the manner of Ovid, from Ann Bullen to Henry the Eighth, in which, though he made a judicious use of the queen's original letter, and in his own additions preserved a true characteristic unity with it, yet it cannot with justice be ranked high among the numerous productions of this kind.

His next poem was his Essay on Ridicule, which also appeared in 1743. This is a studied performance, the parts of it put together with much care, and that chain of reasoning preserved in it, which the subject seemed to demand. In the edition 1774, some lines at the conclusion of the poem, which he thought authorized too free a use of this talent, are omitted. In its first state, he had neither mentioned the name of Swift nor of Pope publicly, because he did not think either of them had employed it with sufficient reserve. Yet he had there held Lucian, Cervantes, and Addison as legitimate models. But in the last edition, the palm of just ridicule is given to Addison alone.

The publication of this poem was soon after followed by Nobility, an Epistle to the Earl of Ashburnham, written also in happy imitation of Pope's manner. This poem, for what reason is not known, he did not insert in either of the editions of his works.

During the time of his being an under graduate, he lived a very studious life, observing the strictest frugality possible, that he might be the less burdensome to an affectionate mother. After taking a very creditable degree, and being emancipated from those mathematical studies for which young men of his tribe seldom have much relish, he wrote rapidly, though not carelessly, for the press; but this rapidity, as it did not continue through life, probably arose at the time, rather from a laudable desire of self-maintenance, than any undue eagerness for poetical fame.

Possessed of a fellowship, it was now his intention to take orders, and with that view, he prepared himself for the church; but shortly afterwards, a circumstance occurred, which led him to desert putting this design into practice, and in the end occasioned his relinquishing the idea altogether.

The late Earl of Jersey was making inquiries after a proper person to take the private tuition of his second son, now become his only hope, from the death of his elder brother; on which account probably he durst not trust him to the dangers of a public education, as his constitution appeared to be very delicate. Fortunately for the young Viscount, Whitehead was recommended to his father, by Mr. Commissary Graves, as a person fully qualified for this important charge. His recommendation was successful; and Whitehead, when the offer was made, did not hesitate to accept it. He therefore, in 1745, removed to the Earl's house in London, where he was placed upon the most liberal footing. He had also the care of a young friend of the family, now General Stephens, who was brought up with Lord Villiers, as the companion of his studies.

At Michaelmas 1746, he resigned his fellowship, in compliance with Lord Jersey's inclination, who wished him, while he continued in his family, not to take orders, which the statutes of Clare-hall would have obliged him to do.

Having now many intervals of leisure for his own favourite studies, he employed himself almost entirely in dramatic compositions. He showed an early talent, not only for writing in that way, but for acting. On his coming to town, he wrote a ballad farce, intituled The Edinburgh Ball, in which the young Pretender is the principal character. It was not represented, and is still in MS.

But he soon attempted higher things, and began a regular tragedy, called the Roman Father, on the subject of Corneille's "Horace," which was produced on the stage at Drury-Lane, February 24. 1750, and obtained the just approbation of repeated and numerous audiences. He inscribed it, when printed, to the Honourable Thomas Villiers, afterwards Earl of Clarendon. It has been so frequently exhibited with applause, and has shown so many actors and actresses to advantage, that it is almost unnecessary to say any thing more concerning it, than that it surely is a great improvement on one of the great Corneille's best tragedies; and may be ranked among the best of the dramatic pieces of this age. Yet it is an improvement of Corneille's play only. The radical defect of the story is not absolutely removed; and after the Curiatii are killed, the fable still drags, yet not in any degree as it does in the French tragedy. With respect to the unity of action and of time, the piece is perfect; but with respect to the unity of place, it is unnecessarily defective. In point of character, there is a variety and discrimination truly laudable; and in point of style, considered only with respect to its effect upon the stage, it is well calculated for the actor's delivery. It is not perhaps sufficiently elevated for the closet; but there are, in general, more poetical beauties in his dramatic verse, than in that of Corneille.

In 1751, he published his Hymn to the Nymph of Bristol Spring, written in the manner of those classical addresses to heathen divinities, of which the hymns of Homer and Callimachus are the archetypes. This poem is essentially different in point of style and manner from any of his other productions. The frequent Summer excursions which he made to Bristol, with the Earl of Jersey and his lady, furnished him with the subject; and the translations of Prior, as well as the poems of Armstrong and Akenfide, then in general estimation, directed his taste to the manner in which that subject might best be treated.

He had before written a little fanciful burlesque poem, intituled The Sweepers, which has less of parody, and more of invention than the "Splendid Shilling" of Philips. In this ludicrous, and the other serious poem, he shows himself possessed of an ear well-attuned to that variety of pause and of cadence, which are as essential to the structure of blank verse as rhyme itself is to that species of heroic numbers, to which it gives its name.

The same year, he wrote the beautiful stanzas on Friendship, to a friend who had blamed him for leading a dependent life, and for not taking orders, or entering upon some stated profession. This delicate poem contains his own vindication, and is written with all the careless ease, but with more of elegance than we usually find in similar productions of Prior. It paints, in amiable colours, the character and feelings of the writer, which gives it a charm superior even to the singular felicity of its diction. Yet this latter quality must ever secure it the approbation of all those readers, who can admire pleasing sentiments, expressed with the purest simplicity.

Many other little epistolary compositions flowed with equal ease from his pen at this period, such as the Epistles to Mr. Cambridge, Mr. Garrick, and Dr. Hoadly, and some Tales, in the manner of Fontaine and Gay.

When Moore began "The World," in 1753, Whitehead, among others, gave his assistance, and contributed the 12th, 19th, and 58th numbers.

In 1754, he collected his works into a volume, 12mo, among which he inserted his Fatal Confrancy, or Love in Tears, a sketch of a tragedy in the high heroic taste, which made part of Foote's farce of "The Diversions of the Morning."

At the time of arranging that volume, he was engaged in preparing for the stage his tragedy of Creusa, which was exhibited at Drury-Lane Theatre, April 20. 1754, with considerable applause, though not so much as it merited. He inscribed it, when printed, to Lord Villiers, now Earl of Jersey. It showed the abilities of his favourite actress, Mrs. Pritchard, who performed the part of Creusa to great advantage; and as Garrick and Mollon also took parts in it, the performance was so perfect, that it was hardly possible for it not to succeed in the representation; yet it has seldom been revived, though it shows the dramatic powers of Whitehead to more advantage than the Roman Father, which takes its turn in the course of theatrical exhibitions. The play is founded on the Ion of Euripides, but the plot is extremely heightened, and admirably conducted; nor has there perhaps ever been a more genuine and native simplicity introduced into dramatic writing than that of Ilyffus, bred up in the service of the gods, and kept unacquainted with the vices of mankind. Whoever compares the two dramas, will readily allow, that to alter a story of so very fabulous a kind, in which the intervention of Pagandivinites appear so necessary, into a probable action, and also where a connected train of natural circumstances resulting one from another, leads to an affecting catastrophe, must have been a work of extreme difficulty. This Whitehead has very successfully achieved. There is hardly a single tragedy of English manufacture in which the three unities are more accurately observed. The language of Creusa is also more elevated than that of the Roman Father; the catastrophe results naturally from the action that precedes it, but it does not satisfy. The crime of the queen, as she so very unwillingly consents to the poisoning of Ilyffus, seems hardly great enough to merit capital punishment. Euripides, who knew her much more criminal, suffers her to exist to the end, and by making Ion attempt to avenge on his unknown mother the crime she had been guilty of, in attempting to poison him, her unknown son, produces an incident truly theatrical. Whitehead, by not admitting this double project of parricide into his plan, has perhaps decreased the theatrical effect, of which the Greek poet had furnished him with the example, and which, had he improved upon it, as he has on all the other incidents of the Ion, might have made the last act much more perfect. It is certain, however, that for this purpose, the preceding plot of the whole piece must have been differently constituted.

The exhibition of this play was hardly over, before he was called upon to attend his pupil and Lord Viscount Nuneham, son to Earl Harcourt, in their travels, as their joint governor. The two young noblemen were nearly of the same age. They had been intimate from their infancy. He was therefore as well acquainted with the pleasing temper and disposition of the other lord as of him whose education he had more immediately superintended; and his own happy art of making instruction an amusement, had so won on the affections of them both, that they felicitated themselves mutually on his being appointed their joint governor.

In June 1754, they left England under his care, and passing through Flanders, resided the rest of the Summer at Rheims, in order to habituate themselves to the French language, and then removing to Leipzig, passed seven months there, for the purpose of studying the Droit Publicque, under the famous Professor Mascow, whom they found in a state of dotage, without being quite incapacitated from reading his lectures.

In the following Spring they proceeded to Dresden, and after visiting that, and most of the other German courts, repaired to Hanover in the Summer 1755, at the time when George II. paid his last visit to his electorate. There Whitehead had the pleasure of meeting his friend Mr. Mason, who had then lately taken orders, and attended the Earl of Holderness, the Secretary of State, as his domestic chaplain. His elegant expostulation To Mr. Mason took its rise at this place, from certain amicable altercations which they there had, on the subject of a public and retired life, to the latter of which Mr. Mason's disposition appeared to lean more than he thought consisted with the views of advancement which then seemed to open before him.

Having continued at Hanover the greatest part of the Summer, he proceeded with his pupils to Vienna, and from thence to Italy. On their return homeward, they crossed the Alps, and passed through Switzerland, Germany, and Holland, being prevented from visiting France by the declaration of war, and landed at Harwich in September 1756.

In the course of so complete a tour, a great part of which led through classic ground, he communicated to his friends at home many curious observations on the countries through which he travelled. A few of his letters from Rome and elsewhere, are in the possession of Mr. Mason and Mr. Wright, rector of Birchin in Yorkshire, with whom he spent several of his college vacations, and to whom he addressed many of his smaller poems; and the executors of the late Dr. Goddard, master of Clare-Hall, and the Rev. Mr. Sanderfon of Haslemere, have many more.

That his muse, now in her fullest vigour, frequently exerted herself, his striking Ode to the Tiber, and his six Elegies addressed to his two noble pupils, with him, and his more particular friends at home, Mr. Wright, Mr. Sanderfon, &c. sufficiently testify. The sublime scenes through which he passed, and the grand historical events which they recalled to his memory, generally furnished the subject; and as they were executed on the spot, they are more replete with picturesque imagery, than any other of his compositions. They were published in February 1757, under the title of Elegies, with an Ode to the Tiber, 4to, and received with approbation proportioned to their merit.

During his absence, he had received the badges of Secretary and Register of the order of the Bath, procured for him by the interest of Lady Jersey, through the mediation of her relation, the Duchess of Newcastle; and in 1757, his finances were farther improved by the appointment of Poet Laureat, on the death of Cibber, upon the nomination of the Duke of Devonshire, as Lord Chamberlain. He has himself said on this appointment, in his Charge to the Poets, that Unask'd it came, and from a friend unknown.

Mr. Mason, in his "Memoirs of Gray," has acquainted the public, that the place was before offered to Gray, by his mediation, with permission to hold it as a mere sinecure. This was not the case when it was given to Whitehead, and "I have often," says Mr. Mason, "considered why, as the late king would readily have dispensed with hearing music, for which he had no ear, and poetry, for which he had no taste."

When Whitehead had accepted the laurel without such permission, Mr. Mason advised him to employ a deputy to write his annual odes, and reserve his own pen for certain great occasions that might occur, such as a peace or a marriage, and then to address his royal master with some studied ode or epistle, as Boileau and Racine had done in France, for their pensions.

This advice was not attended to by his friend. He set himself to his periodical task, with the zeal of a person who wished to retrieve the honours of that laurel, which came to him from the head of Cibber, in a very shrivelled, or rather blasted state.

His first Ode for his Majesty's Birth-Day, November 10. 1758, was calculated from the heroic genealogy that it contained, to be peculiarly agreeable to the monarch for whose birth-day it was written; and its poetical merit had the very just approbation of Gray, and other good judges.

The laurel was said by the ancients to have the power of screening those under its shade from thunder; yet it cannot defend modern laureats from the artillery of their contemporaries. After Whitehead had accepted of this office, he received much illiberal treatment during the rest of his life, from the little fry of his own profession, who were fond of having a lick at the laureat. What he thought of these "poets, who were mean enough to envy even a poet laureat," may be learned from his Pathetic Apology for all Laureats, past, present, and to come, which he wrote some years before his death, for the amusement of a few friends. By the motto Veniant ad Cæsaris aures, he seems to have wished it might reach the royal ear.

On his return to England, Lord Jersey pressed him strongly to continue in his family; an invitation which Whitehead readily accepted. Lord Harcourt gaye him also a general invitation to his table in town, and to his seat in the country; and his pupils, who had now entirely sunk the idea of their governor in the more agreeable one of their friend, showed him constantly such sincere marks of affection, as greatly increased the felicity of his situation.

He resided in this family fourteen years, during which he found opportunities of leisure to do more in the literary way than merely write official odes.

In 1762, he made his first attempt in comedy, and brought upon the stage at Drury-Lane The School for Lovers, a comedy, which had its competent run, as to nights of representation, and received a just tribute of applause from the judicious few. It is formed on a plan of Fontenelle's, never intended for the stage, and printed in the eighth volume of his works, under the title of Le Testament, and inscribed To his Memory, by a Lover of Simplicity. The idea which Fontenelle had conceived of enlarging the provinces of the drama, is explained and controverted with much accuracy of criticism, by Dr. Hurd, in the second dissertation, annexed to his "Commentaries on Horace." What species of drama the School for Lovers ought to be placed in, is somewhat difficult to determine, since, though it is styled a comedy, the risible faculties have much less opportunity of exertion than the tender feelings of the heart; and the catastrophe, though happy in the main, and suitable to poetical justice, is not completely so, since two amiable characters, Belmour and Araminta, are left, the one entirely unprovided for, and the other in a situation far from agreeable. What he, however, seems to have principally aimed at, delicacy, sentiment, and the consequence of instruction in the conduct of a generous and well-placed passion, he has undoubtedly most eminently succeeded in. His Celia, and Sir John Dorilant, especially the latter, are characters most perfectly amiable, and worthy of imitation. The ease and purity of the dialogue, the incidents which arise so naturally, one from the other, the delicate markings of the different characters, and the artful arrangement of the scenes, contribute to give this play a high station in the list of our genteel comedies; at the same time that its want of smart repartee and broad humour, will ever prevent it from being much relished by a mixed audience. This want he possessed a peculiar talent of supplying, had he thought the simplicity of his play would not have been injured by it. He was afraid to mingle with comedy, what he thought belonged to the lower species of the drama, farce; and chose rather to tread in the steps of Terence than of Moliere. They who put this play on a footing with the Dramas of France, and the sentimental comedies in England which have succeeded it, will do Whitehead much injustice.

The same year, 1762, he published his Charge to the Poets, 4to, in which, as laureat, he ludicrously assumes the dignified mode of a bishop, giving his vistorial instructions to his clergy. The idea was new, pregnant with grave humour, and executed so successfully, that even the egotisms necessary to the subject, are among the most pleasing parts of the poem. Replete with good sense and good taste, it is still more to be admired for the amiable picture which it gives of his own mind, and his readiness to be pleased by poets of very different abilities, provided those abilities were employed on subjects that suited them; and for exposing that fastidious mode of criticism which admits no poems to have any merit, except that which accords with some particular preconceived idea of excellence which it has set up as its exclusive criterion.

Notwithstanding this liberal turn of the Charge, its publication brought upon him the vindictive resentment of Churchill, who had just about the time attracted the public notice, by his satire, intitled The Rosciad. He attacked the laureat almost in every one of those hasty productions with which he entertained the town, with an unjustifiable severity.

To have retaliated, was as abhorrent to his natural temper, as contradictory to that precept of "keeping the peace," which in his Charge, he had called "his first and last advice." Among his unfinished fragments, however, there are some Verses, in which he mentions his poetical enemy. They certainly had not his last corrections; but they come from a good heart, willing to commend whatever was commendable in Churchill's talents for strong expression and forcible imagery; at the same time, they justly reprobate his misuse of those talents.

Such at the time was the popularity of Churchill, that his abuse of Whitehead tended to lower his poetical merit so much with the town, that Garrick would not venture to bring on a new tragedy of his, which a little time after he offered to his stage. The public, therefore, for several years, saw nothing more that came from his pen, but those half-yearly odes which his office required him to write.

On the death of the late Earl of Jersey, in August 1769, he obtained an unwilling permission from his pupil, the present Earl of Jersey, to remove to private lodgings; but he still considered himself as a daily-invited guest to his table in town; and, during the rest of his life, he divided his Summers between Middleton and Nuneham.

In 1770, he made a present of his farce, called The Trip to Scotland, to Garrick, on condition of his producing it without his name. This was done; and it appeared on the Drury-Lane stage with the greatest advantage of good acting, and met with deserved applause. It shows that Whitehead had powers to write equally well in the manner of Moliere, as of Terence. The characters are not more overcharged in order to excite ridicule, than they are found to be in the best modern comedies, both in French and English; for surely his old Griſkin is not so much filled with farcical humour as the "Foreſight" and "Fondlewife" of Congreve. Indeed, had he extended his plan to five acts, and exiled his Cupid, as too mythological a personage, it would have been deemed a good comedy. As it stands, it is perhaps the only thing of the kind that can be put in competition with the charming petite pieces of Marivaux.

In 1774, he collected and published all his works, under the title of Plays and Poems, in two volumes, giving the Charge to the Poets, in the concluding pages. But though possibly, after he had arranged these two volumes he might think he had bid adieu to poetical compositions, so far as his office of laureat might permit; yet he had obtained, by long practice, so great a facility of versification, and had always taken so much pleasure in it, that he could not help occasionally throwing out his thoughts upon paper, and clothing them in appropriate verse.

In 1776, he published, without a name, his very pleasing little poem, intituled Variety, a Tale for Married People, 4to, which was so well received, that it speedily ran through five editions.

In 1777, he published The Goat's Beard, a Fable, 4to, which, though a more studied composition, and a most delicate satire on the times, did not so generally please, though it had also a very considerable sale. It is founded on the 14th fable of the 4th book of Phædrus. From this fable, the English Phædrus (or rather Fontaine, for the fable is more in his manner), has given the sexes many ingenious documents. After an oblique reflection on the Bucolics of Virgil, intimating that the poet has assigned to Mantua, the scenery of Naples, he represents a coterie of the goats addressing Jupiter, to render them equal to the males, by honouring their chins with a beard. Jupiter in a frolic mood grants their petition, which occasions a remonstrance from the goaterie of males, and obliges the god to convene the states, in order to determine the claims of both sexes. The majority of his precepts are less applicable to the males than to the females. His strictures on the modish department of the sexes, are a just, though severe comment on real life.

The refuse of an iron age, &c.

This lively fable occasioned an ill-natured and satirical attack on the laureat, in a fable, intituled "The Asses Ears, addressed to the Author of The Goat's Beard," 4to, 1777, which is not, however, void of pleasantry.

The same year, he published a very elegant satire on the fashionable excesses and whimsies of female dress, intituled Venus attiring the Graces, 4to, addressed to the Duchess of Queensberry, which was the last performance, except his annual odes, he gave to the world. Had he possessed the powers of Mr. Bunbury's pencil, he would perhaps have given his idea to the public rather through the medium of the rolling, than the printing press; in its present state, humorous as it is, the comic painter would be its best commentator.

His health now began visibly to decline. He had almost through life been subject to palpitations of the heart, and occasional difficulty of respiration, which the heavy atmosphere of the town in winter always augmented; yet there, partly from habit, and still more from a desire of being near those whom he chiefly respected, he chose, in that season, constantly to reside.

In the Spring of 1785, a cold, accompanied with a cough, affected his breast so much, that it confined him at home for some weeks, though it was by no means so violent as to hinder him pursuing his united amusements of reading and writing. His death, happily for himself, as it must be for all who pass through this world, in the same blameless manner, with the same confidence in their God, and with the same confidence in his revealed will, so to die, "was sudden, and without a groan." A few hours before his death, Lord Harcourt repeating his constant morning visit to him, found him revising for the press, a paper which he imagined to be his last Birth-day Ode, which was in part set to music, but not performed. That day at noon, finding himself disinclined to taste the dinner his servant brought up, he desired to lean upon his arm from the table to his bed, and in that moment he expired. He died at his lodgings in Charles-Street, Grosvenor-Square, April 14. 1785, in the 70th year of his age; and was buried in South Audley Street Chapel.

Some years before his death, he appointed by will, his friend General Stephens, his executor. He left behind him in MS. the Tragedy which Garrick did not venture to bring on the stage, the first act of an Oedipus; an imperfect plan of a tragedy founded on the historical part of Edward the Second's resignation of the crown to his son, also of another composed of Spanish and Moorish characters, and a considerable quantity of miscellaneous pieces; yet but few which he has transcribed in so fair a manner as to indicate that he himself thought them finished; and of these the greater part are occasional and local productions of his pen, which would chiefly, if not exclusively, be matter of amusement to his particular friends, more immediately connected with the two noble families in which he so long resided. His poems, uncollected by himself, together with three short unpublished pieces, On the late improvements at Nuneham; On the Death of the Hon. Catherine Venables Vernon; The Battle of Argoed Llwyfain, nine of his New Year and Birth-day Odes, from June 1776 to Jan. 1785, and his Observations on the Shield of Achilles, first printed in Doddley's "Museum," and afterwards with Pitt's and Warton's translation of "Virgil," were formed into a third volume of his Works, by Mr. Mason, and published in 1788, with a dedicatory "Sonnet" to the Earl of Jersey and Earl Harcourt, and "Memoirs of his Life and Writings," which have been chiefly followed in the preceding account.

His Poems, including all his annual odes, from 1758 to 1785, except the New-year and Birth-day odes, for 1764, and the New-year odes, for 1766, 1769, and 1775, which do not appear in Doddley's "Annual Register," were inserted in the edition of "The English Poets," 1790, and are reprinted in the present collection, with the addition of the Vision of Solomon; Verses to his Mother; A Pathetic Apology for all Laureats; verses To Mr. Stebbing, and fragments On Churchill, collected from Mr. Mason's "Memoirs," &c.

His character, which has few prominent features, may easily be collected from this account of his life. He appears to have been a very amiable man, and lived in intimacy with the great, virtuous, carefled and respected. All his friends bear ample testimony to his unaffected piety, unblemished integrity, engaging politeness, inviolable truth, steadiness in friendship, and the unassuming ease and sprightliness of his conversation. He was a man of good breeding, virtue, and humanity.

"He died," says Mr. Mason, who knew him well, "retaining all his faculties more perfectly than is usually the lot of those who live to such an age. Of these his memory was the most remarkable, which being always strong, continued to that late period with no diminution of vigour. And as his reading and observation had been far more extensive and various than he had occasion to exhibit in that mode of writing which he chiefly employed to convey his sentiments; this accurate retention of what he had by study acquired, made him a living library, always open to communicate its treasures to his acquaintance, without obtruding itself by any ostentatious display, or assumed superiority."

As a poet, though he is far above mediocrity, yet neither his genius nor his writings are of the most brilliant or interesting kind. He is characterized by elegance, correctness, and ease, more than by energy, enthusiasm or sublimity. The most prominent feature in his poetry, seems an innocent and pleasant humour. He is never dull or absurd in his serious pieces; his taste and his judgment were too good to pardon insipidity, or impropriety, even in himself; but there is certainly more facility, as well as originality, in his humorous, than his serious pieces. His Elegies, on account of the affecting and pensive cast of the sentiments, the classical beauty of the imagery, the simplicity of the expression, and the harmony of the versification, may be considered as the most universally interesting of his compositions. Among his humorous pieces, Variety is a first-rate, in that mode of gay and easy composition which distinguishes the genius of Fontaine and Prior. Of his Songs, 22 Belles and ye Flirts, &c. has obtained the greatest popularity.

The principal poems which he himself published, have been already distinctly considered in the order of their publication. It only remains to give some account of his posthumous pieces.

"In the collection of poems," says Mr. Mason, "which Mr. Whitehead printed in 1774, he thought proper to select certain of his New-year, and Birth-day odes for republication. Beginning therefore, from that date, I have reviewed, with the assistance of some friends, whose taste in lyric composition I could depend on, all that he wrote afterwards, and those which we best approved are here inserted. In this review it is to be noted to the poet's honour, that we found more variety of sentiment and expression, than could well be expected from such an uniformity of subject. If we lamented the necessity he was under of so frequently adverting to the war with America, we generally admired his delicate manner of treating it. Should, therefore, the Odes here reprinted lead any person to read all that he composed, in compliance with the forms of his office (and all are to be found in the Annual Register, printed by Doddsley), I persuade myself he must agree with me in thinking, that no court poet ever had fewer courtly stains, and that his page is, at the least, as white as Addison's."

The Odes, selected by Mr. Maſon, are the Birth-day odes for 1776, 1777, 1778, 1781, and 1784, and the New-year odes for 1779, 1783, 1784, and 1785. The odes omitted by Mr. Maſon, and Whitehead himself, have been very properly collected with the rest, and deserve the same commendation. Though they have undergone all the usual obloquy of such compositions, there is certainly in them more delicacy of panegyric, if not more genius, than in any compositions of the kind that can be found from Chaucer to Cibber. If they are not equal to the odes of Pindar, they are not ridiculous, like those of Shadwell and Cibber. Their annual productions rendered the laurel contemptible; but Whitehead, as Ophelia says, "wears his rue with a difference, and you may call it Herb o' grace on Sundays."

The copy of verses On the late Improvements at Nuneham, is a sportive and just eulogium on the place, and on the late Mr. Brown. Though the personification of nature has been common to several poets, when they meant to compliment the artist that rivalled her, yet the idea of making her behave herself like a modern fine lady, must be allowed to be a thought very bold, and truly original; and he has executed it with much genuine humour. As an epitaph, the lines On the Death of the Hon. Catherine Venables Vernon, are beautiful, particularly at the close, in the justification of Providence. The Battle of Argoed Llwyfain, is a translation of a poem of the Cambro-British bard, Taliessin, and is a description of the battle of Argoed Llwyfain, fought about the year 548, by Godden, a king of North Britain, and Brien Reged, king of Cambria, against Flamdwyn, a Saxon general, supposed to be Ido, king of Northumberland. It is inserted in Jones's "Historical Account of the Welsh Bards," published in 1784, and is thus introduced: "I am indebted to the obliging disposition, and undiminished powers of Mr. Whitehead, for the following faithful and animated version of this valuable antique." The version is wild, spirited, and characteristic; but it is inferior to those imitations which Gray made of the Scaldic odes. The wild mythology of the Edda, to which they perpetually allude, gives them a charm peculiar to themselves, and sets them above what he himself has produced from Cambro-British originals.

THE DANGER OF WRITING VERSE.

AN EPISTLE. 1741.

“*Quæ poterant unquam satis expurgare Cicuta,
“ Ni melius dormire putem, quam scribere, versus?”*
HOR.

You ask me, Sir, why thus by phantoms aw'd,
No kind occasion tempts the muse abroad?
Why, when retirement sooths this idle art,
To fame regardless sleeps the youthful heart?
'Twould wrong your judgment, should I fairly say

Distrust or weakness caus'd the cold delay:
Hint the small difference, till we touch the lyre,
'Twi'xt real genius and too strong desire;
The human slips, or seeming slips pretend,
Which rouse the critic, but escape the friend;
Nay which, though dreadful when the foe pur-

sues,
You pass, and smile, and still provoke the muse.
Yet, spite of all you think, or kindly feign,
My hand will tremble while it grasps the pen.
For not in this, like other arts, we try
Our light excursions in a summer sky,
No casual flights the dangerous trade admits;
But wits once authors, are for ever wits.
The fool in prose, like earth's unwieldy son,
May oft rise vig'rous, though he's oft o'erthrown:
One dangerous crisis marks our rise or fall;
By all we're courted, or we're shunn'd by all.

Will it avail, that, unmatu'r'd by years,
My easy numbers pleas'd your partial ears,
If now condemn'd, ev'n where he's valu'd most,
The man must suffer if the poet's lost;
For wanting wit, be totally undone,
And barr'd all arts for having fail'd in one.
When fears like these his serious thoughts engage,
No bugbear phantom curbs the poet's rage.
'Tis powerful reason holds the streighten'd rein,
While flutt'ring fancy to the distant plain
Sends a long look, and spreads her wings in vain.

But grant for once, th' officious muse has shed
Her gentlest influence on his infant head,
Let fears lie vanquish'd, and refounding fame
Give to the bellowing blast the poet's name,

And see! distinguish'd; from the crowd he moves,
Each finger marks him, and each eye approves!
Secure, as halcyons brooding o'er the deep,
The waves roll gently, and the thunders sleep,
Obsequious nature binds the tempest's wings,
And pleas'd attention listens while he sings!
O blissful state, O more than human joy!

What shafts can reach him, or what cares annoy?
What cares, my friend? why all that man can know,

Oppress'd with real or with fancy'd woe.
Rude to the world, like earth's first lord expell'd,
To climes unknown, form Eden's safer field;
No more eternal springs around him breathe,
Black air scowls o'er him, deadly damps beneath;
Now must he learn, misguided youth, to bear
Each varying season of the poet's year:
Flatt'ry's full beam, detraction's win't'ry store,
The frowns of fortune, or the pride of pow'r.
His acts, his words, his thoughts no more his own,
Each folly blazon'd, and each frailty known.
Is he reserv'd!—his sense is so refin'd,

It ne'er descends to trifle with mankind.
Open and free?—they find the secret cause
Is vanity; he courts the world's applause.
Nay, though he speak not, something still is seen,
Each change of face betrays a fault within.
If grave, 'tis spleen; he smiles but to deride;
And downright awkwardness in him is pride.
Thus must he steer through fame's uncertain seas,
Now sunk by censure, and now puff'd by praise;
Contempt with envy strangely mix'd endure,
Fear'd where caref's'd, and jealous, though secure.

One fatal rock on which good authors split
Is thinking all mankind must like their wit;
And the grand business of the world stand still
To listen to the dictates of their quill.
Hurt if they fail, and yet how few succeed!
What's born in leisure men of leisure read;
And half of those have some peculiar whim.
Their test of sense, and read but to condemn.

Besides, on parties now our fame depends,
And frowns or smiles, as these are foes or friends.
Wit, judgment, nature join; you strive in vain;
'Tis keen invective stamps the current strain.
Fix'd to one side like Homer's gods we fight,
These always wrong, and those for ever right.

And would you choose to see your friend resign'd
 Each conscious tie which guides the virtuous mind,
 Embroil'd in factions, hurl with dreaded skill
 The random vengeance of his despicable quill?
 'Gainst pride in man with equal pride declaim,
 And hide ill-nature under virtue's name?
 Or, deeply vers'd in flattery's wily ways,
 Flow in full reams of undistinguis'd praise?
 To vice's grave, or folly's but bequeath
 The blushing trophy, and indignant wreath?
 * Like Egypt's priests, bid endless temples rise,
 And people with earth's pests th' offended skies?

The muse of old her native freedom knew,
 And wild in air the sportive wand'rer flew;
 On worth alone her bays eternal strow'd,
 And found the hero, ere she hymn'd the god.
 Nor less the chief his kind support return'd,
 No drooping muse her slighted labours mourn'd;
 But stretch'd at ease she prun'd her growing
 wings,

By sages honour'd, and rever'd by kings.
 Ev'n knowing Greece confess'd her early claim,
 And warlike Latium caught the generous flame.
 Not to our age regards the tuneful tongue,
 'Tis senseless rapture all, and empty song;
 No Pollio sheds his genial influence round,
 No Varus listens while the groves resound.
 Ev'n those, the knowing and the virtuous few,
 Who noblest ends by noblest means pursue,
 Forget the poet's use; the powerful spell
 Of magic verse, which † Sidney paints so well.
 Forget that Homer wak'd the Grecian flame,
 That Pindar rous'd inglorious Thebes to fame,
 That every age has great examples given [heaven.
 Of virtue taught in verse, and verse inspir'd by

But I forbear—these dreams no longer last,
 The times of fable and of flights are past.
 To glory now no laurel'd suppliants bend,
 No coins are struck, no sacred domes ascend.
 Yet ye, who still the muse's charms admire,
 And best deserve the verse your deeds inspire,
 Ev'n in these gainful unambitious days,
 Feel for yourselves at least, ye fond of praise,
 And learn one lesson taught in mystic rhyme,
 " 'Tis verse alone arrests the wings of time."
 † Fast to the thread of life, annex'd by fame,
 A sculptur'd medal bears each human name,
 O'er Lethe's streams the fatal threads depend,
 The glittering medal trembles as they bend;
 Close but the sheers, when chance or nature calls,
 The birds of rumour catch it as it falls;
 Awhile from bill to bill the trifle's tost,
 The waves receive it, and 'tis ever lost: † [stream

But should the meanest swan that cuts the Confin'd to Phœbus, catch the favour'd name,
 Safe in her mouth she bears the sacred prize
 To where bright fame's eternal altars rise.
 'Tis there the muse's friends true laurels wear
 There great Augustus reigns, and triumphs there,
 Patrons of arts must live till arts decay,
 Sacred to verse in every poet's lay.

† Defence of Poesy. By Sir Philip Sidney.

‡ Bacon de Augment. Scientiarum.

Thus grateful France does Richlieu's worth proclaim,

Thus grateful Britain doats on Sommer's name.
 And, ipite of party rage and human flaws,
 And British liberty, and British laws,
 Times yet to come shall sing of Anna's reign,
 And bards, who blame the measures, love the men. [bays]

But why round patrons climb th' ambitious
 Is interest then the fordid spur to praise?

* Shall the same cause which prompts the chatt'ring jay

To aim at words, inspire the poet's lay?
 And is there nothing in the boasted claim
 Of living labours and a deathless name?
 The pictur'd front, with sacred fillets bound?
 The sculptur'd bust with laurels wreath'd around?
 The annual roses scatter'd o'er his urn,
 And tears to flow from poets yet unborn?

Illustrious all! but sure to merit these,
 Demands at least the poet's learned ease.
 Say, can the bard attempt what's truly great,
 Who pants in secret for his future fate?
 Him serious toils, and humbler arts engage,
 To make youth easy, and provide for age;
 While lost in silence hangs his useless lyre,
 And, though from heav'n it came, fast dies the sacred fire.

Or grant true genius with superior force
 Bursts every bond, resistless in its course;
 Yct lives the man, how wild foe'er his aim,
 Would madly barter fortune's smiles for fame?
 Or distant hopes of future ease forego,
 For all the wreaths that all the nine bestow?
 Well pleas'd to sitne through each recording page,
 The hapless Dryden of a shameless age?

Ill-fated bard! where'er thy name appears,
 The weeping verse a sad memento bears.
 Ah! what avail'd th' enormous blaze between
 Thy dawn of glory, and thy closing scene!
 When sinking nature asks our kind repairs,
 Unstrung the nerves, and silver'd o'er the hairs;
 When stay'd reflection comes uncall'd at last,
 And gray experience counts each folly past,
 Untun'd and harsh the sweetest strains appear,
 And loudest Pæans but fatigue the ear.

'Tis true the man of verse, though born to ills,
 Too oft deserves the very fate he feels.
 When, vainly frequent at the great man's board,
 He shares in every vice with every lord:
 Makes to their taste his sober sense submit,
 And 'gainst his reason madly arms his wit;
 Heav'n but in justice turns their serious heart
 To scorn the wretch, whose life belies his art.

He, only he, should haunt the muse's grove,
 Whom youth might reverence and gray hairs approve; [roll'd,

Whose heav'n-taught numbers, now, in thunder
 Might rouse the virtuous and appal the bold.
 Now, to truth's dictates lend the grace of ease,
 And teach instruction happier arts to please.
 For him would Plato change their gen'ral fate,
 And own one poet might improve his state.

Curs'd be their verse, and blasted all their bays,
 Whose sensual lure th' unconscious ear betrays;

* Perjuri;

Wounds the young breast, ere virtue spreads her shield,
And takes, not wins, the scarce disputed field.
Though specious rhet'ric each loose thought refine,

Though music charm in every labour'd line,
The dangerous verse, to full perfection grown,
Bavius might blush, and Quarles disdain to own.

Should some Machaon, whose sagacious soul
Trac'd blushing nature to her inmost goal,
Skill'd in each drug the varying world provides,
All earth embosoms, and all ocean hides,
Nor cooling herb, nor healing balm supply,
Ease the swollen breast or close the languid eye;
But, exquisitely ill, awake disease,
And arm with poisons every baleful breeze:
What racks, what tortures must his crimes demand,
The more than Borgia of a bleeding land!
And is less guilty he whose shameless page
Not to the present bounds its subtle rage,
But spreads contagion wide, and stains a future age?

Forgive me, Sir, that thus the moral strain,
With indignation warm'd, rejects the rein;
Nor think I rove regardless of my theme,
'Tis hence new dangers clog the paths to fame.
Not to themselves alone such bards confine
Fame's just reproach for virtue's injur'd shrine;
Profan'd by them, the muse's laurels fade,
Her voice neglected, and her flame decay'd.
And the son's son must feel the father's crime,
A curse entail'd on all the race that rhyme.

New cares appear, new terrors swell the train,
And must we paint them ere we close the scene!
Say, must the muse th' unwilling task pursue,
And, to complete her dangers, mention you?
Yes you, my friend, ev'n you whose kind regard
With partial fondness views this humble bard:
Ev'n you he dreads.—Ah! kindly cease to raise
Unwilling censure, by exacting praise.
Just to itself the jealous world will claim
A right to judge; to give, or cancel fame.
And, if th' officious zeal unbounded flows,
The friend too partial is the worst of foes.

* Behold th' Athenian sage, whose piercing mind

Had trac'd the wily lab'rins of mankind,
When now condemn'd, he leaves his infant care
To all those evils man is born to bear.
Not to his friends alone the charge he yields,
But nobler hopes on juster motives builds;
Bids ev'n his foes their future steps attend,
And dare to censure, if they dar'd offend.
Would thus the poet trust his offspring forth,
Or bloom'd our Britain with Athenian worth:
Would the brave foe the imperfect work engage
With honest freedom, not with partial rage,
What just productions might the world surprize!
What other Popes, what other Maros rise!

But since by foes or friends alike deceiv'd,
Too little those, and these too much believ'd;
Since the same fate pursues by diff'rent ways,
Undone by censure, or undone by praise;
Since bards themselves submit to vice's rule,
And party-feuds grow high, and patrons cool:

* Platonis Apologia.

Since, still unnam'd, unnumber'd ills behind
Rise black in air, and only wait the wind:
Let me, O let me, ere the tempest roar,
Catch the first gale, and make the nearest shore;
In sacred silence join th' inglorious train,
Where humble peace and sweet contentment reign;
If not thy precepts, thy example own,
And steal through life not useless, though unknown.

ATYS AND ADRASTUS.

A TALE. 1743.

" Infelix ! Nati funus crudele videbis.

" Hi nostri reditus, expectatique triumphi!
" Hæc mea magna fides!— VIRG.

 This story is related in the first book of Herodotus's History. For the additions made to it, and the manner of telling it, the Author of the following poem is to answer.

In ancient times, o'er Lydia's fertile land
The warrior Croesus held supreme command.
Vast was his wealth, for conquest swell'd his store;
Nor what enrich'd the prince, had left the people poor.

Two sons he had, alike in outward mien,
The tender pledges of a dying queen.
But speechless one ne'er taught his fire to melt
With lipping eloquence by parents felt;
And mimic art in vain expedients sought
To form the tongue, and free th' imprison'd thought.

Yet blooming Atys well that loss supply'd,
Atys the people's hope, and monarch's pride.
His beauteous soul, through every feature glow'd;
And from his lips such soft persuasion flow'd,
As nature had withheld the brother's share,
Only to pour a double portion there.

But vain those graces, since conceal'd from view
They droop in shades and wither where they grew.
For one dread night, when o'er the weary king
The drowsy god had stretch'd his leaden wing,
He seem'd, he knew not where, in wars engag'd,
And, while around the doubtful battle rag'd,
Saw from some hostile hand unerring part
A fatal spear, which pierc'd his Atys' heart.
He starts, he wakes—'tis night and silence all!
Yet scarce confirm'd, he still beholds him fall;
Still bleeds in fancy's eye the gaping wound,
On fancy's ear the dying groans resound.
Again he sleeps; the same sad scenes return—
Restless he rolls, and waits the ling'ring morn.

What can he do, or how prevent a doom,
Which Heav'n foretels, and fate has said shall come?

" And yet perhaps the gods these dreams inspire,
" To save the guiltless son, and warn the fire.
" Too fond of arms I wander'd far astray,
" While youth and blind ambition led the way.
" And ravag'd countries may at length demand
" This bleeding sacrifice at Croesus' hand.
" Then hear me, gods, propitious, while I swear,
" Peace, only peace, shall be my future care.
" O would your powers but save my darling boy,
" No more this breast shall glow; this arm destroy!

"Nor ere shall Atys the dire sport pursue,
 "Still in my court, and seldom from my view,
 "In ease inglorious shall he pass his days,
 "Untaught to feel th' insatiate lust of praise."

He spake, and cautious far away remov'd
 From Atys, what next Atys most be lov'd,
 The pomp of war: no Faulchions guard the gate,
 And chiefs unarm'd around his palace wait.
 Nay farther still extends a parent's fear,
 Ev'n arms themselves he dreads, and most the spear;

Nor leaves of ancient war the weak remains,
 But strips the trophies from the mould'ring fanes,
 Lest, fix'd too loosely, from the faithless stone
 The casual steel should drop, and pierce his son,
 Thus some sweet warbler of the feather'd throng
 Deep in the thorny brake secures her young;
 Yet, vainly anxious, feels a fancied woe,
 And starts at every breeze that stirs the bough;
 With silent horror hears the whisp'ring groves,
 And distant murmurs of the spring she loves.

Unhappy fire! but vainly we oppose
 Weak human caution, when the gods are foes;
 The story's sequel must too surely prove;
 That dreams, prophetic dreams, descend from Jove.

Nor yet shall Atys thwart thy fond designs;
 He moves implicit as his fire inclines.
 On every look his eager duty hung,
 And read his wishes, ere they reach'd his tongue.
 With smiles he strips his helmet's plummy pride,
 With smiles he lays his useless spear aside;
 Nor lets one sigh confess a latent care,
 Reserving all his griefs for his Adrastus' ear.

Adrastus early did his foul approve,
 Brave, virtuous, learn'd, and form'd for Atys' love,
 A Phrygian youth, whom fate condemn'd to roam,
 An exil'd wand'rer from a cruel home.
 For, yet a boy, his inadvertent lance
 An infant brother slew, the crime of chance.
 In vain he wept; the rigid fire demands
 His instant absence from his native lands,
 Or threatens instant death; from death he flew,
 And loaded with a father's curse withdrew.
 Yet not in vain the gods such ills dispense,
 If soft-ey'd pity takes her rise from hence,
 If hence we learn to feel another's pain,
 And from our own misfortunes grow humane.
 This young Adrastus found; and hence confess'd
 That wild benevolence, which warm'd his breast.
 Hence too his fortune stretch'd a bolder wing,
 And plac'd her wand'rer near the Lydian king.
 There long the favour'd youth exalted shone,
 Dear to the sire, but dearer to the son:
 For pow'rful sympathy their hearts had join'd
 In stronger ties than gratitude can bind.

With him did Atys every sport pursue,
 Which health demands, and earlier ages knew.
 At morn, at eve, at sultry noon, with him
 He rovd the sunny lawn, he swam the stream;
 Beside the brook, which dimpling glides away,
 Caught the cool breeze, or lur'd the finny prey;
 Urg'd the light car along th' indented mead,
 Or hung impetuous o'er th' exulting steed,
 Beneath whose hoof unhurt the flow'rs reeds rise,
 And the light grass scarce trembles as he flies.
 But chief he lov'd to range the woods among,
 And hear the music of Adrastus' tongue

With graceful ease unlock the letter'd store,
 And that he learn'd from him endear'd the knowledge more.

Of Thales' wisdom oft the converse ran,
 How varying nature's beauteous frame began,
 And erst to different forms the waters flow'd,
 As o'er the chaos mov'd the breathing god.

Of Solon too he spake, and laws design'd
 To guard fair freedom, not enslave mankind—
 And hinted oft what mutual duties spring
 'Twixt willed subjects and their father king:
 How close connect'd greatness was with pain,
 What earthly bliss, and who the happy man.

Nor lets the while his youthful breast he warm
 With pictur'd fights, the theory of arms;
 Lest inbred sloth should taint his future reign,
 And virtue wake, and glory tempt in vain.
 Thee, Homer, thee with rapture they peruse,
 Expand the soul, and take in all the muse;
 Mix with thy gods, with war's whole ardour burn,
 Or melt in silent tears o'er Hector's urn.

How oft transported would young Atys cry,
 "Thus might I fight, 'twere glorious thus to die!"
 "But why to me are useless precepts giv'n,
 "Tied down and pinion'd by the will of heav'n?
 "No early wreaths my coward youth must claim,
 "No just ambition warm me into fame;
 "Hid from the world to rust in sloth, and buy
 "A poor precarious life with infamy.
 "Happy, thrice happy, on each hostile strand
 "The youths who perish'd by my father's hand!
 "Their honour still survives, and o'er their tomb
 "Their country's tears descend, and laurels bloom.
 "To life alone the conquering sword's confin'd—
 "Would you indeed distress, employ a love too
 kind."

As oft Adrastus, studious to controul
 With reason's voice the tumult of the soul,
 Wou'd hint, to what excess soever wrought,
 Paternal fondness was a venial fault.
 Perhaps, as lenient time stole gently on, [blown the storm which threaten'd might be quite o'er-
 And sun-bright honour only be delay'd
 Awhile, to burst more glorious from the shade.
 "Yet think," he cry'd, "whatever they appear,
 "Few are the causes can excuse a war.
 "To raise th' oppress'd, to curb th' insulting proud,
 "Or should your injur'd country call aloud,
 "Rush, rush to arms, 'tis glorious then to dare,
 "Delay is cowardice, and doubt despair.
 "But let not idler views your breast enflame
 "Of boundless kingdoms, and a dreaded name.
 "Tis yours at home to stem oppression's waves,
 "To guard your subjects, not increase your slaves;
 "On this just basis fame's firm column raise,
 "And be desert in arms your second praise."

'Twas thus in converse, day succeeding day,
 They wore unfelt the tedious hours away,
 And years on years in downy circles ran
 Till the boy rose insensibly to man.
 What now shall Croesus find, what Syren voice,
 To make retirement the result of choice?
 No father's stern command these years allow,
 A chain more pleasing must detain him now.
 In rosy fetters shall the youth be tied,
 And Myria's captive fair the chosen bride.
 Hasten, gentle god, whose chains unite the globe;
 Known by the blazing torch, and saffron robe,

To Lydia haste, for Atys blames your stay,
Nor fair Idalia's blushes brook delay;
O'er glory's blaze your soft enchantments breathe,
And hide the laurel with the myrtle wreath.

And now the king with secret transport found
His hopes succeed, nor fears a martial wound,
While lost in love the happier Atys lies,
The willing victim of Idalia's eyes.
O thoughtless man! from hence thy sorrows flow,
The scheme projected to avert the blow
But makes it sure—for see, from Mysia's land
Round list'ning Atys crowds a suppliant band.
Their tears, their cries, his easy breast assail,
Fond to redress them ere he hears their tale.
"A mighty boar, the curse of angry heaven,
"Had from their homes the wretched sufferers
"driv'n.

"Waste were their viny groves, their rising grain,
"Their herds, their flocks, th' attendant shep-
"herds slain,
"And scarce themselves survive.
"O would but Atys lead the hunter train,
"Again their viny groves, their waving grain
"Might rise secure, their herds, their flocks in"crease,

"And fair Idalia's country rest in peace."
The youth assents, th' exulting crowds retire;
When thus impatient speaks the trembling fire:
"What means my son? prefer'd, alas, in vain,
"From hostile squadrons, and the tented plain;
"You rush on death—recall your rash design,
"Mine be the blame, and be the danger mine;
"Myself will lead the band." The youth return'd,
While his flush'd cheek with mild resentment
burn'd:

"Will Croesus lead the band, a hunter now,
"Skill'd in the fight, and laurels on his brow?
"Alas, such mockeries of war become
"The loiterer Atys fearful of his doom.
"To him at least these triumphs be resign'd,
"That not entirely useless to mankind
"His days may pass; these triumphs all his aim,
"These humble triumphs scarce allied to fame.
"And yet, dread Sir, if you command his stay,
"(O force of duty)! Atys must obey.

"Alas, on you whatever blame shall fall,
"A father's fondness can excuse it all,
"But me, of me, if still your power withstands,
"What must the Lydian, what the Mysian bands,
"What must Idalia think?" Adrastus here
Soft interpos'd. "Great king, dismiss your fear,
"Nor longer Atys' first request oppose;
"War was your dream, no war this region knows:
"For humbler prey the hunters range the wood,
"Their spears fly innocent of human blood.
"Had in the sportive chase some phantom boar
"Dug deep the wound, and drank the vital gore,
"That dreadful vision had excus'd your care,
"Nor Atys offer'd an unheeded prayer.
"I love the prince, and, but I think his life
"Safe as my own, would urge him from the strife.
"Permit him, sire—this arm shall guard him
"there;

"And safely may you trust Adrastus' care,
"For, should he fall, this arm would surely prove
"My bosom feels a more than father's love."

As, when impetuous through th' autumnal sky
Urg'd by the winds the clouds disparting fly,

O'er the broad wave, or wide extended mead,
Shifts the quick beam, alternate light and shade;
So glanc'd the monarch's mind from thought to
thought,

So in his varying face the passions wrought.
Oft on his frown he turn'd a doubtful eye,
Afraid to grant, nor willing to deny,
Oft rais'd it tearful to the best abodes,
And sought in vain the unregarding gods.
Then look'd consent. But added, with a groan,
"From thee, Adrastus, I expect my son."

Why should I tell, impatient for the fight,
How Atys chid the ling'ring hours of night?
Or how the roseate morn with early ray
Streak'd the glad east, and gradual spread the day,

When forth he issu'd like the Lycian god?
Loose to the breeze his hov'ring mantle flow'd,
Wav'd the light plume above, behind him hung
His rattling quiver, and his bow unstrung.
He mounts his steed, the steed obey'd the rein,
Arch'd his high neck, and graceful paw'd the plain.

Ev'n Croesus' self forgot a while his fear
Of future ills, and gaz'd with transport there.

Or why relate, when now the train withdrew,
How fair Idalia sigh'd a soft adieu;
How Croesus follow'd with his voice and eyes,
Fond to behold, but fonder to advise,
And oft repeated, as they journey'd on,
"From thee, Adrastus, I expect my son."

Suffice it us, they leave the waves which flow
O'er beds of gold, and Tmolus' fragrant brow,
They pass Magnesia's plains, Caicus' stream
The Mysian bound, which chang'd its ancient
name,

And reach Olympus' verge:
There desolation spread her ghastly reign
O'er trampled vines, and dissipatèd grain.
And saw with joy revolving seasons smile
To swell her pomp, and mock the lab'rer's toil.
Led by her baleful steps, the youth explore
The dark retreats, and rouse the foaming boar.
Hard is the strife: his horny sides repel
Unting'd the plummy shaft, and blunted steel.
The dogs lie mangled o'er the bleeding plain,
And many a steed, and many a youth was slain.
When now his well-aim'd bow Adrastus drew,
T'wang'd the stretch'd string, the feather'd vengeance flew,

And ras'd the monster's neck: he roars, he flies,
The crowd pursues, the hills resound their cries.
Full in the centre of a vale, embrown'd
With arching shades, they close the savage round.
He wheels, he glares, he meditates his prey,
Resolv'd to strike, resolv'd to force his way;
But Atys timely stopp'd his fierce career,
And through his eye-ball sent the whizzing spear,
And joyful saw him reel; with eager speed
He bears the shining blade, he quits his steed;
"—Ah stop, rash youth, not conquest you pur-
"sue,

"Death lies in ambush there, the victim you;
"You rush on fate"—in vain—he reach'd the beast,

He rais'd his arm, and now had pierc'd his breast,
When in that moment from the adverse side
His too adventurous prince Adrastus sped,

And launch'd with nervous haste his eager spear,
Alarm'd, and trembling for a life so dear.
Glanc'd o'er the falling beaft the fated wood,
And fix'd in Atys's breast drank deep the vital blood.

The struggling prince impatient of the wound
Wrieth'd on the spear, the crowds enclose him
round,

Then sunk in death unknowing whence it came,
Yet, ev'n in death, he call'd Adraftus' name,
"Where flies Adraftus from his dying friend?
"O bear me near." Poor prince! thy life must end

Not in thy murderer's arms, he hears thee not;
Like some sad wretch fix'd to the fatal spot
In where fell the bolt of Jove, nor ear, nor eye,
Nor arm to help, nor language to reply,
Nor thought itself is his. Oblig'd to move
As they direct his speed, he leaves the grove,
As they direct to Sardis' tow'rs again
In silence follows the returning train.

There too we turn, for there the pensive fire
Now hopes, now fears, and pines with vain desire.
In every dust before the wind that flies,
In every distant cloud which stains the skies
He sees his son return: till oft deceiv'd
No more his eye, the flatt'ring scene believ'd,
Yet still he wander'd, and with looks intent,
The fatal road his darling Atys went.

There to averted Heav'n he tells his pain,
And slaughter'd hecatombs decrees in vain.
There to Idalia, frequent by his side,
Relates his fears, or soothes the weeping bride
With tales of Atys' worth, and points the place
Where late he parted from their last embrac.

And now, perchance, in tears they linger'd there,
When slowly-moving real crowds appear. [eye—
"What means," he cried, and shot a trembling
A youth deputed by the rest drew nigh,
And in sad accents told the dreadful tale.

Rage seiz'd the king: expiring, breathless, pale,
Idalia sinks; th' attendant fair convey
With tears, and shrieks, the lifeless frame away.
"Where is the wretch?—hear, hospitable Jove!—

"Is this, is this thy more than father's love?
"Give me my son—why stare thy haggard eyes

"As fix'd in grief? here only sorrow lies"—
And smote his breast—"Thy life in blood began

"A fated wretch, a murderer ere a man.
"O foolish king! by my indulgence stole

"This serpent near me, that has stung my soul.
"This thy return for all a king could shower

"Of bounty o'er thee, life, and wealth, and power—

"But what are those? How great so'er they be,
"I gave thee more, I gave myself to thee:

"I gave thee Atys, link'd in friendship's chain—
"O fatal gift, if thus return'd again!

"Reach me a sword—and yet, dear bleeding clay,
"Can his, can thousand lives thy loss repay?"

Then, burst in tears—"Heav'n's instrument I blame, [came.

"Though by his hand, from Heav'n the vengeance
"This stroke, O Solon, has convinc'd my pride!

"O had I never liv'd, or earlier died!
"Alas, poor wretch, why dost thou bare thy

"breast,
"And court my sword! though lost himself to rest,

"This curse of Heav'n, this Croesus can forgive
"Th' unhappy cause, and bids the murderer live."

"Ah stop," he cried, "and write the milder fate
"Here with thy sword, I only liv'd for that.

"Undone, I thought, beyond misfortune's power,
"O do not by forgiveness curse me more!"

While yet he pleaded, to the mourning crowd,
Forth rush'd Idalia by her maids pursu'd;

Eager she seem'd, with light suspicions fill'd,
And on her face heart-piercing madness smil'd.

"Where is my wand'ring love, ye Lydians say,
"Does he indeed along Meander stray,

"And rove the Asian plain? I'll seek him there.—
"Ye Lydian damsels, of your hearts beware:

"Fair is my love as to the sunny beam
"The light-spread plumage on Cayster's stream,

"His locks are Hermus' gold, his cheeks outshine,
"The ivory tinctur'd by your art divine.—

"I see him now, in Timolus' shade he lies
"On saffron beds, soft sleep has seal'd his eyes.

"His breath adds sweetness to the gale that "blows;

"Tread light, ye nymphs, I'll steal on his repose.
"Alas, he bleeds! O murder! Atys bleeds,

"And o'er his face a dying paleness spreads!
"Help, help, Adraftus—can you leave him now,

"In death neglect him? Once it was not so.
"What, and not weep; a tear at least is due,

"Unkind Adraftus, he'd have wept for you.
"Come then, my maids, our tears shall wash the "gore;

"We, too, will die, since Atys is no more.

"But first we'll strow with flowers the hallow'd
"ground

"Where lies my love, and plant the cypress round;
"Nor let Adraftus know, for should he come,

"New streams of blood would issue from the tomb;
"The flowers would wither at his baleful tread,

"And at his touch the sick'ning cypress fade.
"Come, come—nay, do not tear me from his side,

"Cruel Adraftus, am I not his bride?
"I must—I will—me would you murder too?"

At this, unable to sustain his woe,
"My soul can bear no more," Adraftus cries,

(His eyes on Heav'n), "Ye powers, who rule the "skies!

"If your august, unerring wills decreed,
"That states, and kings, and families must bleed,

"Why was I singled to perform the part,
"Unfecl'd my soul, unpetrified my heart?

"What had I done, a child, an embryo man,
"Ere passions could unfold, or thought began?

"Yet then condemn'd, an infant wretch I fled,
"Blood on my hands, and curses on my head.

"O had I perish'd so! but fortune smil'd,
"To make her frowns more dire.—This vagrant child

"Became the friend of kings, to curse them all,
"And with new horrors dignify his fall."

Then eager snatch'd his sword. "For murders past
"What have I not endur'd?—be this my last,"

And pierc'd his breast. "This fated arm shall pour
"Your streams of wrath, and hurl your bolts no

"more.
"For pangs sustain'd, oblivion's all I crave;

"O let my soul forget them in the grave!
"Alas, forgive the wretch your judgments doom

"Dark are your ways, I wander in the glooms,

" Ndr should perhaps complain.—Be grief my
 " share;
 " But, if your heav'n has mercy, pour it there,
 " On yon heart-broken king, on yon distracted
 " fair."

He spake, and drew the steel; the weeping train
 Support him to the bier, he grasps the slain,
 There feels the last sad joy his soul desires,
 And on his Atys' much-lov'd breast expires.

* O happy both, if I, if I could shed
 " Those tears eternal, which embalm the dead;"
 While round Britannia's coast old ocean waves,
 And to her standard roll th' embattled waves,
 Fair empress of the deep; so long your names
 Should live lamented by her brightest dames;
 Who oft, at evening, should with tears relate
 The murder'd friend, and poor Idalia's fate;
 And oft, inquiring from their lovers, hear
 How Croesus mourn'd a twice revolving year,
 Then reus'd at Cyrus' name, and glory's charms,
 Shook off enervate grief, and shone again in arms.

ANN BOLEYN TO HENRY THE EIGHTH.

AN HEROIC EPISTLE. 1743.

" Ne quid in expertum frustra moritura relinquat."
 VIRG.

The principal hints of the following epistle are taken from the celebrated last letter of Ann Boleyn to Henry the Eighth, published in the Spectator,
 No. 397. The author hopes the additions he has made to it may appear natural in her unfortunate situation.

If sighs could soften, or distress could move
 Obdurate hearts, and bosoms dead to love,
 Already sure these tears had ceas'd to flow,
 And Henry's smiles reliev'd his Anna's woe.
 Yet still I write, still breathe a fruitless prayer,
 The last fond effort of extreme despair.
 As some poor shipwreck'd wretch, for ever lost,
 In strong delusion grasps the leas'ning coast,
 Thinks it still near, howe'er the billows drive,
 And but with life resigns the hopes to live.

You bid me live; but oh how dire the means!
 Virtue starts back, and conscious pride disdains.
 Confess my crime?—what crime shall I confess?
 In what strange terms the hideous falsehood dress?
 A vile adulteress! Heav'n defend my fame!
 Condemn'd for acting what I fear'd to name.
 Blast the foul wretch, whose impious tongue could dare

With sounds like those to wound the royal ear.
 To wound?—alas! they only pleas'd too well,
 And cruel Henry smil'd when Anna fell.

Why was I rais'd, why bade to shine on high
 A pageant queen, an earthly deity?
 This flower of beauty, small, and void of art,
 Too weak to fix a mighty sovereign's heart,
 In life's low vale its humbler charms had spread,
 While storms roll'd harmless o'er its shelter'd
 head:

Had found, perhaps, a kinder gath'rer's hand,
 Grown to his breast, and, by his care sustain'd,

Had bloom'd a while, then, gradual in decay,
 Grac'd with a tear had calmly pass'd away.

Yet, when thus rais'd, I taught my chaste desires
 To know their lord, and burn with equal fires.
 Why then these bonds? Is this that regal state,
 The fair expects whom Henry bids be great?
 Are these lone walls, and never-varied scenes,
 The envied mansion of Britannia's queens?
 Where distant sounds in hollow murmurs die,
 Where moss-grown tow'rs obstruct the trav'ling eye,

Where o'er dim suns eternal damps prevail,
 And health ne'er enters wafted by the gale.
 How curs'd the wretch, to such sad scenes confin'd,
 If guilt's dread scorpions lash his tortur'd mind,
 When injur'd innocence is taught to fear,
 And coward virtue weeps and trembles here!

Nay, ev'n when sleep should ev'ry care allay,
 And softly steal th' imprison'd soul away,
 Quick to my thoughts excurfive fancy brings
 Long visionary trains of martyr'd kings.

There pious * Henry, recent from the blow,
 There ill-starr'd * Edward lifts his infant brow.
 Unhappy prince! thy weak defenceless age
 Might soften rocks, or sooth the tiger's rage;
 But not on these thy harder fates depend,
 Man, man pursues, and murder is his end.

Such may my † child, such dire protectors find,
 Through av'rice cruel, through ambition blind.

No kind condolance in her utmost need,
 Her friends all banish'd, and her parent dead!
 O hear me, Henry, husband, father, hear,
 If e'er those names were gracious in thy ear,
 Since I must die (and so thy ease requires,
 For love admits not of divided fires),
 O to thy babe thy tend'rest cares extend,
 As parent cherish, and as king defend!
 Transferr'd to her, with transport I resign
 Thy faithless heart—if e'er that heart was mine.
 Nor may remorse thy guilty check inflame,
 When the fond prattler lispeth her mother's name;
 No tear start conscious when she meets your eye,
 No heart-felt pang extort th' unwilling sigh,
 Lest she should find, and strong is nature's call,
 I sell untimely, and lament my fall;
 Forget that duty which high Heav'n commands,
 And meet strict justice from a father's hands.
 No, rather say what malice can invent,
 My crimes enormous, small my punishment.
 Pleas'd will I view from yon securer shore
 Life, virtue, love too lost, and weep no more,
 If in your breasts the bonds of union grow,
 And undisturb'd the streams of duty flow.
 —Yet can I tamely court the lifted steel,
 Nor honour's wounds with strong resentment feel?
 Ye powers! that thought improves ev'n terror's
 king,

Adds horrors to his brow, and torments to his sting.
 No, try me, prince; each word, each action weigh,
 My rage could dictate, or my fears betray;
 Each sigh, each smile, each distant hint that hung
 On broken sounds of an unmeaning tongue.
 Recount each glance of these unguarded eyes,
 The seats where passion, void of reason, lies;

* Fortunati ambo, si quid mea carmina possunt,
 &c.

VIRG.

* Henry VI. and Edward V. both murdered in the Tower.

† Afterwards Queen Elizabeth.

In those clear mirrors every thought appears ;
T'ell all their frailties—oh explain their tears !

Yes, try me, prince : but ah ! let truth prevail,
And justice only hold the equal scale,
Ah, let not those the fatal sentence give,
Whom brothers blush to own, yet courts receive !
Base, vulgar souls—and shall such wretches raise
A queen's concern ? to fear them, were to praise.

Yet oh ! (dread thought) oh must I, must I say,
Henry commands, and these constrain'd obey ?
Too well I know his faithless bosom pants
For charms, alas ! which hapless Anna wants.
Yet once those charms this faded face could boast,
Too cheaply yielded, and too quickly lost.

Will * she, O think, whom now your snares pursue,
Will she for ever please, be ever new ?
Or must she, meteor like, a while be great,
Then weeping fall, and share thy Anna's fate ?

Misguided maid ! who now perhaps has form'd,
In transport melting, with ambition warm'd,
Long future greatness in ecstatic schemes,
Loose plans of wild delight, and golden dreams !
Alas ! she knows not with how swift decay
Those visionary glories fleet away,
Alas ! she knows not the sad time will come,
When Henry's eyes to other nymphs shall roam :
When she shall vainly sigh, plead, tremble, rave,
And drop, perhaps, a tear on Anna's grave.
Else would she sooner trust the wintry sea,
Rocks, deserts, monsters—any thing than thee :
Thee, whom deceit inspires, whose every breath
Sooths to despair, and every smile is death.

Fool that I was ! I saw my rising fame
Gild the sad ruins of a † nobler name.
For me the force of sacred ties disown'd,
A realm insulted, and a queen dethron'd.
Yet fondly wild, by love, by fortune led,
Excus'd the crime, and shar'd the guilty bed.
With specious reason lull'd each rising care,
And hugg'd destruction in a form so fair.

'Tis just, ye powers ; no longer I complain,
Vain be my tears, my boasted virtues vain ;
Let rage, let flames, this destin'd wretch pursue,
Who begs to die—but begs that death from you.
Ah ! why must Henry the dread mandate seal ?
Why must his hand, uninjur'd, point the steel ?
Say, for you search the images that roll
In deep recesses of the inmost soul,
Say, did ye e'er amid those numbers find
One wish disloyal, or one thought unkind ?
Then snatch me, blast me, let the lightning's
wing

Avert this stroke, and save the guilty king.
Let not my blood, by lawless passion shed,
Draw down Heav'n's vengeance on his sacred head,
But nature's power prevent the dire decree,
And my hard lord without a crime be free.

Still, still I live, Heav'n hears not what I say,
Or turns, like Henry, from my pray'rs away.
Rejected, lost, O whether shall I fly,
I fear not death, yet dread the means to die !
To thee, O God, to thee again I come,
The sinner's refuge, and the wretch's home !
Since such thy will, farewell my blasted fame,
Let soul detraction seize my injur'd name :

No pang, no fear, no fond concern I'll know,
Nay, smile in death, though Henry gives the blow :

And now, resign'd, my bosom lighter grows,
And hope, soft-beaming, brightens all my woes.
Release me, earth ; ye mortal bonds untie :
Why loiters Henry, when I pant to die ?
For angels call, Heav'n opens at the sound,
And glories blaze, and mercy streams around.
* Adieu, ye fanes, whose purer flames anew
Rose with my rise, and as I flourish'd grew.
Well may ye now my weak protection spare,
The pow'r that fix'd you shall preserve you there.
Small was my part, yet all I could employ,
And Heav'n repays it with eternal joy.

Thus rapt, O King ! thus lab'ring to be free,
My gentlest passport still depends on thee.
My hov'ring soul, though rais'd to Heaven by prayer,

Still bends to earth, and finds one sorrow there ;
Breathes for another's life its latest groan—
Resign'd and happy, might I part alone !

Why frowns my lord ?—ere yet the stroke's decreed,

O hear a sister for a † brother plead !
By Heaven he's wrong'd—alas ! why that to you ?
You know he's wrong'd—you know, and yet pursue.

Unhappy youth ! what anguish he endures !—
Was it for this he press'd me to be yours,
When ling'ring, wav'ring, on the brink I stood,
And ey'd obliquely the too tempting flood ?
Was it for this his lavish tongue display'd
A monarch's graces to a love-sick maid ?
With studied art consenting nature sir'd,
And fore'd my will to what it most desir'd ?
Did he, enchanted by the flatt'ring scene,
Delude the sister, and exalt the queen,
To fall attendant on that sister's shade,
And die a victim with the queen he made ?

And, witness Heav'n, I'd bear to see him die,
Did not that thought bring back the dreadful why :
The blasting foulness, that must still defame
Our lifeless ashes, and unite name.

—Ah stop, my soul, nor let one thought pursue
That fatal track, to wake thy pangs anew.—
Perhaps some pitying bard shall save from death
Our mangled fame, and teach our woes to breathe ;
Some kind historian's pious leaves display
Our hapless loves, and wash the stains away.
Fair truth shall bless them, virtue guard their cause,

And every chaste-ey'd matron weep applausive.
Yet, though no bard should sing, or sage record,
I still shall vanquish my too faithless lord ;
Shall fee at last my injur'd cause prevail,
When pitying angels hear the mournful tale.

—And must thy wife, by Heav'n's severe command,
Before his throne thy sad accuser stand ?
O Henry, chain my tongue, thy guilt atone,
Prevent my suff'rings—ah ! prevent thy own !
Or hear me, Heav'n, since Henry's still unkind,
With strong repentance touch his guilty mind,

* Her marriage with King Henry was a means of introducing the Protestant religion, of which she was a great patroness.

† George Boleyn, Viscount Rochford.

* Lady Jane Seymour.

† Catherine of Arragon.

And oh! when anguish tears his lab'ring soul,
Through his rack'd breast when keenest horrors
roll,

When, weeping, grov'ling in the dust he lies,
An humbled wretch, a bleeding sacrifice,
Then let me bear ('tis all my griefs shall claim,
For life's lost honours, and polluted fame),
Then let me bear thy mandate from on high,
With kind forgiveness let his Anna fly,
From every pang the much-lov'd suffer free,
And breathe that mercy he denies to me.

ON RIDICULE. 1743.

Αἰεὶς δ' ἀπ' τῶν ἐν γένους. HOMER.

'Twas said of old, deny it now who can,
The only laughing animal is man.
'The bear may leap, its lumpish cubs in view,
Or sportive cat her circling tail pursue;
The grin deep-lengthen pug's half-human face,
Or prick'd-up ear confess the sim'ring ass:
In awkward gestures awkward mirth be shown,
Yet, spite of gesture, man still laughs alone.

Th' all-powerful hand, which, taught you fun
to shine,
First dress'd in smiles the human face divine;
And early innocence, unspoil'd by art, [heart.
Through the glad eye betray'd th' o'erflowing
No weak disgraces disturb'd the social plan,
A brother's frailties but proclaim'd him man.
Nought perfect here they found, nor ought re-
quir'd,

Excus'd the weakness, and the worth admir'd.
Succeeding ages more gaseous grew; [too,
They mark'd our foibles, and would mend them
Each, strangely wise, saw what was just and best,
And by his model would reform the rest:
The rest, impatient, or reject with scorn
The specious insult, or with pride return;
Till all meet all with controversial eyes,
If wrong refute them, and if right despise.
Not with their lives, but pointed wits, contend,
Too weak to vanquish, and too vain to mend.

Our mirthful age, to all extremes a prey,
Ev'n courts the lash, and laughs her pains away.
Declining worth imperial wit supplies,
And Momus triumphs, while Astræa flies.
No truth so sacred, banter cannot hit,
No fool so stupid, but he aims at wit.
Ev'n those, whose breasts ne'er plann'd one vir-tuous deed,

Nor rais'd a thought beyond the earth they tread;
Ev'n those can censure, those can dare deride
A Bacon's av'rice, or a Tully's pride;
And sneer at human checks by nature given,
To curb perfection ere it rival heaven:
Nay, chiefly such in these low arts prevail,
Whose want of talents leaves them time to rail.
Born for no end, they worse than useless grow
(As waters poison if they cease to flow);
And pests become, whom kinder fate design'd
But harmless expletives of human kind.
See with what zeal th' insidious talk they ply!
Where shall the prudent, where the virtuous fly?
Lark as ye can, if they direct the ray,
The veriest atoms in the sun-beams play.
No venial slip their quick attention 'scapes;
They trace each Proteus through his hundred shapes;

To mirth's tribunal drag the caustic train,
Where mercy sleeps, and nature pleads in vain.
And whence this lust to laugh? what fond pretence,

Why Shaftsb'ry tells us, mirth's the test of sense;
Th' enchanted touch, which fraud and falsehood fear,

Like Una's mirror, or Ithuriel's spear.
Not so fair truth—aloft her temple stands
The work and glory of immortal hands.
Huge rocks of adamant its base ensold,
Steel bends the arch, the columns swell in gold.
No storms, no tumults, reach the sacred fane;
Waves idly beat, and winds grow loud in vain.
The shaft sinks pointless, ere it verges there,
And the dull hiss but dies away in air.

Yet let me say, howe'er secure it rise,
Sly fraud may reach it, and close craft surpise.
Truth, drawn like truth, must blaze divinely
bright;

But, drawn like error, truth may cheat the sight.
Some awkward epithet, with skill apply'd,
Some specious hints, which half their meanings
hide,

Can right and wrong most courteously confound,
Bandit-like, to sin us ere they wound.

Is there an art, through science' various store,
But, madly strain'd, becomes an art no more?
Is there a virtue, falsehood can't disguise?
Betwixt two vices every virtue lies:
To this, to that, the doubtful beam incline,
Or mirth's false balance take, the triumph's thine.

Let mighty Newton with an Augur's hand,
Through heaven's high concave stretch th' imper-
rial wand,

The vagrant comet's dubious path assign,
And lead from star to star th' unerring line:
Who but with transport lists his piercing eye,
Fond to be lost in vast immensity!
But should your * taylor, with as much of thought,
Erect his quadrant, ere he cuts your coat;
The parchment slips with algebra o'erspread,
And calculations scrawl on ev'ry shred;
Art miscaply'd must glare you in the face,
Nor could you, grave, the long deductions trace.

Fond of one art, most men the rest forego;
And all's ridiculous, but what they know.
Freely they censure lands they ne'er explore,
With tales they learn'd from coasters on the shore.
As Afric's petty kings, perhaps, who hear
Of distant states from some weak traveller,
Imperfect hints with eager ears devour,
And sneer at Europe's fate, and Britain's power.

All arts are useful, as all nature good,
Correctly known, and temperately pursued.
The active soul, that heav'n-born lamp, requires
Still new supports to feed, and raise its fires;
And science' ample stores expanded stand,
As diff'rent aids the varying flames demand.
And, as the sylvan chase bids bodies glow,
And pure health through vig'rous channels
flow:

So fares the infant mind, by nature drawn,
By genius roas'd at reason's early dawn;
Which dares fair learning's arduous seats invade,
Climb the tall cliff, or pierce th' entangled shade;

* "Your taylor," See, in Gulliver's Travels, Voyage to Laputa.

New health, new strength, new force its powers receive,

And 'tis from toil th' immortal learns to live,
Or, if too harsh each boist'rous labour proves,
The muse conducts us to more happy groves;
Where sport her sister arts, with myrtles crown'd,
Expressive picture, and persuasive sound;
Where truth's rough rules the gentlest lays im-
part,

And virtue steals harmonious on the heart.

We oft, 'tis true, mistake the fat'rist's aim,
Not arts themselves, but their abuse they blame.
Yet, if, crusaders like, their zeal be rage,
They hurt the cause in which their arms engage:
On heav'nly anvils forge the temper'd steel,
Which fools can brandish, and the wise may feel.
Readers are few, who nice distinctions form,
Supinely cool, or credulously warm.

'Tis jest, 'tis earnest, as the words convey
Some glimm'ring sense to lead weak heads astray.
And when, too anxious for some art assail'd,
You point the latent flaw by which it fail'd;
Each to his bias leans, a steady fool,
And, for the part defective, damns the whole.

In elder James's ever peaceful reign,
Who sway'd alike the sceptre and the pen,
Had some rough poet, with satiric rage,
Alarm'd the court, and lash'd the pedant age;
What freights of genius on that rock had split?
Where now were learning, and where now were wit?

Matur'd and full the rising forest grows,
Ere its wife owner lops th' advancing boughs:
For oaks, like arts, a length of years demand,
And shade the shepherd, ere they grace the land.

Where then may censure fall? 'tis hard to say;
On all that's wrong it may not, and it may.
In life, as arts, it asks our nicest care,
But hurts us more, as more immediate there.

Resign we freely to th' unthinking crowd,
Their standing jest, which swells the laugh so loud,
The mountain back, or head advanc'd too high,
A leg mis-shapen, or distorted eye:
We pity faults by nature's hand impress'd;
Their fits* mind, but not his form's the jest.

Here then we fix, and lash without controul
These mental pests, and hydras of the soul;
Acquir'd ill-nature, ever prompt debate,
A zeal for slander, and delib'rate hate:
These court contempt, proclaim the public foe,
And each* Ulysses like, should aim the blow.

Yet sure, ev'n here, our motives should be known:

Rail we to check his spleen, or ease our own?
Does injur'd virtue ev'ry shaft supply,
Arm the keen tongue, and flush th' erected eye?
Or do we from ourselves ourselves disguise;
And act, perhaps, the villain we chastise?
Hope we to mend him? hopes, alas, how vain!
He feels the lash, not listens to the reign.

'Tis dangerous too, in these licentious times,
Howe'er severe the smile, to sport with crimes,
Vices when ridicul'd, experience says,
First lose that horror which they ought to raise,
Grow by degrees approv'd, and almost aim at praise.

* Iliad ii.

When Tully's tongue the Roman Clodius draws,
How laughing satire weakens Milo's cause!
Each pictur'd vice so impudently bad,
The crimes turn frolics, and the villain mad;
Rapes, murders, incest, treasons, mirth create,
And Rome scarce hates the author of her fate.

'Tis true, the comic muse, confin'd to rules,
Supply'd the laws, and sham'd the tardy schools;
With living precepts urg'd the moral truth,
And by example form'd the yielding youth.
The titled knave with honest freedom shown,
His person mimic'd, nor his name unknown,
Taught the young breast its opening thoughts to raise

From dread of infamy to love of praise,
From thence to virtue; there perfection ends,
As gradual from the root the flower ascends;
Strain'd through the varying stems the juices
flow,
Bloom o'er the top, and leave their dregs below.

'Twas thus a while th' instructive stage survey'd,
From breast to breast its glowing influence spread.
Till, from his nobler task by passions won,
The man unravell'd what the bard had done;
And he, whose warmth had fir'd a nation's heart,
Debas'd to private piques the gen'rous art.
Here sunk the muse, and, useless by degrees,
She ceas'd to profit, as the ceas'd to please.
No longer wit a judging audience charm'd,
Who, rous'd not fir'd, not raptur'd but alarm'd,
To well-tun'd scandal lent a jealous ear,
And through the faint applause betray'd the fear.

We, like Menander, more discreetly dare,
And well-bred satire wears a milder air.
Still vice we brand, or titled fools disgrace,
But dress in fable's guise the borrow'd face.
Or as the bee, through nature's wild retreats,
Drinks the moist fragrance from th' unconscious sweets,

To injure none, we lightly range the ball,
And glean none from diff'rent knaves the copious gill;
Extract, compound, with all a chemist's skill,
And claim the motley characters who will.
Happy the muse, could thus her tuneful aid
To sense, to virtue, wake the more than dead!
But few to fiction lend attentive ears,
They view the face, but soon forget 'tis theirs.

" 'Twas not from them the bard their likeness
" stole,

" The random pencil haply hit the mole;
" Ev'n from their prying foes such specks retreat;"
—They hide them from themselves, and crown
the cheat.

Or should, perhaps, some softer clay admit
The fly impressions of instructive wit;
To virtue's side in conscious silence steal,
And glow with goodness, ere we find they feel;
Yet more, 'tis fear'd, will closter methods take,
And keep with caution what they can't set free;
For fear of man in his most mirthful mood,
May make us hypocrites, but seldom good.
And what avails that seas confess their bounds,
If subtler insects sap the Belgian mounds?
Though no wing'd mischief cleave the mid-day
skies,

Still through the dark the baleful venom flies,
Still virtue feels a sure though ling'ring fate,
And, stabb'd in secret, bleeds th' unguarded state.

Besides, in men have varying passions made
Such nice confusions, blending light with shade,
That eager zeal to laugh the vice away
May hurt some virtue's intermingling ray.
Mens faults, like Martin's * broider'd coat, demand

The nicest touches of the steadiest hand.
Some yield with ease, while some their posts maintain;

And parts defective will at last remain. [bend;
There, where they best succeed, your labours
Nor render useless, what you strive to mend.

The youthful Curio blush'd whene'er he spoke,
His ill-rim'd modesty the general joke; [dure—
Sneer'd by his friends, nor could that sneer en-
Behold, sad instance of their skill to cure! [fore,
The conscious blood, which fir'd his cheek be-
Now leaves his bosom cool, and warns no more.

But affectation—there, we all confess,
Strong are the motives, and the danger less.
Sure we may smile where fools themselves have made,

As balk'd spectators of a farce ill play'd,
And laugh, if satire's breath should rudely raise
The painted plumes which vanity displays.

O fruitful source of everlasting mirth!
For fools, like apes, are mimics from their birth.
By fashion govern'd, nature each neglects,
And barter's graces for admir'd defects.

The artful hypocrites, who virtue wear,
Confess, at least, the sacred form is fair;
And apes of science equally allow
The scholar's title to the laurell'd brow;
But what have those 'gainst satire's lash to plead,
Who court with zeal what others fly with dread?
Affect ev'n vice! poor folly's last excess,
As Picts mistook deformity for dress, [tharms,
And smear'd with so much art their hideous
That the grim beauty scar'd you from her arms.

Too oft these follies † bask in virtue's shine,
The wild luxuriance of a soil too fine.
Yet oh, repress them, wherefo'er they rise—
But how perform it?—there the danger lies.
Short are the lessons taught in nature's school,
Here each peculiar asks a sep'rate rule.
Nice is the task, be gen'ral if you can,
Or strike with caution, if you point the man:
And think, O think, the cause by all assign'd
To raise our laughter, makes it most unkind:
For though from nature these no strength receive,

We give them nature when we bid them live.
Like Jove's Minerva springs the gentle train,
The genuine offspring of each teeming brain;
On which, like tend'ring fires, we fondly doat,
Plan future fame in luxury of thought,
And scarce at last, o'erpower'd by foes or friends,
Torn from our breasts, the dear delusion ends.

Then let good-nature every charm exert,
And, while it mends it, win th' enfolding heart.
Let moral mirth a face of triumph wear,
Yet smile unconscious of th' extorted tear.
See, with what grace instructive satire flows,
Politely keen, in Clio's number'd prose!
That great example should our zeal excite,
And censors learn from Addison to write.

* Tale of a Tub. † Affectations.

So, in our age, too prone to sport with pain,
Might soft humanity resume her reign;
Pride without rancour feel th' objected fault,
And folly blush, as willing to be taught;
Critics grow mild, life's witty warfare cease,
And true good-nature breathe the balm of peace.

ON NOBILITY.

AN EPISTLE TO THE EARL OF ———

POETS, my lord, by some unlucky fate
Condemn'd to flatter the too easy great,
Have oft, regardless of their heav'n-born flame,
Enshrin'd a title, and ador'd a name;
For idol deities forsook the true,

And paid to greatness what was virtue's due.
Yet hear, at least, one recreant bard maintain
Their incense fruitless, and your honours vain:
Teach you to scorn th' auxiliar props, that raise
The painted produce of these sun-shine days;
Proud from yourself, like India's worm, to weave
Th' ennobling thread, which fortune cannot give.
In two short precepts your whole lesson lies;
Would you be great?—be virtuous, and be wise.

In elder time, e'er heralds yet were known
To gild the vain with glories not their own;
Or infant language saw such terms prevail,
As fets and chev'ron, pale and contrepale;
'Twas he alone the shaggy spoils might wear,
Whose strength subdu'd the lion, or the bear;
For him the rosy spring with smiles beheld
Her honours strip from every grove and field;
For him the rustic quires with songs advance;
For him the virgins form the annual dance.
Born to protect, like gods they hail the brave;
And sure 'twas godlike, to be born to save!

In Turkey still these simple manners reign,
Though Pharamond has liv'd, and Charlemagne:
The cottage hind may there admitted rise
A chief, or statesman, as his talent lies;
And all, but Othman's race, the only proud,
Fall with their fires, and mingle with the crowd.

Politer courts, ingenious to extend
The father's virtues, bid his poms descend;
Chiefs premature with sasive wreaths adorn,
And force to glory heroes yet unborn,
* Plac'd like Hamilcar's son, their path's confin'd,
Forward they must, for monsters press behind;
Monsters more dire than Spain's, or Barca's snakes,
If fame they grasp not, infamy o'ertrakes.
'Tis the same virtue's vigorous, just effort
Must grace alike St. James's or the Porte;
Alike, my lord, must Turks, or British peer,
Be to his king, and to his country dear;
Alike must either honour's caution maintain,
You to preserve a fame, and they to gain.

* Ibi fama est, in quiete visum ab eo juvenem divini specie, qui se ab Jove diceret ducem in Italian Annibali missum. Proinde sequeretur, neque usquam a se desisteret oculus. Pavidum primo, nusquam respicientem, &c.—Tandem, temperare oculis nequissime: tum vidisse post se serpentem mirâ magnitudine cum ingenti arborum ac virgultorum strage ferri, &c. Liv. lib. xxi. c. 22.

For birth—precarious were that boasted gem,
 Though worth flow'd copious in the vital stream:
 (Of which a sad reverse historians preach,
 And sage experience proves the truths they teach.)
 For say, ye great, who boast another's scars,
 And, like Buziris, end among the stars,
 What is this boon of heav'n? dependent still
 On woman's weakness, and on woman's will.
 Might not, in Pagan days, and open air,
 Some wand'ring Jove surprize th' unguarded fair?
 And did your gentle grandames always prove
 Stern rebels to the charms of lawless love?
 And never pity'd, at some tender time,
 * A dying Damian, with'ring in his prime?
 Or, more politely to their vows untrue,
 Lov'd, and elop'd, as modern ladies do?

But grant them virtuous, were they all of birth?
 Did never nobles mix with vulgar earth,
 And city maids to envy'd heights translate,
 Subdu'd by passion, and decay'd estate?
 Or, sigh, still humbler, to the passing gales
 By turk-built cots in daisy-painted vales?
 Who does not, Pamela, thy suff'rings feel?
 Who has not wept at beauteous Grisel's wheel?
 † And each fair marchioness, that Gallia pours
 (Exotic sorrows) to Britannia's shores?

Then blame us not, if backward to comply
 With your demands: we fear a forgery.
 In spite of patents, and of kings decrees,
 And blooming coronets on parchment-trees,
 Your proofs are gone, your very claims are lost,
 But by the manners of that race you boast.
 O if true virtue fires their gen'rous blood,
 The feel for fame, the pant for public good,
 The kind concern for innocence distress,
 The Titus' wish to make a people blest,
 At every deed we see their father's tomb
 Shoot forth new laurels in eternal bloom;
 We hear the rattling car, the neighing steeds,
 A Poitiers thunders, and a Cressy bleeds!
 Titles and birth, like di'monds from the mine,
 Must by your worth be polish'd e'er they shine;
 Thence drink new lustre, there unite their rays,
 And stream through ages one unsully'd blaze.

But what avails the crest with flow'rets crown'd,
 The mother virtuous, or the fires renown'd,
 If, from the breathing walls, those fires behold
 The midnight gamester trembling for his gold:
 And see those hours, when sleep their toils re-
 pair'd, [guard,]
 (Or, if they wak'd, they wak'd for Britain's
 Now on lewd loves bestow'd, or drench'd in wine,
 Drown and embrate the particle divine?
 How must they wish, with many a sigh, unheard
 The warmest pray'r they once to heav'n prefer'd!
 When not content with fame for kingdoms won,
 They sought an added boon, and ask'd a son;
 That cloud eternal in their sky serene,
 That dull dead weight that drags them down to men,
 And speaks as plainly as the muse's tongue,
 * Frail were the fires from whom we mortals sprung."

* See January and May in Chaucer, and Mr. Pope.

† Marianne, the Fortunate Country Maid, &c.

Incenſe to ſuch may breathe, but breathes in vain,
 The duſky vapour but obſcures the ſane:
 * Loretto's lady like, ſuch patrons bear
 The flatt'ring ſtains of many a live-long year;
 While but to ſhame them beams ſeditious day,
 And their own filth th' eternal lamps betray.
 Tell us ye names preserv'd from Charles's times
 In dedication proſe, heroic rhymes;
 Would ye not now, with equal joy reſign
 (Though taught to flow in Dryden's ſtrain divine)
 The awkward virtues never meant to fit,
 The alien morals, and imputed wit,
 Whoſe very praiſe but lends a fatal breath
 To ſave expiring infamy from death?
 And yet, in conſpiring vice ſmall virtue lies;
 The weak can ſhun it, and the vain deſpiſe.
 'Tis yours my lord, to form a nobler aim,
 And build on active merit endleſs fame;
 Unlike the loit'ring, ſtill forgotten crowd,
 Who, ev'n at beſt but negatively good, [days,
 Through ſloth's dull round drag out a length of
 While life's dun taper gradually decays;
 And numbers fall, and numbers riſe the ſame,
 Their country's burden, and their nature's ſhame.

What though in youth, while flatt'ring hopes perfume
 On health's vain flouriſh for long years to come,
 Thoughtleſs and gay, a mad good-nature draws
 From followers flatt'ry, and from crowds ap-plauſe;

Nay from the wife, by ſome capricious whim,
 Should, mix'd with pity, force a faint eſteem:
 Yet will in age that ſiren charm prevail,
 When cares grow peeviſh, and when ſpirits fail;
 Or muſt, deſpis'd, each fool of fortune ſigh
 O'er years miſpent with retroſpective eye,
 Till pomp's laſt honours load the pageant bier,
 And much ſolemnity without a tear?

'Tis yours with judgment nobly to beſtow,
 And treaſure joys the bounteous only know.
 See, fav'd from ſloth by you, with venial pride,
 Laborious health the ſtubborn glebe divide;
 Inſtructed want her folded arms unbend,
 And ſmiling induſtry the loom attend.
 Yours too the talk to ſpread indulgent eaſe,
 Steal cares from wrinkled age, diſarm diſeaſe;
 Inſulted worth from proud oppreſſion ſcreen,
 And give neglected ſcience where to lean.
 Titles, like ſtandard-flags, exalted riſe,
 To tell the wretched where protection lies;
 And he who hears unmov'd affliction's claim,
 Deſerts his duty, and denies his name.

Nor is't enough, though to no bounds confin'd,
 Your cares inſtruct, or bounties bleſs mankind.
 'Tis yours, my lord, with various ſkill to trace,
 By hiſtory's clue, the ſtateſman's ſubtle maze;
 Obſerve the ſprings that mov'd each nice machine,
 Not laid too open, and not drawn too thin:
 From Grecian mines bring ſtirling treaſures home,
 And grace your Britain with the ſpoils of Rome;
 But chief that Britain's gradual riſe behold,
 The changing world's reverse, from lead to gold:
 Happy at laſt, through ſtorms in freedom's cauſe,
 Through fierce prerogative, and trampled laws,

To blend such seeming inconsistent things,
As strength with ease, and liberty with kings.
Know too, where Europe's wav'ring fates depend,

What states can injure, and what states defend,
Their strength, their arts, their policies your own—
And then, like Pelham, make that wisdom known.
Wake ev'ry latent faculty of soul,
Teach from your lips the glowing sense to roll,
Till list'ning senates bless the kind alarm,
Convinc'd, not dazzled, and with judgment warm.

Superior talents, on the great bestow'd;
Are Heav'n's peculiar instruments of good:
Not for the few, who have them, are design'd;
What flows from heav'n must flow for all man-
kind.

Blush then, ye peers, who, niggards of your store,
Brood o'er the shining heap, not make it more;
Or Wilmot like, at some poor fool's expence,
Squander in wit the sacred funds of sense.
Wisdom alone is true ambition's aim,
Wisdom the source of virtue, and of fame,
Obtain'd with labour, for mankind employ'd,
And then, when most you share it, best en-
joy'd.

See! on yon sea-girt isle the goddess stands,
And calls her vot'rys with applauding hands!
They pant, they strain, they glow through climes unknown.

With added strength, and spirits not their own.
Hark! what loud shouts each glad arrival hail!
How full fame's fragrance breathes in ev'ry gale!
How tempting nod the groves for ever green!

—"But tempests roar, and oceans roll between."
Yet see, my lord, your friends around you brave
That roaring tempest, and contending wave.
See—lab'ring through the billowy tide!
See—impatient for the adverse side!
O much-lov'd youths! to Britain justly dear,
Her spring, and promise of a fairer year.
Success be theirs, whate'er thy hopes engage,
Worth grace their youth, and honours crown their age,

And ev'ry warmest wish sincere, and free,
My soul e'er breathes, O —, for thee!

Hard is your stated task by all allow'd,
And modera greatness rarely bursts the cloud.
Lull'd high in fortune's silken lap, you feel
No shocks, nor turns of her uncertain wheel:
Amusements Jazze, weak admirers gaze,
And flatt'ry sooths, and indolence betrays.
Yet still, my lord, on happy peers attends
That noblest privilege, to choose their friends;
The wise, the good are theirs, their call obey;
If pride refuse not, fortune points the way.
Nor great your toils, on wisdom's seas, com-
par'd

With theirs who shift the sail, or watch the card.
For you, the fages every depth explore,
For you, the slaves of science ply the oar;
And nature's genii fly with sails unfurl'd,
The Drake's and Raleigh's of the mental world.

But stay—too long mere English lays detain
Your light-wing'd thoughts, that rove beyond the main:

No fancy'd voyage there expects the gale,
No allegoric zephyr swells the sail,

VOL. XI.

—Yet, e'er you go, e'er Gallia's pomp invades
The milder truth's of Granta's peaceful shades,
This verse at least be yours, and boldly tell,
That if you fall, not unadviz'd you fell;
But, blest with virtue and with sense adorn'd,
A willing victim of the fools you scorn'd.

AN HYMN TO THE NYMPH OF BRISTOL
SPRING, 1751.

"Hinc atque hinc vastæ rupes, geminique mi-nantur

"In cœlum scopuli; tum sylvis scœna coruscis
"Desuper, horrentique atrum Nemus imminet umbra.

"Intus Aquæ dulces, vivoque sedilia saxo
"NYMPHARUM domus!"— VIRG.

NYMPH of the fount! from whose auspicious urn
Flows health, flows strength, and beauty's roseate
bloom,

Which warms the virgin's cheek, thy gifts I sing!
Whether inclining from thy rocky couch
Thou hear'st attentive, or with sister-nymphs
Fast by Sabina's hoarse-resounding stream,
Thou cull'st fresh flowers, regardless of my song.

Avonia, hear'st thou, from the neigh'ring stream

So call'd; or Bristoduna; or the sound
Well known, *Vincentia? Sithence from thy rock
The hermit pour'd his orisons of old,
And, dying, to thy fount bequeath'd his name.

Whate'er thy title, thee the azure god
Of ocean erst bech'd, and to the shore
Fast flew his pearly car; th' obsequious winds
Dropp'd their light pinions, and no sounds were heard

In earth, air, sea, but murmuring sighs of love.
He left thee then; yet not penurious, left
Without a boon the violated maid;
But, grateful to thy worth, with bounteous hand
Gave thee to pour the salutary rill,
And pay this precious tribute to the main.

† And still he visits, faithful to his flame,
Thy moist abode, and each returning tide
Mingles his wave with thine; hence brackish oft
And foul, we fly th' adulterated draught
And scorn the proffer'd bev'rage; thoughtless we,
That then thy naiads hymenæals chaunt,
And rocks re-echo to the triton's shell. [pay

Love warm'd thy breast; to love thy waters
A kind regard: and thence the pallid maid
Who pines in fancy for some sav'rite youth
Drinks in new lustre, and with surer aim
Darts more enliven'd glances. Thence the boy,
Who mourns in secret the polluted charms
Of Lais or Corinna, grateful feels
Health's warm return, and pants for purer joys.

* The spring at Bristol is usually called St. Vincent's Well, and the rocks near it St. Vincent's Rocks, on a fabulous tradition that that saint resided there.

† The high tides in the Avon generally foul the spring in such a manner as to make the waters improper to be drank till some hours after-ward.

3 M

Nor youth alone thy power, indulgent owns;
 Age shares thy blessings, and the tott'ring frame
 By thee supported: not, Tithonus-like,
 To linger in decay, and daily feel
 A death in every pain; such cruel aids,
 Unknown to nature, art alone can lend:
 But, taught by thee, life's latter fruits enjoy
 A warmer winter, and at last fall off,
 Shook by no boist'rous, or untimely blasts.

But why on single objects dwells my song?
 Wide as the neighb'ring sons of commerce waft
 Their inexhausted stores, to every clime
 On every wind up-borne thy triumphs spread!
 Thee the glad merchant hails, whom choice or fate

Leads to some distant home, where Sirius reigns,
 And the blood boils with many a fell disease
 Which Albion knows not. Thee the sable wretch
 To ease whose burning entrails swells in vain
 The citron's dewy moisture, thee he hails;
 And oft from some steep cliff, at early dawn,
 In seas, in winds, or the vast void of heaven
 Thy power unknown adores; or ranks, perhaps,
 Amid his fabled gods Avonia's name.

Scar'd at thy presence start the train of death,
 And hide their whips and scorpions. Thee confusc'd

Slow Febris creeps from; thee the meagre fiend
 Consumption flies, and checks his rattling coughs.
 But chief the dread disease, whose wat'ry pow'r
 Cirb'd by thy wave restraining, knows its bounds,
 And feels a firmer barrier. Ocean thus
 Once flow'd, they say, impetuous; till restrain'd
 By force almighty, streams were taught to flow
 In narrower channels, and once more relieve
 The thirsty hind, and wash the fruitful vale.

What shrieks, what groans, torment the la-
 b'ring air,

And pierce th' astonish'd hearer? ah, behold
 Yon agonizing wretch, that pants and writhes,
 Rack'd with the stone, and calls on thee for ease!
 Nor calls he long in vain; the balmly draught
 Has done its office, and resign'd and calm
 The poor pale sufferer sinks to sweet repose.

O could thy lenient wave thus charm to peace
 That fiercer fiend Ill-nature; Argus-like,
 Whose eyes still open watch th' unwary steps
 Which tread thy margin, and whose subtle brain
 To real mischief turns ideal ills!

But not thy steam nectareous, nor the smiles
 Of rosy dimpled innocence, can charm
 That monster's rage: dark, dark as midnight
 damps,

And ten times deadlier, steals along unseen
 Her blasting venom, and devours at once
 Fair virtue's growth, and beauty's blooming spring.
 But turn we from the sight, and dive beneath
 Thy darksome caverns; or unwearied climb
 Thy tow'ring mountains, studious to explore
 The latent seeds and magazines of health.

"Ye rocks that round me rise, ye pendant woods

High waving to the breeze, ye gliding streams
 That steal in silence through the mossy clefts
 Unnumber'd, tell me in what secret vale
 Hygeia shuns the day?—O, often seen
 In streams poetic, pour thy radiant form

Full on my sight, and bless my waking sense!
 But not to me such visions, not to me;
 No son of Pæan I, like that sweet bard
 * Who sung her charms profest; † or him, whose mule

Now builds the lofty rhyme, and nobly wild
 Crops each unfading flower from Pindar's brow;
 To form fresh garlands for the naiad train.

Yet will I view her still, however coy,
 In dreams poetic; see her to the sound
 Of dulcet symphonies harmonious lead
 Her sportive sister-graces, Mirth serene,
 And Peace, sweet inmate of the sylvan shade.

These are thy handmaids, goddesses of the fount,
 And these thy offspring. Oft have I beheld
 Their airy revels on the verdant steep
 Of Avon, clear as fancy's eye could paint,
 What time the dewy star of eve invites
 To lonely musing; by the wave-worn beach,
 Along the extended mead. Nor less intent
 Their fairy forms I view, when from the height
 Of Clifton, tow'ring mount, th' enraptur'd eye
 Beholds the cultivated prospect rise
 Hill above hill, with many a verdant bound
 Of hedge-row chequer'd. Now on painted clouds
 Sportive they roll, or down yon winding stream
 Give their light mantles to the wafting wind,
 And join the sea-green sisters of the flood.

Happy the man whom these amuse walks,
 These waking dreams delight! no cares molest
 His vacant bosom: Solitude itself
 But opens to his keener view new worlds,
 Worlds of his own: from every genuine scene
 Of nature's varying hand his active mind
 Takes fire at once, and his full soul o'erflows
 With Heaven's own bounteous joy; he too creates,

And with new beings peoples earth and air,
 And ocean's deep domain. The bards of old,
 The godlike Grecian bards, from such fair founts
 Drank inspiration. Hence on airy cliffs
 Light satyrs danc'd, along the woodland shade
 Pan's mystic pipe resounded, and each rill
 Confess'd its tutelary power, like thine.

But not like thine, bright deity, thy urns
 Pour'd health's rare treasures; on their grassy sides

The panting swain reclin'd with his tir'd flock
 At sultry noontide, or at evening led
 His unyok'd heifers to the common stream.

Yet some there have been, and there are, like thee

Profuse of liquid balm; from the fair train
 † Of eldest Tadmor, where the sapient king
 For the faint traveller, and diseas'd, confin'd
 To salutary baths the fugitive stream.

And still, though now perhaps their power unknown,

* Dr. Armstrong, author of that elegant didactic poem, called, "The Art of preserving Health."

† Alluding to a manuscript poem of Dr. Aken-side's, (since published) written in the spirit and manner of the ancients, called, "An Hymn to the Water Nymphs."

‡ Tadmor in the wilderness, built by king Se-lomon, celebrated for its baths.

Unfought, the solitary waters creep
 Amid * Palmyra's ruins, and bewail
 To rocks, and desert caves, the mighty loss
 Of two imperial cities! to may sink
 Yon cloud-envelop'd towers; and times to come
 Inquire where Avon flow'd, and the proud mart
 Of Bristol rose. Nay, Severn's self may fail,
 With all that waste of waters: and the swain
 From the tall summit (whence we now survey
 The anchoring bark, and see with every tide
 Pass and repass the wealth of either world)
 May hail the softer scene where groves aspire,
 And bosom'd villages, and golden fields
 Unite the Cambrian to the English shore.
 Why should I mention many a fabled fount
 By bards recorded, or historians old;
 Whether they water'd Asia's fertile plains
 With soft † Callirhoë; or to letter'd Greece
 Or warlike Latium lent their kindly aid?
 Nor ye of modern fame, whose rills descend
 From Alps and Appennines, or grateful lave
 Germania's haraſ'd realms, expect my verse
 Should chant your praise, and dwell on foreign themes;

When chief o'er Albion have the healing powers
 Shed wide their influence: from a thousand rocks
 Health gushes, through a thousand vales it flows
 Spontaneous. Scarce can luxury produce
 More pale diseases than her streams relieve.

Witness, Avonia, the unnumber'd fountains
 Which hail thy † sister's name! on the same banks
 Your fountains rise, to the same stream they flow.
 See in what myriads to her wat'ry shrine
 The various votaries press! they drink, they live!
 Not more exulting crowds in the full height
 Of Roman luxury proud Baia knew;
 Ere ‡ Musa's fatal skill, fatal to Rome,
 Defam'd the tepid wave. Nor || round thy shades,
 Clitumnus, more recording trophies hang.

O for a Shakspeare's pencil, while I trace
 In nature's breathing paint, the dreary waste
 Of Buxton, dropping with incessant rains
 Cold and ungenial; or its sweet reverse
 Enchanting Matlock, from whose rocks like thine
 Romantic foliage hangs, and rills descend,
 And echoes murmur. Derwent, as he pours
 His oft obstructed stream down rough cascades
 And broken precipices, views with awe,
 With rapture, the fair scene his waters form.

Nor yet has nature to one spot confin'd
 Her frugal blessings. Many a different site
 And different air, to suit man's varying frame
 The same relief extends. Thus Cheltenham links
 Rural and calm amid the flowery vale, [lifts
 Pleas'd with its paitoral scenes; while Scarbro'
 Its towering summits to th' aspiring clouds,
 And sees th' unbounded ocean roll beneath.

Avonia frowns! and justly may'st thou frown
 O goddess, on the bard, th' injurious bard,
 Who leaves thy picture's scenes, and idly roves
 For foreign beauty to adorn his song.
 Thine is all beauty; every site is thine.
 Thine, the sweet vale, and verdure-crowned mead
 Slow rising from the plain, which Cheltenham boasts.

Thine Scarbro's cliffs; and thine the ruffet heaths
 Of sandy Tunbridge; o'er thy spacious downs
 Stray wide the nibbling flocks; the hunter train
 May range thy forests; and the muse-led youth,
 Who loves the devious walk, and simple scene,
 May in thy Kingwood view the scatter'd cots
 And the green wilds of Dulwich. Does the sun,
 Does the free air delight? lo! Clifton stands
 Courted by every breeze; and every sun
 There sheds a kinder ray: whether he rides
 In southern skies sublime, or mildly pours
 O'er Bristol's red'ning towers his orient beam,
 Or gilds at eve the shrub-clad rocks of Ley.
 Beneath thy mountains open to the south
 Pale sickness sits, and drinks th' enlivening day;
 Nor fears the innumerable pangs which pierce
 In keener anguish from the north, or load
 The dusky pinions of the peevish east.

Secure she sits, and from thy sacred urn
 Implor'd, and finds relief. The slacken'd nerves
 Resume their wonted tone, of every wind
 And every season patient. Jocund health
 Blooms on the cheek; and careless youth returns
 (As fortune wills) to pleasure or to toil.

Yet thank not, goddess, that the muse ascribes
 To thee unſailing strength, of force to wrest
 Th' uplifted bolts of fate; to Jove alone
 Belongs that high pre-eminence. Full oft,
 This feeling heart can witness, have I heard
 Along thy shore the piercing cries rebound
 Of widows and of orphans. Oft beheld
 The solemn funeral pomp, and decent rites,
 Which human vanity receives and pays
 When dust returns to dust. Where nature fails,
 There 'too thy power must fail; or only lend
 A momentary aid to soften pain,

he mentions it as a custom for persons to leave inscriptions, &c. as testimonies of their being cured there; something in the manner of the crutches at Bath.

And from the king of terrors steal his frown.
 Nor yet for waters only art thou fam'd,
 Avonia; deep within thy cavern'd rocks
 Do diamonds lurk, which mimic those of Ind.
 Some to the curious searcher's eye betray
 Their varying hues amid the mossy clefts
 Faint glimmering; others in the solid stone
 Lie quite obscur'd, and wait the patient hand
 Of art, or quick explosion's fiercer breath,
 To wake their latent glories into day.
 With these the British fair, ere traffic's power
 Had made the wealth of other worlds our own,
 Would deck their auburn tresses, or confine
 The snowy roundness of their polish'd arm.
 With these the little tyrants of the isle,
 Monarchs of counties, or of clay-built towns
 Sole potentates, would bind their haughty brows,
 And awe the gazing crowd. Say, goddess, say,
 Shall, studious of thy praise, the muse declare
 When first their lustre rose, and what kind power
 Unveil'd their hidden charms? The muse alone
 Can call back time, and from oblivion save
 The once-known tale, of which tradition's self
 Has lost the faintest memory. 'Twas ere
 The titles proud of knight or baron bold
 Were known in Albion; long ere Cæsar's arms
 Had tried its prowess, and been taught to yield.
 We'll ward a mile from yon aspiring shrubs [thorns
 Which front thy hallow'd fount, and snag with
 The adverse side of Avon, dwelt a swain.
 One only daughter blest'd his nuptial bed.
 Fair was the maid; but wherefore said I fair?
 For many a maid is fair, but Leya's form
 Was beauty's self, where each united charm
 Ennobled each, and added grace to all.
 Yet cold as mountain snows her tim'rous heart
 Rejects the voice of love. In vain the fire
 With prayers, with mingled tears, demanded oft
 The name of grandfire, and a prattling race
 To cheer his drooping age. In vain the youths
 To Leya's fav'rite name in every dale
 Attun'd their rustic pipes, to Leya's ear
 Music was discord when it talk'd of love.
 And shall such beauty, and such power to blefs,
 Sink usefess to the grave! forbid it, love!
 Forbid it, vanity! ye mighty two
 Who share the female breast! the last prevails.
 "Whatever youth shall bring the noblest prize
 "May claim her conquer'd heart." The day was fix'd,
 And forth from villages, and turf-built cots,
 In crowds the suitors came: from Ashton's vale,
 From Pil, from Porshut, and the town whose tower
 Now stands a sea-mark to the pilots ken.
 Nor were there wanting Clifton's love-sick sons
 To swell th' enamour'd train. But most in thought
 Yielded to Cadwal's heir, proud lord of Stoke;
 Whose wide dominions spread o'er velvet lawns
 And gently-swelling hills, and tufted groves,
 Full many a mile. For there, ev'n then, the scene
 We now behold to such perfection wrought,
 Charm'd with untutor'd wildness, and but ask'd
 A master's hand to tame it into grace.
 Against such rivals, prodigal of wealth,
 To venal beauty off'ring all their stores,

What arts shall Thenot use, who long has lov'd,
 And long, too long despair'd? Amid thy rocks
 Nightly he wanders, to the silent moon
 And starry host of heaven he tells his pain.
 But chief to thee, to thee his fond complaints
 At morn, at eve, and in the midnight hour
 Frequent he pours. No wealth paternal blest'd
 His humbler birth; no fields of waving gold
 Or flowering orchards, no wide wandering herds
 Or bleating firlings of the flock were his,
 To tempt the wary maid. Yet could his pipe
 Make echoes listen, and his flowing tongue
 Could chant soft ditties in so sweet a strain,
 They charm'd with native music all but her.

Oft had'st thou heard him, goddess; oft resolv'd
 To succour his distress. When now the day,
 The fatal day drew near, and love's last hope
 Hung on a few short moments. Ocean's god
 Was with thee, and observ'd thy anxious thought.
 "And what," he cry'd, "can make Avonia's face
 Wear aught but smiles? what jealous doubts perplex

My fair, my best beloved?" "No jealous doubts,
 Thou answer'd'st mild, and on his breast reclin'd
 Thy blushing cheek, perplex Avonia's breast:
 A cruel fair one flies the voice of love,
 And gifts alone can win her. Mighty power,
 O bid thy tritons ransack ocean's wealth,
 The coral's living branch, the lucid pearl,
 And every shell where mingling lights and shades
 Play happiest. O, if ever to thy breast
 My artful coyness gave a moment's pain,
 Learn from that pain to pity those that love."
 The god return'd: "Can his Avonia ask
 What Neptune would refuse? beauty like thine
 Might talk his utmost labours. But behold
 How needfess now his treasures? what thou seek'st

Is near thee; in the bosom of thy rocks
 Myriads of glittering gems, of power to charm
 More wary eyes than Leya's, lurk unseen. [rais'd
 From these select thy store." He spake, and
 The massy trident; at whose stroke the womb
 Of earth gave up its treasures. Ready nymphs
 Receiv'd the buristing gems, and tritons lent
 A happier polish to th' incrusted stone.

Scarce had they finish'd, when the plaintive strains [proach,"
 Of Thenot reach'd thy ears. "Approach, ap-
 The trident-bearer cried; and at his voice
 The rocks divided, and the awe-struck youth
 (Like Aristæus through the parting wave)
 Descended trembling. But what words can paint
 His joy, his rapture, when, surprise at length
 Yielding to love, he grasp'd the fated gems, [cried,
 And knew their wondrous import. "O! he
 Dismiss me, gracious powers; ere this, perhaps,
 Young Cadwal claps her charms, ere this the wealth [know
 Of Madoc has prevail'd!"—"Go, youth, and Success attends thy enterprise; and time
 Shall make thee wealthier than the proudest swain
 Whose rivalship thou fear'st; go, and be blest.
 Yet let not gratitude be lost in joy;
 But when thy wide possessions shall extend
 Farm beyond farm, remember whence thy rose,
 And grace thy village with Avonia's name."

How shall the blushing muse pursue the tale
Impartial, and record th' ungrateful crime
Of Thenot love-deluded? When success
Had crown'd his fierce desires, awhile he paid
Due honours at thy shrine, and strew'd with flowers

Jasmin and rose, and iris many-hued,
The rocky margin. 'Till at length, intent
On Leya's charms alone, of aught beside
Careless he grew; and scarcely now his hymns
Of praise were heard; if heard, they fondly mix'd

His Leya's praise with thine; or only seem'd
The dying echoes of his former strains.
Nor did he (how wilt thou excuse, O love,
Thy traitor!) when his wide possessions spread,
Farm beyond farm, remember whence thy rose,
Or grace his village with Avonia's name.
But on a festal day, amid the shouts
Of echoing shepherds, to the rising town
"Be Leya nam'd," he cried: and still unchang'd
(Indelible disgrace!) * the name remains.

'Twas then, Avonia, negligent of all
His former injuries, thy heav'nly breast
Felt real rage; and thrice thy arm was rais'd
For speedy vengeance; thrice the azure god
Restrain'd its force, or ere the uplifted rocks
Descending had o'erwhelm'd the fated town.
And thus he sooth'd thee, "Let not rage transport

My injur'd fair-one; love was all his crime,
Resistless love. Yet sure revenge awaits
Thy utmost wishes; never shall his town,
Which, had thy title grac'd it, had aspir'd
To the first naval honours, and look'd down
On Carthage and the ports which grace my own
Phœnicia, never shall it rise beyond
That humble village thou behold'st it now.

And soon transported to the British coast
From farthest India vessels shall arrive
Full fraught with gems, myself will speed the sails,

And all th' imaginary wealth he boasts
Shall sink neglected: rustics shall deride
His diamond's mimic blaze. Nor thou regret
Their perish'd splendour; on a firmer base
Thy glory rests; reject a spurious praise,
And to thy waters only truit for fame."

And what of fame, O goddess, canst thou ask
Beyond thy waters, ever-streaming source
Of health to thousands? Myriads yet unborn
Shall hail thy foist'ring wave: perchance to thee
Shall owe their first existence. For, if fame
Relate not fabling, the warm genial breath
Of nature, which calls forth the bursting forms
Through wide creation, and with various life
Fills every teeming element, amid
Thy stream delighted revels, with increase
Blessing the nuptial bed. Suppliant to thee
The pensive matron bends; without thy aid
Expiring families had ask'd in vain
The long-expected heir; and states perhaps,
Which now stand foremost in the lists of fame,
Had sunk unnerv'd, inglorious, the vile slaves

* Leya, or Leigh, a small village on the opposite side of the Avon.

Of sloth, and couch'd beneath a master's frown,
Had not thy breath awak'd some chosen soul,
Some finer æther, scarce ally'd to clay,
Hero to act, or poet to record.

O if to Albion, to my native land,
Of all that glorious, that immortal train
Which swells her annals, thy prolific stream
Has given one bard, one hero; may nor storms
Nor earthquakes shake thy mansion; may the sweep;

The silent sweep, of slow-devouring time
Steal o'er thy rocks unfelt, and only bear
To future worlds thy virtues, and thy praise.

Still, still, Avonia, o'er thy Albion shed
Benignest influence; nor to her alone
Confine thy partial boon. The lamp of day,
God of the lower world, was meant to all
A common parent. Still to ev'ry realm
Send forth thy blessings; for to every realm,
Such its peculiar excellence, thy wave
May pass untainted; seasons, climates, spare
Its virtues, and the power which conquers all,
Innate corruption, never mixes there.

And might I ask a boon, in whispers ask
One partial favour; Goddess, from the power
Of verse, and arts Pæonian, gracious thou
Entreat this one. Let other poets share
His noisy honours, rapid let them roll
As neighb'ring Severn, while the voice of fame
Re-echoes to their numbers: but let mine
My humbler weaker verse, from scantier rills
Diffusing wholesome draughts, unheard, unseen,
Glide gently on, and imitate thy spring.

ON FRIENDSHIP.

"L'Amitié, qui dans le monde est à peine un sentiment, est une passion dans les cloîtres."

Contes Moraux, de MARMONTEL.

Much have we heard the peevish world complain
Of friends neglected, and of friends forgot:
Another's frailties blindly we arraign,

And blame, as partial ills, the common lot:
For what is friendship?—'Tis the sacred tie
Of souls unbodied, and of love refin'd;
Beyond, benevolence, thy social sigh,
Beyond the duties graven on our kind.

And ah how seldom, in this vale of tears,
Th'is frail existence, by ourselves debas'd,
In hopes bewilder'd, or subdued by fears,
The joys unmix'd of mutual good we taste!
Proclaim, ye reverend fires, whom fate has spar'd
As life's example, and as virtue's test,
How few, how very few, your hearts have shar'd,
How much those hearts have pardon'd in the best.

Vain is their claim whom heedless pleasure joins
In bands of riot, or in leagues of vice;
They meet, they revel, as the day declines,
But, spectre-like, they shudder at its rise.
For 'tis not friendship, though the raptures run,
Led by the mad'ning god, through every vein;
Like the warm flower, which drinks the noon-
tide sun,

Their bosoms open but to close again.
Yet there are hours of mirth, which friendship
loves, [kind,
When prudence sleeps, and wisdom grows more
Sallies of sense, which reason scarce approves,
When all unguarded glows the naked mind.

But far from those be each profaner eye
 With glance malignant withering fancy's bloom;
 Far the vile ear, where whippers never die;
 Far the rank heart, which teems with ills to come.

Full oft, by fortune near each other plac'd,
 Ill-suited souls, nor studious much to please,
 Whole fruitless years in awkward union waste,
 Till chance divides, whom chance had join'd,
 with ease,

And yet, should either oddly soar on high,
 And shine distinguish'd in some sphere remov'd,
 The friend observes him with a jealous eye,
 And calls ungrateful whom he never lov'd.

But leave we such for those of happier clay
 On whose emerging stars the graces smile,
 And search for truth, where virtue's sacred ray
 Wakes the glad seed in friendship's genuine soil.

In youth's soft season, when the vacant mind
 To each kind impulse of affection yields,
 When nature charms, and love of human kind
 With its own brightness every object gilds,

Should two congenial bosoms haply meet,
 Or on the banks of Camus, hoary stream,
 Or where smooth Isis glides on silver feet,
 Nurse the muses each, and each their theme,

How blithe the mutual morning task they ply!
 How sweet the faunt'ring walk at close of day!

How fiscal, secluded from the world's broad eye,
 The midnight hours insensibly away!
 While glows the social bosom to impart
 Each young idea dawning science lends,
 Or big with sorrow beats th' unpractis'd heart.

For suffering virtue, and disastrous friends,
 Deep in the volumes of the mighty dead,
 They feast on joys to vulgar minds unknown;
 The hero's, sage's, patriot's path they tread,
 Adore each worth, and make it half their own.

Sublime and pure as Thebes or Sparta taught
 Eternal union from their souls they swear,
 Each added converse swells the generous thought,
 And each short absence makes it more sincere—

—“And can—(I hear some eager voice exclaim,
 Whose bliss now blossoms, and whose hopes beat
 high)

Can virtue's basis fail th' incumbent frame?
 And may such friendships ever ever die?”
 Ah, gentle youth, they may. Nor thou complain
 If chance the sad experience should be thine.

What can not change where all is light and vain?
 —Ask of the fates who twilt life's varying line.
 Ambition, vanity, suspense, surmise,
 On the wide world's tempestuous ocean roll;

New loves, new friendships, new desires arise,
 New joys elate, new griefs depress the soul.
 Some, in the bustling mart of business, lose
 The still small voice retirement loves to hear;

Some at the noisy bar enlarge their views,
 And some in senates court a people's ear.
 While others, led by glory's meteors, run
 To distant wars for laurels ain'd with blood,

Meanwhile the stream of time glides calmly on,
 And ends its silent course in Lethe's flood.
 Unhappy only he of friendship's train
 Who never knew what change or fortune meant,
 With whom th' ideas of his youth remain
 Too firmly fix'd, and rob him of content.

Condemn'd perhaps to some obscure retreat,
 Where pale reflection wears a sickly bloom,
 Still to the past he turns with pilgrim feet,
 And ghosts of pleasure haunt him to his tomb.

O—but I will not name you—ye kind few,
 With whom the morning of my life I pass'd,
 May every bliss, your generous bosoms knew
 In earlier days, attend you to the last.

I too, alas, am chang'd.—And yet there are
 Who still with partial love my friendship own,
 Forgive the frailties which they could not share,
 Or find my heart unchang'd to them alone.

To them this votive tablet of the muse
 Pleas'd I suspend.—Nor let th' unfeeling mind,
 From these loose hints its own vile ways excuse,
 Or start a thought to injure human-kind.

Who knows not friendship, knows not bliss sincere.
 Court it, ye young; ye aged, bind it fast;
 Earn it, ye proud; nor think the purchase dear,
 Whate'er the labour, if 'tis gain'd at last.

Compar'd with all th' admiring world calls great,
 Fame's loudest blast, ambition's noblest ends,
 Ev'n the last pang of social life is sweet:
 The pang which parts us from our weeping friends.

THE DOG:

A TALE.

A SQUIRE of parts, and some conceit,
 Though not a glaring first-rate wit,
 Had lately taken to his arms
 A damsel of uncommon charms.

A mutual bliss their bosoms knew,
 The hours on downy pinions flew,
 And scatter'd roses as they pass'd
 Emblem of joys too sweet to last!

For lo! th' unequal fates divide
 Th' enamour'd swain, and beauteous bride.
 The honey moon had scarcely wand,
 And love its empire still maintain'd,

When forth he must, for business calls.
 —Adieu, ye fields, ye groves, ye walls,
 That in your hallow'd bounds contain
 My source of joy—my source of pain!

It must be so; adieu, my dear.
 They kiss, he sighs, he drops a tear,
 For lovers of a certain cast
 Think every parting is the last,

And still whine out, whene'er they sever,
 In tragic strain, “Farewell for ever!”
 Awhile, in melancholy mood,
 He slowly pac'd the tiresome road;

For “every road must tiresome prove
 That bears us far from her we love.”
 But fun, and exercise, and air,
 At length dispel the glooms of care;

They vanish like a morning dream,
 And happiness is now the theme.
 How blest his lot, to gain at last,
 So many vain researches past,

A wife so suited to his taste,
 So fair, so gentle, and so chaste,
 A tender partner for his bed,
 A pillow for his aching head,
 The balm good for which he panted,
 In short the very thing he wanted.

And then, to make my blifs complete,
 And lay fresh laurels at my feet,
 How many matches did the flight;
 An Irish lord, a city knight,
 And fquires by dozens, yet agree
 To pafs her life with humble me.
 And did not ſhe the other day
 When Captain Wilkins pafs'd our way—
 The Captain!—well, ſhe lik'd not him,
 Though dreſt in all his Hyde-park trim.
 —She lik'd his ſword-knot though 'twas yellow;
 The Captain is a ſprightly fellow,
 I ſhould not often chooſe to ſee
 Such dangerous viſitors as he.
 I wonder how he came to call—
 Or why he pafs'd that way at all.
 His road lay farther to the right,
 And me he hardly knew by ſight.
 Stay,—let me think—I freeze, I burn—
 Where'er he went, he muſt return,
 And, in my abſence, may again
 Make bold to call.—Come hither, Ben?
 Did you obſerve, I'll lay my life
 You did, when firſt he met my wife,
 What ſpeech it was the Captain made?
 “What, Captain Wilkins, Sir?” The ſame.
 Come, you can tell. “I can't indeed,
 “For they were kiſſing when I came.”
 Kiſs, did they kiſs?—“Moſt ſurely, Sir;
 A bride, and he a bachelor.”
 Peace, rascal, 'tis beyond endurance,
 I wonder at ſome folks aſſurance.
 They think, like Ranger in the play,
 That all they meet is lawful prey.
 Theſe huſſ bluff Captains are of late
 Grown quite a nuisance in the ſtate.—
 Ben, turn your horſe—nay, never ſtare,
 And tell my wife I cannot bear
 Theſe frequent viſits. Hence, you dunce!
 “The Captain, Sir, was there but once.”
 Once is too often; tell her, Ben,
 That, if he dares to call again,
 She ſhould avoid him like a toad,
 A ſnake, a viper.—There's your road.
 —And hark'ee, tell her, under favour,
 We ſtretch too far polite behaviour.
 Tell her, I do not underſtand
 This kiſſing; tell her I command—
 “Heav'n bleſs us, Sir, ſuch whims as theſe”—
 Tell her I beg it on my knees,
 By all the love he ever ſhow'd,
 By all ſhe at the altar vow'd,
 How'er abſurd a husband's fears,
 How'er injurious it appears,
 She would not ſee him if he comes;
 Nay, if ſhe chance to hear his drums,
 Bid her ſtart back, and ſkulk for fear,
 As if the thunder rent her ear.
 O wond'rous power of love and beauty!
 Obedience is a ſervant's duty,
 And Ben obeys. But, as he goes,
 He reaſons much on human woes.
 How frail is man, how prone to ſtray
 And all the long et cætera
 Of ſayings, which, in former ages,
 Immortaliz'd the Grecian ſages,
 But now the very vulgar ſpeak,
 And only critics quote in Greek.

With theſe, like Sancho, was he ſtor'd,
 And Sancho-like drew forth his hoard.
 Proper or not, he all applied,
 And view'd the caſe on every ſide,
 Till, on the whole, he thought it beſt
 To turn the matter to a jeſt,
 And, with a kind of clumſey wit,
 At laſt on an expedient hit.
 Suppoſe we then the journey o'er,
 And Madam meets him at the door.
 So ſoon return'd? and where's your maſter?
 I hope you've met with no diſaſter.
 Is my dear well? “Extremely fo;
 And only ſent me here to know
 How fares his ſiſter, better part.
 Ah, Madam, could you ſee his heart!
 It was not even in his power
 To brook the abſence of an hour.”
 And, was this all? was this the whole
 He ſent you for? The kind, good, ſoul!
 Tell him, that he's my ſource of blifs;
 Tell him my health depends on his;
 Tell him, this breſt no joy can find,
 If cares diſturb his dearer mind;
 This faithful breſt, if he be well,
 No pang, but that of abſence, feel.
 Ben bluſh'd, and ſmil'd, and ſcratch'd his head,
 Then, fall'ring in his accents, ſaid,
 “One meſſage more, he bade me bear,
 But that's a ſecret for your ear—
 My maſter begs, on no account
 Your Ladyſhip would dare to mount
 The maſtiff dog.” What means the lad?
 Are you, or is your maſter dead?
 I ride a dog? a pretty ſtory.
 “Ah, deareſt Madam, do not glory
 In your own ſtrength; temptation's ſtrong,
 And frail our nature.” Held your tongue.
 Your maſter, Sir, ſhall know of this.
 “Dear madam, do not take amiſs
 Your ſervant's zeal; by all you vow'd,
 By all the love you ever ſhow'd,
 By all your hopes of blifs to come,
 Beware the maſtiff dog!” Be dumb,
 Inſulting wretch, the lady cries.
 The ſervant takes his cue, and flies.
 While conſternation marks her face,
 He mounts his ſteed, and quits the place.
 In vain the calls, as ſwift as wind
 He ſcours the lawn, yet caſt behind
 One parting look, which ſeem'd to ſay
 “Beware the dog;” then rode away.
 Why ſhould I paint the hurrying ſcene
 Of claſhing thoughts which paſs'd within,
 Where doubt on doubt inceſſant roll'd.
 Enough for me the ſecret's told,
 And Madam in a ſtrange quandary.
 What's to be done? John, Betty, Harry,
 Go, call him back. He's out of ſight,
 No ſpeed can overtake his flight.
 Patience per force alone remains,
 Precarious cure for real pains!
 “I ride a dog? a ſtrange conceit,
 And never ſure attempted yet.
 What can it mean? What'er it was,
 There is ſome mystery in the caſe.—
 And really, now I've thought a minute,
 There may be no great matter in it.

Ladies of old, to try a change,
 Have rode on animals as strange.
 Helle a ram, a bull Europa;
 Nay, English widows, for a faux pas,
 Were doom'd to expiate their shame,
 As authors say, upon a ram.
 And shan't my virtue take a pride in
 Outdoing such vile trulls in riding?
 And sure a ram's as weak a creature—
 Here, Betty, reach me the Spectator.—
 "Lord bless me, Ma'am, as one may say,
 Your Ladyship's quite mop'd to day.
 Reading will only, I'm afraid,
 Put more strange megrims in your head.
 'Twere better sure to take the air;
 I'll order, Ma'am, the coach and pair,
 And then too I may go beside.
 Or, if you rather choofe to ride."—
 Ride, Betty! that's my wish, my aim.
 Pray, Betty, is our Cæsar tame?
 "Tame, Madam? Yes, I never heard—
 You mean the mastiff in the yard?
 He makes a noise, and barks at folks—
 But surely, Ma'am, your La'ship jokes."
 Jokes, Betty? No. By earth and heaven
 This insult shall not be forgiven.
 Whate'er they mean, I'll ride the dog.
 Go, prithee, free him from his clog,
 And bring him hither; they shall find
 There's courage in a female mind.
 So said, so done. The dog appears
 With Betty chirping on the stairs.
 The floating sack is thrown aside,
 The vestments, proper for a ride,
 Such as we oft in Hyde-park view
 Of fustian white lapell'd with blue,
 By Betty's care were on the spot,
 Nor is the feather'd hat forgot.
 Pleas'd with herself, th' accoutred lass
 Took half a turn before her glass,
 And simp'ring said, I swear and vow
 I look like Captain Wilkins now.
 But serious cares our thoughts demand,
 Poor Cæsar, stroke him with your hand;
 How mild he seems, and wags his tail!
 'Tis now the moment to prevail.
 She spake, and frait with eye sedate
 Began th' important work of fate.
 A cushion on his back she plac'd,
 And bound with ribbands round his waist:
 The knot, which whilom grac'd her head,
 And down her winding lappets spread,
 From all its soft meanders freed,
 Became a bridle for her steed.
 And now she mounts. "Dear Dian, hear!
 Bright goddess of the lunar sphere!
 Thou that hast oft preserv'd from fate
 The nymph who leaps a five-barr'd gate,
 O take me, goddess, to thy care;
 O hear a tender lady's prayer!
 Thy vot'refs once, as pure a maid
 As ever rov'd the Delian shade,
 Though now, by man's seduction won,
 She wears, alas! a looser zone."
 In vain she pray'd. She mounts, she falls!
 And Cæsar barks, and Betty squawls.
 The marble hearth receives below
 The headlong damé, a direful blow!

And starting veins with blood disgrace
 The softer marble of her face.
 Here might I sing of fading charms
 Reclin'd on Betty's faithful neck,
 Like Venus in Dione's arms,
 And much from Homer might I speak;
 But we refer to Pope's translation,
 And hasten to our plain narration.
 While broths and plasters are prepar'd,
 And doctors feed, and madam fear'd,
 At length returns th' impatient 'squire
 Eager and panting with desire.
 But finds his home a desert place,
 No spouse to welcome his embrace,
 No tender sharer of his bliss
 To chide his absence with a kiss.
 Sullen in bed the lady lay,
 And muffled from the eye of day,
 Nor deign'd a look, averse and sad
 As Dido in th' Elyfian shade.

Amaz'd, alarm'd, the bed he press'd,
 And clasp'd her struggling to his breast.
 My life, my soul, I cannot brook
 This cruel, this averted look.
 And is it thus at last we meet?
 Then rais'd her gently from the sheet.
 What mean, he cries, these bleeding stains,
 This muffled head, and bursting veins?
 What sacrilegious hand could dare
 To fix its impious vengeance there?
 The dog, the dog! was all she said,
 And sobbing sunk again in bed.
 The dog, the dog! express'd her grief,
 Like poor Othello's handkerchief.

Meanwhile had Ben with prudent care
 From Betty learnt the whole affair,
 And drew th' impatient 'squire aside,
 To own the cheat he could not hide.
 See, rascal, see, enrag'd he cries,
 What tumours on her forehead rise!
 How swells with grief that face divine!
 "I own it all, the fault was mine,
 Replies the lad, dear angry lord;
 But hush! come hither, not a word!
 Small are the ills we now endure;
 Those tumours, Sir, admit a cure.
 But, had I done as you directed,
 Whose forehead then had been affected?
 Had Captain Wilkins been forbidden,
 Ah master, who had then been ridden?"

AN EPISTLE

FROM A GROVE IN DERBYSHIRE TO A GROVE IN SURRY.

SINCE every naturalist agrees
 That groves are nothing else but trees,
 And root-bound trees, like distant creatures,
 Can only correspond by letters,
 Borne on the winds which through us whistle,
 Accept, dear sister, this epistle.

And first, as to their town relations,
 The ladies send to know the fashions,
 Would I, in something better spelling,
 Inquire how things go on at Haling;
 For here, for all my master's storming,
 I'm sure we strangely want reforming.

Long have my lab'ring trees confu'd
Such griefs as almost burst their rind;
But you'll permit me to difclose 'em,
And lodge them in your leafy bosom.

When gods came down the woods among,
As sweetly chants poetic fong,
And fauns and fylvans sporting there
Attun'd the reed, or chas'd the fair,
My quiv'ring branches lightly fann'd
The movements of the mafter's hand;
Or half conceal'd, and half betray'd,
The blushing, flying, yielding maid;
Did ev'n the blifs of heav'n improve,
And folac'd gods with earthly love!

But now the world is grown fo chaffe,
Or elfe my mafter has no tafte,
That, I'll be fworn, the live-long year
We fearcely fee a woman here.
And what, alas! are woodland quires
To thofe who want your fierce defires?
Can philofophic bosoms know
Why myrtles fpring, or rofes blow,
Why cowflips lift the velvet head,
Or woodbines furni the fragrant fhade?
Even violet couches only fwell
To gratify his fight and fmell;
And Milton's univerfal Pan
Scarce makes him feel himfelf a man.

And then he talks your dull morality
Like fome old heathen man of quality,
(Plato, or what's his name who fled
So nobly at his army's head),
For Chriftian lords have better breeding
Than by their talk to fhew their reading;
And what their fentiment in fact is,
That you may gather from their practice.
Though really, if it were no worfe,
We might excufe his vain difcourfe;
Tofs high our heads above his voice,
Or flop the babbling echo's noife;
But he, I tell you, has fuch freaks,
He thinks and acts whate'er he fpeaks.

Or, if he needs muft preach and reason,
Why let him choofe a proper feafon;
Such mufty morals we might hear
When whiffling winds have ftrip't us bare,
As, after fixty, pious folks

Will on wet Sundays read good books.
And I muft own, dear fifter Haling,

'Tis mine, like many a lady's failing,
(Whom worried fpoufe to town conveys
From cafe, and exercife, and air,
To fleeplefs nights, and raking days,
And joys—too exquisite to bear)

To feel December's piercing harms,
And every winter lofe my charms.
* While you ftill flourifh fresh and fair
Like your young ladies all the year.

O happy groves, who never feel
The froke of winter, or of fteel;
Nor find, but in the † poet's lay,
The race of leaves like men decay.
Nor hear th' imperious woodman's call,
Nor fee your fylvan daughters fall,

* A great many of the trees at Haling are exotics and evergreens.

† Homer.

With head declin'd attend their moan,
And echo to the dying groan.

While I, attack'd by foes to reft,
New viftas opening through my breaft,
Am daily torn with wounds and flafhes,
And fee my oaks, my elms, my afhes,
With rhyming labels round them fet,
As every tree were to be let.
And, when one pants for confolation,
Am put in mind of contemplation.
A friend, inftroct me to endure
Thefe mighty ills, or hint a cure.
Say, might not marriage, well apply'd,
Improve his tafte, correct his pride,
Inform him books but make folks muddy,
Confine his morals to his ftudy,
Teach him, like other mortals, here
To toy and prattle with his dear;
Avert that fate my fear forefees,
And, for his children, fave his trees?
Right truftly wood, if you approve
The remedy exprefs'd above,
Write by the next fair wind that blows,
And kindly recommend a fpoufe.

THE ANSWER.

DEAR GROVE, I ask ten thousand pardons,
Sure I'm the moft absurd of gardens!
Such correſpondence to neglect—
Lord, how muft all grove-kind reflect!

Your human-loiterers, they fay,
Can put ye off from day to day
With poft gone out—the carelefs maid
Forgot—the letter was miflaid—
And twenty phraſes wrought with art
To hide the coldnefs of the heart.
But vegetables from their youth
Were always taught to ſpeak the truth,
In Dodon's vales, on Mona's mountains,
In Jotham's fables, or in Fontaine's,
They talk like any judge or biſhop,
Quite from the cedar down to hyſlop.
I therefore for my paſt offence
May own, with fylvan innocence,
I've nought but negligence to plead;
Which you'll excuſe, and I'll proceed.

You groves who ſtand remote from towns
(Though we are apt to call ye clowns)
Have really ſomething in your natures,
Which makes ye moſt diverting creatures.
And then, I vow, I like to ſee
That primitive ſimplicity;
To think of marriage as a means
T' improve his taſte, and ſave your greens—
It looks ſo like that good old grove
Where Adam once to Eve made love,
That any ſoul alive would ſwear
Your trees were educated there.

Why, child, the only hope thou haſt
Lies in thy maſter's want of taſte;
For ſhou'd his ling'ring ſtay in London
Improve his taſte, you muſt be undone;
Your trees would preſently lie flat,
And the high mode of one green plat
Run through his worſhip's whole eſtate.

Befides, you ruſtics kill your fancies
With Ovid, and his ſtrange romances.

Why now you think, in days like ours,
That love must still inhabit bowers,
And goddesses, as just rewards
For hymns of praise, grow fond of bards,
And fly to over-arching woods
And flowery banks, and crystal floods,
Because such things, forsooth, were wanted
When your great grandmothers were planted.
The case, my dear, is alter'd quite,
Not that we're chaste, but more polite;
Your shepherdesses fought such places,
Like simple girls, to hide their faces;
But our bright maids disdain the thought,
They know hypocrisy's a fault,
And never bear, by their consent,
The shame of seeming innocent.

But I forget, you've just got down.
A mistress, as you wish'd, from town.
I don't know what you'll say at Romely,
We really think the woman comely;
Has some good qualities beside,
They say, but she's as yet a bride;
One can't trust every report—
Not we I mean who live near court;
A lie perhaps in Derbyshire
May be as strange as truth is here.
Our ladies, and all their relations,
Are vastly full of commendations;
As for Miss ——'s part, she swears,
—I ask her pardon—she avers
That never in her life-time yet
She saw a woman more complete;
And wishes trees could tramp the plain,
Like Birnham wood to Dunfinane,
So might or you or I remove,
And Romely join to Haling grove.

O could her wish but alter fate,
And kindly place us à la mode,
How sweetly might from every walk
My echoes to your echoes talk!
But, since, as justly you observe,
By nature's laws, which never swerve
We're bound from gadding, tree by tree,
Both us and our posterity,
Let each, content with her own county,
E'en make the best of nature's bounty.
Calmly enjoy the present bliss,
Nor in what might be, lose what is.

Believe me, dear, beyond expressing
We're happy, if we knew the blessing.
Our masters, all the world allow,
Are honest men, as times go now;
They neither wench, nor drink, nor game,
Nor burn with zeal or party flame,
From whence, excepting adverse fates,
We may conclude that their estates
Will probably increase, and we Shall stand another century.

Then never mind a tree or two
Cut down, perhaps to open a view,
Nor be of nail'd up verse ashamed,
You'll live to see the poet damn'd.
I envy not, I swear and vow,
The temples, or the shades of Stow;
Nor Jarva's groves, whose arms display
Their blossoms to the rising day;
Nor Chili's woods, whose fruitage gleams
Ruddy beneath his setting beams;

Nor Teneriffa's forests shaggy;
Nor China's varying Sharawaggi;
Nor all that has been sung or said
Of Pindus, or of Windsor shade.

Contentment is the chemic power
Which makes trees bloom in half an hour,
And faster plants substantial joy,
Than ax or hatchet can destroy.
O, gain but that, and you'll perceive
Your fears all fade, your hopes revive.
In winter calm contentment's voice
Shall make, like mine, your trees rejoice;
Across dead boughs a verdure fling,
And bless you with eternal spring.

THE ENTHUSIAST.

ONCE, I remember well the day,
'Twas ere the blooming sweets of May
Had lost their freshest hues,
When every flower on every hill,
In every vale, had drank its fill
Of sun-shine, and of dews.

'Twas that sweet season's loveliest prime
When spring gives up the reins of time
To summers glowing hand,
And doubting mortals hardly know
By whose command the breezes blow
Which fan the smiling laud.

'Twas then beside a green-wood shade
Which cloath'd a lawn's aspiring head
I wove my devious way,
With loitering steps, regardless where,
So soft, so genial was the air,
So wondrous bright the day.

And now my eyes with transport rove
O'er all the blue expanse above,
Unbroken by a cloud!
And now beneath delighted pass,
Where winding through the deep-green grass
A full-brim'd river flow'd.

I stop, I gaze; in accents rude
To thee, sereneest solitude,
Bursts forth th' unbidden lay;
Begone, vile world! the learn'd, the wise,
The great, the busy, I despise;
And pity ev'n the gay.

These, these, are joys alone, I cry;
'Tis here, divine philosophy,
Thou deign'st to fix thy throne!
Here contemplation points the road
Through nature's charms to nature's God!
These, these, are joys alone!

Adieu, ye vain low-thoughted cares,
Ye human hopes, and human fears,
Ye pleasures, and ye pains!—
While thus I spake, o'er all my soul
A philosophic calmness stole,
A stoic stillness reigns.

The tyrant passions all subside,
Fear, anger, pity, shame, and pride,
No more my bosom move;
Yet still I felt, or seem'd to feel
A kind of visionary zeal
Of universal love.

When lo! a voice! a voice I hear!
 'Twas reason whisper'd in my ear
 These monitory strains:
 What mean'st thou, man? would'st thou unbind
 The ties which constitute thy kind,
 The pleasures and the pains?

The same Almighty Power unseen,
 Who spreads the gay or solemn scene
 To contemplation's eye,
 Fix'd every movement of the soul,
 Taught every wish its destin'd goal,
 And quicken'd every joy.

He bids the tyrant passions rage,
 He bids them war eternal wage,
 And combat each his foe:
 Till from dissensions concords rise,
 And beauties from deformities,
 And happiness from woe.

Art thou not man? and darst thou find
 A bliss which leans not to mankind?
 Presumptuous thought, and vain!
 Each bliss unshar'd is unenjoy'd,
 Each power is weak, unless employ'd
 Some social good to gain.

Shall light, and shade, and warmth, and air,
 With those exalted joys compare
 Which active virtue feels,
 When on the drags, as lawful prize,
 Contempt, and indolence, and vice,
 At her triumphant wheels.

As rest to labour still succeeds,
 To man, while virtue's glorious deeds
 Employ his toilsome day,
 This fair variety of things
 Are merely life's refreshing springs
 To sooth him on his way.

Enthusiast, go, unstring thy lyre;
 In vain thou sing'st, if none admire,
 How sweet soe'er the strain.
 And is not thy o'erflowing mind,
 Unless thou mixest with thy kind,
 Benevolent in vain?

Enthusiast, go; try every sense:
 If not thy bliss, thy excellence
 Thou yet has learn'd to scan.
 At least thy wants, thy weakness know;
 And see them all uniting show
 That man was made for man.

THE YOUTH AND THE PHILOSOPHER.

A FABLE.

A GRECIAN youth, of talents rare,
 Whom Plato's philisophic care
 Had form'd for virtue's nobler view,
 By precept and example, too,
 Would often boast his matchless skill,
 To curb the steed, and guide the wheel,
 And as he pass'd the gazing throng,
 With graceful ease, and smack'd the thong,
 The idiot wonder they express'd
 Was praise and transport to his breast.

At length, quite vain, he needs would show
 His master what his art could do;
 And bade his slaves the chariot lead
 To Academus' sacred shade.
 The trembling grove confess'd its fright,
 The wood-nymphs startled at the sight,
 The muses drop the learned lyre,
 And to their inmost shades retire!

Howe'er, the youth with forward air
 Bows to the sage, and mounts the car.
 The lash resounds, the courser's spring,
 The chariot marks the rolling ring,
 And gath'ring crowds, with eager eyes,
 And shouts, pursue him as he flies.

Triumphant to the goal return'd,
 With nobler thirst his bosom burn'd;
 And now along th' indented plain,
 The self-same track he marks again;
 Pursues with care the nice design,
 Nor ever deviates from the line.

Amazement seiz'd the circling crowd;
 The youths with emulation glow'd,
 Ev'n bearded sages hail'd the boy,
 And all, but Plato, gaz'd with joy.
 For he, deep judging sage, beheld
 With pain the triumphs of the field;
 And when the charioteer drew nigh,
 And, flush'd with hope, had caught his eye:
 Alas! unhappy youth, he cry'd,
 Expect no praise from me, (and sigh'd);
 With indignation I survey
 Such skill and judgment thrown away.
 The time profusely squander'd there
 On vulgar arts beneath thy care,
 If well employ'd, at less expence,
 Had taught thee this honour, virtue, sense,
 And rais'd thee from a coachman's fate,
 To govern men, and guide the state.

TO A GENTLEMAN,

ON HIS PITCHING A TENT IN HIS GARDEN.

AH! friend, forbear, nor fright the fields
 With hostile scenes of imag'd war;
 Content still roves the blooming wilds,
 And fearless ease attends her there: [seat,
 Ah! drive not the sweet wand'rer from her
 Nor with rude arts profane her latest best retreat.

Are there not bowers, and sylvan scenes,
 By nature's kind luxuriance wove?
 Has Romely lost the living greens
 Which erst adorn'd her artless grove?
 Where through each hallow'd haunt the poet
 stray'd, {shade.
 And met the willing muse, and peopled every

But now no bards thy woods among
 Shall wait th' inspiring muse's call;
 For though to mirth and festal song
 Thy choice devotes the woven wall,
 Yet what avails that all be peace within,
 If horrors guard the gate, and scare us from the scene.

'Tis true, of old the patriarch spread
 His happier tents which knew not war,
 And chang'd at will the trampled mead
 For fresher greens and purer air:

But long has man forgot such simple ways;
Truth unsuspecting harm!—the dream of ancient days.

Ev'n he, cut off from human kind,
(Thy neighb'ring wretch) the child of care,
Who, to his native mines confin'd,
Nor sees the sun, nor breathes the air,
But 'midst the damps and darkness of earth's womb, [tomb;
Drags out laborious life, and scarcely dreads the

Ev'n he, should some indulgent chance
Transport him to thy sylvan reign,
Would eye the floating veil asfance,
And hide him in his caves again,
While dire presage in every breeze that blows,
Hears shrieks, and clashing arms, and all Germania's woes.

And, doubt not, thy polluted taste
A sudden vengeance shall pursue;
Each fairy form we wilom trac'd
Along the morn or evening dew,
Nymph, satyr, faun, shall vindicate their grove,
Robb'd of its genuine charms, and hospitable
Jove.

I see, all arm'd with dews unblest,
Keen frosts, and noisome vapours drear,
Already, from the bleak north-east,
The genius of the wood appear!
—Far other office once his prime delight,
To nurse thy saplings tall, and heal the harms of night;

With ringlets quaint to curl thy shade,
To bid the insect tribes retire,
To guard thy walks, and not invade—
O wheresome then provoke his ire?
Alas! with prayers, with tears, his rage repel,
While yet the red'ning shoots with embryo-blof-
soms swell.

Too late thou'lt weep, when blights deform
The fairest produce of the year;
Too late thou'lt weep, when every storm
Shall loudly thunder in thy ear,
“ Thus, thus the green-hair'd deities maintain
“ Their own eternal rights, and nature's injur'd reign.”

THE LARK.

A SIMILE.

To the Reverend Mr. —

SEZ how the lark, the bird of day,
Springs from the earth, and wings her way!
To heav'n's high vault her course she bends,
And sweetly sings as she ascends.
But when, contented with her height,
She shuts her wings, and checks her flight,
No more she chants the melting strain,
But sinks in silence to the plain.

This you observ'd, and ask'd from me,
My gentle friend, a simile.
So take in homely verse, but true,
Instead of one, the following two.

That larks are poet's birds, is known,
So make the case the poet's own.

And see him first from fields arise,
And pastoral scenes, to Cælia's eyes.
From thence the bold adventurer springs
To vaulted roofs, and courts, and kings.
'Till having crown'd his soaring lays
With something more than empty praise;
And, like his readers, learnt aright
To mingle profit with delight;
He reads the news, he takes the air,
Or slumbers in his elbow chair.

Or lay aside for once grimace,
And make it yours, the parson's case;
Who, leaving curate's humble roof,
Looks down on crape, and sits aloof.
Though no vain wish his breast enthal
To swell in pomp pontifical,
But pure contentment seated there,
Nor finds a want, nor feels a care,
Yet are there not to stain the cloth,
(O may'st thou live secure from both!)
A city pride, or country sloth?
And may not man, if touch'd with these,
Refign his duty for his ease?

But I forbear; for well I ween
Such likenings suit with other men.
For never can my humble verse
The cautious ear of patron pierce;
Nor ever can thy breast admit
Degrading sloth, or self-conceit.

Then let the birds or sing or fly,
As Hector says, and what care I?
They hurt not me, nor eke my friend;
Since, whatsoe'er the fates intend,
Nor he can sink, nor I ascend.

TO THE HONOURABLE CHARLES TOWNSEND.

O CHARLES, in absence hear a friend complain,
Who knows thou lov'st him wheresome'er he goes,
Yet feels uneasy starts of idle pain,
And often would be told the thing he knows.
Why then, thou loiterer, fleets the silent year,
How dar'st thou give a friend unnecessary fear?

We are not now beside that oster'd stream,
Where erst we wander'd, thoughtless of the
way;
We do not now of distant ages dream,
And cheat in converse half the ling'ring day,
No fancied heroes rise at our command,
And no Timolcon weeps, and bleeds no Theban band.

Yet why complain? thou feel'st no want like these,
From me, 'tis true, but me alone debar'd,
Thou still in Granta's shades enjoy'st at ease
The books we reverenc'd, and the friends
we shar'd;
Nor see'st without such aids the day decline,
Nor think how much their loss has added weight to thine.

Truth's genuine voice, the freely-opening mind,
Are thine, are friendship's and retirement's
lot;

To conversation is the world confin'd,
Friends of an hour, who please and are forgot;

And interest stains, and vanity controuls,
The pure unsullied thoughts, and fallies of our souls.

O I remember, and with pride repeat, [knew!
The rapid progress which our friendship
Even at the first with willing minds we met;
And ere the root was fix'd, the branches grew.
In vain had fortune plac'd her weak barrier:
Clear was thy breast from pride, and mine from servile fear.

I saw thee gen'rous, and with joy can say
My education rose above my birth, [clay
Thanks to those parent shades, on whose cold
Fall fast my tears, and lightly lie the earth!
To them I owe what'er I dare pretend Thou saw'st with partial eyes, and bade me call thee friend.

Let others meanly heap the treasure'd store,
And awkward fondness cares on cares employ,
To leave a race more exquisitely poor,
Possess'd of riches which they ne'er enjoy;
He's only kind who takes the nobler way
T' unbind the springs of thought, and give them power to play.

His heirs shall blest him, and look down with scorn
On all that titles, birth, or wealth afford;
Lords of themselves, thank Heaven that they were born
Above the sordid miser's glitt'ring hoard,
Above the servile grandeur of a throne,
For they are nature's heirs, and all her works their own.

TO THE SAME.

ON THE DEATH OF A RELATION.

O CHARLES, 'tis now the tender, trying time,
The hour of friendship, the sad moment,
when
You must a while indulge a virtuous crime,
And hide your own to ease another's pain,
The mournful tribute nature claims forego,
To calm a softer breast, and win it from its woe.

Yet think not consolation, vainly dress
In Tully's language, and the learned pride
Of wordy eloquence, can sooth the breast
Of real grief, or bid the tear subside, [eye;
The heartfelt tear, which streams from virtue's
For virtue's noblest proof is soft humanity.

Let dull unfeeling pedants talk by rote
Of Cato's soul, which could itself subdue;
Or idle scraps of Stoic fustian quote,
And bravely bear the pangs they never knew:
Refin'd from men, to deserts let them fly, [die.
And, 'mid their kindred rocks, unpitied live, and

But He, whose mercy melts in vernal skies,
Whose attribute is universal love,
Kneit man to man by nature's tend'rest ties,
And bade us social joys and sorrows prove;
Bade us bedew with tears the kindred urn,
And for a brother lost like sad Maria mourn.

He bids thee too, in whispers felt within,
For sure he finely tun'd thy social soul,
Haste to the lovely mourner, and restrain
Grief's swelling tides which in her bosom
roll,
Not by obstructing the tumultuous course,
But stealing by degrees, and yielding to its force;
As the kind parent treats the wounded child
With open smiles, and only weeps by stealth;
Its wayward pain with condescension mild
She charms to rest, and cheats it into health:
So must we lightly urge th' afflicted fair,
Probe the self tortur'd breast, and teach it how to bear.

Improve each moment when th' elastic mind,
Tir'd with its complaints, resumes the bent of mirth;
Lead it to joys, not boistrous, but refin'd,
Far from those scenes which gave its sorrows
birth, [vale,
Through the smooth paths of fancy's flowery
And the long devious tracks of some well-woven tale.

Though oft I've known a sorrow like to theirs,
In well-devised story painted strong,
Cheat the fond mourners of their real cares,
And draw perforce the list'ning ear along;
Till powerful fiction taught the tears to flow,
And more than half their grief bewail'd another's
woe.

But she, alas, unfortunately wise,
Will see through every scheme thy art can
frame,
Reject with honest scorn each mean disguise,
And her full share of genuine anguish claim;
Wild as the winds which ocean's face deform,
Or silent as the deep ere rolls th' impetuous storm.

Why had she talents given beyond her sex,
Or why those talents did her care improve?
Free from the follies which weak minds perplex,
But most expos'd to all which most can move.
Great souls alone are curs'd with grief's excess,
That quicker finer sense of exquisite distress.

Yet shall that power beyond her sex, at last,
Not giv'n in vain, o'er grief itself prevail,
Stop those heart-burbling groans which heave
so fast,
And reason triumph where thy counsels fail;
Save when some well-known object ever dear
Recalls th' untutor'd sigh, or sudden-starting tear.

Such tender tribute to departed friends
Through life alas must sad remembrance pay;
And such, O Charles, when kinder fate extends
Thy stronger thread beyond my fatal day,
Such shall I hope from thee, till thou resign
The last sure pledge of love to some poor friend of thine.

TO MR. GARRICK.

ON old Parnassus, t'other day,
The muses met to sing and play;
Apart from the rest were seen
The tragic and the comic queen,

Engag'd, perhaps, in deep debate
 On Rich's, or on Fleetwood's fate.
 When, on a sudden, news was brought
 That Garrick had the patent got,
 And both their ladyships again
 Might now return to Drury-Lane.
 They bow'd, they simper'd, and agreed,
 They wish'd the project might succeed,
 'Twas very possible; the case
 Was likely too, and had a face—
 A face! Thalia titt'ring cry'd,
 And could her joy no longer hide;
 Why, sister, all the world must see
 How much this makes for you and me:
 No longer now shall we expose
 Our unbought goods to empty rows,
 Or meanly be oblig'd to court
 From foreign aid a weak support;
 No more the poor polluted scene
 Shall teem with births of Harlequin?
 Or vindicated stage shall feel
 The insults of the dancer's heel.
 Such idle trash we'll kindly spare
 To operas now—they'll want them there;
 For Sadler's-Wells, they say, this year
 Has quite outdone their engineer.

Pugh, you're a wag, the bukin'd prude
 Reply'd, and smil'd; beside 'tis rude
 To laugh at foreigners, you know,
 And triumph o'er a vanquish'd foe:
 For my part, I shall be content
 If things succeed as they are meant;
 And should not be displeas'd to find
 Some changes of the tragic kind.
 And say, Thalia, mayn't we hope
 The stage will take a larger scope?
 Shall he, whose all-expressive powers
 Can reach the heights which Shakspeare soars,
 Descend to touch an humbler key,
 And tickle ears with poetry;
 Where every tear is taught to flow
 Through many a line's melodious woe,
 And heart-felt pangs of deep distress
 Are fritter'd into similes?

—O thou, whom nature taught the art
 To pierce, to cleave, to tear the heart,
 Whatever name delight thy ear,
 Othello, Richard, Hamlet, Lear,
 O undertake my just defence,
 And banish all but nature hence!
 See, to thy aid with streaming eyes
 The fair afflicted * Constance flies;
 Now wild as winds in madnes's tears
 Her heaving breasts, and scatter'd hairs;
 Or low on earth disdains relief,
 With all the conscious pride of grief.
 My Pritchard too in Hamlet's queen—
 The goddess of the sportive vein
 Here stop'd her short, and with a sneer,
 My Pritchard, if you please, my dear!
 Her tragic merit I confess,
 But surely mine's her proper dress;
 Behold her there with native ease
 And native spirit, born to please;

* Mrs. Cibber in the character of Lady Constance in Shakspeare's King John.

With all Maria's charms engage,
 Or Milwood's arts, or Touchwood's rage;
 Through every foible trace the fair,
 Or leave the town, and toilet's care,
 To chant in forests unconfin'd
 The wilder notes of Rosalind.

O thou, where-e'er thou fix thy praise,
 Brute, Druggier, Fribble, Ranger, Bays!
 O join with her in my behalf,
 And teach an audience when to laugh.
 So shall buffoons with shame repair
 To draw in fools at Smithfield fair,
 And real humour charm the age,
 Though * Falstaff should forsake the stage.

She spoke. Melpomene reply'd,
 And much was said on either side;
 And many a chief, and many a fair,
 Were mention'd to their credit there.

But I'll not venture to display
 What goddesses think fit to say.
 However, Garrick, this at least
 Appears by both a truth confess'd,
 That their whole fate for many a year
 But hangs on your paternal care.
 A nation's taste depends on you:
 —Perhaps a nation's virtue too.

O think how glorious 'twere to raise
 A theatre to virtue's praise.

Where no indignant blush might rise,
 Nor wit be taught to plead for vice;
 But every young attentive ear
 Imbibe the precepts, living there.
 And every unexperienc'd breast
 There feel its own rude hints express'd,
 And, waken'd by the glowing scene,
 Unfold the worth that lurks within.

If possible, be perfect quite;
 A few short rules will guide you right.
 Consult your own good sense in all,
 Be deaf to fashion's fickle call,
 Nor e'er descend from reason's laws
 To court, what you command, applause.

NATURE TO DR. HOADLY,

ON HIS COMEDY OF THE SUSPICIOUS HUSBAND.

SLY hypocrite! was this your aim?
 To borrow Pæon's sacred name,
 And lurk beneath his graver mien,
 To trace the secrets of my reign?
 Did I for this applaud your zeal,
 And point out each minuter wheel,
 Which finely taught the next to roll,
 And made my works one perfect whole?
 For who, but I, till you appear'd,
 To model the dramatic herd,
 E'er bade to won'dring ears and eyes,
 Such pleasing intricacies rise?
 Where every part is nicely true,
 Yet touches still the master clue;
 Each riddle opening by degrees,
 Till all unravels with such ease,
 That only those who will be blind
 Can feel one doubt perplex their mind.

* Mr. Quin, inimitable in that character, was then leaving the stage.

Nor was't enough, you thought, to write ;
 But you must impiously unite
 With Garrick too, who long before
 Had stol'n my whole expressive pow'r.
 That changeful Proteus of the stage,
 Usurps my mirth, my grief, my rage ;
 And as his different parts incline,
 Gives joys or pains, sincere as mine.

Yet you shall find (howe'er elate
 You triumph in your former cheat)
 'Tis not so easy to escape
 In Nature's, as in Pæon's shape.
 For every critic, great or small,
 Hates every thing that's natural.
 The beaux, and ladies too, can't say,
 What does he mean ? is this a play ?
 We see such people every day.
 Nay more, to chafe, and teize your spleen,
 And teach you how to steal again,
 My very fools shall prove you're bit,
 And damn you for your want of wit.

TO RICHARD OWEN CAMBRIDGE, ESQ.

DEAR Cambridge, teach your friend the art
 You use to gain the muse's heart,
 And make her to entirely yours,
 That at all seasons, and all hours,
 The anxious goddess ready stands
 To wait the motion of your hands.

It was of old a truth confest
 That poets must have needful rest,
 And every imp of Phœbus' quire
 To philosophic shades retire,
 Amid those flowery scenes of ease
 To pick up sense and similes.
 Had Virgil been from coast to coast,
 Like his Æneas, tempest-toft,
 Or pass'd life's fluctuating dream
 On Tyber's or on Mincio's stream,
 He might have been expert in sailing ;
 But Mævius ne'er had fear'd his railing,
 Nor great Augustus sav'd from fire
 The relics of a trav'ling quire.

Had Horace too, from day to day,
 Run post upon the Appian way,
 In restless journeys to and from
 Brundisium, Capua, and Rome ;
 The bard had scarcely found a time
 To put that very road in rhyme ;
 And sav'd great cities much expence
 In lab'ring to mistake his sense.

Nay he, whose Greek is out of date
 Since Pope descended to translate,
 Though wand'ring still from place to place,
 At least lay, by in stormy weather

(Whate'er Perrault or Wotton says)
 To tack his rhapsodies together.

But you, reversing every rule
 Of ancient or of modern school,
 Nor hurt by noise, nor cramp'd by rhymes,
 Can all things do, and at all times.
 Your own Scriblerus never knew
 A more unsettled life than you,
 Yet Pope in Twit'nam's peaceful grot
 Scarce ever more correctly thought.

In whirligigs it is confest
 The middle line's a line of rest ;
 And, let the sides fly how they will,
 The central point must needs stand still.
 Perhaps your mind, like one of these,
 Beholds the tumult round at ease,
 And stands, as firm as rock in ocean,
 The centre of perpetual motion.

That Cæsar did three things at once,
 Is known at school to every dunce ;
 But your more comprehensive mind
 Leaves piddling Cæsar far behind.
 You spread the lawn, direct the flood,
 Cut vistas through, or plant a wood,
 Build China's barks for Severn's stream,
 Or form new plans for Epic fame,
 And then, in spite of wind or weather,
 You read, row, ride, and write together.

But 'tis not your undoubted claim
 To naval or equestrian fame,
 Your nicer taste, or quicker parts,
 In rural or mechanic arts,
 (Though each alone in humbler station
 Might raise both wealth and reputation)
 It is not these that I would have,
 Bear them, o' God's name, to your grave.
 But 'tis that unexhausted vein,
 That quick conception without pain,
 That something, for no words can show it,
 Which without leisure makes a poet.

Sure Nature cast, indulgent dame,
 Some strange peculiar in your frame,
 From whose well-lodg'd prolific seeds
 This inexpressive power proceeds.

Or does Thalia court your arms
 Because you seem to slight her charms,
 And, like her sister females, fly
 From our dull assiduity.
 If that's the case, I'll soon be free,
 I'll put on airs as well as she ;
 And even in * this poetic shade,
 Where erst with Pope and Gay the play'd,
 Ev'n here I'll tell her to her face
 I've learn'd to scorn a forc'd embrace.
 In short, here ends her former reign ;
 And if we e'er begin again
 It must be on another score—
 I'll write like you, or write no more.

TO MR. MASON.

I.
 BELIEVE me, Mason, 'tis in vain
 Thy fortitude the torrent braves ;
 Thou too must bear th' inglorious chain ;
 The world, the world will have its slaves.
 The chosen friend for converse sweet,
 The small, yet elegant retreat,
 Are peaceful unambitious views
 Which early fancy loves to form.
 When aided by th' ingenuous muse,
 She turns the philosophic page,
 And sees the wife of every age,
 With nature's dictates warm.

* Middleton park, Oxfordshire.

II.

But ah! to few has fortune given
 The choice, to take or to refuse;
 To fewer still indulgent Heaven
 Allots the very will to choofe,
 And why are varying schemes prefer'd?
 Man mixes with the common herd:
 By custom guided to pursue,
 Or wealth, or honours, fame, or ease,
 What others wish he wishes too;
 Nor from his own peculiar choice,
 Till strengthen'd by the public voice,
 His very pleasures please.

III.

How oft, beneath some hoary shade
 Where Cam glides indolently slow,
 Hast thou, as indolently laid,
 Prefer'd to Heaven thy fav'rite vow:
 "Here, here forever let me stay,
 "Here calmly loiter life away,
 "Nor all those vain connections know
 "Which fetter down the freeborn-mind,
 "The slave of interest, or of show;
 "While you gay tenant of the grove,
 "The happier heir of Nature's love,
 "Can warble unconfin'd."

IV.

Yet sure, my friend, th' eternal plan
 By truth unerring was design'd;
 Inferior parts were made for man,
 But man himself for all mankind.
 Then by th' apparent judge th' unseen;
 Behold how rolls this vast machine
 To one great end, how'er withstood,
 Directing its impartial course.
 All labour for the general good:
 Some stem the wave, some till the soil,
 By choice the bold, th' ambitious toil,
 The indolent by force.

V.

That bird, thy fancy frees from care,
 With many a fear unknown to thee,
 Must rove to glean his scanty fare
 From field to field, from tree to tree,
 His lot, united with his kind,
 Has all his little joys confin'd;
 The lover's and the parent's ties
 Alarm by turns his anxious breast,
 Yet, bound by fate, by instinct wife,
 He hails with songs the rising morn,
 And, pleas'd at evening's cool return,
 He sings himself to rest.

VI.

And tell me, has not nature made
 Some flated void for thee to fill,
 Some spring, some wheel, which asks thy aid
 To move, regardless of thy will?
 Go then, go feel with glad surprize
 New blifs from new attentions rise;
 Till, happier in thy wider sphere,
 Thou quit thy darling schemes of ease;
 Nay, glowing in the full career,
 Ev'n with thy virtuous labours more;
 Nor 'till the toilsome day is o'er
 Expect the night of peace.

TO THE REV. DR. LOWTH*.

ON HIS LIFE OF WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM.

O LOWTH, while Wykeham's various worth you
 trace,
 And bid to distant times his annals shine,
 Indulge another bard of Wykeham's race
 In the fond wish to add his name to thine.

From the same font, with reverence let me boast;
 The classic streams with early thirst I caught;
 What time, they say, the muses revel'd most,
 When Bigg presided, and when Burton taught.

But the same fate, which led me to the spring,
 Forbade me farther to pursue the stream:
 Perhaps as kindly; for, as fages sing,
 Of chance and fate full idly do we deem.

And sure in Granta's philosophic shade
 Truth's genuine image beam'd upon my sight;
 And slow-ey'd reason lent his sober aid
 To form, deduce, compare, and judge aright.

Yes, ye sweet fields, beside your o'er'd stream
 Full many an Attic hour my youth enjoy'd;
 Full many a friendship form'd, life's happiest dream,
 And treasure'd many a bliss which never cloy'd.

Yet may the pilgrim, o'er his temperate fare
 At eve, with pleasing recollection say
 'Twas the fresh morn which strung his nerves to bear

The piercing beam, and useful toils of day.
 So let me still with filial love pursue
 The nurse and parent of my infant thought,
 From whence the colour of my life I drew,
 When Bigg presided, and when Burton taught

O names by me rever'd?—till memory die,
 'Till my deaf ear forget th' enchanting flow
 Of verse harmonious, shall my mental eye
 Trace back old time, and teach my breast to glow.

Peace to that honour'd shade, whose mortal frame
 Sleeps in the bosom of its parent earth,
 While his freed soul, which boasts celestial flame,
 Perhaps now triumphs in a nobler birth.

Perhaps with Wykeham, from some blissful bower,
 Applauds thy labours, or prepares the wreath
 For Burton's generous toil.—Th' insatiate power
 Extends his deathful sway o'er all that breathe;

Nor aught avails it that the virtuous sage,
 Forms future bards, or Wykehams yet to come;
 Nor ought avails it, that his green old age,
 From youth well spent, may seem t' elude the tomb:

For Burton too must fall. And o'er his urn,
 While science hangs her sculptur'd trophies round,
 The letter'd tribes of half an age shall mourn,
 Whose lyres he strung, and added sense to found.

Nor shall his candid ear, I trust, disdain
 This artless tribute of a feeling mind;
 And thou, O Lowth, shalt own the grateful strain,
 Mean though it flow, was virtuously design'd;

* Afterward Bishop of London.

For 'twas thy work inspir'd the melting mood
To feel, and pay the sacred debt I ow'd:
And the next virtue to bestowing good,
'Thou know'st, is gratitude for good bestow'd.

TO THE REV. MR. WRIGHT.
1751.

PRITHEE teaze me no longer, dear troublesome
friend,

On a subject which wants not advice:
You may make me unhappy, but never can mend
Those ills I have learnt to despise.

You say I'm dependent; what then?—if I make
That dependence quite easy to me,
Say why should you envy my lucky mistake,
Or why should I wish to be free?

Many men of less worth, you partially cry,
To splendour and opulence soar;
Sappose I allow it; yet, pray Sir, am I
Less happy because they are more?

But why said I happy? I aim not at that,
Mere ease is my humble request;
I would neither repine at a niggardly fate,
Nor stretch my wings far from my nest.

Nor e'er may my pride or my folly reflect
On the favourites whom fortune has made,
Regardless of thousands who pine with neglect
In penfive obscurity's shade;

With whom when comparing the merit I boast,
Though rais'd by indulgence to fame,
I sink in confusion bewilder'd and lost,
And wonder I am what I am!

And what are these wonders, these blessings refin'd
Which splendour and opulence shower?
The health of the body, and peace of the mind,
Are things which are out of their power.

To contentment's calm sunshine, the lot of the few,
Can insolent greatness pretend?
Or can it bestow, what I boast of in you,
That blessing of blessings, a friend?

We may pay some regard to the rich and the great,
But how seldom we love them you know;
Or if we do love them, it is not their state,
The tinsel and plume of the show.

But some secret virtues we find in the heart
When the mask is laid kindly aside,
Which birth cannot give them, nor riches impart,
And which never once heard of their pride.

A flow of good spirits I've seen with a smile
To worth make a shallow pretence;
And the chat of good breeding with ease, for a while,

May pass for good nature, and sense;
But where is the bosom untainted by art,
The judgment so modest and stay'd,
That union so rare of the head and the heart,
Which fixes the friends it has made?

For those whom the great and the wealthy employ
Their pleasure or vanity's slaves,
Whate'er they can give I without them enjoy,
And am rid of just so many knaves.

VOL. XI.

For the many whom titles alone can allure,
And the blazon of ermine and gules,
I wrap myself round in my lowness secure,
And am rid of just so many fools.

Then why should I covet what cannot increase
My delights, and may lessen their store;
My present condition is quiet and ease,
And what can my future be more?

Should fortune capriciously cease to be coy,
And in torrents of plenty descend,
I, doubtless, like others, should clasp her with joy,
And my wants and my wishes extend.

But since 'tis deny'd me, and Heaven best knows
Whether kinder to grant it or not,
Say, why should I vainly disturb my repose,
And peevishly carp at my lot?

No; still let me follow sage Horace's rule,
Who tried all things, and held fast the best;
Learn daily to put all my passions to school,
And keep the due poise of my breast.

Thus, firm at the helm, I glide calmly away;
Like the merchant long us'd to the deep,
Nor trust for my safety on life's stormy sea,
To the gilding and paint of my ship.

Nor yet can the giants of honour and pelf
My want of ambition deride,
He who rules his own bosom is lord of himself,
And lord of all nature beside.

ODE TO THE TIBER.

ON ENTERING THE CAMPANIA OF ROME, AT OTRICOLO. 1755.

HAIL sacred stream, whose waters roll
Immortal through the classic page!
To thee the muse-devoted soul,
Though destin'd to a later age
And less indulgent clime, to thee,
Nor thou disdain, in Runic lays,
Weak mimic of true harmony,
His grateful homage pays.
Far other strains thine elder ear
With pleas'd attention wont to hear,
When he, who strung the Latian lyre,
And he, who led th' Aonian quire
From Mantua's reedy lakes with osiers crown'd,
Taught echo from thy banks with transport to re-
found.

Thy banks?—alas, is this the boasted scene,
This dreary, wide, uncultivated plain,
Where sick'ning nature wears a fainter green,
And desolation spreads her torpid reign?
Is this the scene where freedom breath'd
Her copious horn where plenty wreath'd,
And health at opening day
Bade all her rosgate breezes fly,
To wake the sons of industry,
And make their fields more gay?

Where is the villa's rural pride,
The swelling dome's imperial gleam,
Which lov'd to grace thy verdant side,
And tremble in thy golden stream?
Where are the bold, the busy throngs,
That rush'd impatient to the war;

3 N

Or tun'd to peace triumphal songs,
 And hail'd the passing car?
 Along the solitary * road,
 Th' eternal flint by Consuls trod,
 We muse, and mark the sad decays
 Of mighty works, and mighty days!
 For these vile wastes, we cry, had fate decreed
 That Veii's sons should strive, for these Camillus bleed?

Did here, in after-times of Roman pride,
 The musing shepherd from Soracte's height
 See towns extend where'er thy waters glide,
 And temples rise, and peopled farms unite?
 They did. For this deserted plain
 The hero strove, nor strove in vain;
 And here the shepherd saw
 Unnumber'd towns and temples spread,
 While Rome majestic rear'd her head,
 And gave the nations law.

Yes, thou and Latium once were great.
 And still, ye first of human things,
 Beyond the grasp of time or fate
 Her fame and thine triumphant springs.
 What though the mould'ring columns fall,
 And frow the desert earth beneath,
 Though ivy round each nodding wall
 Entwine its fatal wreath,
 Yet say, can Rhine or Danube boast
 The numerous glories thou hast lost?
 Can ev'n Euphrates' palmy shore,
 Or Nile, with all his mystic lore,
 Produce from old records of genuine fame
 Such heroes, poets, kings, or emulate thy name?

* The Flaminian way.

Ev'n now the muse, the conscious muse is here;
 From every ruin's formidable shade
 Eternal music breathes on fancy's ear, [dead.
 And wakes to more than form th' illustrious
 Thy Cæsars, Scipios, Catos, rise
 The great, the virtuous, and the wise,
 In solemn state advance!
 They fix the philosophic eye,
 Or trail the robe, or lift on high
 The light'ning of the lance.

But chief that humbler, happier train,
 Who knew those virtues to reward
 Beyond the reach of chance or pain
 Secure, th' historian and the bard.
 By them the hero's generous rage
 Still warm in youth immortal lives;
 And in their adamant page
 Thy glory still survives.
 Through deep savannahs wild and vast,
 Unheard, unknown through ages past,
 Beneath the sun's directer beams,
 What copious torrents pour their streams!
 No fame have they, no loud pretence to mourn,
 No annals swell their pride, or grace their storied urn.
 While thou, with Rome's exalted genius join'd,
 Her spear yet lifted, and her corselet brac'd,
 Canst tell the waves, canst tell the passing wind,
 Thy wond'rous tale, and cheer the list'ning waste.
 Though from his caves th' unfeeling north-
 Pour'd all his legion'd tempests forth,
 Yet still thy laurels bloom:
 One deathless glory still remains,
 Thy stream has roll'd through Latian plains,
 Has wash'd the walls of Rome.

ELEGIES.

ELEGY I.

WRITTEN AT THE CONVENT OF HAUT VILLERS,
 IN CHAMPAGNE. 1754.

SILENT and clear, through yonder peaceful vale,
 While Marne's slow waters weave their mazy
 way,

See, to th' exulting fun, and fostring gale,
 What boundless treasures his rich banks display!

Fast by the stream, and at the mountain's base,
 The lowing herds through living pastures rove;
 Wide waving harvests crown the rising space;
 And still superior nods the viny grove.

High on the top, as guardian of the scene,
 Imperial Sylvan spreads his umbrage wide;
 Nor wants there many a cot, and spire between,
 Or in the vale, or on the mountain's side,

To mark that man, as tenant of the whole,
 Claims the just tribute of his culturing care,
 Yet pays to Heaven, in gratitude of soul,
 The boon which Heaven accepts of praise and prayer.

O dire effects of war! the time has been
 When desolation vaunted here her reign;
 One ravag'd desert was yon beauteous scene,
 And Marne ran purple to the frighted Seine.

Oft at his work, the toilsome day to cheat,
 The swain still talks of those disastrous times,
 When Guise's pride, and Conde's ill-star'd heat,
 Taught Christian zeal to authorize their crimes;

Oft to his children sportive on the grass,
 Does dreadful tales of worn tradition tell,
 Oft points to Epernay's ill-fated pass, [fell.
 Where force thrice triumph'd, and where Biron

O dire effects of war! may ever more [cease!
 Through this sweet vale the voice of discord
 A British hard to Gallia's fertile shore
 Can with the blessings of eternal peace.

Yet say, ye monks (beneath whose moss-grown
 seat,
 Within whose cloister'd cells th' indebted muse
 A while sojourns, for meditation meet, [sues),
 And their loose thoughts in pensive strain pur-

Avails it aught, that war's rude tumults spare
 You cluster'd vineyard, or yon golden field,
 If niggards to yourselves, and fond of care,
 You slight the joys their copious treasures yield?

Avails it aught, that nature's liberal hand
 With every blessing grateful man can know,
 Clothes the rich bosom of yon smiling land,
 The mountain's sloping side, or pendant brow.

If meagre famine paint your pallid cheek,
 If breaks the midnight bell your hours of rest,
 If, 'midst heart-chilling damps, and winter bleak,
 You shun the cheerful bowl, and moderate feast!

Look forth, and be convinc'd! 'tis nature pleads,
 Her ample volume opens on your view:
 The simple-minded swain, who running reads,
 Feels the glad truth, and is it hid from you?

Look forth, and be convinc'd! Yon prospects wide
 To reason's ear how forcibly they speak!
 Compar'd with those, how dull is letter'd pride!
 And Austin's babbling eloquence how weak!

Temp'rance, not abstinence, in every bliss
 Is man's true joy, and therefore Heaven's command.

The wretch who riots thanks his God amiss:
 Who starves, rejects the bounties of his hand.

Mark, while the Marne in yon full channel glides,
 How smooth his course, how nature smiles around!

But should impetuous torrents swell his tides,
 The fairy landkip sinks in oceans drown'd.

Nor less disastrous, should his thrifty urn
 Neglected leave the once well-water'd land,
 To dreary wastes yon paradise would turn,
 Polluted ooze, or heaps of barren sand.

ELEGY II.

ON * THE MAUSOLEUM OF AUGUSTUS.

To the Right Honourable George Buffoy Villiers, Viscount Villiers.

WRITTEN AT ROME. 1756.

AMID these mould'ring walls, this marble round,
 Where slept the heroes of the Julian name,
 Say, shall we linger still in thought profound,
 And meditate the mournful paths to fame?

What though no cypress shades in funeral rows,
 No sculptur'd urns, the last records of fate,
 O'er the shrunk terrace wave their baleful boughs,
 Or breathe in storied emblems of the great;

Yet not with heedless eye will we survey
 The scene, though chang'd, nor negligently
 tread;

These variegated walks, however gay,
 Were once the silent mansions of the dead.

In every shrub, in every flow'ret's bloom
 That paints with different hues yon smiling plain,

* It is now a garden belonging to Marschese di Cerré.

Some hero's ashes issue from the tomb,
 And live a vegetative life again.

For matter dies not, as the sages say,
 But shifts to other forms the pliant mass,
 When the free spirit quits its cumb'rous clay,
 And sees, beneath, the rolling planets pass.

Perhaps, my Villiers, for I sing to thee;
 Perhaps, unknowing of the bloom it gives,
 In yon fair scyon of Apollo's tree,
 The sacred dust of young Marcellus lives.

Pluck not the leaf—'twere sacrilege to wound
 Th' ideal memory of so sweet a shade;
 In these sad seats an early grave he found,
 And * the first rites to gloomy Dis convey'd.

Witness † thou field of Mars, that oft hadst known
 His youthful triumphs in the mimic war,
 Thou heard'st the heart-felt universal groan,
 When o'er thy bosom roll'd the funeral car.

Witness † thou Tuscan stream, where oft he glow'd
 In sportive straggling with th' opposing wave,
 Fast by the recent tomb thy waters flow'd,
 While wept the wife, the virtuous, and the brave.

O lost too soon!—yet why lament a fate
 By thousands envied, and by Heav'n approv'd?
 Rare is the boon to those of longer date
 To live, to die, admir'd, esteem'd, belov'd.

Weak are our judgments, and our passions warm,
 And slowly dawns the radiant morn of truth,
 Our expectations hastily we form,
 And much we pardon to ingenuous youth.

Too oft we satiate on the applause we pay
 To rising merit, and resume the crown;
 Full many a blooming genius snatch'd away,
 Has fall'n lamented, who had liv'd unknown.

For hard the task, O Villiers, to sustain
 Th' important burden of an early fame;
 Each added day some added worth to gain,
 Prevent each wish, and answer every claim.

Be thou Marcellus, with a length of days!
 Be O remember, whatso'er thou art,
 The most exalted breath of human praise,
 To please indeed must echo from the heart.

Though thou be brave, be virtuous, and be wise,
 By all, like him, admir'd, esteem'd, belov'd;
 'Tis from within alone true fame can rise,
 The only happy is the self-approv'd.

ELEGY III.

To the Right Honourable George Simon Harcourt, Viscount Nuneham.

WRITTEN AT ROME. 1756.

YES, noble youth, 'tis true; the softer arts,
 The sweetly-sounding string, and pencil's power,

* He is said to be the first person buried in this monument.

† Quantos ille virum magnam Mavortis ad urbem

VIRE.

Have warm'd to rapture even heroic hearts,
 And taught the rude to wonder and adore.
 For beauty charms us, whether she appears
 In blended colours; or to soothing sound
 Attunes her voice; or fair proportion wears
 In yonder swelling dome's harmonious round.
 All, all the charms; but not alike to all
 'Tis given to revel in her blissful bower;
 Coercive ties, and reason's powerful call, [your.
 Bid some but taste the sweets, which sonic de-
 When nature govern'd, and when man was young,
 Perhaps at will th'untutor'd savage rov'd,
 Where waters murmur'd, and where clusters hung,
 He sed, and slept beneath the shade he lov'd.
 But since the sage's more sagacious mind,
 By Heaven's permission, or by Heaven's command,
 To polish'd flates has social laws assign'd,
 And general good on partial duties plann'd,
 Not for ourselves our vagrant steps we bend
 As heedless chance, or wanton choice ordain;
 On various stations various tasks attend,
 And men are born to trifle or to reign.
 As chaunts the woodman, while the dryads weep,
 And falling forests fear the uplifted blow;
 As chaunts the shepherd, while he tends his sheep,
 Or weaves to pliant forms the osier bough:
 To me 'tis given, whom fortune loves to lead [ers,
 Through humbler toils to life's sequester'd bow-
 To me 'tis given to wake th' amusive reed,
 And foot in with song the solitary hours.
 But thee superior, soberer toils demand,
 Severer paths are thine of patriot fame;
 Thy birth, thy friends, thy king, thy native land,
 Have given thee honours, and have each their claim.
 Then nerve with fortitude thy feeling breast,
 Each wish to combat, and each pain to bear;
 Spurn with disdain th' inglorious love of rest,
 Nor let the syren ease approach thine ear.
 Beneath yon cypress shade's eternal green
 See prostrate Rome her world'rous story tell,
 Mark how she rose the world's imperial queen,
 And tremble at the prospect how she fell!
 Not that my rigid precepts would require
 A painful struggling with each adverse gale,
 Forbid thee listen to th' enchanting lyre,
 Or turn thy steps from fancy's flowery vale.
 Whate'er of Greece in sculptur'd brass survives,
 Whate'er of Rome in mould'ring arcs remains,
 Whate'er of genius on the canvass lives,
 Or flows in polish'd verse, or airy strains,
 Be these thy leisure; to the chosen few
 Who dare excel, thy fost'ring aid afford;
 Their arts, their magic powers, with honours due
 Exalt; but be thyself what they record.

ELEGY IV.

To an Officer.

WRITTEN AT ROME. 1756.

FROM Latian fields, the mansions of renown,
 Where fix'd the warrior got his fated feat;

Where infant heroes learn'd the martial frown,
 And little hearts for genuine glory beat;
 What for my friend, my soldier, shall I frame?
 What nobly-glowing verse that breathes of arms,
 To point his radiant path to deathless fame,
 By great examples, and terrific charms?
 Quirinus first, with bold, collected bands,
 The fiery sons of strength, for empire strove;
 Beneath his prowess bow'd th' astonish'd lands,
 And temples rose to Mars, and to Feretrian Jove.
 War taught contempt of death, contempt of pain,
 And hence the Fabii, hence the Decii come:
 War urg'd the slaughter, though she wept the slain,
 Stern war, the rugged nurse of virtuous Rome.
 But not from antique fables will I draw,
 To fire thy active soul, a dubious aid, [awe,
 Though now, ev'n now, they strike with rev'rend
 By poets or historian sacred made.
 Nor yet to thee the babbling muse shall tell
 What mighty kings with all their legions wrought,
 What cities sunk, and storied nations fell,
 When Cæsar, Titus, or when Trajan fought.
 While o'er yon hill th' exalted * Trophy shows
 To what vast heights of incorrupted praise
 The great, the self-ennobled Marius rose
 From private worth, and fortune's private ways.
 From steep Arpinum's rock-invested shade,
 From hardy virtue's emulative school,
 His daring flight th' expanding genius made,
 And by obeying, nobly learn'd to rule.
 Abash'd, confounded, stern Iberia groan'd,
 And Afric trembled to her utmost coasts;
 When the proud land its destin'd conqueror own'd
 In the new consul, and his veteran hosts.
 Yet chiefs are madmen, and ambition weak,
 And mean the joys the laurell'd harvests yield,
 If virtue fail. Let fame, let envy speak
 Of Capsa's walls, and Sextia's wat'ry field.
 But sink for ever, in oblivion cast,
 Dishonest triumphs, and ignoble spoils.
 Minturna's Marsh severely paid at last
 The guilty glories gain'd in civil broils.
 Nor yet his vain contempt the muse shall praise
 For scenes of polish'd life, and letter'd worth;
 The steel-rib'd warrior wants not envy's ways
 To darken theirs, or call his merits forth:
 Witness yon Cimbrian trophies!—Marius, there
 Thy ample pinion found a space to fly,
 As the plum'd eagle soaring sails in air,
 In upper air, and scorns a middle sky.
 Thence, too, thy country claim'd thee for her own,
 And bade the sculptor's toil thy acts adorn,
 To teach in characters of living stone
 Eternal lessons to the youth unborn.

* The trophies of Marius, now erected before the Capitol.

For wisely Rome her warlike sons rewards
 With the sweet labours of her artists' hands;
 He wakes her graces who her empire guards,
 And both Minervas join in willing bands.

O why, Britannia, why untrophied pass
 The patriot deeds thy godlike sons display,
 Why breathes on high no monumental brass,
 Why swells no arc to grace Culloden's day?

Wait we till faithless France submissive bow
 Beneath that hero's delegated spear,
 Whose light'ning smote rebellion's haughty brow,
 And scatter'd her vile rout with horror in the rear?

O land of freedom, land of arts, assume
 That graceful dignity thy merits claim;
 Exalt thy heroes like imperial Rome,
 And build their virtues on their love of fame!

ELEGY V.

To a Friend Sick.

WRITTEN AT ROME. 1756.

'Twas in this * isle, O Wright indulge my lay,
 Whose naval form divides the Tuscan flood,
 In the bright dawn of her illustrious day
 Rome fix'd her temple to the healing god!

Here stood his altars, here his arm he bar'd,
 And round his mystic staff the serpent twin'd,
 Through crowded portals hymns of praise were heard,
 And victims bled, and sacred seers divin'd.

On every breathing wall, on every round
 Of column, swelling with proportion'd grace,
 Its slated seat some votive tablet found,
 And storied wonders dignified the place.

Oft from the balmy blessings of repose,
 And the cool stillness of the night's deep shade,
 To light and health th' exulting votarist rose, [aid.
 While fancy work'd with med'cine's powerful

Oft in his dreams (no longer clogg'd with fears
 Of some broad torrent, or some headlong steep,
 With each dire form imagination wears,
 When haras'd nature links in turbid sleep),

Oft in his dreams he saw diffusive day
 Through bursting glooms its cheerful beams extend,

On billowy clouds saw sportive genii play,
 And bright Hygeia from her heaven descend.

What marvel then, that man's o'erflowing mind
 Should wreath-bound columns raise, and altars
 fair,

And grateful offerings pay to powers so kind,
 Though fancy-form'd, and creatures of the air?

Who that has with'd beneath the scourge of pain,
 Or felt the burden'd languor of disease,

* The Insula Tiberina, where there are still some small remains of the famous temple of Æsculapius.

But would with joy the slightest respite gain,
 And idolize the hand which lent him ease?

To thee, my friend, unwillingly to thee,
 For truths like these the anxious muse appeals.
 Can memory answer from affliction free,
 Or speaks the sufferer what, I fear, he feels?

No, let me hope ere this in Romely grove
 Hygeia revels with the blooming spring,
 Ere this the vocal feasts the muses love
 With hymns of praise, like Pæon's temple, ring.

It was not written in the book of fate
 That, wand'ring far from Albion's sea-girt plain,
 Thy distant friend should mourn thy shorter date,
 And tell to alien woods and streams his pain.

It was not written. Many a year shall roll,
 If aught th' inspiring muse aright preface,
 Of blameless intercourse from soul to soul,
 And friendship well matur'd from youth to age.

ELEGY VI.

To the Rev. Mr. Sanderfon.

WRITTEN AT ROME. 1756.

BEMOLD, my friend, to this small * orb confin'd,
 The genuine features of Aurelius' face;
 The father, friend, and lover of his kind,
 Shrunk to a narrow coin's contracted space.

Not so his fame; for erst did Heaven ordain,
 While seas should waft us, and while suns should warm,

On tongues of men the friend of man should reign,
 And in the arts he lov'd the patron charm.

Oft as amidst the mould'ring spoils of age,
 His moss-grown monuments my steps pursue;
 Oft as my eye revolves th' historic page,
 Where pass his generous acts in fair review,

Imagination grasps at mighty things, [see;
 Which men, which angels might with rapture
 Then turns to humbler scenes its safer wings,
 And, blush not while I speak it, thinks on thee.

With all that firm benevolence of mind
 Which pities while it blames th' unfeeling vain,
 With all that active zeal to serve mankind,
 That tender suffering for another's pain,

Why wert not thou to thrones imperial rais'd?
 Did heedless fortune lumber at thy birth,
 Or on thy virtues with indulgence gaz'd,
 And gave her grandeurs to her sons of earth?

Happy for thee, whose less distinguish'd sphere
 Now cheers in private the delighted eye,
 For calm content, and smiling ease are there,
 And Heaven's divinest gift, sweet liberty.

Happy for me, on life's serener flood
 Who sail, by talents as by choice restrain'd,
 Else had I only shar'd the general good,
 And lost the friend the universe had gain'd,

MISCELLANIES.

VERSES

TO THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND. 1758.

“Mures animos in martia bella
 “Verfibus exacuit.”

HOR.

BRITONS, rouse to deeds of death!—
 Waste no zeal in idle breath,
 Nor lose the harvest of your swords
 In a civil war of words!

Wherefore teems the shameless press
 With labour'd births of emptiness?
 Reas'nings, which no facts produce,
 Eloquence, that murders use;
 Ill-tim'd humour, that beguiles
 Weeping idiots of their smiles;
 Wit, that knows but to defame,
 And satire, that profanes the name.

Let th' undaunted Grecian teach
 The use and dignity of speech,
 At whose thunders nobly thrown
 Shrank the man of Macedon,
 If the form of words must rise,
 Let it blast our enemies.

Sure and nervous be it hurl'd
 On the Philips of the world.
 Learn not vainly to despise
 (Proud of Edward's victories):
 Warriors wedg'd in firm array,
 And navies powerful to display
 Their woven wings to every wind,
 And leave the panting foe behind,
 Give to France the honours due,
 France has chiefs and statesmen too.
 Breasts which patriot-passions feel,
 Lovers of the common-weal.

And when such the foes we brave,
 Whether on the land or wave,
 Greater is the pride of war,
 And the conquest nobler far.

Agincourt and Cressly long
 Have flourish'd in immortal song;
 And lisping babes aspire to praise
 The wonders of Eliza's days.
 And what else of late renown
 Has added wreaths to Britain's crown;
 Whether on th' impetuous Rhine
 She bade her harness'd warriors shine,
 Or snatch'd the dangerous palm of praise
 Where the Sambre meets the Maese;
 Or Danube rolls his wat'ry train;
 Or the yellow-tressed Mayne
 Through Dettingen's immortal vale—
 Ev'n Fontenoy could tell a tale,
 Might modest Worth ingenuous speak,
 To raise a blush on victory's cheek;

And bid the vanquish'd wreaths display
 Great as on Culloden's day.

But glory which aspires to last
 Learns not meanly on the past.
 'Tis the present now demands
 British hearts, and British hands.
 Curt be he, the willing slave,
 Who doubts, who lingers to be brave.
 Curt be the coward tongue that dare
 Breathe one accent of despair,
 Cold as winter's icy hand
 To chill the genius of the land.

Chiefly you, who ride the deep
 And bid our thunders wake or sleep
 As pity pleads, or glory calls—
 Monarchs of our wooden walls!
 Midst your mingling seas and skies
 'Rise ye Blakes, ye Kaleighs rise!
 Let the fordid lust of gain
 Be banish'd from the liberal main.
 He who strikes the generous blow
 Aims it at the public foe.
 Let glory be the guiding star,
 Wealth and honours follow her.

See! she spreads her lustre wide
 O'er the vast Atlantic tide!
 Constant as the solar ray
 Points the path and leads the way!
 Other worlds demand your care,
 Other worlds to Britain dear;
 Where the foe insidious roves
 O'er headlong streams, and pathless groves;
 And Justice' simpler laws confounds
 With imaginary bounds.

If protected commerce keep
 Her tenor o'er yon heaving deep,
 What have we from war to fear?
 Commerce steals the nerves of war;
 Heals the havoc rapine makes,
 And new strength from conquest takes.

Nor less at home O deign to smile,
 Goddess of Britannia's isle!
 Thou, that from her rocks survey'st
 Her boundless realms the wat'ry waste;
 Thou, that rov'st the hill and mead
 Where her flocks, and heifers feed;
 Thou, that cheer'st th' industrious swain,
 While he sows the pregnant grain;
 Thou, that hear'st his caroll'd vows
 When th' expanded barn o'erflows;
 Thou, the bulwark of our cause,
 Thou, the guardian of our laws,
 Sweet liberty!—O deign to smile,
 Goddess of Britannia's isle!

If to us indulgent Heaven
 Nobler seeds of strength has given,

Nobler should the produce be ;
 Brave, yet gen'rous, are the free.
 Come then, all thy powers diffuse,
 Goddess of extended views !
 Every breast which feels thy flame
 Shall kindle into martial fame,
 Till shame shall make the coward bold,
 And indolence her arms unfold :
 Ev'n avarice shall protect his hoard,
 And the plough-share gleam a sword.
 Goddess, all thy powers diffuse :—
 And thou, genuine British muse,
 Nurs'd amidst the druids old
 Where Deva's wizard waters roll'd,
 Thou that bear'st the golden key
 To unlock eternity,
 Summon thy poetic guard—
 Britain still has many a bard,
 Whom, when time and death shall join
 T' expand the ore, and stamp the coin,
 Late posterity shall own
 Lineal to the muse's throne—
 Bid them leave th' inglorious theme
 Of fabled shade, or haunted stream.
 In the daisy painted mead
 'Tis to peace we tune the reed ;
 But when war's tremendous roar
 Shakes the isle from shore to shore,
 Every bard of purer fire
 Trytæus-like should grasp the lyre ;
 Wake with verse the hardy deed,
 Or in the generous strife like * Sydney bleed.

A CHARGE TO THE POETS.

First Printed, 1762.

" Quasi ex Cathedrâ loquitur."—

FULL twenty years have roll'd, ye rhiming band,
 Since first I dipt in ink my trembling hand,
 For much it trembled, though th' obliging few,
 Who judge with candour, prais'd the † sketch I drew ;

And echo, answering from the public voice,
 Indulg'd as genius, what I fear'd was choice.

At length, arriv'd at those maturer years
 So rarely rais'd by hope, or sunk by fears,
 I rest in peace ; or scribble if I please :
 In point of wealth not affluent, but at ease ;
 (For ease is truly theirs who dare confine Their wishes to such moderate views as mine)
 In point of what the world and you call fame,
 (I judge but by conjecture) much the same.

But whether right or wrong I judge, to you
 It matters not : the following fact is true.
 From nobler names, and great in each degree,
 The pension'd laurel has devolv'd to me.
 To me, ye bards ; and, what you'll scarce conceive,

Or, at the best, unwillingly believe,

* Sir Philip Sydney, mortally wounded in an action near Zutphen, in Gelderland.

† " The danger of writing Verse." First printed in the year 1741 ; to which this poem may be considered as a sequel.

How'er unworthily I wear the crown,
 Unask'd it came, and from a hand unknown.
 Then, since my king and patron have thought fit

To place me on the throne of modern wit,
 My grave advice, my brethren, hear at large ;
 As bishops to their clergy give their charge,
 Though many a priest, who listens, might afford
 Perhaps more solid counsel to my lord.

To you, ye guardians of the sacred fount,
 Deans and archdeacons of the double mount,
 That through our realms intestine broils may cease,
 My first and last advice is, " Keep the peace !"
 What is't to you, that half the town admire
 False sense, false strength, false softness, or false fire ?

Through heav'n's void concave let the meteors
 blaze,

He hurts his own, who wounds another's bays.
 What is't to you that numbers place your name
 First, fifth, or twentieth, in the lists of fame ?
 Old time will settle all your claims at once,
 Record the genius, and forget the dunce.

It boots us much to know, observers say,
 Of what materials nature form'd our clay ;
 From what strange beast Prometheus' plastic art
 Purloin'd the particle which rules the heart.
 If milky softness, gliding through the veins,
 Incline the muse to panegyric strains,
 Insipid lays our kindest friends may lull,
 Be very moral, yet be very dull.

If bile prevails, and temper dictates satire,
 Out wit is spleen, our virtue is ill-nature ;
 With it's own malice arm'd we combat evil,
 As zeal for God's sake sometimes plays the devil.
 O mark it well ! does pride affect to reign
 The solitary tyrant of the brain ?

Or vanity exert her quick'ning flame,
 Stuck round with ears that listen after fame ?
 O to these points let strict regard be given,
 Nor " Know thyself" in vain descend from heaven.

Do critics tease you ?—with a smile I speak,
 Nor would suppose my brethren were so weak.
 'Tis on ourselves, and not our foes, or friends,
 Our future fame, or infamy, depends.
 Let envy point, or malice wing the darts.
 They only wound us in our mortal parts.
 Besides, 'tis much too late to go to school,
 Grown men will judge by nature's noblest rule,
 Admire true beauties, and slight faults excuse,
 Not learn to dance from † journals and reviews.

If fools traduce you, and your works decry,
 As many fools will rate your worth too high ;
 Then balance the account, and fairly take
 The cool report which men of judgment make.

In writing, as in life, he foils the foe,
 Who, conscious of his strength, forgives the blow,

* " E cœlo descendit," quasi ex cathedrâ. Juv.

† This is not intended as a reflection on either the Journals or Reviews. They are not so masters, but the scholars, the grown gentlemen,
 at whom the author smiles ; and who, he thinks,
 had much better not pretend to judge at all,
 than borrow opinions which never sit easy upon them.

They court the insult who but seem afraid :
And then, by answering, you promote the trade,
And give them, what their own weak claims deny,

A chance for future laughter, or a sigh.

You, who as yet, unfulfill'd by the press,
Hang o'er your labours in their virgin dress :
And you, who late the public taste have hit,
And still enjoy the honey-moon of wit,
Attentive hear me : grace may still abound,
Whoever preaches, if the doctrine's found ;
If nature prompts you, or if friends persuade,
Why write ; but ne'er pursue it as a trade.
And seldom publish : manuscripts disarm
The censor's frown, and boast an added charm,
Enhance their worth by seeming to retire ;
For what but few can prate of, all admire.

Who trade in verse, alas, as rarely find,
The public grateful, as the muses kind.
From constant feasts like fated guests we steal,
And tir'd of tickling lose all power to feel.
'Tis novelty we want ; with that in view,
We praise stale matter, so the bard be new ;
Or from known bards with ecstasy receive :
Each pert new whim they almost blush to give.
A life of writing, unless wond'rous short,
No wit can brave, no genius can support.
Some soberer province for your business choose,
Be that your helmet, and your plume the muse.
Through Fame's long rubric, down from Chaucer's time,

Few fortunes have been rais'd by lofty rhyme.
And, when our toils success no longer crowns,
What shelter find we from a world in frowns ?
O'er each distress, which vice or folly brings,
Though charity extend her healing wings,
No maudlin hospitals are yet assign'd
For slipshod muses of the vagrant kind ;
Where anthems might succeed to satires keen,
And hymns of penitence to songs obscene. [grin
What refuge then remains !—with gracious
Some practis'd bookfeller invites you in. [town,
Where luckless bards ; condemn'd to court the
(Not for their parents' vices, but their own) !
Write gay conundrums with an aching head,
Or earn by defamation daily bread,
Or, friendless, shirtless, pennyless, complain,
Not of the world's, but " Cælia's cold disdain."

Lords of their workhouse see the tyrants sit,
Brokers in books, and stock-jobbers in wit,
Beneath whose lash, oblig'd to write or fast,
Our confessors and martyrs breathe their last !

And can ye bear such insolence ?—away,
For shame ! plough, dig, turn pedlars, drive the dray ;

With minds indignant each employment suits,
Our fleets want sailors, and our troops recruits ;
And many a dirty street, on Thames's side,
Is yet by stool and brush unoccupied.

Time was when poets play'd the thorough game,
Swore, drank, and bluster'd, and blasphem'd for fame.

The first in brothels with their punk and muse ;
Your toast, ye bards ? " Parnassus and the fews !"
Thank Heaven the times are chang'd ; no poet
now
Need roar for Bacchus, or to Venus bow.

'Tis our own fault if Fielding's last we feel,
Or, like French wits, begin with the Batille.

Ev'n in those days some few escap'd their fate,
By better judgment, or a lenger date,
And rode, like buoys, triumphant o'er the tide.
Poor Otway in an ale-house dos'd, and died !
While happier Southern, though with spots of yore,

Like Plato's hovering spirits, crusted o'er,
Liv'd every mortal vapour to remove,
And to our admiration join'd our love.

Light lie his funeral turf !—for you, who join
His decent manners to his art divine,
Would ye (while, round you, tofs the proud and
vain

Convuls'd with feeling, or with giving pain)
Indulge the muse in innocence and ease,
And tread the flowery path of life in peace ?
Avoid all authors.—What ! th' illustrious few,
Who, shunning fame, have taught her to pursue,
Fair virtue's heralds ?—yes, I say again,
Avoid all authors, till you've read the men.
Full many a peevish, envious, slandering elf,
Is, in his work, benevolence itself.

For all mankind unknown, his bosom heaves,
He only injures those with whom he lives.
Read then the man : does truth his actions guide,
Exempt from petulance, exempt from pride ?
To social duties does his heart attend,
As son, as father, husband, brother, friend ?
Do those who know him love him ? if they do,
You've my permission, you may love him too.

But chief avoid the boist'rous roaring sparks,
The sons of fire !—you'll know them by their marks.

Fond to be heard, they always court a crowd,
And, though 'tis borrow'd nonsense, talk it loud.
One epithet supplies their constant chime,
Damn'd bad, damn'd good, damn'd low, and damn'd sublime !

But most in quick short repartee they shine
Of local humour ; or from plays purloin
Each quaint stale scrap which every subject hits,
Till fools almost imagine, they are wits.
Hear them on Shakspeare ! there they foam, they rage !

Yet taste not half the beauties of his page,
Nor see that art, as well as nature, strove
To place him foremost in th' Aonian grove.
For there, there only, where the sisters join,
His genius triumphs, and the works divine.

Or would ye sit more near these sons of fire,
'Tis Garrick, and not Shakspeare, they admire.
Without his breath, inspiring every thought,
They ne'er perhaps had known what Shakspeare wrote ;

Without his eager, his becoming zeal,
To teach them, though they scarce know why, to feel,

A crude unmeaning mass had Jonson been,
And a dead letter Shakspeare's noblest scene.
O come the time, when diffidence again
Shall bind our youth in nature's modest chain !
Born in a happier age, and happier clime,
Old Sophocles had merit, in his time ;
And so, no doubt, howe'er we flout his plays,
Had poor Euripides, in former days.

Not like the moderns we confess; but yet
Some seeming faults we surely might forget,
Because 'twould puzzle even the wife to show
Whether those faults were real faults, or no.

To all true merit give its just applause,
The worst have beauties, and the best have flaws.
Greek, French, Italian, English, great or small,
I own my frailty, I admire them all.

There are, mistaking prejudice for taste,
Who on one species all their rapture waste.
Though, various as the flowers which paint the year,

In rainbow charms the changeful nine appear,
The different beauties coyly they admit,
And to one standard would confine our wit.
Some manner'd verse delights; while some can raife

To fairy fiction their extatic gaze,
Admire pure poetry, and revel there
On sightless forms, and pictures of the air!
Some hate all rhyme; some seriously deplore
That Milton wants that one enchantment more.
Tir'd with th' ambiguous tale, or antique phrase,
O'er Spenser's happiest paintings, loveliest lays,
Some heedless pass; while some with transport
view

Each quaint old word, which scarce Eliza knew;
And, eager as the fancied knights, prepare
The lance, and combat in ideal war
Dragons of lust, and giants of despair.

Why be it so; and what each thinks the best
Let each enjoy: but not condemn the rest.
Readers there are of every class prepar'd:
Each village teems; each hamlet has its bard,
Who gives the tone; and all th' inferior fry,
Like the great vulgar here, will join the cry.

But be it mine with every bard to glow,
And taste his raptures genuine as they flow,
Through all the muses wilds to rove along
From plaintive elegy to epic song:
And, if the sense be just, the numbers clear,
And the true colouring of the work be there,
Again, subdued by truth's ingenuous call,
I own my frailty, I admire them all.

Nor think I, with the mob, that nature now
No longer warms the soil where laurels grow.
'Tis true, our poets in repose delight,
And, wiser than their fathers, seldom write.
Yet I, but I forbear for prudent ends,
Could name a list, and half of them my friends,
For whom posterity its wreaths shall twine,
And its own bards neglect, to honour mine.

Their poets in their turn will grieve, and swear,
Perhaps with truth, no patron lends an ear.
Complaints of times when merit wants reward
Descend like similes from bard to bard;
We copy our distresses from Greece and Rome;
As in our northern lays their flowrets bloom.
We feel their breezes, with their heats we burn,
And plead prescription to rejoice or mourn.

All present times are bad: then cast your
eyes

Where fairy scenes of bliss in prospect rise.
As fond enthusiasts o'er the western main
With eager ken prophetic in vain,
See the mix'd multitudes from every land
Grow pure by blending, virtuous by command;

Till phoenix-like, a new bright world of gold
Springs from the dregs and refuse of the old.

I'm no enthusiast, yet with joy can trace
Some gleams of sunshine for the tuneful race.
If monarchs listen when the muses woo,
Attention wakes, and nations listen too.
The bard grows rapturous, who was dumb
before,

And every fresh-plum'd eagle learns to soar!
Friend of the finer arts, when Egypt saw
Her second Ptolemy give science law,
Each genius waken'd from his dead repose,
The column swell'd, the pile majestic rose,
Exact proportion borrow'd strength from ease,
And use was taught by elegance to please.
Along the breathing walls, as fancy flow'd,
The sculpture soften'd, and the picture glow'd,
Heroes reviv'd in animated stone,
The groves grew vocal, and the * Pleiads shone!
Old Nilus rais'd his head, and wond'ring cried,
Long live the king! my patron, and my pride!
Secure of endless praise, behold, I bear
My grateful suffrage to my sovereign's ear.
Though war shall rage, though time shall level
all,

Yon colours sicken, and yon columns fall,
Though art's dear treasures feed the wasting flame,

And the proud volume sinks, an empty name,
Though plenty may desert this copious vale,
My streams be scatter'd, or my fountain fail,
Yet Ptolemy has liv'd: the world has known
A king of arts, a patron on a throne.

Ev'n utmost Britain shall his name adore,
"And Nile be sung, when Nile shall flow no
more †"

One rule remains. Nor shun nor court the great,
Your truest centre is that middle state
From whence with ease th' observing eye may go
To all which soars above, or sinks below.
'Tis yours all manners to have tried, or known,
T' adopt all virtues, yet retain your own:
To stem the tide, where thoughtless crowds are hurl'd.

The firm spectators of a bustling world!

Thus arm'd, proceed; the breezes court your wing.

Go range all Helicon, taste every spring;
From varying nature cull th' innoxious spoil,
And, while amusement soothes the generous toil,
Let puzzled critics with judicious spite
Descant on what you can, or cannot write.
True to yourselves, not anxious for renown,
Nor court the world's applause, nor dread its frown.

Guard your own breasts, and be the bulwark
there

To know no envy, and no malice fear.

At least you'll find, thus stoic-like prepar'd,
That verse and virtue are their own reward.

* The seven poets patronised by Ptolemy Philadelphus, are usually called by the name of that constellation.

† "And Boyne be sung, when it has ceas'd to "flow."
ADDISON.

VARIETY.

A TALE FOR MARRIED PEOPLE.

"Nec tecum possum vivere, nec sine te."

MAR.

I can't live with you, or without you.

A GENTLE maid, of rural breeding,
By nature first, and then by reading,
Was fill'd with all those soft sensations
Which we restrain in near relations,
Left future husbands should be jealous,
And think their wives too fond of fellows:

The morning sun beheld her rove
A nymph, or goddesses of the grove!
At eve she pac'd the dewy lawn,
And call'd each clown the saw, a faun!
Then, scudding homeward, lock'd her door,
And turn'd some copious volume o'er.
For much she read; and chiefly those
Great authors, who in verse, or prose,
Or something betwixt both, unwind
The secret springs which move the mind.
These much she read; and thought she knew
The human heart's minutest clue;
Yet shrewd observers still declare,
(To show how shrewd observers are)
Though plays, which breath'd heroic flame,
And novels, in profusion, came,
Imported fresh and fresh from France,
She only read the heart's romance.

The world, no doubt, was well enough
To smooth the manners of the rough;
Might please the giddy and the vain,
Those tinsel'd slaves of folly's train:
But, for her part, the truest taste
She found was in retirement plac'd,
Where, as in verse it sweetly flows,
"On every thorn instruction grows."

"Not that she wish'd to "be alone,"
As some affected prudes have done;
She knew it was decreed on high
We should "increase and multiply;"
And therefore, if kind fate would grant
Her fondest wish, her only want,
A cottage with the man she lov'd
Was what her gentle heart approv'd;
In some delightful solitude
Where step profane might ne'er intrude;
But Hymen guard the sacred ground,
And virtuous Cupids hover round.
Not such as flutter on a fan
Round Crete's vile bull, or Leda's swan,
(Who scatter myrtles, scatter roses,
And hold their fingers to their noses).
But simp'ring, mild, and innocent
As angels on a monument:

Fate heard her pray'r: a lover came,
Who felt, like her, th' innoxious flame;
One who had trod, as well as she,
The flow'ry paths of poesy;
Had warm'd himself with Milton's heat,
Could ev'ry line of Pöpe repeat,
Or chaunt in Shenstone's tender strains,
"The lover's hopes," "the lover's pains."

Attentive to the charmer's tongue,
With him the thought no ev'ning long;
With him the faunter'd half the day;
And sometimes, in a laughing way,
Ran o'er the catalogue by rote
Of who might marry, and who not.
Consider, Sir, we're near relations—
"I hope so in our inclinations."—
In short, she look'd, the bludh'd consent;
He grasp'd her hand, to church they went;
And ev'ry matron that was there,
With tongue so voluble and supple,
Said, for her part, she must declare,
She never saw a finer couple:
O Halcyon days! 'twas nature's reign,
'Twas Tempe's vale, and Enna's plain,
The fields assum'd unusual bloom,
And ev'ry zephyr breath'd perfume.
The laughing sun with genial beams
Danc'd lightly on th' exulting streams;
And the pale regent of the night,
In dewy softness shed delight.

'Twas transport not to be express'd;
'Twas paradise!—But mark the rest.
Two smiling springs had wak'd the flow'rs
That paint the meads, or fringe the bow'rs;
(Ye lovers, lend your wond'ring ears,
Who count by months, and not by years)
Two smiling springs had chaplets wove
To crown their solitude, and love:
When lo, they find, they can't tell how,
Their walks are not so pleasant now.
The seasons sure were chang'd; the place
Had, some how, got a diff'rent face.
Some blast had struck the cheerful scene;
The lawns, the woods were not so green.
The purling rill, which murmur'd by,
And once was liquid harmony,
Became a sluggish, reedy pool:
The days grew hot, the ev'nings cool.
The moon with all the starry reign
Were melancholy's silent train.
And then the tedious winter night—
They could not read by candle-light.

Full oft, unknowing why they did,
They call'd in adventitious aid.
A faithful fav'rite dog ('twas thus With Tobit, and Telemachus)
Amus'd their steps; and for a while
They view'd his gambols with a smile.
The kitten too was comical,
She play'd so oddly with her tail,
Or in the glass was pleas'd to find
Another cat, and peep'd behind.

A courteous neighbour at the door
Was deem'd intrusive noise no more.
For rural visits, now and then,
Are right, as men must live with men,
Then cousin Jenny, fresh from town,

A new recruit, a dear delight!
Made many a heavy hour go down,
At morn, at noon, at eve, at night:
Sure they could hear her jokes for ever,
She was so sprightly, and so clever!
Yet neighbours were not quite the thing;
What joy, alas! could converse bring
With awkward creatures bred at home—
The dog grew dull, or troublesome.

The cat had spoil'd the kitten's merit,
 And, with her youth, had lost her spirit.
 And jokes repeated o'er and o'er,
 Had quite exhausted Jenny's store.
 —“ And then, my dear, I can't abide
 “ This always faunt'ring side by side.” —
 Enough, he cries! the reason's plain:
 For causes never rack your brain.
 Our neighbours are like other folks,
 Skip their playful tricks, and Jenny's jokes
 Are still delightful, still would please
 Were we, my dear, ourselves at ease.
 Look round, with an impartial eye,
 On yonder fields, on yonder sky;
 The azure cope, the flow'rs below,
 With all their wonted colours glow.
 The rill still murmurs; and the moon
 Shines, as she did, a softer fun.
 No change has made the seasons fail,
 No comet brusht' us with his tail.
 The scene's the same, the same the weather —
 We live, my dear, too much together.

Agreed. A rich old uncle dies,
 And added wealth the means supplies.
 With eager haste to town they flew,
 Where all must please, for all was new.

But here, by strict poetic laws
 Description claims its proper pause.

The rosy morn had rais'd her head
 From old Tithonus' saffron bed;
 And embryo sunbeams from the east,
 Half chok'd, were struggling through the mist,
 When forth advanc'd the gilded chaise,
 The village crowd'd round to gaze.
 The pert postillion, now promoted
 From driving plough, and neatly booted,
 His jacket, cap, and baldric on,
 (As greater folks than he have done)
 Look'd round; and with a coxcomb air,
 Smack'd loud his lash. The happy pair
 Bow'd graceful, from a separate door,
 And Jenny, from the stool before.

Roll swift, ye wheels! to willing eyes
 New objects ev'ry moment rise.
 Each carriage passing on the road,
 From the broad waggon's pond'rous load.
 To the light car, where mounted high
 The giddy driver seems to fly,
 Were themes for harmless satire fit,
 And gave fresh force to Jenny's wit.
 Whate'er occur'd, 'twas all delightful,
 No noise was harsh, no danger frightful.
 The dash and splash through thick and thin,
 The hair-breadth 'scapes, the bustling inn,
 (Where well-bred landlords were so ready
 To welcome in the 'quire and lady).
 Dirt, dust, and fun, they bore with ease,
 Determin'd to be pleas'd, and please.

Now nearer town and all agog
 They know dear London by its fog.
 Bridges they cross, through lanes they wind,
 Leave Hounslow's dang'rous breath behind,
 Through Brentford win a passage free
 By roaring, Wilkes and liberty!
 At Knightbridge blest the shortning way,
 (Where Bay's troops in ambush lay)
 O'er Piccadilly's pavement glide,
 (With palaces to grace its side)

Till Bond-street with its lamps a-blaze
 Concludes the journey of three days.

Why should we paint, in tedious song,
 How ev'ry day, and all day long.
 They drove at first with curious haste
 Through Lud's vast town; or, as they pass'd
 'Midst risings, fallings, and repairs
 Of streets on streets, and squares on squares,
 Describe how strong their wonder grew
 At buildings — and at builders too.

Scarce less astonishment arose
 At architects more fair than those —
 Who built as high, as widely spread
 Th' enormous loads that cloath'd their head.
 For British dames new follies love,
 And if they can't invent, improve.
 Some with erect pagodas vie,
 Some nod, like Pisa's tow'r, awry,
 Medusa's snakes, with Pallas' crest,
 Convolv'd, contorted, and compress'd;
 With intermingling trees, and flow'rs,
 And corn and grass, and shepherds' bow'rs,
 Stage above stage the turrets run,
 Like pendant groves of Babylon,
 'Till nodding from the topmost wall
 Otranto's plumes envelope all!
 While the black ewes, who own'd the hair,
 Feed harmless on, in pastures fair,
 Unconscious that their tails perfume,
 In scented curls, the drawing-room.

When night her murky pinions spread,
 And sober folks retire to bed,
 To ev'ry public place they flew,
 Where Jenny told them who was who.
 Money was always at command,
 And tripp'd with pleasure hand in hand.
 Money was equipage, was show;
 Gallini's Almack's, and Soho;
 The passé par tout through ev'ry vein
 Of dissipation's hydra reign.

O London, thou prolific source,
 Parent of vice, and folly's nurse!
 Fruitful as Nile thy copious springs
 Spawn hourly births, — and all with stings;
 But happiest far the he, or she,

I know not which, that livelier dunce:
 Who first contriv'd the coterie,
 To crush domestic bliss at once.
 Then grin'd no doubt, amidst the dames,
 As Nero fiddled to the flames.

Of thee, Pantheon, let me speak
 With rev'rence, though in numbers weak;
 Thy beauties satire's frown beguile,
 We spare the follies for the pile.
 Flounc'd, furbelow'd, and trick'd for show,
 With lamps above, and lamps below,
 Thy charms even modern taste defy'd,
 They could not spoil thee, though they try'd.

Ah, pity that time's hasty wings
 Must sweep thee off with vulgar things!
 Let architects of humbler name
 On frail materials build their fame,
 Their noblest works the world might want,
 Wyat should build in Adamant.

But what are these to scenes which lie
 Secreted from the vulgar eye,
 And baffle all the pow'rs of song? —
 A brazen throat, an iron tongue,

(Which poets wish for, when at length
Their subject soars above their strength)
Would shun the talk. Our humble muse,
(Who only reads the public news,
And idly utters what she gleans
From chronicles and magazines)
Recoiling feels her feeble fires,
And blushing to her shades retires.
Alas! she knows not how to treat
The finer follies of the great,
Where ev'n, Democritus, thy sneer
Were vain as Heraclitus' tear.

Suffice it that by just degrees
They reach'd all heights, and rose with ease;
(For beauty wins its way, uncall'd,
And ready dupes are ne'er black-ball'd).
Each gambling dame she knew, and he Knew ev'ry shark of quality;
From the grave, cautious few, who live
On thoughtless youth, and living thrive,
To the light train who mimic France,
And the soft sons of Nonchalance.
While Jenny, now no more of use,
Excuse succeeding to excuse,
Grew piqued, and prudently withdrew
To shilling whist, and chicken lu.

Advanc'd to fashion's wav'ring head,
They now, where once they follow'd, led.
Devis'd new systems of delight,
A-bed all day, and up all night,
In diff'rent circles reign'd supreme.
Wives copied her, and husbands him;
Till so divinely life ran on,
So separate, so quite bon-ton,
That meeting in a public place,
They scarcely knew each other's face.

At last they met, by his desire,
A-tête-à-tête across the fire;
Look'd in each other's face a-while,
With half a tear, and half a smile.
The ruddy health, which wont to grace
With manly glow his rural face,
Now scarce retain'd its faintest streak;
So fallow was his leathern cheek,
She lank, and pale, and hollow-ey'd,
With rouge had striven in vain to hide
What once was beauty, and repair
The rapine of the midnight air.

Silence is eloquence, 'tis said.
Both wish'd to speak, both hung the head.
At length it burst.—“Tis time,” he cries,
“When tir'd of folly, to be wife.
“Are you too tir'd?”—then check'd a groan.
She wept consent, and he went on.
“How delicate the married life!
“You love your husband, I my wife.
“Not ev'n satiety could tame,
“Nor dissipation quench the flame.
“True to the bias of our kind
“'Tis happiness we wish to find.
“In rural scenes retir'd we fought
“In vain the dear, delicious draught.
“Though blest with love's indulgent store,
“We found we wanted something more.
“'Twas company, 'twas friends to share
“The bliss we languish'd to declare.
“'Twas social converse, change of scene,
“To soothe the sullen hour of spleen?

“Short absences to wake desire,
“And sweet regrets to fan the fire.
“We left the lonesome place; and found,
“In dissipation's giddy round,
“A thousand novelties to wake
“The springs of life and not to break.
“As, from the nest not wand'ring far,
“In light excursions through the air,
“The feather'd tenants of the grove
“Around in mazy circles move,
“ (Sip the cool springs that murmur flow,
“Or taste the blossom on the bough).
“We sported freely with the rest;
“And, still returning to the nest,
“In easy mirth we chatter'd o'er
“The trifles of the day before.
“Behold us now, dissolving quite
“In the full ocean of delight;
“In pleasures ev'ry hour employ,
“Immers'd in all the world calls joy.
“Our affluence easing the expence
“Of splendour, and magnificence.
“Our company, th' exalted set
“Of all that's gay, and all that's great:
“Nor happy yet!—and where's the wonder!—
“We live, my dear, too much asunder.”

The moral of my tale is this,
Variety's the soul of bliss.
But such variety alone
As makes our home the more our own,
As from the heart's impelling pow'r
The life-blood pours its genial store;
Though taking each a various way,
The active streams meand'ring play
Through ev'ry artery, ev'ry vein,
All to the heart return again;
From thence resume their new career,
But still return, and centre there:
So real happiness below
Must from the heart sincerely flow;
Nor, list'ning to the Syren's song,
Must stray too far, or rest too long.
All human pleasures thither tend;
Must there begin, and there must end;
Must there recruit their languid force,
And gain fresh vigour from their source.

THE GOAT'S BEARD.*

A FABLE.

“Propria quæ maribus—
“Fœmineo generi tribuuntur.”

LILLY'S GRAM.

LIB. IV. FAB. 14.

Capellæ et Hirci.

BARBAM Capellæ quum impetrassent ab Jove,
Hirci mœrentes indignari cœperant,

* The purport of the above Fable is this. When the She-goats had, by their intrigues, obtained of Jupiter the privilege of having beards as well as the males, the He-goats grew angry; and complained, that he had degraded their dignity by admitting the females to equal honours with themselves.

To which the god replied, That if they would take care to preserve the real and essential ad-

Quod dignitatem fœminæ æquassent suam ;
 " Sinite, inquit, illis gloriâ vanâ frui,
 " Et usurpare vestri ornatum muneris :
 " Pares dum non sint vestræ fortitudini."
 " Hoc argumentum monet ut sustineas tibi
 Habitu esse similes, qui sunt virtute impares.

In eight terse lines has Phœdrus told
 (So frugal were the bards of old)
 A tale of goats ; and clos'd with grace
 Plan, moral, all, in that short space.
 Alas, that ancient moralist
 Knew nothing of the slender twist
 Which Italy, and France, have taught
 To later times to spin the thought.
 They are our masters now, and we
 Obsequious to their high decree,
 Whate'er the classic critics say,
 Will tell it in a modern way.
 'Twas somewhere on the hills, which lie
 'Twixt Rome and Naples' softer clime,
 (They can't escape the traveller's eye,
 Nor need their names be told in rhyme)

A herd of goats, each shining morn,
 'Midst scraggy myrtle, pointed thorn,
 Quick glancing to the sun display'd
 Their spotted sides, and pierc'd the shade.
 Their goat-herds still, like those of old,
 Pipe to the stragglers of the fold.
 'Twas there—and there (no matter when)
 With Virgil's leave, we place the scene.
 For scarcely can we think his swains
 Dealt much in goats on Mantua's plains ;
 Much less could e'er his shepherds dream
 Of pendant rocks on Mincio's stream.
 From Naples his enliven'd thought
 Its fondest, best ideas caught,
 Theocritus perhaps beside
 Some kind embellishments supply'd,
 And poets are not common men—
 Who talks of goats in Ely fen !

'Twas there, on one important day,
 It chanc'd the he-goats were away,
 The ladies of the colony
 Had form'd a female coterie ;
 And, as they brows'd the cliffs among,
 Exerted all their power of tongue.
 Of ease and freedom much they spoke,
 Enfranchis'd from the husband's yoke ;
 How bright the sun, how soft the air,
 The trefoil flowers were sweeter far,
 While thus alone they might debate
 The hardships of the married state.

Encourag'd by the quick'ning flame
 Which spread, and caught from dame to dame,
 A matron, sager than the rest,
 The fair enthusiasts thus address'd :
 " Ladies, I joy to see, what I
 " Have felt, and smother'd with a sigh,
 " Should touch at length the general breast,
 " And honest nature stand confess'd.
 " Queens as we are, we see our power
 " Usurp'd, and daily sinking lower.

vantages which their sex gave them over the other, they would have no reason to be dissatisfied with letting them participate in what was merely ornamental.

" Why do our lords and masters reign
 " Soic monarchs o'er their subject train ?
 " What stamp has nature given their line,
 " What mark to prove their right divine
 " To lead at will the passive herd ?
 " —It can be nothing but their beard.
 " Observe our shapes, our winning airs,
 " Our spots more elegant than theirs ;
 " With equal ease, with equal speed
 " We swim the brook, or skim the mead ;
 " Climb the tall cliff, where wild thyme grows,
 " On pinnacles undaunted browse,
 " Hang fearless o'er th' impetuous stream,
 " And skip from crag to crag like them.
 " Why are they then to us preferr'd ?
 " —It can be nothing but their beard.
 " Then let us to great Jove prepare
 " A sacrifice and solemn prayer,
 " That he would graciously relieve
 " Our deep distress, and kindly give
 " The all we want to make us shine
 " Joint empresses by right divine."
 A general murmur of applause
 Attends the speech. The common cause
 Glows in each breast, and all defy
 The bonds of Salique tyranny.
 The mild, the timorous grow bold ;
 And as they faunter to the fold,
 Ev'n kids, with voices scarcely heard,
 Lisp out—" 'Tis nothing but the beard."

Agreed. And now with secret care
 The due lustrations they prepare ;
 And having mark'd a sacred field,
 Of horns a spacious altar build ;
 Then from the fragrant herbs that grow
 On craggy cliff, or mountain's brow,
 They cull the sweets : and stuff the pile
 With * tragopogon's downy spoil,
 And gums of † tragacanth to raise
 The bickering flame, and speed the blaze.
 But chief the flower beyond compare,
 The flaunting ‡ woodbine revell'd there,
 Sacred to goats ; and bore their name,
 Till botanists of modern fame
 New-fangled titles chose to give
 To almost all the plants that live.
 Of these a hallow'd heap they place
 With all the skill of female grace ;
 Then spread the sprigs to catch the air,
 And light them with the brushy hair
 Pluck'd sily from their husbands' chins,
 In seeming sport, when love begins.

" Hear, father Jove, if still thy mind
 " With partial fondness views our kind ;
 " If nurs'd by goats, as story says,
 " Thou still retain'st their gamefome ways ;
 " If on || thy shield her skin appears,
 " Who fed with milk thy infant years ;
 " If Capricorn advanc'd by thee,
 " Shines in the sphere a deity, &c. &c.

* A plant called in English the goat's beard.

† The goat's thorn. The gums of this plant are used in medicine.

‡ The caprifolium, or goat's leaf of the ancients and of Tournefort. Linneus ranks it under the genus of lagnicera, as he does the tragacanth under that of astragalus.

|| The ægi, called so from the goat's skin which covers it.

"Hear, father Jove, our just request;
 "O grant us beards, and make us blest?"
 Swift mounts the blaze, the scented fly
 Seems pleas'd, the zephyrs gently sigh,
 And Jove himself, in frolic mood,
 Reclining on an amber cloud,
 Snuff'd in the gale; and though he hides
 A laugh which almost bursts his sides,
 Smil'd gracious on the suppliant crew;
 And from the left his thunder flew:
 Blest omen of success! Ye fair,
 Who know what tyrant spouses are,
 If e'er you slip the tighten'd rein,
 Or gave a surly husband pain,
 Guess at their joy.—Devotely low
 They bent, and with prophetic glow
 They wreath'd their necks, they cock'd their tails,
 With skittish coyness met the males,
 And scarce admitted the embrace,
 But merely to preserve the race.

But chief the river banks they throng;
 Narcissus-like o'er fountains hung,
 And not a puddle could they pass
 Without a squint to view their face,
 Happy to see the sprouts arise,
 Which promis'd future dignities.

When lo! their utmost wish prevails.
 A beard, as graceful as the male's,
 Flows from their chins; and forth they mov'd,
 At once to be rever'd and lov'd;
 Looking (to borrow a quaint phrase
 From Young, to deck our humbler lays),
 "Delightfully with all their might,"
 The he-goats started at the sight.
 "Angels and ministers of grace!"
 Appear'd on theirs, like * Garrick's face.
 Glance after glance oblique they sent,
 Then fix'd in dumb astonishment.
 Scarce more amaz'd did † Atlas stand,
 Sole monarch of th' Hesperian strand,
 When Perseus on his shield display'd
 Terrific charms, the Gorgon's head.

At last recovering their surprisè,
 For goats, like men, are sometimes wise,
 On this absurd, new-modell'd plan,
 Like human couples they began,
 Unwilling, for decorum's sake,
 Quite to unite, or quite to break.
 With short halfwords, and looks that leer'd,
 They frown'd, they pouted, and they sneer'd.
 In general terms express'd their thoughts
 On private and peculiar faults;
 Dropp'd hints they scarcely wish'd to smother,
 And talk'd not to, but at each other.
 Till strife engend'ring more and more,
 They downright wrangled, if not swore;
 And ev'n the fair could scarce refrain

From broad expressions, when they saw
 Th' accomplishments they wish'd to gain,
 Created not respect, but awe;
 And softer kids usurp'd the flames
 Due only to experienc'd dames.

'Twas then the general discord rose;
 And Jove (industrious to compose
 The casual feuds his hasty nod
 Had caus'd); well worthy such a god,

Conven'd the states. And though he knew
 What mortals say is really true,
 "Advice is sometimes thrown away,"
 He bade them meet, and fix'd the day.

Each conscious of their claim, divide
 In separate bands on either side.

Like clients in a party cause,
 Determin'd to succeed or die
 (Whatever their judge may talk of laws),

Staunch martyrs to integrity.
 The god appear'd in proper state,
 Not as the arbiter of fate,
 With all those ensigns of command
 Which sway the air, the sea, the land,
 But yet with dignity, to draw
 Attention, and becoming awe.

"Approach," he cry'd, "your idle strife
 "Has rais'd a thought: I'll give it life.
 "For know, ye goats, my high behests
 "Shall not be thrown away on beasts.
 "When sexes plead, the cause is common;
 "Be goats no more, but man and woman."

The change ensues. He smil'd again,
 And thus address'd the motley train:
 (Here might we tell in Ovid's lay,
 How forms to other forms gave way,
 How pert-cock'd tails, and shaggy hides,
 And horns, and twenty things besides,
 Grew spruce bag-wigs, or well queu'd hair,
 The floating sack, the Pet-en-Pair,
 Fur gown, gold chain, or regal robe,
 Which rules in ermin'd state the globe.
 We wave all this, and say again,
 He thus address'd the motley train).

"When first I different sexes form'd,
 Happy myself, with goodness warm'd,
 I meant you helpmates for each other;
 The ties of father, son, and brother,
 And all the charities below
 I kindly meant should spring from you.
 Were more exalted scenes your lot,
 I kindly meant, as who would not,
 The fair should sooth the hero's care,
 The hero should protect the fair;
 The statesman's toils a respite find
 In pleasures of domestic kind;
 And kings themselves in social down
 Forget the thorns which line a crown.

In humbler life that man should roam
 Busy abroad, while she at home,
 Impatient for his dear return,
 Should bid the crackling incense burn,
 And spread, as fortune might afford,
 The genial feast, or frugal board;
 The joys of honest competence,
 The solace even of indigence.

But things are chang'd, no matter how;
 These blessings are not frequent now.
 Let time account, as he glides on,
 For all his wings and scythes have done:
 We take you in his present page,
 The refuse of an iron age.
 Then hear our sober thoughts.

Ye dames,
 Affection and good breeding claims
 That first, in preference to the males,
 We place your merits in the scales.
 For whether 'twas design'd or not,
 You some ascendancy have got.

 Nay, now, so squalid men are grown,
 Their manners are so like our own,

 Your safety to your ignorance.
 But ah! the consequential ill
 Might there restrain ev'n woman's will.
 The furrow plough'd by * Tyburn hat
 On the fair forehead's Parian flat,
 The freckles, blotches, and parch'd skins,
 The worms, which like black-headed pins
 Peep through the damask cheek, or rise
 On noses bloated out of size,
 Are things which females ought to dread.—
 But you know best, and I proceed.

Some sages, a peculiar thought,
 Think politics become you not.
 Nay one, well vers'd in nature's rules,
 Calls † "cunning women knavish fools."
 —Your pardon—I but barely hint
 What impious mortals dare to print.

In learning, doubtless, you have shin'd
 The paragons of human kind.
 Each abstract science have explor'd;
 Have pierc'd through nature's coyest hoard;
 And cropp'd the loveliest flowers that blow
 On steep Parnassus' double brow.

And yet what small remains we find!

‡ *Alpasia left no tracts behind;
 Content her doctrines to impart,
 As oral truths, warm from the heart.
 And ill-bred time has swept away
 Full many a grave and sprightly lay,
 Full many a tome of just renown,
 Fram'd by the numerous fair, who shone
 Poetic or historic queens,
 From Sappho down to † Anne Comnens.*

In modern days the female pen
 Is paramount, and copes with men.
 Ladies have led th' instructive crew,
 And kindly told us all they knew.
 In France, in Britain, many a score.—
 I mention none—to praise the more.

Eleanor crosses existing at present are a sufficient testimony of her husband's affections, and his gratitude to her memory.

* The small round hat, which acquired its name from its being the distinguished mark of a pick-pocket: it is now adopted by gentlemen and ladies.

I view with a peculiar smile,
And wish to name a chosen few.

Or — — — — —
But I won't. Be envy rais'd,
Few men can bear each other's praises,
And in the fair one would not see

It may be fit, and he be wise —
But I sometimes despire.
Men cannot judge in such affairs.

Your sense more moral and refin'd;
And should ye from such reasoning swerve,
You shall have conquest in reverse.
It argues not an Orbit slight,

The second Charles on England's throne
 (Sav'd from oblivion by his crown),
 Call him whatever you think fit,
 A knave, an idiot, or a wit,
 Had from his travels learnt no more
 Than modern youths from Europe's tour.
 To all that should improve his mind,
 The voluntary dupe was blind.
 Whate'er calamities fell on him,
 Distress was thrown away upon him;
 The same unfeeling thoughtless thing,
 Whether an exile, or a king.

Cleveland and Portsmouth had fine features,
 And yet they were but silly creatures,
 Play'd off like shuttles in a loom
 (To weave the web of England's doom!
 By knaves abroad, and knaves at home).
 Of all who sooth'd his * idle hours
 (To wave his en passant amours),
 Of all who gloried in the flame,
 And in broad day-light blaz'd their shame,
 Spite of her † frolics and expence,
 Nell Gwyn alone had common sense.

Of gaming little shall be said,
 You're surfeited upon that head.
 What arguments can move the mind,
 Where folly is with madness join'd?
 What sober reasoning can prevail,
 Where even contempt and ruin fail?
 Yet let me mention, betwixt friends,
 "Burn not the taper at both ends."
 Why must your wives be taught by you,
 That needles art to squander too?
 Whene'er they show their bracelet strings,
 Their dear white hands, and brilliant rings,
 It should be in a quiet way;
 Ladies should piddle, and not play.

You know too well your glorious power,
 Greatly to lose in half an hour
 What cost your ancestors with pain
 At least full half an age to gain.
 Then let your spouses (to be grave)
 For coals and candles something save,
 And keep their pin-money and jointures,
 To free from jail the kind appointers.

Learning—you scarce know what it is.
 Then put the question, and 'tis this:
 True learning is the mind's good breeding,
 'Tis Common Sense improv'd by reading.
 If Common Sense, that corner-stone,
 Is wanting, let the rest alone.
 Better be fools without pretence,
 Than coxcombs even of eminence.

‡ Eve from her husband's lips prefer'd
 What she from angels might have heard.

* There was as much of lascivious as of love in all those hours which he passed among his mistresses; who served only to fill up his fragrant, while a bewitching kind of pleasure, called sauntering, was the sultana queen he delighted in. Duke of Buckingham's Character of Charles the Second.

† Bishop Burnet, in his History of his own Times, says of Mrs. Gwyn, that she was the indiscreetest and wildest creature that ever was in a court, yet continued to the end of the king's life in great favour, and was maintained at a vast expence.

‡ He might have added to her credit, that she never meddled at all with the wretched politics of those times.

§ In the eighth book of Paradise Lost.

VOL. XI.

And wisely chose to understand
 Exalted truths at second hand.
 Should your soft mates adopt her notions,
 And for instruction wait your motions,
 To what improvements would they reach?
 —Lord bless you, what have you to teach?

Yes, one thing, I confess you deal in,
 And read in fairly without spelling.
 In that, I own, your zeal is such,
 You even communicate too much.
 In matter, spirit, and in fate,
 Your knowledge is extremely great,
 Nobly deserting Common Sense
 For metaphysic excellence.

And yet whate'er you say, or sing,
 Religion is a serious thing.
 At least to me you will allow
 A deity, it must be so.
 Then let me whisper—"Don't perplex
 "With specious doubts the weaker sex.
 "Let them enjoy their Tates and Bradys,
 "Free-thinking is not sport for ladies."

Is't not enough you read Voltaire,
 While sneering valets frizz your hair,
 And half asleep, with half an eye,
 Steal in dear infidelity?
 Is't not enough Helvetius' schemes
 Elucidate your waking dreams
 (Though each who on the doctrine deats
 Skips o'er the text, to skim the notes),
 Why must the fair be made the wise
 Partakers of your mysteries?

You'll say they listen to your chat.
 I grant them fools, but what of that?
 Your prudence, sure, might be so civil
 To let your females fear the devil.
 Even for the comfort of your lives,
 Some must be mothers, daughters, wives;
 Howe'er it with your genius suits,
 They shall not all be prostitutes.

Firm as the sage Lucretius draws
 Above religion, morals, laws,
 Secure (though at a proper distance)
 Of that great blessing nonexistence,
 You triumph; each a deity
 In all, but immortality.

Why, therefore, will ye condescend
 To tease a weak believing friend.
 Whose honest ignorance might gain
 From error a relief in pain,
 And bear with fortitude and honour
 The miseries you brought upon her?
 Momus perhaps would sily say,
 For Momus has a merry way,
 Why will your wisdom and your wit
 To such degrading tricks submit?
 Why in soft bosoms raise a riot?
 Can't ye be d—m'd yourselves in quiet?

But that's an after thought; at present
 We merely wish you to be decent.
 And just will add some trifling things,
 From whence we think confusion springs.

You'll easily conceive in gods,
 Who sit in air their thin abodes,
 And feast on incense and ambrosia;
 Foul feeding must create a nausea.
 Yet we ourselves to flesh and blood
 Have granted more substantial food,
 Nor wonder that, in times like yours,
 All but the poor are Epicures,

And reason from effects to causes
 On roti's, entremets, and fauces.
 But here be wise, the reason's clear,
 Be niggards of your knowledge here,
 And to yourselves alone confine
 That first of blessings, how to dine.
 For should the fair your taste pursue,
 And eating be their science too,
 Should they too catch this nasty trick
 (The bare idea makes me sick),
 What would become of nature's boast?
 Their beauty and their sex were lost.
 —I turn disgusted from the scene—
 She-gluttons are she-aldermen.

Another precept lingers yet,
 To make the tiresome group complete.
 In all your commerce with the sex,
 Whether you mean to please or vex;
 If not well bred, at least be civil;
 Ill manners are a catching evil.
 I speak to the superior few—
 Ye British youths, I speak to you.

The ancient heroes of romance,
 Idolaters in complaisance,
 So hit the sex's dearest whim,
 So rais'd them in their own esteem,
 That ev'ry conscious worth increas'd,
 And every foible sunk to rest.
 Nay, e'en when chivalry was o'er,
 And adoration reign'd no more,
 Within due bounds the following sect
 Restrain'd them by profound respect;
 Politely grasp'd the silken reins,
 And held them in ideal chains.

But now, when you appear before 'em,
 You want all deference and decorum;
 And, conscious of good Heav'n knows what,
 Noddle your heads, and slouch your hat;
 Or, careless of the circling throng,
 Through full assemblies lounge along,
 And on a couch politely throw
 Your listless limbs without a bow,
 While all the fair, like Sheba's queen,
 Crowd eager to the inviting scene,
 And o'er that couch in raptures hang,
 To hear their Solomon's harangue.

No doubt, 'tis edifying stuff
 (For gentle ears are cannon proof),
 And wise the doctrines which you teach.
 But your examples more than preach:
 For 'tis from hence your high-bred lasses
 Love or despise their native graces.
 Hence comes it that at every rout
 They hoyden in, and hoyden out.
 The modest dignity of yore,
 The step chastis'd, is seen no more.
 They hop, they gallop, and they trot,
 A curt'zy is a thing forgot.
 Th' affected stare, the thrust-out chin,
 The leer, the titter, and the grin,
 Supply what "hung on Hebe's cheek,
 "And lov'd to live in dimple sleek."
 Nay, some who boast their sixteen quarters
 One might mistake for chandlers daughters.

Ah, could these triflers of a day
 Know what their masters think and say,
 When o'er their claret they debate
 Each pretty victim's future fate;

With what contempt and malice fraught
 They sneer the follies they have taught;
 How deep a blush their cheek would fire!
 Their little breasts would burst with ire;
 And the most heedless mawkin there,
 The loveliest idiot, drop a tear.

Virtues have sexes, past a doubt,
 Mythologists have mark'd them out;
 Nor yet in excellence alone
 Have this peculiar difference shown:
 Your vices—that's too hard a name—
 Your follies—should not be the same.
 In every plant, in every grain

Of nature's genuine works, we find
 Some innate essences remain,

Which mark the species and the kind.
 Though forms may vary, round or square,
 Be smooth, be rough, be regular;
 Though colours separate or unite,
 The sport of superficial light?

Yet is there something, that, or this,
 By nature's kind indulgence sown,
 Which makes each thing be what it is,

A tree a tree, a stone a stone.
 So in each sex distinct and clear
 A genuine something should appear,
 A je-ne-sçai-quoi, however slight,
 To vindicate the natural right.

Then, sirs, for I perceive you yawn,
 Be this conclusion fairly drawn;
 Sexes are proper, and not common;
 Man must be man, and woman woman.
 In short, be coxcombs if you please,
 Be arrant ladies in your drefs;
 Be every name the vulgar give
 To what their grossness can't conceive:
 Yet one small favour let me ask,
 Not to impose too hard a task—
 Whether you fix your fancied reign
 In brothels, or in drawing-rooms,
 The little something still retain.

Be gamesters, gluttons, jockies, grooms,
 Be all which nature never meant,
 Free-thinkers in the full extent,
 But ah; for something be rever'd,
 And keep your sex, and show the beard.

TO HER GRACE THE
 DUTCHESS OF QUEENSBURY*.

SAY, shall a bard in these late times
 Dare to address his trivial rhymes
 To her, whom Prior, Pope, and Gay,
 And every bard who breath'd a lay,
 Of happier vein, was fond to choose
 The patroness of every muse?

Say, can he hope that you, the theme
 Of partial Swift's severe esteem,

* In the first edition of this little poem, the name was not printed. As the Dutchess is since dead, it cannot be necessary to conceal it. She was of a great age when this compliment was paid to her, which was singularly well adapted, as her Grace never changed her dress according to the fashion, but retained that which had been in vogue when she was a young beauty.

You, who have borne meridian rays,
And triumph'd in poetic blaze,
Ev'n with indulgence should receive
The fainter gleams of ebbing eye.

He will; and boldly say in print,
That 'twas your Grace who gave the hint;
Who told him that the present scene
Of dress, and each preposterous fashion,
Flow'd from supineness in the men,
And not from female inclination.

That women were oblig'd to try
All stratagems to catch the eye,
And many a wild vagary play,
To gain attention any way.
'Twas merely cunning in the fair.—
This may be true—But have a care;
Your Grace will contradict in part,
Your own assertion, and my song,
Whose beauty, undisguis'd by art,
Has charm'd so much, and charm'd so long.

VENUS ATTIRING THE GRACES.

— "In naked beauty more ador'd,
More lovely." MILTON.

As Venus one day, at her toilet affairs,
With the graces attending, adjust'd her airs,
In a negligent way, without boddice or hoop,
As * Guido has painted the beautiful group,
(For Guido, no doubt, in idea at least,
Had seen all the graces and Venus undrest),
Half pensive, half smiling, the goddess of beauty

Then how it should happen I cannot divine:
Either you are too coy, or the gods too supine.
I believe 'tis the latter; for every soft bosom
Must have its attachments, and wish to disclose 'em.
Some lovers not beauty, but novelty warms,
They have seen you so often, they're tir'd of your

But I'll find out a method their languour to move,

* The sleeping Eagle in Pindar, thus translated by West.
Perch'd on the sceptre of th' Olympian king,
The thrilling darts of harmony he feels;
And indolently hangs his rapid wing,
While gentle sleep his closing eye-lids seals;
And o'er his heaving limbs in loose array
To ev'ry balmy gale the ruffling feathers play.

Thus imitated by Akenfide.

With slacken'd wings,
While now the solemn concert breathes around,
Incumbent o'er the sceptre of his lord
Sleeps the stern eagle; by the number'd notes
Possess'd; and satiate with the melting tone;
Sovereign of birds.

And thus by Gray.

Perching on the scepter'd hand
Of Jove, thy magic lulls the feather'd king
With ruffled plumes, and flagging wing:
Quench'd in dark clouds of slumber lie
The terror of his beak, and lightnings of his eye

Then fend the receipt to the ladies on earth,
And bid them become monsters, till men become men.

ON A MESSAGE-CARD IN VERSE,

SENT BY A LADY.

HERMES, the gamester of the sky,
To share for once mankind's delights,
Slipp'd down to earth, exceeding fly,
And bade his coachman drive to White's.
In form a beau, so light he trips,
You'd swear his wings were at his heels;
From glafs to glafs alert he skips,
And bows and prattles while he deals.
In short, so well his part he play'd,
The waiters took him for a peer;
And ev'n some great ones whisp'ring said
He was no vulgar foreigner.
Whate'er he was, he swept the board,
Won every bett, and every game;
Stripp'd ev'n the rooks, who stamp'd and roar'd,
And wonder'd how the devil it came!
He wonder'd too, and thought it hard;
But found at last this great command
Was owing to one fav'rite card,
Which still brought luck into his hand.
The four of spades; when'er he saw
Its fable spots, he laugh'd at rules,
Took odds beyond the gaming law,
And Hoyle and Philidor were fools.
But now, for now 'twas time to go,
What gratitude shall he express?
And what peculiar boon bestow
Upon the cause of his success?
Suppose, for something must be done,
On Juno's self he could prevail
To pick the pips out, one by one,
And stick them in her peacock's tail.
Should Pallas have it, was a doubt,
To twist her silk, or range her pins,
Or should the muses cut it out,
For bridges to their violins.
To Venus should the prize be given,
Superior beauty's just reward,
And 'gainst the next great rout in heaven
Be lent her for a message-card.
Or hold—by Jove, a lucky hit!
Your goddesses are arrant farces;
Go, carry it to Mrs ———
And bid her fill it full of verses.

ON THE BIRTH-DAY OF A YOUNG LADY,

FOUR YEARS OLD.

OLD creeping time, with silent tread,
Has stol'n four years o'er Molly's head.
The rose-bud opens on her cheek,
The meaning eyes begin to speak;
And in each smiling look is seen
The innocence which plays within.
Nor is the fault'ring tongue confin'd
To lisp the dawns of the mind,
But fair and full her words convey
The little all they have to say;
And each fond parent, as they fall,
Finds volumes in that little all.

May every charm which now appears,
Increase, and brighten with her years!
And may that fame old creeping time
Go on till she has reach'd her prime,
Then, like a master of his trade,
Stand still, nor hurt the work he made.

THE JE NE SCAI QUOI.

A SONG.

YES, I'm in love, I feel it now,
And Cælia has undone me;
And yet I'll swear I can't tell how
The pleasing plague stole on me.
'Tis not her face which love creates,
For there no graces revel;
'Tis not her shape, for there the fates
Have rather been uncivil.
'Tis not her air, for sure in that
There's nothing more than common;
And all her sense is only chat,
Like any other woman.
Her voice, her touch, might give th' alarm—
'Twas both perhaps, or neither;
In short, 'twas that provoking charm
Of Cælia all together.

THE DOUBLE CONQUEST.

A SONG.

OF music, and of beauty's power,
I doubted much, and doubted long:
The fairest face a gaudy flower,
An empty sound the sweetest song.
But when her voice Clarinda rais'd,
And sung so sweet, and smil'd so gay,
At once I listen'd, and I gaz'd;
And heard, and look'd my soul away.
To her, of all his beauteous train,
This wond'rous power had love assign'd,
A double conquest to obtain,
And cure at once the deaf and blind.

SONG FOR RANELAGH.

Who trip in this frolicksome round, [springs,
Pray tell me from whence this impertinence
The sexes at once to confound? [air,
What means the cock'd hat, and the masculine
With each motion design'd to perplex?
Bright eyes were intended to languish, not stare,
And softness the test of your sex.

The girl who on beauty depends for support,
May call every art to her aid;
The bosom display'd, and the petticoat short,
Are samples she gives of her trade.
But you on whom fortune indulgently smiles,
And whom pride has preserv'd from the snare,
Should slyly attack us with coyness and wiles,
Not with open and insolent war.

The Venus, whose statue delights all mankind,
Shrinks modestly back from the view,
And kindly should seem by the artist design'd
To serve as a model for you.

Then learn, with her beauty, to copy her air,
Nor venture too much to reveal:
Our fancies will paint what you cover with care,
And double each charm you conceal.

The blushes of morn, and the mildness of May,
Are charms which no art can procure:
O be but yourselves, and our homage we pay,
And your empire is solid and sure.
But if, Amazon-like, you attack your gallants,
And put us in fear of our lives,
You may do very well for sisters and aunts,
But, believe me, you'll never be wives.

AN INSCRIPTION

IN THE COTTAGE OF VENUS,

AT MIDDLETON PARK, OXFORDSHIRE.

QUISQUIS es, O juvenis, nostro vagus advena luco,
Cui cor est tenerum, cuique puella comes;
Quisquis es, ah fugias!—hic suadent omnia amo-
rem,

Inque casâ hâc latitans omnia suadet amor.
Aspice flore capri quam circum astringitur ilex
Hærenti amplexu, et luxuriante comâ!
Sylva tegit, tacitum sternit tibi lana cubile,
Aut tumet in vivos mollior herba toros.
Si quis adest subitum dant tintinnabula signum,
Et strepit in primo limine porta loquax.
Nec rigidum ostendit nostrum de pariete vultum
Actæusvê fenex, dimidiusvê Cato:
At nuda aspirat dulces Cytherea furores,
Atque suos ritus consecrat ipsa Venus.

THE SAME IN ENGLISH.

WHOE'ER thou art, whom chance ordains to rave
A youthful stranger to this fatal grove,
O, if thy breast can feel too soft a flame,
And with thee wanders some unguarded dame,
Fly, fly the place!—Each object through the shade

Perfuades to love; and in this cottage laid,
What cannot, may not, will not, love persuade? }
See to yon oak how close the woodbine cleaves,
And twines around its luxury of leaves!
Above, the boughs a pleasing darkness shed,
Beneath, a noiseless couch soft fleeces spread, }
Or softer herbage forms a living bed.
Do spies approach?—Shrill bells the sound repeat,
And from the entrance screams the conscious gate.
Nor from these walls do rigid busts frown,
Or philosophic censors threat in stone.
But Venus' self does her own rites approve
In naked state, and through the raptur'd grove }
Breathes the sweet madness of excessive love.

HYMN TO VENUS.

ON A GREAT VARIETY OF ROSES BEING PLANTED
ROUND HER COTTAGE.

"Te, dea, te fugiunt venti, te nubila cœli
Adventumque tuum; tibi suaves Dædala tellus
Summitit flores." LUCRET.

O VENUS, whose inspiring breath
First waken'd nature's genial pow'r,
And cloath'd the teeming earth beneath
With every plant, with every flower,

Which paints the verdant lap of spring,
Or wantons in the summer's ray;
Which, brush'd by zephyr's dewy wing,
With fragrance hails the opening day;
Or, pour'd profuse on hill, on plain, on dale,
Reserves its treasur'd sweets for evening's foster gale!

To thee, behold, what new delights
The master of this shade prepares!
Induc'd by far inferior rites,
You've heard a Cyprian's softest prayers;
There, form'd to wreaths, the sickly flower
Has on thy altars bloom'd and died;
But here, around thy fragrant bower,
Extends the living incense wide;
From the first rose the soft'ring zephyrs rear,
To that whose fainter blush adorns the dying year.

Behold one beautiful flower assume
The lustre of th' unfulled snow!
While there the Belgic's softer bloom
Improves the damask's deeper glow;
The Austrian here in purple breaks,
Or flaunts in robes of yellow light;
While there, in more fantastic streaks,
The red rose * mingles with the white,
And in its name records poor Albion's woes,
Albion that oft has wept the colours of the roof!

Then, Venus, come; to every thorn
Thy kind prolific influence lend;
And bid the tears of eve and morn
In gently dropping dews descend;
Teach every sunbeam's warmth and light
To pierce thy thicket's inmost shade;
Nor let th' ungenial damps of night
The breeze's searching wings evade,
But every plant confess the power that guides,
And all be beauty here, where beauty's queen presides.

So shall the master's bounteous hand
New plans design, new temples raise
To thee, and wide as his command
Extend the trophies of thy praise.
So daily, nightly, to thy star
The bard shall grateful tribute pay,
Whether it gilds Aurora's car,
Or loiters in the train of day; [grace
And each revolving year new hymns shall Thy showery month, which wakes the vegetable race.

IN A HERMITAGE,

AT THE SAME PLACE.

THE man whose days of youth and ease
In nature's calm enjoyments pass'd,
Will want no monitors like † these,
To torture and alarm his last.

The gloomy grot, the cypress shade,
The zealot's list of rigid rules,
To him are merely dull parade,
The tragic pageantry of fools.

* York and Lancaster roses.
† A skull, hour glass, &c.

What life affords he freely tastes,
When nature calls, resigns his breath;
Nor age in weak repining wastes,
Nor acts alive the face of death.

Not so the youths of folly's train,
Impatient of each kind restraint
Which parent nature fix'd, in vain,
To teach us man's true bliss, content.

For something still beyond enough
With eager impotence they strive,
Till appetite has learn'd to loath
The very joys by which we live.

Then, fill'd with all which four disdain
To disappointed vice can add,
Tir'd of himself, man flies from man,
And hates the world he made so bad.

INSCRIPTION FOR A COLD BATH.

WHOE'ER thou art, approach.—Has medicine
fail'd? [vain?
Have balms and herbs essay'd their powers in
Nor the free air, nor soft'ning sun prevail'd
To raise thy drooping strength, or soothe thy pain?

Yet enter here. Nor doubt to trust thy frame
To the cold bosom of this lucid lake. [flame,
Here health may greet thee, and life's languid
Ev'n from its icy grasp new vigour take.

What soft Ausonia's genial shores deny,
May Zembla give. Then boldly trust the wave:
So shall thy grateful tablet hang on high,
And frequent votaries bless this healing cave.

INSCRIPTION ON AN OAK,

AT ROMELY, IN DERBYSHIRE.

The oak is supposed to speak.

ONCE was I fam'd, an awful sage,
The silent wonder of my age!
To me was every science known,
And every language was my own.
The sun beheld my daily toil,
I labour'd o'er the midnight oil,
And hid in woods, conceal'd from view
Whate'er I was, whate'er I knew.
In short, consum'd with learned care,
I liv'd, I died.—I rooted here!
For Heaven, that's pleas'd with doing good,
To make me useful, made me wood.

INSCRIPTION FOR A TREE*.

ON THE TERRACE AT NUNEHAM, OXFORDSHIRE.

THIS tree was planted by a female hand,
In the gay dawn of rustic beauty's glow;

* This tree is well known to the country people by the name of Bab's Tree. It was planted by one Barbara Wyatt, who was so much attached to it, that, on the removal of the village of Nuneham, to where it is now built, she earnestly entreated that she might still remain in her old habitation. Her request was complied with, and her cottage not pulled down till after her death.

And fast beside it did her cottage stand, [snow.

When age had cloath'd the matron's head with
To her, long us'd to nature's simple ways,

This single spot was happiness complete;
Her tree could shield her from the noon-tide blaze,
And from the tempest's green her little seat.

Here with her Collin oft the faithful maid

Had led the dance, the envious youths among:
Here, when his aged bones in earth were laid,

The patient matron turn'd her wheel, and sung.
She felt her loss; yet felt it as she ought,

Nor dar'd 'gainst nature's general law exclaim;
But check'd her tears, and to her children taught

That well-known truth, "Their lot would be
"the same." [shores

Though Thames before her flow'd, his farther
She ne'er explor'd; contented with her own.

And distant Oxford, though she saw its towers,
To her ambition was a world unknown.

Did dreadful tales the clowns from market bear
Of kings and tumults, and the courtier train,

She coldly listen'd with unheeding ear,
And good queen Anne, for aught she car'd,

might reign.

The sun her day, the seasons mark'd her year,
She toil'd, she slept, from care, from envy free,

For what had she to hope, or what to fear,
Blest with her cottage, and her favourite tree,

Hear this ye great, whose proud possessions spread
O'er earth's rich surface to no place confin'd;

Ye learn'd in arts, in men, in manners read,
Who boast as wide an empire o'er the mind,

With reverence visit her august domain;
To her unletted memory bow the knee:

She found that happiness you seek in vain,
Blest with a cottage, and a single tree.

INSCRIPTION

ON THE PEDESTAL OF AN URN.

Erected in the flower-garden at Nuneham, by G. S.
Harcourt, and the Honourable Elizabeth Vernon, Viscount and Viscountess Nuneham. Sacred to the memory of Frances Poole, Viscountess Palmerston.

HERE shall our ling'ring footsteps oft be found,
This is her shrine, and consecrates the ground.

Here living sweets around her altar rise,
And breathe perpetual incense to the skies.

Here too the thoughtless and the young may
tread,

Who shun the drearier mansions of the dead;
May here be taught what worth the world has known.

Her wit, her sense, her virtues were her own;
To her peculiar—and for ever lost

To those who knew, and therefore lov'd her most.
O, if kind pity steal on virtue's eye,

Check not the tear, nor stop the useful sigh;
From soft humanity's ingenuous flame

A wish may rise to emulate her fame,
And some faint image of her worth restore,

When those who now lament her are no more.

AN EPITAPH.

HERE lies a youth, (ah wherefore breathless lies!)
Learn'd without pride, and diffidently wise.

Mild to all faults, which from weak nature flow'd;
Fond of all virtues, whereof'er bestow'd,

Who never gave, nor slightly took offence,
The best good-nature, and the best good sense.
Who living hop'd, and dying felt no fears,
His only sting of death, a parent's tears.

EPITAPH IN WESTMINSTER-ABBEY.

TO THE MEMORY OF MRS FRITCHARD.

This tablet is placed here by the voluntary subscription of those who admired and esteemed her. She retired from the stage, of which she had long been the ornament, in the month of April 1768, and died at Bath in the month of August following; in the 57th year of her age.

HER comic vein had every charm to please,
'Twas nature's dictates breath'd with nature's ease.

Ev'n when her powers sustain'd the tragic load,
Full, clear, and just th' harmonious accents flow'd;
And the big passions of her feeling heart
Burst freely forth, and sham'd the mimic art.

Oft, on the scene, with colours not her own,
She painted vice, and taught us what to shun:
One virtuous track her real life pursued,
That nobler part was uniformly good,
Each duty there to such perfection wrought,
That, if the precepts fail'd, th' example taught.

ON THE LATE

IMPROVEMENTS AT NUNEHAM,

THE SEAT OF THE EARL OF HARCOURT.

DAME nature, the goddess, one very bright day,
In strolling through Nuneham, met Brown in her way:

And bless me, she said, with an insolent sneer,
I wonder that fellow will dare to come here.
What more than I did has your impudence plann'd?
The lawn, wood, and water, are all of my hand;
In my very best manner, with Themis's scales,
I lifted the hills, and I scoop'd out the vales;
With Sylvan's own umbrage I grac'd ev'ry brow,
And pour'd the rich Thames through the meadows below. [mand

I grant it, he cry'd; to your sov'reign com-
I bow, as I ought.—Gentle lady, your hand;
The weather's inviting, so let us move on;
You know what you did, and now see what I've done.

I, with gratitude, own you have reason to plead,
That to these happy scenes you were bounteous indeed:

My lovely materials were many and great!
(For sometimes, you know, I'm oblig'd to create).
But say in return, my adorable dame,
To all you see here, can you lay a just claim?
Were there no lighter parts which you finish'd in haste,
Or left, like a friend, to give scope to my taste?
Who drew o'er the surface, did you, or did I,
The smooth-flowing outline, that steals from the eye*.

* The first two words in this couplet have identical, rather than corresponding sounds, and therefore only appear to rhyme. This defect, however, may easily be

The soft undulations, both distant and near,
That heave from the lawns, and yet scarcely appear?

(So bends the ripe harvest the breezes beneath,
As if earth was in slumber, and gently took breath),
Who thin'd, and, and who group'd, and who feather'd those trees,

Who bade the slopes fall with that delicate ease,
Who cast them in shade, and who plac'd them in light,

Who bade them divide, and who bade them unite?
The ridges are melted, the boundaries gone:
Observe all these changes, and candidly own
I have cloath'd you when naked, and, when over-drest,

I have stripp'd you again to your boddice and vest;
Conceal'd ev'ry blemish, each beauty display'd,
As Reynolds would picture some exquisite maid,
Each spirited feature would happily place,
And shed o'er the whole inexpressible grace.

One question remains. Up the green of yon steep,
Who threw the bold walk with that elegant sweep?

—There is little to see, till the summit we gain;
Nay, never draw back, you may climb without pain,

And, I hope, will perceive how each object is caught,

And is lost in exactly the point where it ought.
That ground of your moulding is certainly fine,
But the swell of that knoll and those openings are mine.

The prospect, wherever beheld, must be good,
But has ten times its charms, when you burst from this wood, [hold!

A wood of my planting.—The goddess cried,
'Tis grown very hot, and 'tis grown very cold:
She fann'd and she shudder'd, she cough'd and she sneez'd,

Inclin'd to be angry, inclin'd to be pleas'd,
Half smil'd, and half pouted—then turn'd from the view, [drew.

And dropp'd him a curtsy, and blushing with-
Yet soon recollecting her thoughts, as she pass'd,

“ I may have my revenge on this fellow at last:

“ For a lucky conjecture comes into my head,

“ That, whate'er he has done, and whate'er he has said,

“ The world's little malice will balk his design:

“ Each fault they call his, and each excellence
“ mine.”

TO LADY NUNEHAM,

NOW COUNTESS OF HARCOURT.

On the death of her sister, the Honourable Catherine Venables Vernon, June 1775.

MILD as the opening morn's serene'st ray,
Mild as the close of summer's softest day,
Her form, her virtues, (fram'd alike to please
With artless grace and unassuming ease),

removed, by transposing the two verses, and reading them thus:

“ That sweet-flowing outline, that steals from
“ the view,

“ Whose w o'er the surface, did I, or did you

M

Nor blush that hence your origin we trace:
 'Twas thus immortal heroes sprung of old
 Strong from the stol'n embrace: by such as you,
 Unhous'd, uncloth'd, unletter'd, and unfed,
 Were kingdoms modell'd, cities taught to rise,
 Firm laws enacted, freedom's rights maintain'd,
 The gods and patriots of an infant world!

Let others meanly chant in tuneless song
 The black-hoe race, whose mercenary tribes,
 Allur'd by halfpence, take their morning stand
 Where streets divide, and to their proffer'd stools
 Solicit wand'ring feet; vain pensioners,
 And placemen of the crowd! Not so you pour
 Your blessings on mankind. Nor traffic vile
 Be your employment deem'd, ye last remains
 Of public spirit, whose laborious hands,
 Uncertain of reward, bid kennels know
 Their wonted bounds, remove the bord'ring filth,
 And give th' obstructed ordure where to glide.

What though the pitying passenger bestows
 His unextorted boon, must they refuse
 The well-earn'd bounty, scorn th' obtruded ore?
 Proud were the thought and vain. And shall not we

Repay their kindly labours, men like them,
 With gratitude unsought? I, too, have oft-
 Seen in our streets the wither'd hands of age
 Toil in th' industrious task; and can we there
 Be thrifty niggards? Haply they have known
 Far better days, and scatter'd liberal round
 The scanty pittance we afford them now.
 Soon from this office grant them their discharge,
 Ye kind church-wardens! take their meagre limbs,
 Shiv'ring with cold and age, and wrap them warm
 In those blest mansions charity has rais'd.

But you of younger years, while vigour knits
 Your lab'ring sinews, urge the generous task,
 Nor lose in fruitless brawls the precious hours
 Assign'd to toil. Be your contentions, who
 First in the dark'ning streets, when Autumn sheds
 Her earliest showers, shall clear th' obstructed pass;
 Or last shall quit the field, when Spring distills
 Her moist'ning dews, prolific there in vain.
 So may each lusty scavenger, ye fair,
 Fly ardent to your arms; and every maid,
 Ye gentle youths, be to your wishes kind;
 Whether Ostrea's fishy fumes allure,
 As Venus' tresses fragrant; or the sweets
 More mild and rural from her stall who toils
 To feast the sages of the Samian school.

Nor ever may your hearts, elate with pride,
 Desert this sphere of love; for should ye, youths,
 When blood boils high, and some more lucky chance

Has swell'd your stores, pursue the tawdry band
 That romp from lamp to lamp—for health expect
 Disease, for fleeting pleasure soul remorse,

And daily, nightly, agonizing pains.
 In vain you call for Æsculapius' aid
 From Whitecross Alley, or the azure posts
 Which beam through Haydon Yard: the god demands

More ample offerings, and rejects your prayer.
 And you, ye fair, O let me warn your breasts
 To shun deluding men: for some there are,
 Great lords of counties, mighty men of war,
 And well-dress'd courtiers, who with leering eye
 Can in the face begim'd with dirt discern
 Strange charms, and pant for Cynthia in a cloud.

But let Lardella's fate avert your own.
 Lardella once was fair, the early boast
 Of proud St. Giles's, from its ample pound
 To where the column points the seven-fold day.
 Happy, thrice happy, had she never known
 A street more spacious! but ambition led
 Her youthful footsteps, artless, unassur'd,
 To Whitehall's fatal pavement. There she ply'd
 Like you the active broom. At sight of her
 The coachman dropp'd his lash, the porter oft
 Forgot his burden, and with wild amaze
 The tall well-booted sentry, arm'd in vain,
 Lean'd from his horse, to gaze upon her charms.

But fate reserv'd her for more dreadful ills:
 A lord beheld her, and with powerful gold
 Seduc'd her to his arms. What can not gold
 Effect, when aided by the matron's tongue,
 Long tried and practis'd in the trade of vice,
 Against th' unwary innocent! A while
 Dazzled with splendour, giddy with the height
 Of unexperienc'd greatness, she looks down
 With thoughtless pride, nor sees the gulf beneath.
 But soon, too soon, the high-wrought transport sinks

In cold indifference, and a newer face
 Alarms her restless lover's fickle heart.
 Distress'd, abandon'd, whither shall she fly?
 How urge her former task, and brave the winds
 And piercing rains with limbs whose daintier sense

[now,
 Shrinks from the evening breeze? Nor has she
 Sweet innocence, thy calmer heart-felt aid,
 To solace or support the pangs she feels.

Why should the weeping muse pursue her steps
 Through the dull round of infamy, through haunts
 Of public lust, and every painful stage
 Of ill-feign'd transport, and uneasy joy?
 Too sure she tried them all, till her sunk eye
 Lost its last languish; and the bloom of health,
 Which revell'd once on beauty's virgin cheek,
 Was pale disease, and meagre penury.
 Then loath'd, deserted, to her life's last pang,
 In bitterness of soul, she curs'd in vain
 Her proud betrayer, curs'd her fatal charms,
 And perish'd in the streets from whence she sprung

FATAL CONSTANCY; OR, LOVE IN TEARS.

A SKETCH OF A

TRAGEDY IN THE HEROIC TASTE.

"Sed vetere patres quod non potuere vetare."

OVID.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE following sketch of a tragedy, though interrupted with breaks and et ceteras (which are left to be supplied by the fancy of the reader), is nevertheless a continued soliloquy spoken by the hero of the piece, and may be performed by one actor, with all the starts, graces, and theatrical attitudes in practice at present.

If any young author should be ambitious of writing on this model, he may begin his preface, or his advertisement, which is the more fashionable term, by observing, that "it is a melancholy contemplation to every lover of literature, to behold that universal defect of science which is the disgrace of the present times." He may then proceed to assert, "that every species of fine writing is at its very lowest ebb; that the reign of * was what might properly enough be styled the golden age of dramatic poetry; that since that happy era, genius itself has gradually decayed, till at length, if he may be allowed the expression, the effete vires of nature, by he knows not what fatality, seem quite exhausted."

In his dedication, if to a lord—the proper topics are his lordship's public spirit; the noble stand which he made in the cause of liberty, but more particularly his heroic disinterestedness, in hiding from the world his own spirited performances, that those of inferior authors might have a chance for success.

If to a lady—after the usual compliments of wit, beauty, elegance of taste, and every social virtue, he must by no means forget, that like Prometheus he has endeavoured to steal fire from heaven; and that the finest and most animated touches in the character of Lindamira, are but faint copies of the perfections of his patroness.

He may take hints for his prologue from the following lines:

"Critics, to-night at your dread bar appears
"A virgin-author, aw'd by various fears.
"Should ye once hiss, poor man, he dies away,
"So much he trembles for his first essay;
"And therefore humbly hopes to gain your vote
"—For the best play that ever yet was wrote.
"Athens and Rome, the Stagirite, old Ben,
"Cornille's sublimity, exact Racine,

"Rowe's flowing lines, and Otway's tender
"part,
"How Southern wounds, and Shakspeare tears
"the heart,
"Rules, nature, strength, truth, greatness, taste,
"and art, &c. &c. &c.

ACT I.

A ROOM OF STATE.

The Hero and his Friend meeting.

[If this manner of opening the play, though almost universally practised, should be thought too simple and unaffecting, the curtain may rise slowly to soft music, and discover the hero in a reclining, pensive posture, who, upon the entrance of his friend, and the ceasing of the symphony, may start from his couch, and come forward.]

WELCOME, my friend; thy absence long has torn
My bleeding breast—nor hast thou heard as yet
My hapless story. 'Twas that fatal morn,
The frighted sun seem'd conscious of my grief,
And hid himself in clouds, the tuneful birds
Forgot their music, &c.—O Lyfimachus,
Think'st thou she e'er can listen to my vows?
Think'st thou the king can e'er refuse her to me?
O if he should!—I cannot bear the thought—
The shipwreck'd mariner, the tortur'd wretch
That on the rack, the traveller that fees
In pathless deserts the pale light's last gleam
Sink in the deep abyss, distracted, lost—
But soft ye now, for Lindamira comes.
Ah, cruel maid! &c. &c. &c.
And dost thou yield? Ye waters, gently glide;
Wind, catch the sound, O thou transcending fair!
Stars, fall from heaven; and suns, forget to rise;
And chaos come, when Lindamira dies!

[Exeunt embracing.]

ACT II.

THE PRESENCE CHAMBER.

The Hero, solus.

How frail is man! what fears, what doubts perplex
His firmest resolutions! Sure the gods*, &c.

* It is a usual complaint in tragedy, as well as in common life, that the gods have not made us as they should have done.

But hark! yon trumpet's sprightly notes declare
The king's approach: be still, my flut'ring heart.
O royal Sir! if e'er thy groveling slave, &c.

[Kneeling.

Refus'd! O indignation!
Is it day?

[Rising hastily.

Do I behold the sun?—Thou tyrant, monster—
Down, down allegiance to the blackest hell.
I cannot, will not bear it.—O my fair,
And art thou come to witness my disgrace?
And is it possible that charms like thine
Could spring from such a fire?—Why dost thou weep?

Say, can a father's harsh commands controul—
Unkind and cruel! then thou never lovedst.
Curs'd be the treacherous sex, curs'd be the hour,
Curs'd be the world, and every thing—but her!
By heaven, she faints! Ah, lift those lovely eyes,
Turn on this faithful breast their cheering beams!
—O joy! O ecstasy! and wilt thou seek
With me some happier land, some safer shore?
At night I'll meet thee in the palmy grove,
When the pale moon beams, conscious of the theft
—Till then a long adieu!
The merchant thus, &c.

[Exeunt severally, languishing at each other.

ACT III.

THE PALMY GROVE.

The Hero, solus.

Night, black-brow'd night, queen of the ebony
wand,

Now o'er the world has spread her solemn reign.
The glow-worm twinkles, and from every flower
The pearly dews return the pale reflex
Of Cynthia's beams, each drop a little moon!
Hark, Lindamira comes!—No, 'twas the breath
Of zephyr panting on the leafy spray.
Perhaps he lurks in yonder woodbine bower,
To steal soft kisses from her lips, and catch
Ambrosial odours from her passing sighs.
O thief!—

She comes; quick let us haste away.
The guards pursue us? heavens!—Come then,
my love,

Fly, fly this moment. [Here a long conference upon love, virtue, the moon, &c. till the guards come up.

—Dogs, will ye tear her from me?

Ye must not, shall not—O my heart-strings crack,
My head turns round, my starting eyeballs hang
Upon her parting steps—I can no more—

So the first man, from paradise exil'd,
With fond reluctance leaves the blooming wild:
Around the birds in pleasing concert sing,
Beneath his feet th' unbidden flow'rets spring;
On verdant hills the flocks unnumber'd play,
Through verdant vales meand'ring rivers stray;
Blossoms and fruits at once the trees adorn,
Eternal roses bloom on every thorn,
And join Pomona's lap to Amalthæa's horn.

[Exeunt, torn off on different sides.

ACT IV.

A PRISON.

The Hero in Chains.

Ye deep, dark dungeons, and hard prison walls,
Hard as my fate, and darksome as the grave

To which I hasten, wherefore do ye bathe
Your rugged bosoms with unwholesome dews
That seem to weep in mockery of my woe?
—But see! some angel brightness breaks the gloom.
'Tis Lindamira comes! So breaks the morn
On the reviving world. Thou faithful fair!

[Approaching to embrace her.

—Curse on my fetters, how they bind my limbs,
Nor will permit me take one chaste embrace.
Yet come, O come!—

What say'st thou? Force thee to it!
Thy father force thee to Orosius' arms!
He cannot, will not, shall not.—O my brain!
Darkness and devils! Burst my bonds, ye powers,
That I may tear him peaceful from the earth,
And scatter him to all the winds of heaven.
—What means that bell?—O 'tis the found of death!

Alas, I had forgot I was to die!
Let me reflect on death, &c.—

But what is death,
Racks, tortures, burning pincers, floods of fire,
What are ye all to disappointed love?
Drag, drag me hence, ye ministers of fate,
From the dire thought—Orosius must enjoy her!
Death's welcome now—Orosius must enjoy her!
Hang on her lip, pant on her breast!—O gods!
I see the lustful satyr grasp her charms,
I see him melting in her amorous arms:
Fiends seize me, furies lash me, vultures tear,
Hell, horror, madness, darkness, and despair!

[Runs off to execution.

ACT V.

THE AREA BEFORE THE PALACE.

The Hero and Soldiers.

I thank you, friends; I thank you, fellow-soldiers:
Ye gave me liberty, ye gave me life.

Yet what are those? Alas, ye cannot give
My Lindamira to my longing arms.
O I have search'd in vain the palace round,
Explor'd each room, and trac'd my steps again,
Like good Æneas through the streets of Troy
When lost Creusa, &c.—

Ha, by heaven she comes!
'Tis she, 'tis she, and we shall still be blest!
We shall, we shall!—But why that heaving breast?
Why floats that hair dishevell'd to the wind?
Why burst the tears in torrents from her eyes?
Speak, Lindamira, speak!—

Distraction! No,
He could not dare it. What, this dreadful night,
When the dire thunder rattled o'er his head,
Marry thee! bed thee! force thee to be his!
Defile that heaven of charms!—What means thy rage?

Thou shalt not die! O wrest the dagger from her!
Thou kill art mine, still, still to me art pure
As the soft fleecy snow on Alpine hills.
Ere the warm breath of Spring pollutes its whiteness.

—O gods, she dies! And dost thou bear me, earth?
Thus, thus I follow my adventurous love,
And we shall rest together.

Ha, the king!
But let him come; I am beyond his reach,
He cannot curse me more. See, tyrant, see,
And triumph in the mischief thou hast caus'd.

—By heaven he weeps! O, if humanity
 Can touch thy flinty heart, hear my last prayer;
 Be kind, and lay me in the same cold grave
 Thus with my love; one winding-sheet shall hold
 Our wretched reliques, and one marble tomb
 Tell our sad story to the weeping world.
 —One kiss—'tis very dark—good night—heaven
 —Oh!

THE MORAL.

Let cruel fathers learn from woes like these,
 To wed their daughters where those daughters
 please.
 Nor erring mortals hope true joys to prove,
 When such dire ills attend on virtuous love.

EPILOGUE.

SPOKEN BY LINDAMIRA.

STRANGE rules, good folks! these poets are so nice,
 They turn our mere amusements into vice.
 Lard! must we women of our lives be lavish,
 Because those huge strong creatures men will ravish!
 I'll swear I thought it hard, and think so still,
 To die for---being pleas'd against one's will.

 But you, ye fair and brave, for virtue's sake,
 These spotless scenes to your protection take.

O D E S.

ODE I.

FOR HIS * MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, NOV. 10. 1758.

THE ARGUMENT.

ABOUT the year 963 Ottoberto, of the family of Este, passed from Italy into Germany with the Emperor Otho the Great. Azo, his descendant in the next century, by marriage with the daughter of Welfus, Count Aldorf, inherited the dominions of the family in Suabia. Welfus, a son of that marriage, received the dukedom of Bavaria from the emperor Henry the Fourth, in 1061. The descendants of Welfus became afterwards possessed of all those duchies which lie between the Elbe and the Weser (Brunswick, Wolfenbuttle, Lunenburgh, Zell, Hanover, &c.); and in the year 1714, George the First, Duke and Elector of Hanover, succeeded to the throne of Great Britain.

WHEN Othbert left th' Italian plain,
 And soft Atefté's green domain,
 Attendant on imperial sway
 Where fame and Otho led the way,
 The genius of the Julian hills
 (Whose piny fummits nod with snow,
 Whose naiads pour their thousand rills
 To swell th' exulting Po),
 An eager look prophetic cast,
 And hail'd the hero as he pass'd.

Hail, all hail, the woods replied,
 And echo on her airy tide [side.
 Roll'd the long murmurs down the mountain's

The voice resum'd again: " Proceed,
 " Nor cast one ling'ring look behind;
 " By those who toil for virtue's meed,
 " Be every softer thought resign'd;
 " Nor social home, nor genial air,
 " Nor glowing suns, are worth thy care:
 " New realms await thee in a harsher sky,
 " There and thy chosen race from Azo's nuptial tie.
 " 'Tis glory wakes; her active flame
 " Nor time shall quench, nor danger tame;

* George the Second.

" Nor * Boia's amplest range confine;
 " Though Guelpho reigns, the Guelphic line.
 " Yon northern star, which dimly gleams
 " Athwart the twilight veil of eve,
 " Must point their path to distant streams:
 " And many a wreath shall victory weave,
 " And many a palm shall fame display
 " To grace the warriors on their way,
 " Till regions bow to their commands
 " Where Albis widens through the lands,
 " And vast Visurgis spreads his golden sands.
 " Nor rest they there. Yon guiding fire
 " Still shines aloft, and gilds the main!
 " Not Lion Henry's † fond desire
 " To grasp th' Italian realms again,
 " Nor warring winds, nor wint'ry seas,
 " Shall stop the progress fate decrees;
 " For lo! Britannia calls to happier coasts,
 " And vales more verdant far than soft Atefté
 " boasts.
 " Behold, with euphrasy I clear
 " Thy visual nerve, and fix it there,
 " Where, crown'd with rocks grotesque and
 " steep,
 " The white isle rises o'er the deep!

* Bavaria.

† Henry the Lion, Duke of Bavaria, Saxony, &c. was one of the greatest heroes of the twelfth century. He united in his own person the hereditary dominions of five families. His claims upon Italy hindered him from joining with the Emperor Frederic the First, in his third attack upon the Pope, though he had assisted him in the two former; for which he was stripped of his dominions by that Emperor, and died in 1195, possessed only of those duchies which lie between the Elb and the Weser.

From this Henry, and a daughter of Henry the Second of England, his present Majesty is lineally descended.

" There glory rests. For there arrive
 " Thy chosen sons; and there attain
 " To the first title fate can give,
 " The father-kings of free-born men!
 " Proceed; rejoice; descend the vale,
 " And bid the future monarchs hail!"
 Hail, all hail, the hero cried;
 And echo on her airy tide
 Pursued him, murmuring down the mountain's side.

'Twas thus, O king, to heroes old
 The mountains breath'd the strain divine,
 Ere yet her volumes Fame enroll'd
 To trace the wonders of thy line;
 Ere freedom yet on ocean's breast
 Had northward fix'd her halcyon nest;
 Or Albion's oaks descending to the main
 Had roll'd her thunders wide, and claim'd the wat'ry reign.

But now each Briton's glowing tongue
 Proclaims the truths the genius sung,
 On Brunswick's name with rapture dwells,
 And hark! the general chorus swells:
 " May years on happy years roll o'er,
 " Till glory close the shining page,
 " And our ill-fated sons deplore
 " * The shortness of a Nestor's age!
 " Hail, all hail! on Albion's plains
 " The friend of man and freedom reigns!
 " Echo, waft the triumph round,
 " Till Gallia's utmost shores rebound,
 " And all her bulwarks tremble at the found."

ODE II.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1759.

Ye guardian powers, to whose command,
 At nature's birth, th' Almighty mind
 The delegated task assign'd
 To watch o'er Albion's favour'd land,
 What time your hosts with choral lay,
 Emerging from its kindred deep,
 Applausive hail'd each verdant deep,
 And white rock, glittering to the new-born day!
 Angelic bands, where'er ye rove
 Whilst lock'd in sleep creation lies:
 Whether to genial dews above
 You melt the congregated skies,
 Or teach the torrent streams below
 To wake the verdure of the vale,
 Or guide the varying winds that blow
 To speed the coming, or the parting, gale:
 Where'er ye bend your roving flight,
 Whilst now the radiant lord of light
 Winds to the north his sliding sphere,
 Avert each ill, each bliss improve,
 And teach the minutes as they move
 To bless the opening year.

Already Albion's lifted spear,
 And rolling thunders of the main,
 Which justice sacred laws maintain,
 Have taught the haughty Gaul to fear.

* " Nestora brevitas senectæ."

Musæ Anglicanæ.

On other earths, in other skies,
 Beyond old ocean's western bound,
 Though bleeds afresh th' eternal wound,
 Again Britannia's cross triumphant flies.
 To British George, the king of isles,
 The tribes that rove th' Arcadian snows,
 Redeem'd from Gallia's polish'd wiles,
 Shall breathe their voluntary vows:
 Where nature guards her last retreat,
 And pleas'd Astrea lingers still;
 While faith yet triumphs o'er deceit,
 And virtue reigns, from ignorance of ill.
 Yet, angel powers, though Gallia bend,
 Though fame with all her wreaths, attend
 On bleeding war's tremendous sway,
 The sons of leisure still complain,
 And musing science sighs in vain,
 For peace is still away.

Go then, ye faithful guides!
 Of her returning steps, angelic band,
 Explore the sacred seats where peace resides,
 And waves her olive wand.
 Bid her the wastes of war repair.
 —O fouthward seek the flying fair,
 For not on poor Germania's haras'd plain,
 Nor where the Vistula's proud current swells,
 Nor on the borders of the frighted Seine,
 Nor in the depths of Russia's snows she dwells.

Yet O, where'er, deserting freedom's isle,
 She gilds the slave's delusive toil;
 Whether on Ebro's banks she strays,
 Or fighting traces Taio's winding ways,
 Or soft Aufonia's shores her feet detain,
 O bring the wanderer back, with glory in her train.

ODE III.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY,

November 10. 1759.

BEGIN the song—Ye subject choirs,
 The bard whom liberty inspires
 Wakes into willing voice th' accordant lays.—
 Say, shall we trace the hero's flame
 From the first soft'ring gale of fame,
 Which bade the expanding bosom pant for
 praise?
 Or hail the star whose orient beam
 Shed influence on his natal hour,
 What time the nymphs of Leyna's stream,
 Emerging from their wat'ry bower,
 Sung their soft carols through each æther shade,
 And for the pregnant fair invok'd Lucina's aid?

No. Haste to Scheld's admiring wave,
 Distinguish'd amidst thousands brave,
 Where the young warrior flesh'd his eager sword:

While Albion's troops with rapture view'd
 The ranks confus'd, the Gaul subdu'd,
 And hail'd, prophetic hail'd, their future lord,
 Waiting the chief's maturer nod,
 On his plum'd helmet vict'ry fate,
 While suppliant nations round him bow'd,
 And Austria trembled for her fate,

Till, at his bidding slaughter swell'd the Mayne,
And half her blooming fons proud Gallia wept in vain.

But what are wreaths in battle won?
And what the tribute of amaze
Which man too oft mistaken pays
To the vain idol shrine of false renown?
The noblest wreaths the monarch wears
Are those his virtuous rule demands,
Unstain'd by widows' or by orphans' tears,
And woven by his subjects' hands.
Comets may rise, and wonder mark their way
Above the bounds of nature's sober laws,
But 'tis th' all-cheering lamp of day,
The permanent, th' unerring cause,
By whom th' enliven'd world its course maintains,
By whom all nature smiles, and beauteous order reigns.

ODE IV.

FOR THE NEW YEAR, 1760.

AGAIN the sun's revolving sphere
Wakes into life th' impatient year,
The white-wing'd minutes haste:
And, spite of fortune's fickle wheel,
Th' eternal fates have fix'd their seal
Upon the glories of the past.
Suspended high in memory's fane,
Beyond ev'n envy's soaring rage,
The deeds survive, to breathe again
In faithful history's future page;
Where distant times shall wond'ring read
Of Albion's strength, of battles won,
Of faith restor'd, of nations freed;
Whilst round the globe her conquests run,
From the first blush of orient day,
To where descend his noontide beams,
On sable Afric's golden streams,
And where at eve the gradual gleams decay.

So much already hast thou prov'd
Of fair success, O best below'd,
O first of favour'd isles!
What can thy fate assign thee more,
What whiter boon has Heaven in store,
To bless thy monarch's ceaseless toils?
Each rising season, as it flows,
Each month exerts a rival claim;
Each day with expectation glows,
Each fleeting hour demands its fame.
Around thy genius waiting stands
Each future child of anxious time:
See how they press in shadowy bands,
As from thy fleecy rocks sublime
He rolls around prophetic eyes,
And earth, and sea, and Heaven surveys:
"O grant a portion of thy praise!
"O bid us all," they cry, "with lustre rise!"

Genius of Albion, hear their prayer,
O bid them all with lustre rise!
Beneath thy tutelary care,
The brave, the virtuous, and the wise,

Shall mark each moment's winged speed
With something that disdains to die,
The hero's, patriot's, poet's meed,
And passport to eternity!
Around thy rocks while ocean raves,
While yonder sun revolves his radiant car,
The land of freedom with the land of slaves,
As nature's friends, must wage illustrious war.
Then be each deed with glory crown'd,
Till smiling peace resume her throne;
Till not on Albion's shores alone
The voice of freedom shall resound,
But every realm shall equal blessings find,
And man enjoy the birth-right of his kind.

ODE V.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR, 1761.

STILL must the muse, indignant, hear
The clanging trump, the rattling car,
And usher in each opening year
With groans of death, and sounds of war?
O'er bleeding millions, realms oppress,
The tuneful mourner sinks distress,
Or breathes but notes of woe:
And cannot Gallia learn to melt,
Nor feel what Britain long has felt
For her insulting foe?
Amidst her native rocks secure,
Her floating bulwarks hovering round,
What can the sea-girt realm endure,
What dread, through all her wat'ry bound?
Great queen of ocean, she defies
All but the power who rules the skies,
And bids the storms engage;
Inferior foes are dash'd and lost,
As breaks the white wave on her coast
Consum'd in idle rage.
For alien sorrows heaves her generous breast,
She proffers peace to ease a rival's pain:
Her crowded ports, her fields in plenty dress,
Bless the glad merchant, and th' industrious swain.
Do blooming youths in battle fall?
True to their fame the funeral urn we raise;
And thousands, at the glorious call,
Aspire to equal praise.

Thee, glory, thee through climes unknown
Th' adventurous chief with zeal pursues;
And fame brings back from every zone
Fresh subjects for the British muse.
Tremendous as th' ill-omen'd bird
To frighted France thy voice was heard
From Mladen's echoing towers:
O'er Biscay's roar thy voice prevail'd;
And at thy word the rocks we scal'd,
And Canada is ours.
O potent queen of every breast
Which aims at praise by virtuous deeds,
Where'er thy influence shines confess
The hero acts, th' event succeeds.
But ah, must glory only bear,
Bellona-like, the vengeful spear?
To fill her mighty mind

Must bulwarks fall, and cities flame,
 And is her amplest field of fame
 The miseries of mankind?
 On ruins pil'd on ruins must the rise,
 And lend her rays to gild her fatal throne?
 Must the mild power who melts in vernal skies,
 By thunders only make his godhead known?
 No, be the omen far away;
 From yonder pregnant cloud a kinder gleam,
 Though faintly struggling into day,
 Portends a happier theme!—

—And who is he, of regal mien,
 Reclin'd on Albion's golden fleece,
 Whose polish'd brow and eye serene
 Proclaim him elder-born of peace?
 Another George!—Ye winds convey
 Th' auspicious name from pole to pole!
 Thames, catch the sound, and tell the subject sea
 Beneath whose sway its waters roll,
 The hoary monarch of the deep,
 Who sooth'd its murmurs with a father's care,
 Doth now eternal Sabbath keep,
 And leaves his trident to his blooming heir.
 O, if the muse aright divine,
 Fair peace shall bless his opening reign,
 And through its splendid progress shine,
 With every art to grace her train.
 The wreaths so late by glory won,
 Shall weave their foliage round his throne,
 Till kings, abash'd, shall tremble to be foes,
 And Albion's dreaded strength secure the world's repose.

ODE VI.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1761.

'Twas at the nectar'd feast of Jove,
 When fair Alcmena's son
 His destin'd course on earth had run
 And claim'd the thrones above,
 Around their king in deep debate,
 Conven'd, the heavenly synod sate,
 And meditated boons refin'd
 To grace the friend of human kind:
 When lo, to mark th' advancing god,
 Propitious Hermes stretch'd his rod,
 The roofs with music rung!
 For, from amidst the circling choir,
 Apollo struck th' alarming lyre,
 And thus the muses sung:
 "What boon divine would Heav'n bestow?
 "Ye gods unbend the studious bow,
 "The fruitless search give o'er,
 "Whilst we the just reward assign,
 "Let Hercules with Hebe join,
 "And youth unite with power!"

O sacred truth in emblem dress'd!
 Again the Muses sing,
 Again in Britain's blooming king
 Alcides stands confess'd.
 By temp'rance nurs'd, and early taught
 To shun the smooth fallacious draught
 Which sparkles high in Circe's bowl;
 To tame each hydra of the soul,

Each lurking pest, which mocks its birth,
 And ties his spirit down to earth,
 Immers'd in mortal coil;
 His choice was that severer road
 Which leads to virtue's calm abode,
 And well repays the toil.
 In vain ye tempt, ye specious harms,
 Ye flow'ry wiles, ye flatt'ring charms,
 That breathe from yonder bower;
 And Heav'n the just reward assigns,
 For Hercules with Hebe joins,
 And youth unites with power.

O, call'd by Heav'n to fill that awful throne,
 Where Edward, Henry, William, George, have
 shone,
 (Where love with rev'rence, laws with power agree,
 And 'tis each subject's birthright to be free)
 The fairest wreaths already won
 Are but a prelude to the whole:
 Thy arduous task is now begun,
 And, starting from a nobler goal,
 Heroes and kings of ages past
 Are thy compeers: extended high
 The trump of fame expects the blast,
 The radiant lists before thee lie,
 The field is time, the prize eternity!
 Beyond example's bounded light
 'Tis time to urge thy daring flight,
 And heights untry'd explore:
 O think what thou alone can't give,
 What blessings Britain may receive
 When youth unites with power.

ODE VII.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1762.

God of slaughter, quit the scene,
 Lay the crested helmet by;
 Love commands, and beauty's queen
 Rules the power who rules the sky.
 Janus, with well-omen'd grace,
 Mounts the year's revolving car,
 And forward turns his smiling face,
 And longs to close the gates of war.
 Enough of glory Albion knows.—
 Come, ye powers of sweet repose,
 On downy pinions move!
 Let the war-worn legions own
 Your gentler sway, and from the throne
 Receive the laws of love!

Yet, if justice still requires
 Roman arts, and Roman souls,
 Britain breathes her wonted fires,
 And her wonted thunders rolls.
 Added to our fairer isle
 Gallia mourns her bulwark gone:
 Conquest pays the price of toil,
 Either India is our own.
 Ye sons of freedom, grasp the sword;
 Pour, ye rich, th' imprison'd hoard,
 And teach it how to shine:
 Each selfish, each contracted aim
 To glory's more exalted claim
 Let luxury resign.

You too, ye British dames, may share
 If not the toils, and dangers of the war,
 At least its glory. From the Baltic shore,
 From Runic virtue's native shore,
 Fraught with the tales of ancient lore,
 Behold a fair instructress come!
 When the fierce* female tyrant of the north
 Claim'd every realm her conquering arms could
 gain,

When discord, red with slaughter, issuing forth,
 Saw Albert struggling with the victor's chain;
 The storm beat high, and shook the coast,
 Th' exhausted treasures of the land
 Could scarce supply th' embattled host,
 Or pay th' insulting foe's demand.

What then could beauty do? † She gave
 Her treasure'd tribute to the brave,
 To her own softness join'd the manly heart,
 Sustain'd the soldier's drooping arms,
 Confided in her genuine charms,
 And yielded every ornament of art.

—We want them not. Yet, O ye fair,
 Should Gallia, obstinately vain,
 To her own ruin urge despair,
 And brave th' acknowledg'd masters of the main:
 Should she through ling'ring years protract her fall,

Through seas of blood to her destruction wade,
 Say, could ye feel the generous call,
 And own the fair example here pourtray'd?
 Doubtless ye could. The royal dame

Would plead her dear adopted country's cause,
 And each indignant breast unite its flame,
 To save the land of liberty and laws.

ODE VIII.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4, 1762.

“Go Flora” (said the impatient queen
 Who shares great Jove's eternal reign)

“Go breathe on yonder thorn:

“Wake into bloom th' emerging rose,

“And let the fairest flower that blows

“The fairest month adorn.

“Sacred to me that month shall rise,

“Whatever † contests shake the skies

“To give that month a name:

“Her April buds let Venus boast,

“Let Maia range her painted host:

“But June is Juno's claim.

“And goddess, know, in after-times

“(I name not days, I name not climes)

* Margaret de Waldemar, commonly called the Semiramis of the North.

† In the year 1395, the ladies of Mecklenburgh to support their Duke Albert's pretensions to the crown of Sweden, and to redeem him when he was taken prisoner, gave up all their jewels to the public; for which they afterwards received great emoluments and privileges, particularly the right of succession in fiefs, which had before been appropriated to males only.

‡ Alluding to the contention between the goddesses in Ovid's Fasts, about naming the month of June.

“From nature's noblest throes
 “A human flower shall glad the earth,
 “And the same month disclose his birth,
 “Which bears the blushing rose.
 “Nations shall bless his mild command,
 “And fragrance fill th' exulting land,
 “Where'er I fix his throne.”——
 Britannia listen'd as she spoke,
 And from her lips prophetic broke,
 “The flower shall be my own.”

O goddess of connubial love,
 Thou sister, and thou wife of Jove,
 To thee the suppliant voice we raise!
 We name not months, we name not days,
 For where thy smiles propitious shine,
 The whole prolific year is thine.
 Accordant to the trembling strings,
 Hark, the general chorus swells,
 From every heart it springs,
 On every tongue it dwells.

Goddess of connubial love,
 Sister thou, and wife of Jove,
 Bid the genial powers that glide
 On ether's all-pervading tide,

Or from the fount of life that stream
 Mingling with the solar beam
 Bid them here at virtue's shrine,
 In chastest bands of union join.

Till many a George and many a Charlotte prove,
 How much to thee we owe, queen of connubial
 love!

ODE IX.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1763.

At length th' imperious lord of war

Yields to the fates their ebon car,

And frowning quits his toil:

Dash'd from his hand the bleeding spear

Now deigns a happier form to wear,

And peaceful turns the soil.

Th' insatiate furies of his train,

Revenge and hate, and fell disdain,

With heart of steel; and eyes of fire,

Who stain the sword which honours draws,

Who fully virtue's sacred cause,

To Stygian depths retire.

Unholy shapes, and shadows drear,

The pallid family of fear,

And rapine, still with shrieks pursued,

And meagre famine's squalid brood

Close the dire crew.—Ye eternal gates display

Your adamant folds, and shut them from the day!

For lo, in yonder pregnant skies

On billowy clouds the goddess lies,

Whose presence breathes delight,

Whose power th' obsequious seasons own,

And Winter loses half his frown,

And half her shades the night,

Soft-smiling peace! whom Venus bore,

When tutor'd by th' enchanting lore

Of Maia's blooming son,

She sooth'd the synod of the gods,

Drove discord from the blest abodes,

And Jove resum'd his throne.

Th' attendant graces gird her round,
 And sportive ease, with locks unbound,
 And every muse to leisure born,
 And plenty, with her twisted horn,
 While changeful commerce spreads his loosened
 sails, [vaits!
 Blow as ye list, ye winds, the reign of peace pre-

And low, to grace that milder reign,
 And add fresh lustre to the year,
 Sweet innocence adorns the train,
 In form and features, Albion's heir!
 A future George!—Propitious powers,
 Ye delegates of heaven's high King,
 Who guide the years, the days, the hours
 That float on time's progressive wing,
 Exert your influence, bid us know
 From parent worth what virtues flow!
 Be to less happy realms resign'd
 The warrior's unrelenting rage,
 We ask not kings of hero-kind,
 The storms and earthquakes of their age.
 To us be nobler blessings given:
 O teach us, delegates of Heaven,
 What mightier bliss from union springs!
 Future subjects, future kings,
 Shall bless the fair example shown,
 And from our character transcribe their own:
 "A people zealous to obey;
 "A monarch whose parental sway
 "Despises regal art:
 "His shield, the laws which guard the land;
 "His sword, each Briton's eager hand,
 "His throne, each Briton's heart."

ODE X.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1763.

COMMON births, like common things,
 Pass unheeded or unknown:
 Time but spreads or waves his wings,
 The phantom swells, the phantom's gone!
 Born for millions, monarchs rise,
 Heirs of infamy or fame.
 When the virtuous, brave, or wise,
 Demand our praise, with loud acclaim,
 We twine the festive wreath, the stirres adorn,
 'Tis not our king's alone, 'tis Britain's natal morn.
 Bright examples plac'd on high
 Shine with more distinguish'd blaze;
 Thither nations turn their eye,
 And grow virtuous as they gaze.
 Thoughtless ease and sportive leisure,
 Dwell in life's contracted sphere;
 Public is the monarch's pleasure,
 Public is the monarch's care:
 If Titus smiles, the observant world is gay;
 If Titus frowns or sighs, we sigh and love a day!
 Around their couch, around their board,
 A thousand ears attentive wait,
 A thousand busy tongues record
 The smallest whispers of the great.
 Happy those whom truth sincere
 And conscious virtue join to guide!
 Can they have a foe to fear,
 Can they have a thought to hide?
 VOL. XI.

Nobly they soar above th' admiring throng,
 Superior to the power, the will of acting wrong,
 Such may Britain find her kings!—
 Such the muse * of rapid wings
 Wafts to some sublimer sphere:
 Gods and heroes mingle there.
 Fame's eternal accents breathe,
 Black Cocytus howls beneath;
 Ev'n malice learns to blush, and hides her stings,
 —O such may Britain ever find her kings!

ODE XI.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1765.

SACRED to thee,
 O commerce, daughter of sweet liberty,
 Shall flow the annual train!
 Beneath a monarch's fostering care
 Thy sails unnumber'd swell in air,
 And darken half the main.
 From every cliff of Britain's coasts
 We see them toil, thy daring hosts
 Who bid our wealth increase,
 Who spreads our martial glory far,—
 The sons of fortitude in war,
 Of industry in peace.
 On woven wings,
 To where, in orient clime, the gray dawn springs,
 To where soft evening's ray
 Sheds its last blush, their course they steer,
 Meet, or o'ertake the circling year,
 Led by the lord of day.
 Whate'er the frozen poles provide,
 Whate'er the torrid regions hide
 From Sicius' fiercer flames,
 Of herb, or root, or gem, or ore,
 They grasp them all from shore to shore,
 And waft them all to Thames.
 When Spain's proud pendants wav'd in western
 skies,
 When Gerna's fleet on Indian billows hung,
 In either sea did ocean's genius rise,
 And the same truths in the same numbers sung.
 "Daring mortals, whither tend
 "These vain pursuits? Forbear, forbear!
 "These sacred waves no keel shall rend,
 "No streamers float on this sequester'd air!
 "Yes, yes, proceed, and conquer too;
 "Success be yours: But mortals, know,
 "Know, ye rash, adventurous bands,
 "To crush your high-blown pride,
 "Not for yourselves, or native lands,
 "You braye the seasons, and you stem the tide.
 "Nor Etyis, nor Iberus' stream,
 "Nor Tagus with his golden gleam,
 "Shall violently call their own
 "The dear-bought treasures of these worlds unknown.
 "A chosen race to freedom dear,
 "Untaught to injure as to fear,
 "By me conducted, shall exert their claims,
 "Shall glut my great revenge, and roll them all
 "to Thames."

* Pindar.

P

ODE XII.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1765.

HAIL to the rosy morn, whose ray
To lustre wakes th' auspicious day,
Which Britain holds so dear!
To this fair month of right belong
The festive dance, the choral song,
And pastimes of the year.
Whate'er the wint'ry colds prepar'd,
Whate'er the spring but faintly rear'd,
Now wears its brightest bloom;
A brighter blue enrobes the skies,
From laughing fields the zephyrs rise
On wings that breathe perfume.
The lark in air that warbling floats,
The wood-birds with their tuneful throats,
The streams that murmur as they flow,
The flocks that rove the mountain's brow,
The herds that through the meadows play,
Proclaim 'tis nature's holiday!

And shall the British lyre be mute,
Nor thrill through all its trembling strings,
With oaten reed, and pastoral flute,
Whilst every vale responsive rings?
To him we pour the grateful lay,
Who makes the season doubly gay:
For whom so late, our list'd eyes
With tears besought the pitying skies,
And won the cherub health to crown
A nation's prayer, and ease that breast
Which feels all sorrows but its own,
And seeks by blessing to be blest.
Fled are all the ghastly train,
Writhing pain, and pale disease;
Joy resumes his wonted reign,
The sun-beams mingle with the breeze,
And his own month, which health's gay livery wears, [years.
On the sweet prospect smiles of long [succeeding

ODE XIII.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1766.

HAIL to the man, so sings the Hebrew bard,
Whose numerous offspring grace his genial board:
Heaven's fairest gift, Heaven's best reward,
To those who honour, who obey his word.
What shall he fear, though drooping age
Unnerve his strength, and pointles sink his spear;
In vain the proud, in vain the mad shall rage;
He fears his God and knows no other fear.
Lo! at his call a duteous race
Spring eager from his lov'd embrace,
To shield the fire from whom their virtues rose;
And fly at each fever'd command,
Like arrows from the giant's hand,
In vengeance on his foes.
So Edward fought on Creffy's bleeding plain,
A blooming hero, great beyond his years.
So William fought—But cease the strain,
A loss so recent bathes the muse in tears.
So shall hereafter every son,—
Who now with prattling infancy relieves
Those anxious cares which wait upon a throne,
Where, ah, too oft, amidst the myrtles, weaves

The thorn its pointed anguish—So
Shall every youth his duty know
To guard the monarch's right, and people's weal;
And thou, great George, with just regard,
To Heav'n, shalt own the Hebrew bard
But sung the truths you feel.

Blest be the day which gave thee birth!
Let others tear the ravag'd earth,
And fell ambition's powers appear
In storms, which desolate the year.
Confess'd thy milder virtues shine,
Thou rul'st indeed, our hearts are thine.
By slender ties our kings of old
Their fabled right divine would vainly hold.
Thy juster claim ev'n freedom's sons can love,
The king who bends to Heav'n, must Heav'n itself approve.

ODE XIV.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1767.

WHEN first the rude o'er-peopled north
Pour'd his prolific offspring forth,
At large in alien climes to roam,
And seek a newer better home,
From the bleak mountain's barren head,
The marshy vale, th' ungrateful plain,
From cold and penury they fled
To warmer suns, and Ceres' golden reign.
At every step the breezes blew
Soft and more soft: the lengthen'd view
Did fairer scenes expand:
Unconscious of approaching foes,
The farm, the town, the city rose,
To tempt the spoiler's hand.
Not Britain's so. For nobler ends
Her willing daring sons the fends,
Fraught like the fabled car of old,
Which scatter'd blessings as it roll'd.
From cultur'd fields, from fleecy downs,
From vales that wear eternal bloom,
From peopled farms, and busy towns,
Where shines the ploughshare, and where sounds
the loom,
To sandy deserts, pathless woods,
Impending steep, and headlong floods,
She sends th' industrious swarm:
To where self-strangled nature lies,
Till social art shall bid her rise,
From Chaos into form.
Thus George and Britain blefs mankind.—
And lest the parent realm should find
Her numbers shrink, with flag unfurl'd
She stands, th' asylum of the world.
From foreign strands new subjects come,
New arts accede a thousand ways,
For here the wretched finds a home,
And all her portals charity displays.
From each proud master's hard command,
From tyrant zeal's oppressive hand,
What eager exiles fly!
"Give us, they cry, 'tis nature's cause,
"O give us liberty and laws
"Beneath a harsher sky!"
Thus George and Britain blefs mankind.—
Away, ye barks; the favouring wind

Springs from the east; ye prowls, divide
The vast Atlantic's heaving tide!
Britannia from each rocky height
Pursues you with applauding hands:
Afar, impatient for the freight,
See! the whole western world expecting stands!
Already fancy paints each plain,
The deserts nod with golden grain,
The wond'ring vales look gay,
The woodman's stroke the forests feel,
The lakes admit the merchant's keel—
Away, ye barks, away!

ODE XV.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1767.

FRIEND to the poor!—for sure, O king,
That godlike attribute is thine—
Friend to the poor; to thee we sing,
To thee our annual offerings bring,
And bend at mercy's throne.
In vain had nature deign'd to smile
Propitious on our favourite isle:
Emerging from the main:
In vain the genial source of day
Selected each indulgent ray
For Britain's fertile plain:
In vain yon bright surrounding skies
Bade all their clouds in volumes rise,
Their soft'ring dews distill'd:
In vain the wide and teeming earth
Gave all her buried treasures birth,
And crown'd the laughing field:
For lo! some fiend, in evil hour
Assuming famine's horrid mien,
Diffus'd her petrifying power
O'er thoughtless plenty's festive bower,
And blasted every green.
Strong panic terrors shook the land;
Th' obduratè breast, the griping hand
Were almost taught to spare;
For loud mistule, the scourge of crimes,
Mix'd with the madness of the times,
And rous'd a rustic war.
Whilst real want, with sigh sincere,
At home, in silence, dropp'd the tear,
Or rais'd th' imploring eye,
Foul riot's sons in torrents came,
And dar'd usurp thy awful name,
Thrice sacred misery!

Then George arose. His feeling heart
Inspir'd the nation's better part
With virtues like its own:
His pow'r controul'd th' insatiate train,
Whose av'rice grasp'd at private gain,
Regardless of a people's groan.
Like snows beneath th' all-cheering ray,
The rebel crowds dissolv'd away:
And justice, though the sword she drew,
Glanc'd lightly o'er th' offending crew,
And scarce selected, to avenge her woes,
A single victim from a host of foes.
Yes, mercy triumph'd; mercy shone confest,
In her own noblest sphere, a monarch's breast.
Forcibly mild did mercy shine,
Like the sweet month in which we pay

Our annual vows at mercy's shrine,
And hail our monarch's natal day.

ODE XVI.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1768.

LET the voice of music breathe,
Hail with song the new-born year!—
Though the frozen earth beneath
Feels not yet his influence near,
Already from his southern goal
The genial god who rules the day
Has bid his glowing axle roll,
And promis'd the return of May.
You ruffian blasts, whose pinions sweep
Impetuous o'er our northern deep,
Shall cease their fouds of war:
And, gradual as his power prevails,
Shall mingle with the softer gales
That sport around his car.

Poets should be prophets too,—
Plenty in his train attends;
Fruits and flowers of various hue
Bloom where'er her step the bends
Down the green hill's sloping side,
Winding to the vale below,
See she pours her golden tide!
Whilt, upon its airy brow,
Amidst his flocks, whom nature leads
To flowery feasts on mountains' heads,
Th' exulting shepherd lies:
And to th' horizon's utmost bound
Rolls his eye with transport round,
Then lifts it to the skies.

Let the voice of music breathe!
Twine, ye swains, the festal wreath!
Britain shall no more complain
Of niggard harvests, and a failing year:
No more the miser hoard his grain,
Regardless of the peasant's tear,
Whose hand laborious till'd the earth,
And gave those very treasures birth.

No more shall George, whose parent breast
Feels every pang his subjects know,
Behold a faithful land distressed,
Or hear one sigh of real woe.
But grateful mirth, whose decent bounds
No riot swells, no fear confounds,
And heart-felt ease, whose glow within
Exalts contentment's modest mien,
In every face shall smile confest,
And in his people's joy, the monarch too be blest.

ODE XVII.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1768.

PREPARE, prepare your songs of praise,
The genial month returns again,
Her annual rites when Britain pays
To her own monarch of the main.
Not on Phenicia's bending shore,
Whence commerce first her wings essay'd,
And dar'd th' unfathom'd deep explore,
Sincere vows the Tyrian paid

To that imaginary deity,
 Who bade him boldly seize the empire of the sea.
 What though no victim bull be led,
 His front with snow-white fillets bound;
 Nor fable chant the neighing steed;
 That issued when he smote the ground;
 Our felds a living incense breathe:
 Not Lihanus, nor Carmel's brow,
 To dress the bower, or form the wreath,
 More liberal fragrance could bestow.
 We too have herds and flocks, beside the rills
 That feed and rove, protected, o'er a thousand hills.

Secure, while George the sceptre sways
 (Whom will, whom int'rest, and whom duty draws
 To venerate and patronize the laws),
 Secure her open front does freedom raise.
 Secure the merchant ploughs the deep,
 His wealth his own: Secure the swains
 Amidst their rural treasures sleep,
 Lords of their little kingdoms of the plains
 Then to his day be honour given!
 May every choicest boon of Heaven
 His bright, distinguish'd reign adorn!
 Till white as Britain's fleece, old time shall shed
 His snows upon his reverend head,
 Commanding filial awe from senates yet unborn.

ODE XVIII.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1769.

PATRON of arts, at length by thee
 Their home is fix'd: thy kind decree
 Has plac'd their empire here.
 No more unheeded shall they waste
 Their treasures on the sickle taste
 Of each fantastic year.
 Judgment shall frame each chaste design,
 Nor e'er from truth's unerring line
 The sportive artist roam:
 Whether the breathing bust he forms,
 With nature's tints the canvas warms, [dome,
 Or swells, like Heaven's high arch, th' imperial Fancy, the wanderer, shall be taught
 To own severer laws:
 Spite of her wily wanton play,
 Spite of her lovely errors, which betray
 Th' enchanted soul to fond applause,
 Ev'n she, the wanderer, shall be taught
 That nothing truly great was ever wrought,
 Where judgment was away.

Through osier twigs th' acanthus rose:
 Th' idea charms, the artist glows:
 But 'twas his skill to please,
 Which bade the graceful foliage spread,
 To crown the stately column's head
 With dignity and ease.
 When great Apelles, pride of Greece,
 Frown'd on the almost finish'd piece,
 Despairing to succeed,
 What though the missile vengeance pass'd
 From his rash hand, the random cast
 Might dash the foam, but skill had form'd the steed.
 Nor less the Phidian arts approve
 Labour, and patient care,
 What'er the skilful artists trace,
 Laocoon's pangs, or soft Antinous' face,
 By skill, with that diviner air

The Delian god does all but move;
 'Twas skill gave terrors to the front of Jove,
 To Venus every grace.

—And shall each sacred seat,
 The vales of Arno, and the Tuscan stream,
 No more be visited with pilgrim feet?
 No more on sweet Hymettus' summits dream
 The fons of Albion? or below,
 Where Ilyssus' waters flow,
 Trace with awe the dear remains
 Of mould'ring urns, and mutilated fanes?
 Far be the thought. Each sacred seat,
 Each monument of ancient fame,
 Shall still be visited with pilgrim feet,
 And Albion gladly own from whence she caught
 the flame.
 Still shall her studious youth repair,
 Beneath their king's protecting care,
 To every clime which art has known;
 And rich with spoils from every coast
 Return, till Albion learn to boast
 An Athens of her own.

ODE XIX.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1770.

FORWARD, Janus, turn thine eyes,
 Future scenes in prospect view,
 Rising as the moments rise,
 Which form the fleeting year anew.
 Fresh beneath the scythe of time,
 Could the muse's voice avail,
 Joys should spring, and reach their prime,
 Bleoming ere the former fail,
 And every joy its tribute bring
 To Britain, and to Britain's king.
 Suns should warm the pregnant soil,
 Health in every breeze should blow;
 Plenty crown the peasant's toil,
 And shine upon his cheerful brow.
 Round the throne whilst duty waits,
 Duty join'd with filial love,
 Peace should triumph in our gates,
 And every distant fear remove;
 Till gratitude to Heav'n should raise
 The speaking eye, the song of praise.

Let the nations round in arms
 Stun the world with war's alarms,
 But let Britain still be found
 Safe within her wat'ry bound.
 Tyrant chiefs may realms destroy;
 Nobler is our monarch's joy.
 Of all that's truly great possess'd,
 And by blessing, truly blest.

Though comets rise, and wonder mark their way,
 Above the bounds of nature's sober laws,
 It is the all-cheering lamp of day,
 The permanent, the unerring cause,
 By whom th' enliven'd world its course maintains,
 By whom all nature smiles, and beauteous order
 reigns.

ODE XX.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1770.

DISCORD hence! the torch resign
 Harmony shall rule to-day.—

Whate'er thy busy fiends design
Of future ills in cruel play,
To torture or alarm mankind,
Lead th' insidious train away,
Some blacker hours for mischief find;
Harmony shall rule to-day.

Distinguish'd from the vulgar year,
And mark'd with Heaven's peculiar white,
This day shall grace the rolling sphere,
And ling'ring end its bright career,
Unwilling to be lost in night.
Discord, lead thy fiends away!
Harmony shall rule to-day.

Is there, intent on Britain's good,
Some angel hovering in the sky,
Whose ample view surveys her circling flood,
Her guardian rocks, that shine on high,
Her forests waving to the gales,
Her streams that glide through fertile vales,
Her lowing pastures, fleecy downs,
Towering cities, busy towns,
Is there who views them all with joy serene,
And breathes a blessing on the various scene?

O if there is, to him 'tis given
(When daring crimes almost demand
The vengeance of the thunderer's hand),
To soften or avert the wrath of Heaven.
O'er ocean's face do tempests sweep?
Do civil storms blow loud?
He stills the raging of the deep,
And madness of the crowd.

He too, when Heaven vouchsafes to smile
Propitious on his favourite isle,
With zeal performs the task he loves,
And every gracious boon improves.
Blest delegate! if now there lies
Ripening in yonder pregnant skies
Some great event of more than common good,
Though envy howl with all her brood,
Thy wonted power employ;
Usher the mighty moments in,
Sacred to harmony and joy,
And from this era let their course begin!

ODE XXI.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1771.

AGAIN returns the circling year,
Again the festal day,
Which ushers in its bright career,
Demands the votive lay:
Again the oft-accustom'd muse
Her tributary task pursues,
Strikes the precluding lyre again, [strain.
And calls the harmonious band to animate her
Britain in the glowing theme;
To Britain sacred be the song:
Whate'er the fages lov'd to dream
Lycæan shades among,
(When raptur'd views their bosoms warm'd,
Of perfect states by fancy form'd),
United here and realiz'd we see,
Thrones, independence, laws, and liberty!
The triple cord, which binds them fast,
Like the golden chain of Jove,
Combining all below with all above,
Shall bid the sacred union last.

What though jars intestine rise,
And discord seems a while to reign,
Britain's sons are brave, are wise,
The storm subsides, and they embrace again.
The master-springs which rule the land,
Guided by a skilful hand,
Loosening now, and now restraining,
Yielding something, something gaining,
Preserve inviolate the public frame,
As, though the seasons change, the year is still the same.
O should Britain's foes presume,
Trusting some delusive scene
Of transient feuds that rage at home,
And seem to shake the nice machine,
Should they dare to lift the sword,
Or bid their hostile thunders roar,
Soon their pride would mirth afford;
And break like billows on her shore;
Soon would find her vengeance wake,
Weep in blood the dire mistake,
And 'gainst their wild attempts united see
Thrones, independence, laws, and liberty!

ODE XXII.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1771.

LONG did the churlish east detain
In icy bonds th' imprison'd Spring:
No verdure dropp'd in dewy rain,
And not a zephyr wav'd its wing.
Even he, th' enlivening source of day,
But pour'd an ineffeetual ray
On earth's wild bosom, cold and bare;
Where not a plant uprear'd its head,
Or dar'd its infant foliage spread
To meet the blasting air.
Nor less did man confess its force:
Whate'er could damp its genial course,
Or o'er the seats of life prevail,
Each pale disease that pants for breath,
Each painful harbinger of death,
Lurk'd in the loaded gale.

But now th' unfolding year resumes
Its various hues, its rich array;
And bursting into bolder blooms,
Repays with strength its long delay.
'Tis nature reigns. The grove unbinds
Its tresses to the southern winds,
The birds with music fill its bowers;
The flocks, the herds beneath its shade
Repose, or sport along the glade,
And crop the rising flowers.
Nor less does man rejoice. To him
More mildly sweet the breezes seem,
More fresh the fields, the fons more warm;
While health, the animating soul
Of every bliss, inspires the whole,
And heightens each peculiar charm.
Loveliest of months, bright June! again
Thy season smiles. With thee return
The frolic band of pleasure's train;
With thee Britannia's festal morn,
When the glad land her homage pays
To George, her monarch, and her friend,
"May cheerful health, may length of days,
"And smiling peace his steps attend!

"May every good"—Cease, cease the strain;
The prayer were impotent and vain:
What greater good can man possess
Than he, to whom all-bounteous Heaven,
With unremitting hand, has given
The power and will to blefs?

ODE XXIII.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1772.

At length the fleeting year is o'er,
And we no longer are deceiv'd;
The wars, the tumults are no more
Which fancy form'd, and fear believ'd.
Each distant object of distress,
Each phantom of uncertain guile,
The busy mind of man possess,
Has taught ev'n folly to beware;
At fleets and armies in the air
The wond'ring crowd has ceas'd to gaze.
And shall the same-dull cheats again
Reviye, in stale succession roll'd?
Shall sage experience warn in vain,
Nor the new-year be wiser than the old?
Forbid it, ye protecting powers,
Who guide the months, the days, the hours,
Which now advance on rapid wing!
May each new spectre of the night
Dissolve at their approaching light,
As fly the win'try damps the lost return of Spring.
True to herself if Britain prove,
What foreign foes has she to dread?
Her sacred laws, her sov'reign's love,
Her virtuous pride by freedom bred,
Secure at once domestic ease,
And awe th' aspiring nations into peace.

Did Rome e'er court a tyrant's smiles,
Till faction wrought the civil frame's decay?
Did Greece submit to Philip's wiles,
Till her own faithless sons prepar'd the way?

True to herself if Britain prove,
The warring world will league in vain,
Her sacred laws, her sovereign's love,
Her empire boundless as the main,
Will guard at once domestic ease,
And awe th' aspiring nations into peace.

ODE XXIV.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1772.

From scenes of death and deep distress
(Where Britain shar'd her monarch's woe),
Which most the feeling mind oppresses,
Yet best to bear the virtuous know,
Turn we our eyes—The cyress wreath
No more the plaintive muse shall wear;
The blooming flowers which round her breathe,
Shall form the chaplet for her hair;
And the gay month which claims her annual fire,
Shall raise to sprightlier notes the animated lyre.
The lark that mounts on morning wings
To meet the rising day,
Amidst the clouds exulting sings,
The dewy clouds, whence zephyr flings
The fragrance of the May.
The day which gave our monarch birth,
Recalls each noblest theme of ages past;

Tells us, whate'er we owed to Nassau's worth,
The Brunswick race confirm'd, and bade it last:
Tell us, with rapturous joy unblam'd,
And conscious gratitude, to feel
Our laws, our liberties reclaim'd
From tyrant pride and bigot zeal;
While each glad voice that wakes the echoing air,
In one united wish thus joins the general prayer:
"Till ocean quits his fav'rite isle,
"Till Thames, thy wat'ry train
"No more shall blefs its pregnant soil,
"May order, peace, and freedom smile
"Beneath a Brunswick's reign!"

ODE XXV.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1773.

WRAPT in the stole of fable grain,
With storms and tempests in his train,
Which howl the naked woods among,
Winter claims the solemn song.
Hark, 'tis nature's last farewell;
Every blast is nature's knell!
Yet shall glooms oppress the mind,
So oft by sage experience taught
To feel its present views confin'd,
And to the future point th' aspiring thought?
All that fades again shall live,
Nature dies but to revive.

Yon sun who fails in southern skies,
And faintly gilds th' horizon's bound,
Shall northward still, and northward rise,
With beams of warmth and splendour crown'd;
Shall wake the slumbering, buried grain
From the cold earth's relenting breast,
And Britain's isle shall bloom again
In all its wonted verdure dress'd.

Britain, to whom kind Heaven's indulgent care
Has fix'd in temperate climes its stat'd goal,
Far from the burning zone's inclement air,
Far from th' eternal frosts which bind the pole.
Here dewy Spring exerts his genial powers;
Here Summer glows salubrious, not severe;
Here copious Autumn spreads his golden stores,
And Winter strengthens the returning year.

O with each blessing may it rise,
Which Heaven can give, or mortals bear!
May each wing'd moment as it flies,
Improve a joy, or ease a care;
Till Britain's grateful heart astonish'd bends
To that Almighty Power from whom all good descends.

ODE XXVI.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1773.

BORN for millions are the kings
Who sit on Britain's guarded throne:
From delegated power their glory springs,
Their birth-day is our own!

In impious pomp let tyrants shine,
Assuming attributes divine,
And stretch their unresist'd sway
O'er slaves, who tremble and obey.
On lawless pinions let them soar:
Far happier he, whose temperate power,

Acknowledg'd and avow'd,
Ev'n on the throne restriction knows;
And to those laws implicit bows
By which it rules the crowd.

When erst th' imperial pride of Rome
Exulting saw a world o'ercome,
And rais'd a mortal to the skies,
There were, 'tis true, with eagle eyes
Who view'd the dazzling scene.
Though incense blaz'd on flattery's shrine,
Great Titus and the greater Antonine
Felt, and confess'd they were but men.

But ah! how few, let history speak
With weeping eye and blushing cheek,
E'er reach'd their mighty mind.
Man, selfish man, in most prevail'd,
And power roll'd down a curse entail'd
On reason and mankind.

Happy the land, to whom 'tis given
To enjoy that choicest boon of Heaven,
Where bound in one illustrious chain,
The monarch and the people reign!

Hence is Britannia's weal maintain'd;
Hence are the rights his fathers gain'd
To every free-born subject known:
Hence to the throne, in songs of praise,
A grateful realm its tribute pays,
And hails the king, whose birth-day is its own.

ODE XXVII.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1774.

" Pass but a few short fleeting years,"
Imperial Xerxes sigh'd and said,
Whilst his fond eye suffus'd with tears,
His numerous hosts survey'd;
" Pass but a few short fleeting years,
" And all that pomp, which now appears
" A glorious living scene,
" Shall breathe its last; shall fall, shall die,
" And low in earth yon myriads lie
" As they had never been!"
True, tyrant: Wherefore then does pride,
And vain ambition, urge thy mind
To spread thy needless conquests wide,
And desolate mankind?
Say, why do millions bleed at thy command?
If life, alas, is short, why shake the hasty sand?

Not so do Britain's kings behold
Their floating bulwarks of the main,
Their undulating sails unfold,
And gather all the wind's aerial reign.
Myriads they see, prepar'd to brave
The loudest storm, the wildest wave,
To hurl just thunders on insulting foes,
To guard, and not invade, the world's repose.
Myriads they see, their country's dear delight,
Their country's dear defence, and glory in the fight!

Nor do they idly drop a tear
On fated nature's future bier;
For not the grave can damp Britannia's fires;
Though chang'd the men, the worth is still the same;
The sons will emulate their fires,
And the sons sons will catch the glorious flame!

ODE XXVIII.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1774.

HARK!—or does the muse's ear
Form the sounds she longs to hear?—
Hark! from yonder western main
O'er the white wave echoing far,
Vows of duty swell the strain,
And drown the notes of war.
The prodigal again returns,
And on his parent's neck reclines;
With honest shame his bosom burns,
And in his eye affection shines;
Shines through tears, at once that prove
Grief, and joy, and filial love.

Discord, stop that raven voice,
Lest the nations round rejoice.
Tell it not on Gallia's plain,
Tell it not on Ebro's stream,
Though but transient be the pain,
Like to some delusive dream:
For soon shall reason, calm and sage,
Detect each vile seducer's wiles,
Shall sooth to peace mistaken rage,
And all be harmony and smiles;
Smiles repentant, such as prove
Grief, and joy, and filial love.

O prophetic be the muse!
May her monitory flame
Wake the soul to noble views,
And point the path to genuine fame!
Just subjection, mild commands,
Mutual interest, mutual love,
Form indissoluble bands,
Like the golden chain of Jove.
Closely may they all unite!
And see, a gleam of lustre breaks
From the shades of envious night—
And hark! 'tis more than fancy speaks—
They bow, they yield, they join the choral lay,
And hail with us our monarch's natal day.

ODE XXIX.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1775.

Ye powers, who rule o'er states and kings,
Who shield with sublimary wings
Man's erring race from woe,
To Britain's sons in every clime
Your blessings waft, whate'er their crime,
On all the winds that blow!
Beyond the vast Atlantic tide
Extend your healing influence wide,
Where millions claim your care:
Inspire each just, each filial thought,
And let the nations round be taught
The British oak is there.

Though vaguely wild its branches spread,
And rear almost an alien head
Wide-waving o'er the plain,
Let still, unspoil'd by foreign earth,
And conscious of its nobler birth,
The untainted trunk remain.

Where mutual interest binds the band,
Where due subjection, mild command,
Ensure perpetual ease,

Shall jarring tumults madly rave,
 And hostile banners proudly wave
 O'er once united seas?
 No; 'midst the blaze of wrath divine
 Heaven's loveliest attribute shall shine,
 And mercy gild the ray;
 Shall still avert impending fate;
 And concord its best era date
 From this auspicious day.

ODE XXX.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1776.

ON the white rocks which guard her coast,
 Observant of the parting-day,
 Whose orb was half in ocean lost,
 Reclin'd Britannia lay.
 Wide o'er the wat'ry waste
 A pensive look she cast;
 And scarce could check the rising sigh,
 And scarce could stop the tear which trembled in her eye.

"Sheath, sheath the sword which thirsts for blood"
 (She cried), "deceiv'd, mistaken men!
 "Nor let your parent o'er the flood
 "Send forth her voice in vain!
 "Alas, no tyrant she;
 "She courts you to be free.
 "Submissive hear her soft command,
 "Nor force unwilling vengeance from a parent's "hand."

Hear her, ye wife, to duty true,
 And teach the rest to feel,
 Nor let the madness of a few
 Distress the public weal!

So shall the opening year assume,
 Time's fairest child, a happier bloom;
 The white-wing'd hours shall lightly move,
 The sun with added lustre shine!
 "To err is human."—Let us prove
 "Forgiveness is divine!"

ODE XXXI.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1776.

YE western gales, whose genial breath
 Unbinds the glebe, till all beneath
 One verdant livery wears:
 You sooth the sultry heats of noon,
 Add softness to the setting sun,
 And dry the morning's tears.

This is your season, lovely gales,
 Through ether now your power prevail;
 And our dilated breasts shall own
 The joys which flow from you alone.

Why, therefore, in you dubious sky,
 With outspread wing, and eager eye
 On distant scenes intent,
 "Sits expectation in the air?"
 Why do, alternate, hope and fear
 Suspend some great event?

Can Britain fail?—The thought were vain!
 The powerful empress of the main.

But strives to smooth th' unruly flood,
 And dreads a conquest stain'd with blood.

While yet, ye winds, your breezy balm
 Through nature spreads a general calm,
 While yet a pause fell discord knows;
 Catch the soft moment of repose,
 Your genuine powers exert;
 To pity melt th' obdurate mind,
 Teach every bosom to be kind,
 And humanize the heart.

Propitious gales, O wing your way!
 And whilst we hail that rightful sway
 Whence temper'd freedom springs,
 The bliss we feel to future times
 Extend, and from your native climes
 Bring peace upon your wings!

ODE XXXII.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1777.

AGAIN, imperial Winter's sway
 Bids the earth and air obey;
 Throws o'er yon hostile lakes his icy bar,
 And, for a while, suspends the rage of war.
 O may it ne'er revive!—Ye wife,
 Ye just, ye virtuous, and ye brave,
 Leave fell contention to the sons of vice,
 And join your powers to save!

Enough of slaughter have ye known,
 Ye wayward children of a distant clime,
 For you we heave the kindred groan,
 We pity your misfortune and your crime.
 Stop, parricides, the blow,
 O find another foe!

And hear a parent's dear request,
 Who longs to clasp you to her yielding breast.

What change would ye require? What form
 Ideal floats in fancy's sky?
 Ye fond enthusiasts break the charm,
 And let cool reason clear the mental eye.
 On Britain's well-mix'd state alone,
 True liberty has fix'd her throne,
 Where law, not man; an equal rule maintains:
 Can freedom e'er be found where many a tyrant
 reigns?

United, let us all those blessings find,
 The God of nature meant mankind.
 Whate'er of error, ill redrest;
 Whate'er of passion, ill repress;
 Whate'er the wicked have conceiv'd,
 And folly's heedless sons believ'd,
 Let all lie buried in oblivion's flood,
 And our great cement be—the public good.

ODE XXXIII.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1777.

DRIVEN out from heaven's ethereal domes,
 On earth insatiate discord roams,
 And spreads her baleful influence far:
 On wretched man her scorpion stings
 Around th' insidious fury flings,
 Corroding every bliss, and sharp'ning every care.

Hence, demon, hence! in tenfold night
 Thy Stygian spells employ,

Nor with thy presence blast the light
Of that auspicious day, which Britain gives to joy.

But come, thou foster deity,
Fairest unanimity!
Not more fair the star that leads
Bright Aurora's glowing steeds,
Or on Hesper's front that shines,
When the garish day declines;
Bring thy usual train along,
Festive dance, and choral song,
Loose-rob'd sport, from folly free,
And mirth, chaſtis'd by decency.

Enough of war the pensive muse has ſung,
Enough of ſlaughter trembled on her tongue;
Fairer proſpects let her bring
Than hoſtile fields, and ſcenes of blood;
If happier hours are on the wing,
Wherefore damp the coming good?
If again, our tears muſt flow,
Why forſak the future woe?
Bright-ey'd hope, thy pleaſing power
Give at leaſt the preſent hour,
Every anxious thought beguiles,
Dreſſes every face in ſmiles,
Nor lets one tranſient cloud the bliſs deſtroy
Of that auſpicious day, which Britain gives to joy.

ODE XXXIV.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1778.

WHEN rival nations great in arms,
Great in power, in glory great,
Fill the world with war's alarms,
And breathe a temporary hate,
The hoſtile ſtorms but rage a while,
And the tir'd conteſt ends.—
But ah, how hard to reconcile
The foes who once were friends!
Each haſty word, each look unkind,
Each diſtant hint, that ſeems to mean
A ſomething lurking in the mind
Which almoſt longs to lurk unſeen,
Each ſhadow of a ſhade offends
Th' embitter'd foes who once were friends.
That Power alone who fram'd the ſoul,
And bade the ſprings of paſſion play,
Can all their jarring ſtrings controul,
And form on diſcord concord's ſway.
'Tis He alone, whoſe breath of love
Did o'er the world of waters move,
Whoſe touch the mountains bends;
Whoſe word from darkneſs call'd forth light,
'Tis He alone can reunite
The foes who once were friends.
To Him, O Britain, bow the knee!
His awful, his awful decree,
Ye rebel tribes, adore!
Forgive at once, and be forgiven,
Ope in each breaſt a little heaven,
And diſcord is no more.

ODE XXXV.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1778.

ARM'D with her native force, behold,
How proudly through each martial plain

Britannia ſalks! " 'Twas thus of old,
" My warlike ſons, a gallant train,
" Call'd forth their genuine ſtrength, and ſpread
" Their banners o'er the tented mead; [yield,"
" 'Twas thus they taught perfidious France to
She cries, and ſhows the lilies on her ſhield.

" Yes, goddeſs, yes! 'twas thus of old,"
The muſe replies, " thy barons bold
" Led forth their native troops, and ſpread
" Their banners o'er the tented mead.
" But nobler now the zeal that warms
" Each patriot breaſt: For freedom's reign
" Has burſt the Norman's feudal chain,
" And given new force to glory's charms.
" No vaſſal bands
" Riſe at a tyrant lord's commands:
" 'Tis for themſelves, with honeſt rage,
" The voluntary youths engage;
" To guard their ſacred homes they fight,
" And in their own aſſert the public right.
" Bound by choice, and choice alone, [own,
" Their leaders, and their laws are both their
" Laws obey'd, becauſe approv'd,
" And chiefs that rule, becauſe belov'd.
" 'Tis hence that ſhaſh of virtuous pride,
" Which Britain's ſons diſdain to hide, [eyes,
" Glows on their cheeks, and through their
" In active fire, the foe deſies:
" 'Tis hence, at home, they claim and find
" Th' undoubted rights of human kind;
" And, while they own a juſt controul,
" But yield a part to guard the whole.
" 'Tis hence they ſpurn a fervile chain,
" While tyrant man's deſpotic reign
" Enſlaves the peopled earth;
" And hence, with equal zeal obey
" A father king, and hail the day
" Which gave ſuch monarchs birth."

ODE XXXVI.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1779.

To arms, to arms, ye ſons of might,
And hail with ſounds of war the new-born year!
Britannia, from her rocky height,
Points to the Gallic coaſt, and liſts her ſpear.
Th' immortal hatred, which by turns
Wakes and ſleeps, with fury burns:
New cauſe of juſt offence has Albion found,
And lo, it bleeds aſreſh, th' eternal wound!
Though great in war, of ſkill poſſeſt,
Though native courage fire their breaſt
With ardour for the public weal,
One want, at leaſt, our rivals feel,
The want of freedom damps each gen'rous aim;
Whoe'er the lord they ſerve, th' oppreſſion is the ſame.
Power deſpotic rarely knows,
Rarely heeds a ſubject's woes;
By force it claims, with graſping hand,
Whate'er ambition dares demand:
The ravag'd merchant, plunder'd ſwain,
May pour their weak complaints in vain;
Their private wrongs are their own;
A tyrant feels not, though a people groan.
O happier far the well-mix'd ſtate, [ſtate,
Which blends the monarch's with the ſubject's

And links the sceptre to the spade!
 The stroke which wounds the lowliest clown
 Is insult to the British crown, [invade,
 And he attacks our rights, who dares the throne
 One common flame, one active soul
 Pervades, and animates the whole;
 One heart, one hand, directs the blow,
 And hurls the vullied vengeance on the foe.

ODE XXXVII.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1779.

LET Gallia mourn! th' insulting foe,
 Who dar'd to aim the treach'rous blow,
 When lost, she thought, in deep dismay,
 Forlorn, distress'd, Britannia lay.

Deems she misfortune e'er can tame
 The gen'rous inborn British flame?
 Is Agincourt so little known?
 Must fresh conviction curb her pride,
 Each age new annals be supply'd,
 Of Gallia's fame and our renown?

What though a while the tempest shrouds
 Her summits, and a night of clouds
 Each rock and mountain wears;
 Yet soon returns the flitting breeze,
 And brighter o'er her subject seas
 The queen of isles appears.

Let Gallia mourn! th' insulting foe,
 Who fees by all the winds that blow,
 Her treasures wasted to the coast
 She insolently deem'd was lost.

Yon sun, that with meridian ray
 Now gilds the consecrated day,
 When Britain breathes her annual vow
 For him, the guardian of her laws,
 For him, who in her sacred cause
 Bids the red bolt of vengeance glow.

That very sun, when Ganges' stream
 Redden'd beneath his rising beam,
 Saw Britain's banners wave
 In eastern air, with honest pride,
 O'er vanquish'd forts; which Gallia tried,
 But tried in vain to save.

That very sun, ere evening due
 Has dimm'd his radiant orb, will view,
 Where Lucia's mountains tower on high,
 And seem to prop the western sky,
 That oft-contested island own
 Allegiance to the British throne.

Like her own oak, the forest's king,
 Though Britain feels the blows around;
 Ev'n from the steel's inflictive sting,
 New force she gains, new scyons spring,
 And flourish from the wound.

ODE XXXVIII.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1780.

AND dares insulting France pretend
 To grasp the trident of the main,
 And hope the astonish'd world should bend
 To the mock pageantry assum'd in vain?

What, though her fleets the billows load,
 What, though her mimic thunders roar,
 She bears the ensigns of the god,
 But not his delegated power. [scree,
 Ev'n from the birth of time, 'twas Heaven's decree,
 The queen of isles should reign sole empress of the sea.

United Bourbon's giant pride,
 Strains every nerve, each effort tries,
 With all but justice on its side,
 That strength can give, or perfidy devise.
 Dread they not Him who rules the sky,
 Whose nod directs the whirlwind's speed,
 Who bars His red right arm on high,
 For vengeance on the perjurd head,
 Th' Almighty Power, by whose august decree
 The queen of isles alone is sovereign of the sea?

Vain-glorious France! deluded Spain!
 Whom even experience warns in vain,
 Is there a sea that dashing pours
 Its big waves round your trembling shores,
 Is there a promontory's brow
 That does not Britain's vast achievements know?
 Ask Biscay's rolling flood,
 Ask the proud Celtic steep,
 How oft her navies rode
 Triumphant o'er the deep?

Ask Lagos' summits that beheld your fate,
 Ask Calpe's jutting front, fair cause of endless hate,
 Yet 'midst the loudest blasts of fame,
 When most the admiring nations gaze,
 What to herself does Britain claim?
 —Not to herself she gives the praise,
 But low in dust her head she bows,
 And prostrate pays her grateful vows
 To Him, the Almighty Power, by whose decree
 She reigns, and still shall reign, sole empress of the sea.

ODE XXXIX.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1780.

STILL o'er the deep does Britain reign,
 Her monarch still the trident bears:
 Vain-glorious France; deluded Spain,
 Have found their boasted efforts vain;
 Vain as the fleeting shades, when orient light appears.

As the young eagle to the blaze of day
 Undazzled and undaunted turns his eyes,
 So unappall'd, where glory led the way,
 'Midst storms of war, 'midst mingling seas
 and skies,

The genuine offspring of the Brunswick name
 Prov'd his high birth's hereditary claim,
 And the applauding nation hail'd with joy
 Their future hero in the intrepid boy.

Prophetic, as the flame that spread
 Round the young Iulus' head,
 Be that blest omen of success. The muse
 Catches thence ecstatic views;
 Sees new laurels nobly won,
 As the circling year rolls on;
 Sees that triumphs of its own
 Each distinguish'd month shall crown;

And, ere this festive day again
Returns to wake the grateful strain,
Sees all that host of foes,
Both to her glory and repose,
Bend their proud necks beneath Britannia's yoke,
And court that peace which their injustice broke.

Still o'er the deep shall Britain reign,
Her monarch still the trident bear;
The warring world is leagu'd in vain
To conquer those who know not fear.

Grafp'd be the spear by ev'ry hand,
Let every heart united glow,
Collected, like the Theban band,
Can Britain dread a foe?

No! o'er the deep she still shall reign,
Her monarch still the trident bear:
The warring world is leagu'd in vain
To conquer those who know not fear.

ODE XL.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1781.

ASK round the world, from age to age,
Not where alone th' historian's page
Or poet's song have just attention won:
But even the feeblest voice of fame
Has learnt to list Britannia's name,
Ask of her inborn worth, and deeds of high renown!

What power from Lustania broke
The haughty Spaniard's galling yoke? [ring?
Who bade the Belgian mounds with freedom
Who fix'd so oft with strength supreme
Unbalanc'd Europe's nodding beam,
And rais'd the Austrian eagle's drooping wing?
'Twas Britain!—Britain heard the nations
groan,

As jealous of their freedom as her own!
Where'er her valiant troops she led,
Check'd and abash'd, and taught to fear,
The earth's proud tyrants stopp'd their mad
career; [fled,
To Britain Gallia bow'd; from Britain Julius

Why then, when round her fair protectress'
brow [blow,
The dark clouds gather, and the tempests
With folded arms, at ease reclin'd,
Does Europe sit? or, more unkind,
Why fraudulently aid the insidious plan?
The foes of Britain are the foes of man.

Alas! her glory soars too high;
Her radiant star of liberty
Has bid too long th' astonish'd nations gaze;
That glory which they once admir'd,
That glory in their cause acquir'd,
That glory burns too bright, they cannot bear
the blaze.

Then Britain, by experience wise,
Court not an envious or a timid friend;
Firm in thyself undaunted rise,
On thy own arm and righteous Heaven depend.
So as in great Eliza's days,
On self-supported pinions borne,
Again shalt thou look down with scorn
On an opposing world, and all its wily ways:

Grown greater from distress,
And eager still to bless,
As truly generous as thou'rt truly brave,
Again shalt crush the proud, again the conquer'd
save.

ODE XLI.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1781.

STILL does the rage of war prevail,
Still thirsts for blood th' insatiate spear?
Waft not, ye winds, th' invidious tale,
Nor let th' untutor'd nations hear,
That passion baffles reason's boasted reign,
And half the peopled world is civilized in vain.
What ere morals, what are laws,
What religion's sacred name?
Nor morals soften, nor religion awes:
Pure though the precepts flow, the actions are the same.

Revenge, and pride, and deadly hate,
And avarice tainting deep the mind,
With all the fury fiends that wait,
As torturing plagues, on human kind,
When shown in their own native light,
In truth's clear mirror heavenly bright,
Like real monsters rise;
But let illusion's powerful wand
Transform, arrange, the hideous band,
They cheat us in disguise;
We dress their horrid forms in borrow'd rays,
Then call them glory, and pursue the blaze.

O blind to nature's social plan,
And Heaven's indulgent end!
Her kinder laws knit man to man,
As brother and as friend.
Nature, intent alone to bless,
Bids strife and discord cease;
"Her ways are ways of pleasantness,
"And all her paths are peace."
Ev'n this auspicious day would wear
A brighter face of joy serene;
And not one ruffling gale of care
Disturb the halcyon scene;
On lighter wings would zephyr move,
The sun with added lustre shine,
Did peace descending from above,
Here fix her earthly shrine;
Here to the monarch's fondest prayer
A just attention yield,
And let him change the sword of war
For her protecting shield.

ODE XLII.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1782.

O WOND'ROUS power of inborn worth,
When danger calls its spirit forth,
And strong necessity compels
The secret springs to burst their narrow cells!
Though foes unnumber'd gird her round,
Though not one friend is faithful found,
Though impious scorn derides,
Yet still unmov'd amidst the band,
Like her own rocks, does Britain stand,
And braves th' insulting tides.
A world in arms assaults her reign,
A world in arms assaults in vain.

'Tis Britain calls, ye nations, hear?
 Unbrace the corselet, drop the spear,
 No more th' insidious toil pursue,
 Nor strive to weaken what you can't subdue.
 'Tis Britain calls: with fatal speed
 You urge, by headlong fury led,
 Your own impending fate.
 Too late you'll weep, too late you'll find,
 'Twas for the glory of mankind,
 That Britain should be great.
 In Britain's voice, 'tis freedom calls,
 For freedom dies, if Britain falls.

She cannot fall; the same Almighty hand
 That rais'd her white rocks from the main,
 Does still her arduous cause maintain, [hand.
 Still grasps the shield that guards her favour'd
 Obedient to his word,
 Not to destroy, but to reclaim,
 Th' avenging angel waves the flaming sword;
 Revere his awful name!
 Repentant in the dust,
 Confess his judgments just;
 Th' avenging sword shall cease to wave,
 And whom his mercy spares, his power shall save.

ODE XLIII.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1782.

STILL does reluctant peace refuse,
 Though courted by each generous mind,
 To shed her panatean dews,
 And heal the madness of mankind!
 Must this auspicious day again
 Be clouded with one anxious care,
 And powers malignant render vain [pray'r!
 The monarch's fondest wish, the people's general
 O no! in yonder pregnant sky,
 Whence all our hopes and blessings spring,
 New bursting scenes of glory lie,
 And future joys are on the wing!
 The ling'ring morn, that coyly sheds
 On broken clouds and mountain-heads
 At first a glimmering ray,
 Now brighter and now brighter glows,
 Wide and more wide the lustre flows,
 'Till all is future day,
 And earth, rejoicing in ethereal light,
 Forgets the dreary damps, and live-long shades of night.

Satiate of war, whose mad excess
 No bound, no kind restriction knows,
 But marks its progress with distress,
 The willing world shall seek repose;
 And Belgia, waking from her dreams
 Of Gallic frauds, illusive schemes,
 Shall add new strength to concord's chain,
 And know her ancient friends again.
 While those, whom nearer ties unite,
 Whom all the charities combine,
 Shall backward turn their trembling sight,
 And deprecate the wrath divine:
 'Midst bleeding heaps of brothers slain,
 'Midst desolation's horrid reign,
 And all its complicated woe,
 With wild affright in every face,

Shall strain more close the strict embrace,
 And wonder they could e'er be foes.
 O pleasing hope, O blest presage
 Of joys to last from age to age! [approve,
 For what Heaven's self commands must Heaven
 Returning amity, and mutual love!
 And hark! on yonder western main
 Imperious France is taught to know,
 That Britain reassumes her reign:
 Her thunders only slept, to strike the deeper blow.
 Ye nations, hear! the Gallic star,
 -Shorn of its beams, th' horizon leaves;
 That fatal firebrand of the war
 No longer dazzles and deceives.
 Record it in the fairest light
 Of faithful history's future page,
 "They only triumph'd, whilst they shunn'd
 "the fight,
 "We, when we forc'd them to engage."

ODE XLIV.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1783.

YE nations, hear th' important tale—
 Though armies press, though fleets assail,
 Though vengeful war's collected stores
 At once united Bourbon pours—
 Unmov'd amidst th' insulting bands,
 Emblem of Britain, Calpe stands— [mourn,
 Th' all-conquering hosts their baffled efforts
 And, though the wreath's prepar'd, unwreath'd
 the chiefs return.
 Ye nations, hear! nor fondly deem
 Britannia's ancient spirit fled;
 Or glozing weep her setting beam,
 Whose fierce meridian rays her rivals
 dread—
 Her genius slept—her genius wakes—
 Nor strength deserts her, nor high Heaven
 forsakes.
 To Heaven she bends, and Heaven alone,
 Who all her wants, her weakness knows,
 And supplicates th' eternal Throne
 To spare her crimes, and heal her woes.
 Proud man with vengeance still
 Pursues, and aggravates e'en fancied ill;
 Far gentler means offended Heaven employs,
 With mercy Heaven corrects—chastises, not destroys.
 When hope's last gleam can hardly dare
 To pierce the gloom, and sooth despair;
 When flames th' uplifted bolt on high,
 In act to cleave th' offended sky,
 Its issuing wrath can Heaven repress,
 And win to virtue by success.
 Then O! to Heaven's protecting hand
 Be praise, be prayer address,
 Whose mercy bids a guilty land
 Be virtuous, and be blest!
 So shall the rising year regain
 The erring seasons wonted chain;
 The rolling months that gird the sphere,
 Again their wonted liveries wear;

And health breathe fresh in every gale,
And plenty clothe each smiling vale
With all the blessings nature yields
To temperate suns from fertile fields.

So shall the proud be taught to bow,
Pale envy's fierce contentions cease,
The sea once more its sovereign know,
And glory gild the wreath of peace.

ODE XLV.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1783

AT length the troubled waters rest,
And, shadowing ocean's calmer breast,
Exulting commerce spreads her woven wings:
Free as the winds that waft them o'er,
Her issuing vessels glide from shore to shore,
And in the bending shrouds the careless sea-boy
fings.

Is peace a blessing?—Ask the mind
That glows with love of human kind,
That knows no guile, no partial weakness knows,
Contracted to no narrow sphere,
The world, the world at large is umpire here;
They feel, and they enjoy, the blessings peace
bestows.

Then, oh! what bliss his bosom shares,
Who, conscious of ingenious worth,
Can nobly scorn inferior cares,
And send the generous edict forth;
To distant sighs of modest woe
Can lend a pitying list'ning ear,
Nor see the meanest sorrows flow
Without a sympathizing tear.

Though rapine with her fury train
Rove wide and wild o'er earth and main,
In act to strike, though slaughter cleave the air,
At his command they drop the sword,
And in their midway course his potent word
Arrests the shafts of death, of terror, of despair.

When those who have the power to bless,
Are readiest to relieve distress,
When private virtues dignify a crown,
The genuine sons of freedom feel
A duty which transcends a subject's zeal,
And dread the man's reproach more than the monarch's frown.

Then to this day be honours paid
The world's proud conquerors never knew;
Their laurels shrink, their glories fade,
Expos'd to reason's sober view.
But reason, justice, truth rejoice,
When discord's baneful triumphs cease,
And hail, with one united voice,
The friend of man, the friend of peace.

ODE XLVI.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1784.

ENOUGH of arms—to happier ends
Her forward view Britannia bends;
The gen'rous hosts, who grasp'd the sword,
Obedient to her awful word,

Though martial glory cease,
Shall now, with equal industry,
Like Rome's brave sons, when Rome was free,
Resume the arts of peace.

O come, ye toil-worn wand'ers, come
To genial hearths, and social home,
The tender housewife's busy care;
The board with temperate plenty crown'd;
The smiling progeny around,
That listen to the tale of war.

Yet be not war the fav'rite theme,
For what has war with bliss to do?
Teach them more justly far to deem,
And own experience taught it you.

Teach them, 'tis in the will of fate,
Their frugal industry alone
Can make their country truly great,
And in her bliss secure their own.

Be all the songs that sooth their toil,
And bid the brow of labour smile,
When through the loom the shuttle glides,
Or shining share the glebe divides,
Or, bending to the woodman's stroke,
To waft her commerce, falls the British oak—
Be all their songs, that soften these,
Of calm content and future well-earn'd ease;
Nor dread, lest inborn spirit die:
One glorious lesson, early taught,
Will all the boasted powers supply
Of practised rules and studied thought.
From the first dawn of reason's ray
On the young bosom's yielding clay,
Strong be their country's love imprest,
And with your own example fire their breast:
Tell them 'tis theirs to grasp the sword
When Britain gives the awful word;
To bleed, to die, in Britain's cause,
And guard, from faction nobly free,
Their birth-right blessing, liberty,
True liberty, that loves the laws.

ODE XLVII.

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1784.

HAIL to the day, whose beams, again
Returning, claim the choral strain,
And bid us breathe our annual vows
To the first power that Britain knows;
The power which, though itself restrain'd,
And subject to that just controul
Which, many an arduous conflict gain'd,
Connects, unites, and animates the whole.

You radiant sun, whose central force
Winds back each planet's vagrant course,
And through the systems holds imperial sway,
Bound by the same inherent laws,
Ev'n whilst it seems the active cause, [they.
Promotes the general good, as much confin'd as

That wond'rous plan, through ages fought,
Which elder Egypt never taught,
Nor Greece with all her letter'd lore,
Nor struggling Rome, could e'er explore,

Though many a form of rule she tried;
That wond'rous plan has Britain found,
Which curbs licentiousness and pride,
Yet leaves true liberty without a wound.

The fierce Plantagenets beheld
Its growing strength, and deign'd to yield;
Th' imperious Tudors frown'd, and felt ag-
griev'd;

Th' unhappy race, whose faults we mourn,
Delay'd awhile its wish'd return, [chiev'd.
Till Brunswick perfected what Nassau had at-

From that bright era of renown,
Aftrea walks the world again,
Her fabled form the nations own,
With all th' attendant virtues in her train.
Hark! with what general loud acclaim
They venerate the British name,
When forms of rule are in the balance weigh'd,
And pour their torrents of applause
On the fair isle, whose equal laws
Controul the sceptre, and protect the spade.

The triple chain, which binds them fast,
Like Homer's golden one, descends from Jove;
Long may the sacred union last,
And the mixt powers in mutual concert move,
Each tempering each, and listening to the call
Of genuine public good, blest source and end of all!

ODE XLVIII.

FOR THE NEW-YEAR 1785.

DELUSIVE is the poet's dream,
Or does prophetic truth inspire
The zeal which prompts the glowing theme,
And animates th' according lyre?
Trust the muse: her eye commands
Distant times and distant lands;
Through bursting clouds, in opening skies,
Sees from discord union rise;

And friendship bind unwilling foes
In firmer ties than duty knows.

Torn rudely from its parent tree,
Yon scyon rising in the west
Will soon its genuine glory see,
And court again the fostering breast,
Whose nurture gave its powers to spread,
And feel their force, and lift an alien head.

The parent tree, when storms impend,
Shall own affection's warmth again;
Again its fostering aid shall lend,
Nor hear the suppliant plead in vain;
Shall stretch protecting branches round,
Extend the shelter, and forget the wound.

Two Britains through th' admiring world
Shall wing their way with sails unfurl'd;
Each from the other's kindred state
Avert by turns the bolts of fate;
And acts of mutual amity endear
The Tyre and Carthage of a wider sphere.

When Rome's divided eagles flew,
And different thrones her empire knew,
The varying language soon disjoin'd
The boasted masters of mankind:
But here, no ills like those we fear,
No varying language threatens here;
Congenial worth, congenial flame,
Their manners and their arts the same,
To the same tongue shall glowing themes afford,
And British heroes act, and British bards record.
Fly swift, ye years! ye minutes haste!
And in the future lose the past;
O'er many a thought-afflicting tale,
Oblivion, cast thy friendly veil!
Let not memory breathe a sigh,
Or backward turn th' indignant eye;
Nor the insidious arts of foes
Enlarge the breach that longs to close,
But acts of amity alone inspire
Firm faith, and cordial love, and wake the willing lyre.

PROLOGUES AND EPILOGUES.

PROLOGUE TO THE ROMAN FATHER.

SPOKEN BY MR. BARRY, 1750.

BRITONS, to-night in native pomp we come,
True heroes all, from virtuous ancient Rome;
In those far distant times when Romans knew
The sweets of guarded liberty, like you;
And, safe from ills which force or faction brings,
Saw freedom reign beneath the smile of kings.

Yet from such times, and such plain chiefs as these,
What can we frame a polish'd age to please?

Say, can you listen to the artless woes
Of an old tale, which every school-boy knows?
Where to your hearts alone the scenes apply,
No merit their's but pure simplicity.

Our bard has play'd a most adventurous part,
And turn'd upon himself the critic's art;
Stripp'd each luxuriant plume from fancy's
wings,

And torn up similes like vulgar things:
Nay ev'n each moral, sentimental, stroke,
Where not the character, but poet spoke,
He lopp'd, as foreign to his chaste design,
Nor spar'd an useless, though a golden line.

These are his arts; if these cannot atone
 For all those nameless errors yet unknown;
 If, shunning faults which nobler bards commit,
 He wants their force to strike th' attentive pit;
 Be just, and tell him so; he asks advice,
 Willing to learn, and would not ask it twice.
 Your kind applause may bid him write—beware!
 Or kinder censure teach him to forbear.

EPILOGUE TO THE SAME.

SPOKEN BY MRS. FRITCHARD, 1750.

LADIES, by me our courteous author sends
 His compliments to all his female friends;
 And thanks them from his soul for every bright
 Indulgent tear, which they have shed to-night.
 Sorrow in virtue's cause proclaims a mind,
 And gives to beauty graces more refin'd.
 O who could bear the loveliest form of art,
 A cherub's face, without a feeling heart!
 'Tis there alone, whatever charms we boast,
 Though men may flatter, and though men will toast,
 'Tis there alone they find the joy sincere;
 The wife, the parent, and the friend, are there:
 All else, the veriest rakes themselves must own,
 Are but the paltry play-things of the town;
 The painted clouds, which glittering tempt the chase,

Then melt in air, and mock the vain embrace.

Well then; the private virtues, 'tis confess'd,
 Are the soft inmates of the female breast.
 But then, they fill so full that crowded space,
 That the poor public seldom finds a place.
 And I suspect there's many a fair one here,
 Who pour'd her sorrows on Horatio's bier,
 That still retains so much of flesh and blood,
 She'd fairly hang the brother, if she could.

Why, ladies, to be sure, if that be all,
 At your tribunal he must stand or fall.
 Whate'er his country or his fire decreed,
 You are his judges now, and he must plead.

Like other culprit-youths, he wanted grace;
 But could have no self-interest in the case.
 Had she been wife, or mistress, or a friend,
 It might have answer'd some convenient end:
 But a mere sister, whom he lov'd—to take
 Her life away—and for his country's sake!
 Faith, ladies, you may pardon him; indeed
 There's very little fear the crime should spread.
 True patriots are but rare among the men,
 And really might be useful, now and then.
 Then do not check, by your disapprobation,
 A spirit which once rul'd the British nation,
 And still might rule—would you but set the fashion.

PROLOGUE

TO EVERY MAN IN HIS HUMOUR.

Spoken by Mr. Garrick, 1751.

CRITICS! your favour is our author's right—
 The well-known scenes we shall present to-night,
 Are no weak efforts of a modern pen,
 But the strong touches of immortal Ben;
 A rough old bard, whose honest pride disdain'd
 Applause itself, unless by merit gain'd—

And would to-night your loudest praise disclaim,
 Should his great shade perceive the doubtful
 fame,
 Not to his labours granted, but his name.
 Boldly he wrote, and boldly told the age,
 "He dar'd not prostitute the useful stage,
 "Or purchase their delight at such a rate,
 "As for it he himself must justly hate;
 "But rather begg'd they would be pleas'd to see
 "From him such plays as other plays should be;
 "Would learn from him to scorn a motley scene,
 "And leave their monsters, to be pleas'd with
 "men." [chang'd,

Thus spoke the bard.—And though the times are
 Since his free muse for fools the city rang'd;
 And satire had not then appear'd in state,
 To lash the finer follies of the great;
 Yet let not prejudice infect your mind,
 Nor slight the gold, because not quite refin'd;
 With no false niceness this performance view,
 Nor damn for low, whate'er is just and true:
 Sure, to those scenes some honour should be paid,
 Which Camden patroniz'd, and Shakspeare play'd:
 Nature was nature then, and still survives;
 The garb may alter, but the substance lives,
 Lives in this play—where each may find complete,
 His pictur'd self—Then favour the deceit—
 Kindly forget the hundred years between;
 Become old Britons, and admire old Ben.

PROLOGUE TO CREUSA.

SPOKEN BY MR. ROSS, 1754.

PROLOGUES of old, the learn'd in language say,
 Were merely introductions to the play,
 Spoken by gods, or ghosts, or men who knew
 Whate'er was previous to the scenes in view;
 And complaisantly came to lay before ye
 The several heads and windings of the story.

But modern times and British rules are such,
 Our bards beforehand must not tell too much;
 Nor dare we, like the neighb'ring French, admit
 Ev'n confidants, who might instruct the pit,
 By asking questions of the leading few,
 And hearing secrets, which before they knew.

Yet what we can to help this antique piece
 We will attempt.—Our scene to-night is Greece,
 And by the magic of the poet's rod,
 This stage the temple of the Delphic god!
 Where kings, and chiefs, and sages came of old,
 Like modern fools, to have their fortunes told;
 And monarchs were enthron'd, or nations freed,
 As an old priest, or wither'd maid, decreed.
 Yet think not all were equally deceiv'd,
 Some knew, more doubted, many more believ'd.
 In short, these oracles and witching rhymes
 Were but the pious frauds of ancient times;
 Wisely contriv'd to keep mankind in awe,
 When faith was wonder, and religion law!

Thus much premis'd, to ev'ry feeling breast
 We leave the scenes themselves to tell the rest.
 —Yet something sure was to the critics said,
 Which I forget—some invocation made!

Ye critic bands, like jealous guardians, plac'd
 To watch th' encroachments on the realms of taste,
 From you our author would two boons obtain,
 Not wholly diffident, nor wholly vain:
 Two things he asks; 'tis modest, sure, from you
 Who can do all things, to request but two:

First to his scenes a kind attention pay,
Then judge!—with candour judge—and we obey.

EPILOGUE TO THE SAME.

SPOKEN BY MISS HAUGHTON, WHO ACTED THE
PYTHIA, 1754.

AT length I'm freed from tragical parade,
No more a Pythian priestess—though a maid;
At once resigning, with my sacred dwelling,
My wreaths, my wand, my arts of fortune-telling.

Yet superstitious folks, no doubt are here,
Who still regard me with a kind of fear,
Left to their secret thoughts these prying eyes
Should boldly pass, and take them by surprise.
Nay, though I disavow the whole deceit,
And fairly own my science all a cheat,
Should I declare, in spite of ears and eyes,
The beaux were handsome, or the critics wise,
They'd all believe it, and with dear delight
Say to themselves at least— [right.]

“The girl has taste;” “The woman's in the
Or should I tell the ladies, so dispos'd,
They'd get good matches ere the season clos'd,
They'd smile, perhaps, with seeming discontent,
And, sneering, wonder what the creature meant;
But whisper to their friends, with beating heart,
“Suppose there should be something in her art!”
Grave statesmen too would chuckle, should I say,
On such a motion, and by such a day,
They would be summon'd from their own affairs,
To 'tend the nation's more important cares:
“Well, if I must—howe'er I dread the load,
“I'll undergo it—for my country's good.”

All men are bubbles; in a skilful hand,
The ruling passion is the conjurer's wand.
Whether we praise, foretell, persuade, advise,
'Tis that alone confirms us fools or wise.
The devil without may spread the tempting sin,
But the sure conqueror is—the devil within.

A SECOND EPILOGUE TO THE SAME.

SPOKEN BY MRS. PRITCHARD, 1754.

STAY, ladies—Though I'm almost tir'd to death
With this long part—and am so out of breath—
Yet such a lucky thought kind Heaven has sent,
That, if I die for't, I must give it vent. [pose,
The men you know are gone. And now sup-
Before our lords and masters are rechose,
We take th' advantage of an empty town,
And choose a House of Commons of our own.
What think ye, cannot we make laws?—and then
Cannot we too unmake them, like the men?
O place us once in good St. Stephen's pews,
We'll show them women have their public use!
Imprimis they shall marry; not a man
Past twenty-five, but what shall wear the chain.
Next we'll in earnest set about reclaiming;
For by my life and soul, we'll put down gaming:
We'll spoil their deep destructive midnight play;
The laws we make, we'll force them to obey;
Unless we let them, when their spirits flag,
Piddle with us, ye know, at quinze and brag.
“I hope, my dearest,” says some well-bred spouse,
“When such a bill shall come before your house,

* This epilogue was spoken at the time of a general election.

“That you'll consider men are men—at least.
“That you'll not speak, my dear.”—Not speak?—
the beast!

What, would you wound my honour?—Wrongs like these—

For this, Sir, I shall bring you on your knees.
—Or if we're quite good-natured, tell the man,
We'll do him all the service that we can.

Then for ourselves, what projects, what designs!
We'll tax, and double tax, their nasty wines;
But, duty free, import our blonds and laces,
French hoops, French silks, French cambricks, and —French faces.

In short, my scheme is not completed quite,
But I may tell you more another night.
So come again, come all, and let us raise
Such glorious trophies to our country's praise,
That all true Britons shall with one consent
Cry out, “Long live the female parliament!”

PROLOGUE TO THE ORPHAN OF CHINA.

SPOKEN BY MR. HOLLAND, 1759.

ENOUGH of Greece and Rome. Th' exhausted store

Of either nation now can charm no more:
Ev'n adventitious helps in vain we try,
Our triumphs languish in the public eye;
And grave processions, musically slow,
Here pass unheeded—as a Lord Mayor's show.

On eagle wings the poet of to-night
Soars for fresh virtues to the source of light,
To China's eastern realms; and boldly bears
Confucius' morals to Britannia's ears.
Accept th' imported boon; as echoing Greece
Receiv'd from wand'ring chiefs her golden fleece;
Nor only richer by the spoils become, [home.
But praise th' advent'rous youth who brings them

One dubious character, we own, he draws,
A patriot zealot in a monarch's cause!
Nice is the task the varying hand to guide,
And teach the blending colours to divide;
Where, rainbow-like, th' encroaching tints invade
Each other's bounds, and mingle light with shade.

If then, assiduous to obtain his end,
You find too far the subject's zeal extend;
If undistinguish'd loyalty prevails
Where nature shrinks, and strong affection fails,
On China's tenets charge the fond mistake,
And spare his error for his virtue's sake.
From nobler motives our allegiance springs,
For Britain knows no right divine in kings;
From freedom's choice that boasted right arose,
And through each line from freedom's choice it flows.

Justice, with mercy join'd, the throne maintains;
And in his people's hearts—our monarch reigns.

PROLOGUE TO THE SCHOOL FOR LOVERS,

AS IT WAS INTENDED TO HAVE BEEN SPOKEN, 1762.

Success makes people vain.—The maxim's true,
We all confess it—and not over new.
The veriest clown who stumps along the streets,
And doffs his hat to each grave cit he meets,

Some twelvemonths hence, bedaub'd with livery lace,
Shall thrust his saucy flambeau in your face.
Not for our bard: though twice your kind applause
Has on this fickle spot espous'd his cause,
He owns with gratitude th' obliging debt;
Has twice been favour'd, and is modest yet.
Plain tragedy, his first adventurous care,
Spoke to your hearts, and found an echo there.
Plain comedy to-night, with strokes refin'd,
Would catch the coyest features of the mind;
Would play politely with your hopes and fears,
And sometimes smiles provoke, and sometimes tears.

Your giant wits, like those of old, may climb
Olympus high, and step o'er space and time;
May stride, with seven-leagu'd boots, from shore
to shore,

And, nobly by transgressing, charm you more.
Alas! our author dares not laugh at schools,
Plain sense confines his humbler muse to rules.
Form'd on the classic scale his structures rise,
He shifts no scenes to dazzle and surprize.
In one poor garden's solitary grove,
Like the primeval pair, his lovers rove;
And in due time will each transaction pass
—Unless some hasty critic shakes the glass.

EPILOGUE TO THE SAME.

Spoken before the Dance, by Mrs. Yates and Mr. Palmer, in the Characters of Araminta and Modely, 1762.

Araminta.

WELL, ladies, am I right, or am I not?
Should not this foolish passion be forgot;
This fluttering something, scarce to be exprest,
Which pleads for coxcombs in each female breast?
How mortified he look'd!—and looks so still.

[Turning to Modely.

He really may repent—perhaps he will—

Modely.

Will Araminta?—Ladies, be so good,
Man's made of frail materials, flesh and blood.
We all offend at some unhappy crisis,
Have whims, caprices, vanities—and vices.
Your happier sex by nature was design'd,
Her last best work, to perfect humankind.
No spot, no blemish, the fair frame deforms,
No avarice taints, no naughty passion warms
Your firmer hearts. No love of change in you
E'er taught desire to stray.—

Araminta.

All this is true.

Yet stay; the men, perchance, may call it sneer,
And some few ladies think you not sincere.
For your petition, whether wrong or right,
Whate'er it be, withdraw it for to-night.
Another time, if I should want a spouse,
I may myself report it to the house:
At present, let us strive to mend the age;
Let justice reign, at least upon the stage.
Where the fair danies, who like to live by rule,
May learn two lessons from the Lovers' School;
While Cælia's choice instructs them how to choose,
And my refusal warns them to refuse.

PROLOGUE TO ALMIDA.

SPOKEN BY MR. REDDISH, 1771.

CRITICS be dumb—to-night a lady sues,
From soft Italia's shores, an English muse,
Though fate there binds her in a pleasing chain,
Sends to our stage the offspring of her brain:
True to her birth, the pants for British bays;
And to her country trusts for genuine praise.
From infancy well read in tragic lore,
She treads the path her father trod before;
To the same candid judges trusts her cause,
And hopes the same indulgence and applause.
No Salic law here bars the female's claim,
Who pleads hereditary right to fame.

Of love and arms she sings, the mighty two,
Whose powers uniting must the world subdue;
Of love and arms! in that heroic age,
Which knew no poet's, no historian's page;

But war to glory form'd the unletter'd mind,
 And chivalry alone taught morals to mankind;
 Nor taught in vain: the youth who dar'd aspire
 To the nice honours of a lover's fire,
 Observ'd with duteous care each rigid rule,
 Each stern command of labour's patient school;
 Was early train'd to bear the sultry beams
 Of burning suns, and winter's fierce extremes;
 Was brave, was temperate: to one idol fair
 His vows he breath'd, his wishes center'd there:

Honour alone could gain her kind regard;
 Honour was virtue, beauty its reward.
 And shall not British breasts, in beauty's cause,
 Adopt to-night the manners which she draws?
 Male writers we confess are lawful prize,
 Giants and monsters that but rarely rise!
 With their enormous spoils your triumphs grace,
 Attack, confound, exterminate the race;
 But when a lady tempts the critic war,
 Be all knights-errant, and protect the fair.

MISCELLANIES.

(NOT INCLUDED IN THE EDITION OF THE ENGLISH POETS, 1790.)

THE VISION OF SOLOMON *.

'Twas night, and sleep with gently-waving wand
 Sat softly brooding o'er that monarch's brow,
 Whose waking nod could Judah's realms command,

Or deal destruction to the frighted foe.
 Great David's son—but at this tranquil hour
 No dreams of state disturb'd his peaceful bed;
 To nobler heights his thoughts unfetter'd soar,
 And brighter visions hover round his head.
 Let meaner kings by mortals guard their state,
 Around his sacred couch aerial legates wait.

"Hail, best belov'd!" superior to the rest,
 One bending angel cry'd with heavenly voice,
 "Earth, seas, and air, stand to thy view confess'd,
 And God's own mandate ratifies thy choice.
 Choose then from these—say, shall thy pow'r extend

[shore,
 Where suns scarce warm this earth's remotest
 Shall India's lords beneath thy sceptre bend,
 Whilst their black troops stand silent and adore?
 To thee, sole lord, shall earth her stores unfold,
 Fear all her gems to thee, and mines that flame with gold?

Shall ocean's waves, obedient to thy call,
 As erst to Moses, rang'd in order stand;
 While crowds once more admire the floating wall,
 And treasures open on the glittering sand?
 Or shall Fame's breath inspire each softer air,
 Thee just and good, to distant worlds resound,
 While Peace, fair goddess, leads the smiling year,
 Swells the glad grain, and spreads the harvest
 round;
 Bids Jordan's stream extend its azure pride,
 Pleas'd with reflected fruits that tremble in the tide?"

The chert spoke—when Power majestic rose;
 A Tyrian-tinctur'd robe she dragg'd behind,
 Whose artful folds at every turn disclose
 Sceptres and crowns that flutter'd in the wind.
 Gigantic phantom! in her face appear'd
 Terrific charms, too fierce for mortal eyes.
 Aw'd and amaz'd, her very smiles we fear'd,
 As though storms lurk'd beneath the smooth disguise;

But when she frowns, tremendous thunders roar,
 Stern desolation reigns, and kingdoms float in gore.

Her, Wealth succeeds—and scarce his tottering
 head

Sustains the glittering ore's incumbent weight;
 O'er his old limbs were tatter'd garments spread;
 A well-fix'd staff directs his feeble feet.

Thus mean himself appear'd; but all around
 What crowds unnumber'd hail the passing peer!
 Power, as he came, bow'd lowly to the ground,
 And own'd with reverence a superior there.

"Rise, David's son, thy utmost wish extend,
 See to thy sceptre Wealth, the world's great monarch, bend."

Fame next approach'd, whose clarion's martial sound

Bids conqu'ring laurels flourish ever green;
 And gentle Peace with olive chaplets crown'd,
 And Plenty, goddess of the sylvan scene. [hair;
 These Pleasure join'd; loose flow'd her radiant
 Her flying fingers touch'd the trembling lyre.

"Come, Mirth," she sung; "your blooming wreaths prepare;

Come, gay Delight, and ever-young Desire:
 Let days, let years in downy circles move,
 Sacred to brightly Joy, and all-subduing Love."

The mingled train advanc'd; to close the rear,
 As lost in thought, appear'd a pensive maid;

Bright was her aspect, lovely, yet severe,
 In virgin white her decent limbs array'd:

She mov'd in sober state; on either side
 A beautiful handmaid friendly aid bestow'd,
 Fair Virtue here, her view from earth to guide;

There Contemplation rais'd her golden rod.
 Hail, Wisdom, hail! I see and bless the sight,
 First-born of Heav'n, pure source of intellectual light.

On her the monarch fix'd his eager eyes,
 On her alone, regardless of the crowd;

"Let vulgar souls (he cry'd) yon trifles prize,
 Mortals that dare of mis'ry to be proud.

Hence then: I burn for more ingenuous charms;
 Nature's true beauties with more lustre shine.

Then take me, Wisdom, take me to thy arms;
 O snatch me from myself, and make me thine.

All Heav'n calls good, or man felicity,
 Peace, plenty, health, content, are all compriz'd in thee."

* See 2 Chron. chap. i. ver. 7.—12.

VERSES TO HIS MOTHER.

ON HER BIRTH-DAY *.

ERE yet to Heaven my infant thought could reach,
 Ere praise its Maker by the powers of speech,
 Taught by thy care, by thy example mov'd,
 I rais'd my waking eyes, ador'd and lov'd.
 For life, and this my more than life, receive
 That poor return which I with blushes give;
 For, ah! the trifling tribute of a lay,
 Is all my humble gratitude can pay!

Hear then my fervent wish, though cloth'd in song,
 (Ye powers confirm it, ere it quit my tongue!)
 From this blest day may fate propitious shine;
 Each earthly bliss that Heaven calls good, be thine.

May adverse clouds like empty mists decay,
 And time declining, shed a purer ray,
 To gild the evening of thy well-spent day.
 And when (yet ne'er let that sad hour appear,
 While my poor breast draws in this vital air),
 Thy fainting frame sinks on the bed of death,
 May no sharp pangs attend thy fleeting breath;
 No care on care, like restless billows roll,
 To break the calm of thy departing soul.
 Full in thy sight let choirs of angels spread
 Their radiant plumes, and hover round thy head;
 Then one soft sigh thy issuing soul convey,
 While thy great loss and mine points out the way †
 To scenes of bliss, and realms of endless day.

TO DR. STEBBING ‡.

O EVER mine! whate'er my fate portends,
 Of absence, passions, business, fortune, friends;
 Whether in wide-spread scarf and rustling gown,
 My borrow'd rhetoric sooths the saints in town,
 Or makes in country pews soft matrons weep,
 Gay damsels smile, and tir'd church-wardens sleep.
 Whether to ease consign'd, my future day,
 One downy circle, sportive rolls away;
 Or, deep in Cambria, or the wilds of Kent,
 I drag out life, and learn from ills content;
 Still be thy friendship like a genius there,
 Zest of the joy, and solace of the care.

ON CHURCHILL.

So from his common place, when Churchill strings
 Into some motley form his damn'd good things,

* He seems to have had Pope's verses to Mrs. Martha Blount, in his eye, when he wrote this little poem. His imitation, however, is by no means servile.
 † This line probably alludes to the recent loss of his father.

‡ Written apparently while he was but young in the college, and had an intention to take orders. He left a sermon among his MSS. apparently prepared for the pulpit, written in a plain, clear, and unornamented style; such as might be expected from a man whose judgment was too correct, to give to any species of composition which he exercised himself, in grates foreign to it.

The purple patches every where prevail,
 But the poor work has neither head nor tail.

Churchill had strength of thought, had power to paint,
 Nor felt from principles the least restraint.
 From hell itself his characters he drew,
 And christen'd them by every name he knew;
 For 'twas from hearsay he pick'd up his tales,
 Where false and true by accident prevails:
 Hence I, though older far, have liv'd to see
 Churchill forgot, an empty shade like me.

That I'm his foe, ev'n Churchill can't pretend;
 But—thank my stars—he proves I am no friend:
 Yet Churchill, could an honest wish succeed,
 I'd prove myself to thee a friend indeed;
 For had I power like that which bends the spheres
 To music never heard by mortal ears,
 Where, in his system sets the central sun,
 And drags reluctant planets into tune;
 So would I bridle thy eccentric soul,
 In reason's sober orbit bid to roll:
 Spite of thyself, would make thy rancour cease,
 Preserve thy present fame, and future peace;
 And teach thy muse no vulgar place to find
 In the full moral chorus of mankind.

A PATHETIC APOLOGY

For all Laureats, past, present, and to come.

“ Veniant ad Cæsaris aures!”

YE silly dogs, whose half-year lays
 Attend like satellites on Bays,
 And still, with added lumber load
 Each birth-day, and each new-year ode,
 Why will ye strive to be severe?
 In pity to yourselves forbear;
 Nor let the sneering public see
 What numbers write far worse than he.
 His muse, oblig'd by sack and pension,
 Without a subject or invention—
 Must certain words in order set,
 As innocent as a gazette;
 Must some half-meaning, half-disguise;
 And utter neither truth nor lies.
 But why will you, ye volunteers
 In nonsense, tease us with your jeers,
 Who might with dullness and her crew
 Securely slumber? Why will you
 Sport your dim orbs amidst her fogs,
 You're not oblig'd—ye silly dogs!
 When Jove, as ancient fables sing,
 Made of a senseless log a king,
 The frogs at first their doubts express'd;
 But soon leap'd up, and smok'd the jest,
 While every tadpole of the lake
 Lay quiet, though they felt it quake.
 They knew their nature's due degree,
 'Themselves scarce more alive than he;
 They knew they could not croak like frogs;
 —Why will you try?—ye silly dogs!
 When the poor barber felt aliance
 The thunder of a Quixote's lance,
 For merely bearing on his head
 Th' expressive emblem of his trade.

The barber was a harmless log,
The hero was the silly dog.—
What trivial things are cause of quarrel,
Mambrino's helmet, or the laurel,
Alike distract an idiot's brain,
" Unreal mock'ries!" shadowy pain!
Each laureat (if kind Heaven dispense
Some little gleam of common sense),
Blest with one hundred pounds per ann.
And that too tax'd, and but ill paid,
With caution frames his frugal plan,
Nor apes his brethren of the trade.

He never will to garrets rise,
For inspiration from the skies,
And pluck, as Hotspur would have done,
" Bright honour from the pale-fac'd moon."
He never will to cellars venture,
To drag up glory from the centre,
But calmly steer his course between
Th' ærial and infernal scene,
—One hundred pounds! a golden mean!

Nor need he ask a printer's pains,
To fix the type, and share the gains;
Each morning paper is so kind,
To give his works to every wind.
Each evening post and magazine
Gratis adopts the lay serene.

On their frail barks his praise or blame
Floats for an hour, and sinks with them.
Sure without envy you might see
Such floundering immortality.
Why will ye then, amidst the bogs,
Thrust in your oar?—ye silly dogs!

He ne'er desires his stated loan
(I honestly can speak for one)
Should meet in print the public eye;
Content with Boyce's harmony,
Who throws on many a worthless lay
His music and his powers away.

Are you not charm'd, when at Vauxhall
Or Marybone, the Syrens squall
Your oft-repeated madrigals,
Your Nancys of the hills or vales,
While tip-toe misses and their beaux
Catch the dear sounds in triple rows,
And whisper, as their happiness,
They know the author of the piece?
This vanity, my gentle brothers,
You feel; forgive it then in others;
At least in one you call a dunce.
The laureat's odes are sung but once,
And then not heard—while your renown
For half a season stuns the town—
Nay, on brown paper fairly spread,
With wooden print to grace its head,
Each barber pastes you on his wall,
Each cobbler chants you in his stall;
And Dolly, from her master's shop,
Encores you, as she twirls her mop.

Then "ponder well ye parents dear"
Of works, which live a whole half year,
And with a tender eye survey
The fraiker offspring of a day,
Whose glories wither ere they bloom,
Whose very cradle is their tomb.
Have ye no bowels, cruel men!
You who may grasp or quit the pen,

May choose your subject, nay, your time,
When genius prompts to sport in rhyme,
Dependent on yourselves alone,
To be immortal, or unknown;
Does no compassion touch your breast,
For brethren to the service prest?
To laureats is no pity due,
Encumber'd with a thousand clogs?
I'm very sure they pity you,
Ye fillicit of all silly dogs!

INSCRIPTION

IN THE GARDENS AT NUNEHAM, IN OXFORDSHIRE.

To the Memory of Walter Clark, Florist, who died suddenly near this spot, 1784.

ON him whose very soul was here,
Whose duteous, careful, constant toil
Has varied with the varying year,
To make the gay profusion smile;
Whose harmless life in silent flow
Within these circling shades has past,
What happier death could Heaven bestow,
Than in these shades to breathe his last?

'Twas here he fell: not far remov'd
Has earth receiv'd him in her breast;
Still far beside the scenes he lov'd,
In holy ground his relics rest.
Each clambering woodbine, flaunting rose,
Which round you bow'r he taught to wave,
With ev'ry fragrant brier that blows,
Shall lend a wreath to bind his grave.

Each village matron, village maid,
Shall with chaste fingers chaplets tie:
Duc honours to the rural dead,
And emblems of mortality.
Each village swain that passes by,
A sigh shall to his memory give;
For sure his death demands a sigh,
Whose life instructs them how to live.

If spirits walk, as fabling age
Relates to childhood's wond'ring ear,
Full oft, does fancy dare presage,
Shall Walter's faithful shade be here;
Athwart you glade, at night's pale noon,
Full oft shall glide with busy feet,
And by the glimmering of the moon
Revisit each below'd retreat:

Perhaps the tasks on earth he knew,
Resume, correct the gadding spray,
Brush from the plants the sickly dew,
Or chase the noxious worm away.
The burbling buds shall gladlier grow,
No midnight blasts the flowers shall fear;
And many a fair effect shall show
At noon that Walter has been here.

Nay, ev'ry morn, in times to come,
If quainter ringlets curl the shade,
If richer breezes breathe perfume,
If softer swell the verdant glade;
If neatness charm a thousand ways,
Till nature almost art appear,
Tradition's constant fav'rite theme,
Shall be—Poor Walter has been here.

Anno 1795.

THE LIFE OF JENYNS.

SOAME JENYNS was born in Great Ormond-Street, London, in the beginning of the year 1704. He was the only son of Sir Roger Jenyns, Knt. of Bottisham-Hall, in Cambridgeshire, descended from the ancient and respectable family of the Jenyns of Churchill, in Somersetshire. He was knighted by King William, January 9. 1693-4. His mother was one of the daughters of Sir Peter Soame, Bart. of Hayden, in the county of Essex; a woman of great beauty, and of very amiable manners, and elegant accomplishments.

He received a domestic education, at first under the Rev. Mr. Hill, and afterwards under the Rev. Stephen White.

At the age of seventeen, he was sent to the University of Cambridge, and entered a Fellow Commoner of St. John's College, July 2. 1722, under Dr. Edmonson, at that time one of the principal tutors of the college.

He resided there near three years, pursuing his studies with great industry; but left the university, as was formerly the usual practice with gentlemen of fortune, without taking any degree.

From the time he left Cambridge, his residence in winter was in London, and in the summer in the country, in his father's family, as long as he lived.

He early displayed his poetical talents. In 1728, he published The Art of Dancing, a poem in two cantos, inscribed to Lady Fanny Fielding; 1729, he wrote the verses In the Earl of Oxford's Library; in 1730, verses To the Earl of Chesterfield, on his being installed Knight of the Garter; and in 1733, An Epistle to Lord Lovelace. This was followed by The Modern Fine Gentleman, 1746; The Squire and Parson, An Eclogue; The First Epistle of the Second Book of Horace Imitated, to Lord Hardwicke; To the Hon. Miss Torke, on her Marriage to Lord Anson, 1748; The Modern Fine Lady, 1750; and several others, which he collected into a volume in 1752.

Soon after his father's death, at the general election, in 1741, he was chosen one of the representatives for the county of Cambridge, and gave his support to Walpole. He represented it again in the parliament of 1747. In that of 1754, he was member for Dunwich, in Suffolk; and in 1761, took his seat for the town of Cambridge, which place he continued to represent so long as he remained in Parliament.

When Moore began "The World," in 1753, he gave his assistance, among others, and contributed Nos. 125, 153, 157, 163, and 178.

In 1755, he was appointed one of the Lords of Trade and Plantations; a place which he held during every change of administration, until it was abolished in 1780, when he retired from the business of parliament. He was, in general, an adherent of the minister for the time being, and was a useful, active, and diligent member of the House of Commons, though he shared, as he admitted in one of his poems, no gift of tongue.

In 1757, he published his Free Inquiry into the Origin of Evil, in Six Letters, 8vo. This work excited much attention, and produced several answers; to which he replied, in an Additional Preface to the second edition. He is of opinion, that to produce good exclusive of evil, is one of those im-possibilities which even Infinite Power cannot accomplish, and that all evils owe their existence solely to the necessity of their own nature; by which he means, that they could not possibly have been prevented without the loss of some superior good. Many evils, he thinks, will unavoidably insinuate themselves, by the natural relations and circumstances of things, into the most perfect system of created beings, even in opposition to the will of an Almighty Creator; by reason that they cannot be excluded without working contradictions, which not being proper subjects of power, it is no diminution of Omnipotence, to affirm that it cannot effect them. Such is the ground-work of his Inquiry, &c. which was reviewed with great severity by Dr. Johnson, in the "Literary Magazine" for 1757. He took a revenge unworthy of a man of letters, many years after, in a severe Epitaph on Dr. Johnson.

On the publication of Mr. Hawkins Browne's Latin poem, on the "Immortality of the Soul," in 1752, Jenyns made a translation of it into English, which was published in Doddsley's "Collection of Poems," 1758.

In 1756 he published a pamphlet, intitled Short but Serious Reasons for a National Militia, 8vo; and to this succeeded several other performances, both in prose and verse, either in defence of Government, or levelled at some persons in opposition to the measures of administration.

In 1761, he published his Miscellaneous Poems, in 2 vols, 8vo, one of which contained some political essays.

In 1767, he published a pamphlet, intitled Thoughts on the Causes and Consequences of the High Price of Provisions, 8vo. This high price he attributes principally to the increase of our national debt, and the increase of our riches, that is, to the poverty of the public, and the wealth of private individuals. This pamphlet is replete with very ingenious observations.

In 1776, he published his celebrated work, intitled A View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion, 12mo. This publication was very generally read, and commended in terms of the highest praise, by some, whilst it was spoken of in the slightest manner by others. Though he professes, and appears to have written it with a laudable design, yet it has provoked censure from the divine and the moralist, and profane sarcasm from the philosopher and sceptic. He is accused of injuring the cause he professed to defend, by diligently relating, and elaborately displaying the strongest objections which have been raised against the Christian religion, while his mode of refuting them is cold, careless, and unsatisfactory. He seems to have defended Christianity upon principles that lead, as persons may be differently disposed, to scepticism, or to enthusiasm.

His plan is comprehended under the following propositions: 1st, That there is now extant, a book intitled the New Testament. 2dly, That from this book may be extracted, a system of religion entirely new, both with regard to the object, and the doctrines, not only infinitely superior to, but unlike every thing which had ever entered into the mind of man. 3dly, That from this book may likewise be collected a system of ethics, in which every moral precept founded on reason is carried to a higher degree of purity and perfection, than in any other of the wisest philosophers of preceding ages; every moral precept founded on false principles is totally omitted, and many new precepts added, peculiarly corresponding with the new object of this religion. Lastly, that such a system of religion and morality could not have been the work of any man, or set of men, much less of those obscure, ignorant, and illiterate persons, who actually did discover and publish it to the world; and that, therefore, it must undoubtedly have been effected by the interposition of Divine Power, that is, that it must derive its origin from God. Under the third proposition, he reckoned valour, patriotism, and friendship, among fictitious virtues, founded on false principles; and he apprehends that however they have been celebrated and admired, they are, in fact, no virtues at all.

At the close of his work, he makes the following explicit declaration of his belief in the doctrine of the Christian religion. "Should it ever have the honour to be admitted into such good company, they will, immediately, I know, determine that it must be the work of some enthusiast, or methodist, some beggar, or some madman. I shall, therefore, beg leave to assure them, that the author is very far removed from all these characters: that he, once, perhaps, believed as little as themselves; but having some leisure, and more curiosity, he employed them both in resolving a question, which seemed to him of some importance.—Whether Christianity was really an imposture founded on an absurd, incredible, and obsolete fable, as many suppose it? or whether it is what it pretends to be, a revelation communicated to mankind by the interposition of some supernatural power? On a candid inquiry he found that the first was an absolute impossibility, and that its pretensions to the latter were founded on the most solid grounds. In the further pursuits of his examination, he perceived at every step new lights arising, and some of the brightest, from parts of it the most obscure, but productive of the clearest proofs, because equally beyond the power of human artifice to invent, and human reason to discover. These arguments, which have convinced him of the divine origin of this religion, he has here put together in as clear and concise a manner as he was able, thinking they might have the same effect upon others, and being of opinion that if there were a few more true Christians in the world, it would be beneficial to themselves, and by no means detrimental to the public."

Many answers to this work appeared, but only two of them merit notice: "A Series of Letters addressed to Soame Jenyns, &c." by Dr. Maclaine, the learned translator of Mosheim's "Church History;" and "A Full Answer to a Late View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion, &c." by the Rev. Henry Taylor, the editor of Ben. Mordecai's Letters to Elisha Levi. "I have the interest of Christianity," says Dr. Maclaine, "too much at heart, not to protest solemnly against your method of defending it. Your View of its internal evidence is certainly exceptionable in many respects. In general, your reasoning is neither close nor accurate; your illustrations run wide of the principles they are designed to explain and enforce. One would be tempted sometimes to think that you yourself lost sight of those principles in the midst of the desultory detail of arguments and observations which you bring to support them; and while we admire several fine touches of genius, wit, and eloquence, that strike us in the midst of this splendid confusion, we lament the want of that luminous order, and philosophical precision, that are indispensably required in a work of this kind. You look like a man who has been suddenly transported into a new scene of things, where a multitude of objects strike him at once, and who begins to describe them before he had time to consider their arrangement and their connections. Or, to use another figure that comes nearer to your particular case, you look like a zealous and spirited volunteer, who has embarked in a vessel surrounded with enemies, and assailed by tempestuous weather, and begins to defend and work the ship, without that experience in the art of navigation, or the science of defence, that is necessary to ensure success and victory."

In 1732, he published eight Disquisitions on several Subjects, 8vo. In this work, among other ingenious, but idle fancies, he communicates his ideas of the pre-existent state of man as a state of punishment, which he attempts to confirm, by a fanciful construction of those passages of scripture, which are commonly adduced in support of the doctrine of original sin. But if the condition of man be indeed so forlorn and wretched, as he represents, it must be likewise entirely hopeless; for if all be wrong at present, it is impossible we should have any proof that things ever have been, or ever will be right. The doctrines which he inculcates in his disquisition on Government, in opposition to the established principles of civil liberty, are inconsistent with the great rights and interests of mankind. In his disquisition on Rational Christianity, he dogmatically condemns the doctrines and spirit of these friends to Christianity, who believe it on rational grounds, and explain it in a manner consistent with common sense; and paradoxically asserts that the doctrines of Christianity are "so adverse to all the principles of human reason, that if brought before her tribunal, it must be inevitably condemned." It will generally, however, be thought by those who are sincere believers in Christianity, that that explanation of the Scriptures which makes them agree with our natural ideas of religion and morals, is as likely to be the true one, as that which ascribes to them doctrines contrary to the principles of reason. His opposition to all the established principles of civil liberty, in his seventh disquisition, was combated in a very sensible and spirited pamphlet, intitled "An Answer to the Disquisition on Government and Civil Liberty, &c. It was likewise ridiculed, with great humour, in the "Dean and the Squire," a political eclogue, humbly dedicated to Soame Jenyns, Esq. by the "Author of the Heroic Epistle to Sir William Chambers."

This was the last performance which he gave to the world; but he continued from time to time to write verses. Among the last of his occasional compositions, were the burlesque Ode to Lord Carlisle, the Epitaph on Dr. Johnson, the short poem on his Majesty's Escape from the attack of a lunatic, and the compliment to Lady Salisbury, 1787.

He died at his house in Tilney-Street, of a fever, after a few days illness, December 18. 1787, in the 83d year of his age, leaving no issue. He was buried in the church of Bottisham. In the registry of burials in the parish of Bottisham for 1787, the following entry was made by the Rev. William Lort Mansell, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, who was then sequestrator of that vicarage.

SOAME JENYNS, in the 83d year of his age.

What his literary character was,
The world hath already judged for itself;
But it remains for his parish Minister
to do his duty,

By declaring,
That while he registers the burial of
SOAME JENYNS,
He regrets the loss of one of the most amiable of men,

And one of the truest Christians.
To the parish of Bottisham he is an irreparable loss.

He was buried in this church, December 27,
near midnight,

By William Lort Mansell, sequestrator;
Who thus transgresses the common forms
of a Register,

Merely because he thinks it to be
The most solemn and lasting method of recording to posterity,

That the finest understanding
Has been united
To the best heart.

He was twice married, first to Mary, the only daughter of Colonel Soame, of Dercham, in Norfolk, a lady of great fortune, to whom his father was guardian. In this union, as is too frequently the case, his inclinations were less consulted than the advantages that were supposed to be the certain appendages to an alliance with great wealth. The consequence may be imagined. A separation ensued, which his lady did not long survive. He afterwards married Elizabeth, the daughter of Henry Grey, Esq. of Hackney, in the county of Middlesex, who survived him.

Three editions of his works were printed during his life. The first was printed in a small 8vo, 1752, the second in two small volumes 8vo, 1761, and the last was printed in one large volume 8vo, 1776. His name was not put to either of these editions; but the title-pages of the first and last contain an urn filled with flowers, round which a wreath is entwined, charged with the motto to his arms, Ignavis nunquam. In 1790, his Works were collected in 4 vols. 8vo, including several pieces never before published, by Charles Nalson Cole, Esq. with "Short Sketches of his Life," which have been chiefly followed in the present account. The first volume contains his Miscellaneous Poems. The second, the translation of Browne, De Animi Immortalitate; five numbers of the "World;" Short but Serious Reasons for a National Militia; Thoughts on the Causes and Consequences of the present high Price of Provisions; The objections to the Taxation of our American Colonies by the Legislature; Reflections on several Subjects; Thoughts on a Parliamentary Reform; A Scheme for the Coalition of Parties; Thoughts on the National Debt, never before published. The third, A Free Inquiry into the Nature and Origin of Evil, in Six Letters; On Evil in General, On Evils of Imperfection. On Natural Evils, On Moral Evils, On Political Evils; and seven Disquisitions, On the Chain of Universal Being, On Cruelty to Inferior Animals, On a Pre-existent State, On the Nature of Fame, On the Analogy between things Material and Intellectual, On Rational Christianity, On Government and Civil Liberty. The fourth, View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion, and Short and Cursory Observations on Several Passages in the New Testament, never before published.

His Poems were inserted in the edition of "The English Poets," 1790, and are reprinted in the present collection, with the following additional pieces from Mr. Cole's edition, 1790, written in the Earl of Oxford's Library at Wimble; To a Nefegay in Pancharilla's Breast, From Bonfarius, Given to a Lady with a Watch; Belphegor, a Fable from Machiavel; A Dialogue between the Right Hon. Henry Pelham, and Madam Popularity; A Simile; A Passage in Offian Versified; On seeing the Earl of Chesterfield at a Ball, at Barb; The American Coachman; Burlesque Ode, Written at the Countess of Salisbury's Assembly; Epitaph on Dr. Johnson; On a late execrable Attempt on his Majesty's Life.

His character seems to have been amiable and respectable. His life had been very active and diversified. He had studied much, he had seen more. He conversed as well as he wrote. His thoughts were sprightly, his expressions neat. His person was diminutive, and of a slight make; and he had a small wen, or protuberance, on his neck. In his youth, he had been so fond of dress, as to be distinguished as one of the beaux of his time; but in the latter part of his life, his appearance was rather mean, being generally habited in a Bath beaver surtout, with blue worsted boot-stockings. His religious routine is said to have been singular. From early impression, or strong conviction, he was originally a zealous believer of revelation, and suspected of a tendency to certain fanatical opinions. Gradually losing ground in faith, he wandered into paths obscured by doubt, and became a professed deist; till, by a retrograde progress, he measured back his steps to the comforts of rational Christianity. On his death-bed, it is said, he reviewed his life, and with a visible gleam of joy, he gloried in the belief that his View of the Internal Evidences of the Christian Religion had been useful. It was received, perhaps, where greater works would not make their way, and so might have aided the ardour of virtue, the confidence of truth. He spoke of his death as one prepared to die. He did not shrink from it as an evil, nor as a punishment, but met it with decent firmness, as his original destiny, the kind release from what was worse, the kinder summons to all that is better. As a lay-vindicator of divine revelation, he ranks with Milton, Locke, Addison, and Newton.

As an author, he has attained no small degree of reputation, by powers which have had every aid that useful and polite learning could give. He possesses a judgment critically exact, an elegant taste, and a rich vein of wit and humour. He is entitled to great praise for many excellencies of style. Mr. Burke has truly said, that he was one of those who wrote the purest English, that is, the most simple and aboriginal language, the least qualified with foreign impregnation. To the character of an elegant, he joins that of a sensible and agreeable writer. He has the rare merit of treating, in a pleasing manner, that abstracted metaphysic subject, the origin or necessity of evil, which has perplexed human reason in every age. He has written like a man of taste and acuteness, in the habit of deep thinking. A species of reading often injurious, and generally unentertaining, he has rendered at once interesting and argumentative. But genius, like every power in human nature, is capable of an absurd and pernicious, as well as of a judicious and beneficial application. While it is employed in investigating useful truths, and enlarging the boundaries of real knowledge, it is rendering such important services to mankind, as to merit the highest applause. Of this perversion of genius, his political tracts and philosophical disquisitions afford a striking example. Not contented with that portion of reputation for originality, which is to be acquired in the plain path of truth and common sense, he finds it necessary to employ the subtleties of sophistry in support of opinions, which party-attachments led him to adopt, and to exercise his superior abilities, in erecting fanciful and paradoxical systems, or in defending some dangerous tenets. His View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion, contains many just and important observations; but his method of reasoning is liable to considerable objections. It has not occurred to the advocates of the Christian religion, that doctrines, allowed to be contradictory to reason, are not on this account the less credible, nor have they ever conceived that the virtues of friendship, fortitude, and patriotism, do not form a part of the morality of the gospel; much less have they urged the want of these virtues as a peculiar recommendation of its excellence. They are conspicuously illustrated in the character of its author; and it would be easy to produce striking instances, in which his courage and friendship, and concern for the welfare of his country, were actually displayed. The advocates of Christianity, in answer to Shaftesbury and others, have sufficiently vindicated it in this respect. They are unquestionably virtues of considerable importance; and so far as they do not interfere with the general principles of benevolence, which Christianity inculcates, they constitute a part of Christian morality.

As a poet, he is rather characterised by elegance and correctness, than by invention or enthusiasm. He writes with terseness and neatness, seldom with much vigour or animation. He is a pleasing and elegant, but not a very animated, or first-rate writer. His expression is concise, his wit lively, his satire poignant, his humour delicate, and his versification easy, flowing and agreeable. His Art of Dancing, Modern Fine Gentleman, Modern Fine Lady, First Epistle of Horace, Burlesque Ode, &c. are elegant and beautiful compositions. In every one of them there are just conception, lively imagination, correct expression, and clear connection. His version of Browne's De Immortalitate Animæ, is a correct and classical performance, which may challenge a comparison with the subsequent versions of Mr. Cranwell and Mr. Lettice. His shorter pieces, in general, may be read with pleasure. We find here, and there some indecencies of expression, which we sincerely wish he had avoided. The Epitaph on Dr. Johnson was not dictated by the same spirit of candour and friendship which bedewed the grave of Jenyns, and strewed it with flowers.

His moral and literary character has been delineated by Mr. Cole, in his "Sketches," with the zeal of friendship and the fondness of affectionate remembrance; but he rates his merits too high. His remarks on his style are exceeding just.

"He was a man of great mildness, gentleness, and sweetness of temper, which he manifested to all with whom he had concerns, either in the business of life or its social intercourse. His earnest desire was, as far as it was possible, never to offend any person; and he made such allowances, even for those who in their dispositions differed from him, that he was rarely offended with others; of which, in a long life, he gave many notable instances. He was strict in the performance of religious duties in public, and a constant practiser of them in private; ever professing the greatest veneration for the church of England and its government, as by law established; holding her liturgy as the purest and most perfect form of public worship in any established church in Christendom: but he thought that alterations and amendments might be made in it, which would render it more perfect than it is in its present state, and which he earnestly desired to have seen accomplished by those who were properly authorized.

"In private life, he was most amiable and engaging; for he was possessed of a well-informed mind, accompanied by an uncommon vein of the most lively, spirited, and genuine wit, which always flowed very copiously amongst those with whom he conversed, but which was tempered with such a kindness of nature, that it never was the cause of uneasiness to any of those with whom he lived: this made his acquaintance much sought after and courted by all those who had a taste for brilliant conversation, being well assured that they would be delighted with it where he was; and that, though they did not possess the same talent, they never would be censured by him because they wanted it.

"This so gentle an exertion of so rare a quality, he not only strictly observed himself, but was always much hurt if he observed the want of it in others; and considered every fallacy of wit, however bright it might be, which tended to the mortification of those who heard it, as one of its greatest abuses, since he looked upon all pre-eminent gifts of the mind, bestowed by nature, as much for the happiness of others, as of those who possess them.

"No person ever felt more for the miseries of others than he did; no person saw, or more strictly practised, the necessity imposed on those who form the superior ranks of life, whose duty it is to reconcile the lower classes to their present condition, by contributing the utmost to make them happy; and thereby to cause them to feel as little of that difference as is possible; for he was most kind and courteous to all his inferiors, not only in his expressions and in his behaviour, but in assisting them in all their wants and distresses, as far as he could; ever considering his poor neighbours in the country as parts of his family, and, as such, entitled to his care and protection.

"He spent his summers at his house in the country, residing there with hospitality to his tenants and neighbours, and never suffered any places at that season calculated for public diversions to allure him; for he said he could at that time do more good in his own parish than in any other situation.

"He frequently lamented the prevailing fashion of the later times of his life, which carried gentlemen with their families from London, when it is deserted by all whose absence can be dispensed with, to places far distant from their houses and ancient seats in the country; opened chiefly for the reception of those who wish to continue the scenes of dissipation they have left: whence it is, that the money which should revert to the districts from which it was received, is turned into a different channel; tenants are deprived of the advantages they are in some degree entitled to, from its expenditure amongst them; hospitality done away, and the stream of charity, that would otherwise have gladdened the hearts of their poor neighbours, is stopped; their inferiors deprived of their example, encouragement, and protection, in the practice of religion and virtue, and thereby the manners of the country altered for the worse, which necessarily occasions great mischief to the public.

“When he was in the country, he constantly acted as a magistrate in his own district, and attended all those meetings which were holden for the purposes of public justice.

“From the general opinion that was entertained of his inflexible integrity, and superior understanding, he was much resorted to in that character at home.

“Unknown to Sir Robert Walpole, and unconnected with him by acquaintance or private regard, he supported him to the utmost of his power, till he retired from his high station. He seldom or ever spoke, whilst sitting in Parliament.

“From having long had a seat at the Board of Trade, and constantly attending his duty there, he gained an understanding of the great outlines of the commercial interests of this country.

“As an author, so long as a true taste of fine writing shall exist, he will have a distinguished place amongst those who have excelled. Whatever he hath published, whether he played with his muse, or appeared in the plain livery of prose, was sought for with avidity, and read with pleasure, by those who at the time were esteemed the best judges of composition. A minute criticism on their several excellencies is unnecessary, as the public sanction hath stamped their merit. Suffice it to say, that his poems are on the most pleasing subjects, and are executed with a warm animation of fancy, sterling wit, and, at the same time, great correctness.

“He wonderfully excelled in burlesque imitations of the ancient poets, by applying their thoughts to modern times and circumstances; which might be well expected, after his short but excellent strictures on this manner of writing, prefixed to his imitations of the first epistle of the second book of Horace's Epistles, inscribed to the Lord Chancellor Hardwicke.

“How far he followed the rules there laid down, must be determined by those who shall read and compare the original with the translation; in which it may be found, that in this kind of imitation, he hath gone through a poem of three hundred lines, without ever losing sight of the original, by introducing new thoughts of his own.

“As a writer of prose, whoever will examine his style, will find that he is entitled to a place amongst the purest and correctest writers of the English language. He always puts proper words in proper places, and hath at the same time a variety in different members of his periods, which would otherwise tire and disgust the reader with their sameness; a failure which may be found in some of the works of those to whom the public have ascribed a superior degree of merit. But this variety occasions no difficulty or embarrassment in the sense intended to be conveyed, which always at first sight appears clear, and is easy to be comprehended, so that the reader is never stopped in his progress to study what is meant.

“This is his characteristic as a writer, on whatever subject he engaged, whether it were serious or called for his wit, whether political, moral, religious, or metaphysical. His matter is always most pertinent to the subject which he handles; he reasons with closeness and precision, and always, by a regular chain of argument, arrives at the conclusions which he professes is his design to establish. And whoever will attend to the exertions of his mind, manifesting at some times the truest humour and the most lively wit, at other times the most regular chain of argument, with the nicest discrimination and marked differences of abstract ideas, cannot but allow, that as wit consists in quickly assembling ideas, and putting those together with readiness and variety, wherein can be found any resemblance; and judgment, on the contrary, in carefully separating ideas from one another, and examining them apart; I say, that he cannot but allow that our author was one of those very few who have appeared in the world possessed of these two almost discordant talents of the understanding.”

THE ART OF DANCING.

Inscribed to the Right Hon. the Lady Fanny Fielding*.

“Incessu patuit Dea.” VIRG.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1730.

CANTO I.

IN the smooth dance to move with graceful mien,
Easy with care, and sprightly, though serene,
To mark th' instructions echoing strains convey,
And with just steps each tuneful note obey,
I teach; be present, all ye sacred choir,
Blow the soft flute, and strike the sounding lyre:
When Fielding bids, your kind assistance bring,
And at her feet the lowly tribute fling;
O may her eyes (to her this verse is due),
What first themselves inspir'd, vouchsafe to view!

Hail, loveliest art! that canst all hearts ensnare,
And make the fairest still appear more fair.

Beauty can little execution do,
Unless she borrows half her arms from you;
Few, like Pygmalion, doat on lifeless charms,
Or care to clasp a statue in their arms;
But breasts of flint must melt with fierce desire,
When art and motion wake the sleeping fire:
A Venus drawn by great Apelles' hand,
May for a while our wond'ring eyes command,
But still, though form'd with all the pow'rs of art,
The lifeless piece can never warm the heart;
So a fair nymph, perhaps, may please the eye,
Whilst all her beauteous limbs unactive lie,
But when her charms are in the dance display'd,
Then ev'ry heart adores the lovely maid:
This sets her beauty in the fairest light,
And shows each grace in full perfection bright;
Then as she turns around, from ev'ry part,
Like porcupines, she sends a piercing dart;
In vain, alas! the fond spectator tries
To shun the pleasing dangers of her eyes,
For, Parthian like, she wounds as sure behind
With flowing curls, and ivory neck reclin'd:
Whether her steps the Minuet's mazes trace,
Or the slow Louvre's more majestic pace,
Whether the Rigadoon employs her care,
Or sprightly Jigg displays the nimble fair,
At every step new beauties we explore,
And worship now, what we admir'd before:

* Daughter of Basil, fourth Earl of Denbigh. She married Daniel Earl of Winchelsea, and died Sep. 27. 1734.

So when Æneas in the Tyrian grove
Fair Venus met, the charming queen of love,
The beauteous goddess, whilst unmov'd she stood,
Seem'd some fair nymph, the guardian of the wood;
But when she mov'd, at once her heavenly mien
And graceful step confess bright beauty's queen,
New glories o'er her form each moment rise,
And all the goddess open to his eyes.

Now haste, my muse, pursue thy destin'd way,
What dresses best become the dancer, say;
The rules of dress forget not to impart,
A lesson previous to the dancing art.

The soldier's scarlet glowing from afar,
Shows that his bloody occupation's war;
Whilst the lawn band, beneath a double chin,
As plainly speaks divinity within; [snows,
The milk-maid safe through driving rains and Wrapp'd in her cloak and propp'd on pattens goes;
While the soft Belle immur'd in velvet chair,
Needs but the silken shoe, and trusts her bosom bare:

The woolly drab, and English broad cloth warm,
Guard well the horseman from the beating storm,
But load the dancer with too great a weight,
And call from ev'ry pore the dewy sweat;
Rather let him his active limbs display
In camlet thin, or glossy paduasoy:
Let no unwieldy pride his shoulders press,
But airy, light; and easy be his dress;
Thin be his yielding sole, and low his heel,
So shall he nimbly bound, and safely wheel.

But let not precepts known my verse prolong,
Precepts which use will better teach than song;
For why should I the gallant spark command,
With clean white gloves to fit his ready hand?
Or in his sob enlivening spirits wear,
And pungent salts to raise the fainting fair?
Or hint, the sword that dangles at his side,
Should from its silken bondage be untied?
Why should my lays the youthful tribe advise,
Lest snowy clouds from out their wigs arise:
So shall their partners mourn their laces spoil'd,
And shining silks with greasy powder soil'd?
Nor need I, sure, bid prudent youths beware,
Lest with erected tongues their buckles stare,
The pointed steel shall oft their stockings rend,
And oft th' approaching petticoat offend.

And now, ye youthful fair, I sing to you,
With pleasing smiles my useful labours view;
For you the silk-worm's fine-wrought webs display,
And lab'ring spin their little lives away,

For you bright gems with radiant colours glow,
 Fair as the dyes that paint the heavenly bow,
 For you the sea resigns its pearly store,
 And earth unlocks her mines of treasur'd ore;
 In vain yet nature thus her gifts bestows,
 Unless yourselves with art those gifts dispose.

Yet think not, nymphs, that in the glittering ball,
 One form of dress prescribed can suit with all;
 One brightest shines when wealth and art combine,
 To make the finish'd piece completely fine;
 When least adorn'd, another steals our hearts,
 And rich in native beauties, wants not arts;
 In some are such resistless graces found,
 That in all dresses they are sure to wound;
 Their perfect forms all foreign aids despise,
 And gems but borrow lustre from their eyes. [seen

Let the fair nymph, in whose plump cheeks are
 A constant blush, be clad in cheerful green;
 In such a dress the sportive sea-nymphs go;
 So in their grassy bed fresh roses blow:
 The lass, whose skin is like the hazel brown,
 With brighter yellow should overcome her own;
 While maids grown pale with sickness or despair,
 The sable's mournful dye should choose to wear;
 So the pale moon still shines with purest light,
 Cloth'd in the dusky mantle of the night.

But far from you be all those treacherous arts,
 That wound with painted charms unwary hearts;
 Dancing's a touch-stone that true beauty tries,
 Nor suffers charms that nature's hand denies:
 Though for a while we may with wonder view
 The rosy blush, and skin of lovely hue,
 Yet soon the dance will cause the cheeks to glow,
 And melt the waxen lips, and neck of snow;
 So shine the fields in icy fetters bound,
 Whilst frozen gems bespangle all the ground;
 Through the clear crystal of the glittering snow,
 With scarlet dye the blushing hawthorns glow;
 O'er all the plains unnumber'd thorns rise,
 And a new bright creation charms our eyes;
 Till zephyr breathes, then all at once decay
 The splendid scenes, their glories fade away,
 The fields resign the beauties not their own,
 And all their snowy charms run trickling down.

Dare I in such momentous points advise,
 I should condemn the hoop's enormous size:
 Of ills I speak by long experience found,
 Oft have I trod th' immeasurable round,
 And mourn'd my shins bruise'd black with many a wound.

Nor should the tighten'd stays, too straitly lac'd,
 In whalebone bondage gall the slender waist;
 Nor waving lappets should the dancing fair,
 Nor ruffles edg'd with dangling fringes wear;
 Oft will the cobweb-ornaments catch hold
 On the approaching button rough with gold,
 Nor force nor art can then the bonds divide,
 When once th' entangled Gordian knot is ty'd.
 So the unhappy pair, by Hymen's power,
 Together join'd in some ill-fated hour,
 The more they strive their freedom to regain,
 The faster binds th' indissoluble chain.

Let each fair maid, who fears to be disgrac'd,
 Ever be sure to tie her garters fast,
 Lest the loos'd string, amidst the public ball,
 A with'd-for prize to some proud top should fall,
 Who the rich treasure shall triumphant show,
 And with warm blushes cause her cheeks to glow.

But yet, (as fortune by the self-same way
 She humbles many, some delights to raise)
 It happen'd once, a fair illustrious dame
 By such neglect acquir'd immortal fame.
 And hence the radiant star and garter blue
 Britannia's nobles grace, if fame says true:
 Hence still, Plantagenet, thy beauties bloom,
 Though long since moulder'd in the dusky tomb,
 Still thy lost garter is sovereign's care,
 And what each royal breast is proud to wear.

But let me now my lovely charge remind,
 Lest thy forgetful leave their fans behind;
 Lay not, ye fair, the pretty toy aside,
 A toy at once display'd for use and pride,
 A wondrous engine, that by magic charms
 Cools your own breasts, and ev'ry other's warm.
 What daring bard shall e'er attempt to tell
 The pow'rs that in this little weapon dwell?
 What verse can e'er explain its various parts,
 Its numerous uses, motions, charms, and arts?
 Its painted folds that oft extended wide,
 Th' afflicted fair one's blubber'd beauties hide,
 When secret sorrows her sad bosom fill,
 If Strephon is unkind, or Shock is ill:
 Its sticks, on which her eyes dejected pore,
 And pointing fingers number o'er and o'er,
 When the kind virgin burns with secret shame,
 Dies to consent, yet fears to own her flame;
 Its shake triumphant, its victorious clap,
 Its angry flutter, and its wanton tap?

Forbear, my muse, th' extensive theme to sing,
 Nor trust in such a slight thy tender wing;
 Rather do you in humble lines proclaim,
 From whence this engine took its form and name,
 Say from what cause it first deriv'd its birth,
 How form'd in heaven, how thence deduc'd to earth.

Once in Arcadia, that fam'd seat of love,
 There liv'd a nymph the pride of all the grove,
 A lovely nymph, adorn'd with ev'ry grace,
 An easy shape, and sweetly-blooming face;
 Fanny, the damsel's name, as chaste as fair,
 Each virgin's envy, and each swain's despair;
 To charm her ear the rival shepherds sing,
 Blow the soft flute, and wake the trembling string;
 For her they leave their wand'ring flocks to rove,
 Whilst Fanny's name resounds through ev'ry
 grove, [love;

And spreads on ev'ry tree, enclos'd in knots of
 As Fielding's now, her eyes all hearts inflame,
 Like her in beauty, as alike in name.

'Twas when the Summer fun now mounted
 high,

With fiercer beams had scorch'd the glowing sky,
 Beneath the covert of a cooling shade,
 To shun the heat, this lovely nymph was laid;
 The sultry weather o'er her cheeks had spread
 A blush that added to their native red,
 And her fair breath, as polish'd marble white,
 Was half conceal'd, and half expos'd to sight:
 Æolus, the mighty god whom winds obey,
 Observ'd the beauteous maid, as thus she lay;
 O'er all her charms he gaz'd with fond delight,
 And suck'd in poison at the dangerous sight;
 He sighs, he burns; at last declares his pain,
 But still he sighs, and still he woos in vain;

The cruel nymph, regardless of his moan,
Minds not his flame, uneasy with her own;
But still complains, that he who rul'd the air
Would not command one zephyr to repair
Around her face, nor gentle breeze to play
Through the dark glade, to cool the sultry day;
By love incited, and the hopes of joy,
Th' ingenious god contriv'd this pretty toy,
With gales incessant to relieve her flame,
And call'd it Fan, from lovely Fanny's name.

CANTO II.

Now see prepar'd to lead the sprightly dance,
The lovely nymphs and well-dress'd youths advance;

The spacious room receives its jovial guest,
And the floor shakes with pleasing weight oppress'd:
Thick rang'd on ev'ry side, with various dyes
The fair in glossy silks our sight surprize;
So in a garden bath'd with genial show'rs,
A thousand sorts of variegated flow'rs,
Jonquils, carnations, pinks, and tulips rise,
And in a gay confusion charm our eyes.
High o'er their heads, with num'rous candles
bright,

Large sconces shed their sparkling beams of light,
Their sparkling beams, that still more brightly
glow,

Reflected back from gems, and eyes below:
Unnumber'd fans to cool the crowded fair,
With breathing zephyrs move the circling air:
The sprightly fiddle, and the sounding lyre,
Each youthful breast with gen'rous warmth inspire;

Fraught with all joys the blissful moments fly,
Whilst music melts the ear, and beauty charms
the eye.

Now let the youth, to whose superior place
It first belongs the splendid ball to grace,
With humble bow and ready hand prepare
Forth from the crowd to lead his chosen fair;
The fair shall not his kind request deny,
But to the pleasing toil with equal ardour fly.

But stay, rash pair, nor yet untaught advance:
First hear the muse, ere you attempt to dance:

* By art directed o'er the foaming tide,
Secure from rocks the painted vessels glide;
By art the chariot scours the dusty plain,
Springs at the whip, and † hears the strait'ning
rein;

To art our bodies must obedient prove,
If e'er we hope with graceful ease to move.

Long was the dancing art unfix'd and free,
Hence lost in error, and uncertainty;
No precepts did it mind, or rules obey,
But ev'ry master taught a different way:
Hence ere each new-born dance was fully try'd,
The lovely product ev'n in blooming dy'd;
Through various hands in wild confusion tost;
Its steps were alter'd, and its beauties lost;

* "Arte citæ veloce rates remoque moventur,
"Arte leves currus." OVID.

† "—Nec audit currus habenas." VIRG.
Vol. XI.

Till † Fuillet, the pride of Gallia rose,
And did the dance in characters compose;
Each lovely grace by certain marks he taught,
And ev'ry step in lasting volumes wrote;
Hence o'er the world this pleasing art shall spread,
And ev'ry dancer in ev'ry clime be read,
By distant masters shall each step be seen,
Though mountains rise, and oceans roar between;
Hence, with her sister arts, shall dancing claim
An equal right to universal fame;
And Isaac's Rigadoon shall live as long
As Raphael's painting, or as Virgil's song.

Wise nature ever, with a prudent hand,
Dispenses various gifts to ev'ry land;
To ev'ry nation frugally imparts
A genius fit for some peculiar arts;
To trade the Dutch incline, the Swiss to arms,
Music and verse are soft Italia's charms;
Britannia justly glories to have found
Lands unexplor'd, and sail'd the globe around;
But none will sure presume to rival France,
Whether she forms or executes the dance:
To her exalted genius 'tis we owe
The sprightly Rigadoon and Louvre slow,
The Borée, and Courant unpractis'd long,
Th' immortal Minuet, and smooth Bretagne,
With all those dances of illustrious fame,
|| Which from their native country take their
name:

With these let ev'ry ball be first begun,
Nor Country-Dance intrude till these are done.

Each cautious bard, ere he attempts to sing,
First gently flutt'ring tries his tender wing;
And if he finds that with uncommon fire
The muses all his raptur'd soul inspire,
At once to Heav'n he soars in lofty odes,
And sings alone of heroes and of gods;
But if he trembling fears a flight so high,
He then descends to softer elegy;
And if in elegy he can't succeed,
In pastoral he still may tune the oaten reed:
So should the dancer, ere he tries to move,
With care his strength, his weight and genius prove;

Then, if he finds kind nature's gifts impart
Endowments proper for the dancing art,
If in himself he feels together join'd,
An active body and ambitious mind,
In nimble Rigadoons he may advance,
Or in the Louvre's slow majestic dance:
If these he fears to reach, with easy pace
Let him the Minuet's circling mazes trace:
Is this too hard? This too let him forbear,
And to the Country-Dance confine his care.

Would you in dancing ev'ry fault avoid,
To keep true time be first your thoughts employ'd;
All other errors they in vain shall mend,
Who in this one important point offend;
For this, when now united hand in hand
Eager to start the youthful couple stand,
Let them a while their nimble feet restrain,
And with soft taps beat time to every strain:

† Fuillet wrote the Art of Dancing by Characters, in French, since translated by Weaver.

|| French Dances.

So for the race prepar'd two coursers stand,
And with impatient pawings spurn the sand.

In vain a master shall employ his care,
Where nature has once fix'd a clumsy air;
Rather let such, to country sports confin'd,
Pursue the flying hare or tim'rous hind:
Nor yet, while I the rural 'square despise,
A mien effeminate would I advise:
With equal scorn I would the top deride,
Nor let him dance—but on the woman's side.

And you, fair nymphs, avoid with equal care
A stupid dullness, and a coquette air;
Neither with eyes, that ever love the ground,
Asleep, like spinning tops, run round and round,
Nor yet with giddy looks and wanton pride
Stare all around, and skip from side to side.

True dancing, like true wit, is best express'd
By nature only to advantage dress'd;
'Tis not a nimble bound, or caper high,
That can pretend to please a curious eye;
Good judges no such tumbler's tricks regard,
Or think them beautiful, because they're hard.

'Tis not enough that ev'ry stander-by
No glaring errors in your steps can spy,
The dance and music must so nicely meet,
Each note should seem an echo to her feet;
A nameless grace must in each movement dwell,
Which words can ne'er express, or precepts tell,
Not to be taught, but ever to be seen
In Flavia's air, and Chloe's easy mien;
'Tis such an air that makes her thousands fall,
When Fielding dances at a birth-night ball;
Smooth as Camilla she skims o'er the plain,
And flies like her through crowds of heroes slain.

Now when the Minuet, oft repeated o'er,
(Like all terrestrial joys) can please no more,
And ev'ry nymph, refusing to expand
Her charms, declines the circulating hand;
Then let the jovial Country-Dance begin,
And the loud fiddles call each straggler in:
But ere they come, permit me to disclose,
How first, as legends tell, this pastime rose.

In ancient times (such times are now no more)
When Albion's crown illustrious Arthur wore,
In some fair op'ning glade, each Summer's night,
Where the pale moon diffus'd her silver light,
On the soft carpet of a grassy field,
The sporting fairies their assemblies held:
Some lightly tripping with their pigmy queen,
In circling ringlets mark'd the level green,
Some with soft notes bade mellow pipes resound,
And music warble through the groves around;
Oft lonely shepherds by the forest side,
Belated peasants oft their revels spy'd,
And home returning, o'er their nut-brown ale
Their guests diverted with the wondrous tale.
Instructed hence, throughout the British isle,
And fond to imitate the pleasing toil,
Round where the trembling May-pole fix'd on
high,

Uplifts its flow'ry honours to the sky,
The ruddy maids and sun-burnt swains resort,
And practise ev'ry night the lovely sport;
Oh ev'ry side Æolian artists stand,
Whose active elbows swelling winds command,
The swelling winds harmonious pipes inspire,
And blow in ev'ry breast a gen'rous fire.

Thus taught, at first the Country-Dance began,
And hence to cities and to courts it ran;
Succeeding ages did in time impart
Various improvements to the lovely art;
From fields and groves to palaces remov'd,
Great ones the pleasing exercise approv'd:
Hence the loud fiddle and shrill trumpet's sounds
Are made companions of the dancer's bounds;
Hence gems, and silks, brocades, and ribbons
join,

To make the ball with perfect lustre shine.

So rude at first the tragic muse appear'd,
Her voice alone by rustic rabble heard;
Where twisting trees a cooling arbour made,
The pleas'd spectators sat beneath the shade;
The homely stage with rushes green was strew'd,
And in a cart the strolling actors rode;
Till time at length improv'd the great design,
And bade the scenes with painted landscapes
shine:

Then art did all the bright machines dispose,
And theatres of Parian marble rose;
Then mimic thunder shook the canvas sky,
And gods descended from their tow'rs on high.

With caution now let ev'ry youth prepare
To choose a partner from the mingled fair;
Vain would be here th' instructing muse's voice,
If he pretended to direct his choice:
Beauty alone by fancy is express'd,
And charms in different forms each differ'nt breast:
A snowy skin this am'rous youth admires,
Whilst nut-brown cheeks another's bosom fires;
Small waists and slender limbs some hearts inspire,
Whilst others love the more substantial fair.

But let not outward charms your judgment
sway,

Your reason rather than your eyes obey;
And in the dance, as in the marriage noose,
Rather for merit, than for beauty choose:
Be her your choice, who knows with perfect skill
When she should move, and when she should be still,

Who uninstructed can perform her share,
And kindly half the pleasing burden bear.
Unhappy is that hopeless wretch's fate,
Who fetter'd in the matrimonial state
With a poor simple inexperienc'd wife,
Is forc'd to lead the tedious dance of life;
And such is his, with such a partner join'd,
A moving puppet, but without a mind:
Still must his hand be pointing out the way,
Yet ne'er can teach so fast as she can stray;
Beneath her follies he must ever groan,
And ever blush for errors not his own.

But now behold, united hand in hand,
Rang'd on each side, the well-pair'd couples stand!

Each youthful bosom beating with delight,
Waits the brisk signal for the pleasing sight;
While lovely eyes, that flash unusual rays,
And snowy bobbies pull'd above the stays,
Quick busy hands, and bridling heads declare
The fond impatience of the starting fair.
And see, the sprightly dance is now begun!
Now here, now there, the giddy maze they run;
Now with slow steps they pace the circling ring,
Now all confus'd, too swift for sight they spring:

So in a wheel, with rapid fury tost,
The undistinguish'd spokes are in the motion lost.

The dancer here no more requires a guide,
To no strict steps his nimble feet are ty'd;
The muse's precepts here would useless be,
Where all is fancy'd, unconfin'd, and free;
Let him but to the music's voice attend,
By this instructed, he can ne'er offend:
If to his share it falls the dance to lead,
In well-known paths he may be sure to tread;
If others lead, let him their motions view,
And in their steps the winding maze pursue.

In every country-dance a serious mind,
Turn'd for reflection, can a moral find.
In hunt-the-squirrel thus the nymph we view,
Seeks when we fly, but flies when we pursue:
Thus in round-dances where our partners change,
And unconfin'd from fair to fair we range,
As soon as one from his own consort flies,
Another seizes on the lovely prize;
A while the fav'rite youth enjoys her charms,
Till the next comer steals her from his arms;
New ones succeed, the last is still her care;
How true an emblem of th' inconstant fair!

Where can philosophers, and sages wise,
Who read the curious volumes of the skies,
A model more exact than dancing name
Of the creation's universal frame?
Where worlds unnumber'd o'er th' ethereal way
In a bright regular confusion stray;
Now here, now there they whirl along the sky,
Now near approach, and now far distant fly;
Now meet in the same order they begun,
And then the great celestial dance is done.

Where can the mor'lif find a juster plan
Of the vain labours and the life of man;
A while through juggling crowds we toil, and sweat,

And eagerly pursue we know not what;
Then when our trifling short-liv'd race is run,
Quite tir'd sit down, just where we first begun.

Though to your arms kind fate's indulgent care
Has given a partner exquisitely fair,
Let not her charms so much engage your heart,
That you neglect the skilful dancer's part;
Be not, when you the tuneful notes would hear,
Still whisp'ring idle prattle in her ear;
When you should be employ'd, be not at play,
Nor for your joys all other steps delay;
But when the finish'd dance you once have done,
And with applause through ev'ry couple run,
There rest a while; there snatch the fleeting
bliss,

The tender whisper, and the balmy kifs;
Each secret wish, each softer hope confess,
And her moist palm with eager fingers press;
With smiles the fair shall hear your warm desires,
When music melts her soul, and dancing fires.

Thus mix'd with love, the pleasing toil pursue,
Till the unwelcome morn appears in view;
Then, when approaching day its beams displays,
And the dull candles shine with fainter rays;
Then, when the sun just rises o'er the deep,
And each bright eye is almost set in sleep;
With ready hand, obsequious youths prepare
Safe to her coach to lead each chosen fair,
And guard her from the morn's inclement air: }

Let a warm hood enwrap her lovely head,
And o'er her neck a handkerchief be spread;
Around her shoulders let this arm be cast;
Whilst that from cold defends her slender waist;
With kisses warm her balmy lips shall glow,
Unchill'd by nightly damps or wint'ry snow;
While gen'rous white-wine, mull'd with ginger
warm,

Safely protects her inward frame from harm.

But ever let my lovely pupils fear
To chill their mantling blood with cold small beer.
Ah, thoughtless fair! the tempting draught re-
sue,

When thus forewarn'd by my experienc'd muse:
Let the sad consequence your thoughts employ,
Nor hazard future pains for present joy;
Detraction lurks within the pois'nous dose,
A fatal fever, or a pimpled nose.

Thus through each precept of the dancing art
The muse has play'd the kind instructor's part;
Through ev'ry maze her pupils she has led,
And pointed out the surest paths to tread:
No more remains; no more the goddess sings,
But drops her pinions, and unfurls her wings.
On downy beds the weary dancers lie,
And sleep's silk cords tie down each drowsy eye;
Delightful dreams their pleasing sports restore,
And ev'n in sleep they seem to dance once more.

And now the work completely finish'd lies,
Which the devouring teeth of time defies:
Whilst birds in air, or fish in streams we find,
Or damsels fret with aged partners join'd;
As long as nymphs shall with attentive ear
A fiddle rather than a sermon hear:
So long the brightest eyes shall oft peruse
These useful lines of my instructive muse;
Each belle shall wear them wrote upon her fan,
And each bright beau shall read them—if he can.

AN EPISTLE,

WRITTEN IN THE COUNTRY,

To the Right Honourable the Lord Lovelace, then in Town. September 1735.

Six days, my Lord, when mother time,
Though now grown old, was in her prime,
When Saturn first began to rule,
And Jove was hardly come from school,
How happy was a country life!
How free from wickedness and strife!
Then each man liv'd upon his farm,
And thought and did no mortal harm;
On mossy banks fair virgins slept,
As harmless as the flocks they kept;
Then love was all they had to do,
And nymphs were chaste, and swains were true.

But now, whatever poets write,
'Tis sure the case is alter'd quite:
Virtue no more in rural plains,
Or innocence or peace remains;
But vice is in the cottage found,
And country girls are oft unsound;
Fierce party rage each village fires,
With wars of justices and 'squires;
Attorneys, for a barley straw,
Whole ages hamper folks in law,

And ev'ry neighbour's in a flame
 About their rates, or tithes, or game :
 Some quarrel for their hares and pigeons,
 And some for difference in religions :
 Some hold their parson the best preacher,
 The tinker some a better teacher ;
 These to the church they fight for strangers,
 Have faith in nothing but her dangers ;
 While those, a more believing people,
 Can swallow all things—but a steeple.

But I, my Lord, who, as you know,
 Care little how these matters go,
 And equally detest the strife
 And usual joys of country life,
 Have by good fortune little share
 Of its diversions or its care ;
 For seldom I with 'squires unite,
 Who hunt all day, and drink all night ;
 Nor reckon wonderful inventing,
 At quarter-sessions, or cock-fighting :
 But then no farm I occupy
 With sheep to rot, and cows to die ;
 Nor rage I much, or much despair,
 Though in my hedge I find a snare ;
 Nor view I, with due admiration,
 All the high honours here in fashion ;
 The great commissions of the quorum,
 Terrors to all who come before 'em ;
 Militia scarlet edg'd with gold,
 Or the white staff high-sheriffs hold ;
 The representative's caressing,
 The judge's bow, the bishop's blessing ;
 Nor can I for my soul delight
 In the dull feast of neighb'ring knight,
 Who, if you send three days before,
 In white gloves meets you at the door,
 With superfluity of breeding
 First makes you sick, and then with feeding :
 Or if with ceremony cloy'd,
 You would next time such plagues avoid,
 And visit without previous notice,
 " John, John, a coach !—I can't think who 'tis,
 My Lady cries, who spies your coach,
 Ere you the avenue approach :
 " Lord, how unlucky !—washing day !
 " And all the men are in the hay !"
 Entrance to gain is something hard,
 The dogs all bark, the gates are barr'd ;
 The yard's with lines of linen cross'd,
 The hall-door's lock'd, the key is lost :
 These difficulties all o'ercome,
 We reach at length the drawing-room ;
 Then there's such trampling over-head,
 Madam you'd swear was brought-to-bed ;
 Miss in a hurry bursts her lock,
 To get clean sleeves to hide her smock ;
 The servants run, the pewter clatters,
 My lady dresses, calls, and chatters ;
 The cook-maid raves for want of butter,
 Pigs squeak, fowls scream, and green geese flutter.

Now after three hours tedious waiting,
 On all our neighbour's faults debating,
 And having nine times view'd the garden,
 In which there's nothing worth a farthing,
 In comes my lady and the pudden :
 " You will excuse, Sir,—on a sudden—"
 Then that we may have four and four,
 The bacon, fowls, and cauliflow'r,

Their ancient unity divide,
 The top one graces, one each side ;
 And by and by, the second course
 Comes lagging like a distant horse ;
 A falver then to church and king,
 The butler sweats, the glasses ring :
 The cloth remov'd, the toasts go round,
 Bawdy and politics abound ;
 And as the knight more tipsey waxes,
 We damn all ministers and taxes.

At last the ruddy sun quite sunk,
 The coachman tolerably drunk,
 Whirling o'er hillocks, ruts, and stones,
 Enough to dislocate one's bones,
 We home return, a wondrous token
 Of Heaven's kind care, with limbs unbroken.

Afflict us not, ye gods, though sinners,
 With many days like this, or dinners !
 But if civilities thus tease me,
 Nor business, nor diversions please me ;
 You'll ask, my Lord, how time I spend ?
 I answer, with a book or friend :
 The circulating hours dividing
 'Twixt reading, walking, eating, riding :
 But books are still my highest joy,
 These earliest please, and latest cloy.

Sometimes o'er distant climes I stray,
 By guides experienc'd taught the way ;
 The wonders of each region view,
 From frozen Lapland to Peru ;
 Bound o'er rough seas, and mountains bare,
 Yet ne'er forsake my elbow chair.

Sometimes some fam'd historian's pen
 Recals past ages back again ;
 Where all I see, through ev'ry page,
 Is but how men, with senseless rage,
 Each other rob, destroy, and burn,
 To serve a priest's, a statesman's turn ;
 Though loaded with a different aim,
 Yet always asses much the same.

Sometimes I view with much delight,
 Divines their holy game-cocks fight ;
 Here faith and works at variance set,
 Strive hard who shall the vict'ry get ;
 Presbytery and Episcopacy
 They fight so long, it would amaze ye :
 Here free-will holds a fierce dispute
 With reprobation absolute ;
 There sense kicks transubstantiation,
 And reason pecks at revelation.

With learned Newton now I fly
 O'er all the rolling orbs on high,
 Visit new worlds, and for a minute
 This old one scorn, and all that's in it ;
 And now with lab'ring Boyle I trace
 Nature through ev'ry winding maze ;
 The latent qualities admire
 Of vapours, water, air, and fire ;
 With pleasing admiration see
 Matter's surprising subtlety ;
 As how the smallest lamp displays,
 For miles around, its scatter'd rays ;
 Or how (the case still more t' explain)
 A * fart, that weighs not half a grain,
 The atmosphere will oft perfume
 Of a whole spacious drawing-room.

* See Boyle's Experiments.

Sometimes I pass a whole long day
 In happy indolence away,
 In fondly meditating o'er
 Past pleasures, and in hoping more;
 Or wander through the fields and woods,
 And gardens bath'd in circling floods;
 There blooming flowers with rapture view,
 And sparkling gems of morning dew,
 Whence in my mind ideas rise
 Of Cælia's cheeks, and Chloe's eyes.

'Tis thus my lord, I free from strife
 Spend an inglorious country life;
 'These are the joys I still pursue,
 When absent from the town and you;
 Thus pass long summer suns away,
 Busily idle, calmly gay:
 Nor great, nor mean, nor rich, nor poor,
 Not having much, nor wishing more;
 Except that you, when weary grown
 Of all the follies of the town,
 And seeing in all public places
 The same vain fops and painted faces,
 Would sometimes kindly condescend
 To visit a dull country friend:
 Here you'll be ever sure to meet
 A hearty welcome, though no treat;
 One who has nothing else to do,
 But to divert himself and you;
 A house, where quiet guards the door,
 No rural wits smoke, drink, and roar;
 Choice books, safe horses, wholesome liquor,
 Clean girls, backgammon, and the vicar.

AN ESSAY ON VIRTUE.

"Atque ipsa utilitas iusti prope mater et æqui."
 HUR.

To the Hon. Philip Yorke, Esq.*

Thou, whom nor honours, wealth, nor youth can spoil
 With the least vice of each luxuriant soil,
 Say, Yorke, (for sure, if any, thou can'st tell)
 What Virtue is, who practise it so well;
 Say, where inhabits this sultana queen;
 Prais'd and ador'd by all, but rarely seen:
 By what sure mark her essence can we trace,
 When each religion, faction, age, and place
 Sets up some fancy'd idol of its own,
 A vain pretender to her sacred throne?
 In man too oft a well dissembled part,
 A self-denying pride in woman's heart;
 In synods faith, and in the fields of fame
 Valour usurps her honours, and her name.
 Whoe'er their sense of Virtue would express,
 'Tis still by something they themselves possess.
 Hence youth good-humour, frugal craft old-age,
 Warm politicians term it party-rage,
 True churchmen zeal right orthodox; and hence
 Fools think it gravity, and wits pretence;
 To constancy alone fond lovers join it,
 And maids unask'd to chastity confine it.
 But have we then no law besides our will?
 No just criterion fix'd to good and ill?

* Now Earl of Hardwicke.

As well at noon we may obstruct our sight,
 Then doubt if such a thing exists as light;
 For no less plain would nature's law appear
 As the meridian sun unchang'd, and clear,
 Would we but search for what we were design'd,
 And for what end th' Almighty form'd mankind;
 A rule of life we then should plainly see,
 For to pursue that end must Virtue be.

Then what is that? Not want of power, or fame,
 Or worlds unnumber'd to applaud his name,
 But a desire his blessings to diffuse,
 And fear lest millions should existence lose;
 His goodness only could his power employ,
 And an eternal warmth to propagate his joy.

Hence soul and sense diffus'd through ev'ry place,
 Make happiness as infinite as space;
 Thousands of suns beyond each other blaze,
 Orbs roll o'er orbs, and glow with mutual rays;
 Each is a world, where, form'd with wondrous
 art,

Unnumber'd species live through ev'ry part:
 In ev'ry tract of ocean, earth, and skies,
 Myriads of creatures still successive rise;
 Scarce buds a leaf, or springs the vilest weed,
 But little flocks upon its verdure feed:
 No fruit our palate courts, or flow'r our smell,
 But on its fragrant bosom nations dwell,
 All form'd with proper faculties to share
 The daily bounties of their Maker's care:
 The great Creator from his heav'nly throne
 Pleas'd on the wide-expanded joy looks down,
 And his eternal law is only this,
 That all contribute to the general bliss.

Nature so plain this primal law displays,
 Each living creature sees it, and obeys;
 Each, form'd for all, promotes through private care

The public good, and justly takes its share.
 All understand their great Creator's will,
 Strive to be happy, and in that fulfil;
 Mankind excepted, lord of all beside,
 But only slave to folly, vice and pride;
 'Tis he that's deaf to this command alone,
 Delights in other's woe, and courts his own;
 Racks and destroys with tort'ring steel and flame,
 For luxury brutes, and man himself for fame;
 Sets superstition high on virtue's throne,
 Then thinks his Maker's temper like his own:
 Hence are his altars stain'd with reeking gore,
 As if he could atone for crimes by more:
 Hence whilst offended Heav'n he strives in vain
 T' appease by fasts and voluntary pain,
 Ev'n in repenting he provokes again.

How easy is our yoke! how light our load!
 Did we not strive to mend the laws of God:
 For his own sake no duty he can ask,
 The common welfare is our only talk:
 For this sole end his precepts, kind as just,
 Forbid intemperance, murder, theft, and lust,
 With ev'ry act injurious to our own
 Or others good, for such are crimes alone:
 For this are peace, love, charity enjoin'd,
 With all that can secure and bless mankind.
 Thus is the public safety virtue's cause,
 And happiness the end of all her laws;

For such by nature is the human frame,
Our duty and our interest are the same.

“ But hold,” cries out some Puritan divine,
Whose well-stuff'd cheeks with ease and plenty
shine,

“ Is this to fast, to mortify, refrain ?

“ And work salvation out with fear and pain ?”

We own the rigid lessons of their schools
Are widely different from these easy rules :
Virtue, with them, is only to abstain
From all that nature asks, and covet pain ;
Pleasure and vice are ever near a-kin,
And, if we thirst, cold water is a sin :
Heaven's path is rough and intricate, they say,
Yet all are damn'd that trip, or miss their way ;
God is a Being cruel and severe,
And man a wretch by his command plac'd here,
In sun-shine for a while to take a turn,
Only to dry and make him fit to burn.

Mistaken men, too piously severe !

Through craft misleading, or misled by fear ;
How little they God's counsels comprehend,
Our universal parent, guardian, friend !
Who, forming by degrees to bless mankind,
This globe our sportive nursery assign'd,
Where for a while his fond paternal care
Feasts us with ev'ry joy our state can bear :
Each sense, touch, taste, and smell dispense de-
light,

Music our hearing, beauty charms our sight ;
Trees, herbs, and flow'rs to us their spoils resign,
Its pearl the rock presents, its gold the mine ;
Beasts, fowl, and fish their daily tribute give
Of food and clothes, and die that we may live :
Seasons but change, new pleasures to produce,
And elements contend to serve our use :
Love's gentle shafts, ambition's tow'ring wings,
The pomps of senates, churches, courts, and kings,

All that our reverence, joy, or hope create,
Are the gay play-things of this infant state.
Scarcely an ill to human life belongs,
But what our follies cause, or mutual wrongs ;
Or if some stripes from providence we feel,
He strikes with pity, and but wounds to heal ;
Kindly perhaps sometimes afflicts us here,
To guide our views to a sublimer sphere,
In more exalted joys to fix our taste,
And wean us from delights that cannot last.
Our present good the easy task is made,
To earn superior bliss, when this shall fade ;
For, soon as e'er these mortal pleasures cloy,
His hand shall lead us to sublimer joy ;
Snatch us from all our little sorrows here,
Calm ev'ry grief, and dry each childish tear ;
Wait us to regions of eternal peace,
Where bliss and virtue grow with like increase ;
From strength to strength our souls for ever guide
Through wond'rous scenes of being yet untry'd,
Where in each stage we shall more perfect grow,
And new perfections, new delights bestow.

Oh ! would mankind but make these truths
their guide,

And force the helm from prejudice and pride ;
Were once these maxims fix'd, that God's our
friend,

Virtue our good, and happiness our end,

How soon must reason o'er the world prevail,
And error, fraud, and superstition fall !
None would hereafter then with groundless fear
Describe th' Almighty cruel and severe,
Predestinating some without pretence
To Heav'n, and some to hell for no offence ;
Inflicting endless pains for transient crimes,
And favouring sects or nations, men or times.
To please him none would foolishly forbear
Or food, or rest, or itch in shirts of hair,
Or deem it merit to believe or teach
What reason contradicts, or cannot reach * ;
None would fierce zeal for piety mistake,
Or malice for whatever tenets sake,
Or think salvation to one sect confin'd,
And heaven too narrow to contain mankind.

No more then nymphs, by long neglect grown
nice,

Would in one female frailty sum up vice,
And censure those, who, nearer to the right,
Think virtue is but to dispense delight †.

No servile tenets would admittance find,
Destructive of the rights of human kind ;
Of power divine, hereditary right,
And non-resistance to a tyrant's might :
For sure that all should thus for one be curs'd,
Is but a naked nature's edict just revers'd.

No moralists then, righteous to excess,
Would show fair virtue in so black a dress,
That they, like boys, who some feign'd spright array,

First from the spectre fly themselves away :
No preachers in the terrible delight,
But choose to win by reason, not affront ;
Not, conjurers like, in fire and brimstone dwell,
And draw each moving argument from hell.

No more our sage interpreters of laws
Would fatten on obscurities and flaws,
But rather, nobly careful of their trust,
Strive to wipe off the long contracted dust,
And be, like Hardwicke, guardians of the just.

No more applause would on ambition wait,
And laying waste the world be counted great,
But one good-natur'd act more praises gain
Than armies overthrown, and thousands slain ;
No more would brutal rage disturb our peace
But envy, hatred, war, and discord cease ;
Our own and others good each hour employ,
And all things smile with universal joy ;
Virtue with happiness her consort join'd,
Would regulate and bless each human mind,
And man be what his Maker first design'd.

THE MODERN FINE GENTLEMAN.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1746.

“ Quale portentum neque militaris
“ Daunia in latis alit esculetis,
“ Nec Jubæ tellus generat, leonum
“ Arda nutrit.”

Just broke from school, pert, impudent, and raw,
Expert in Latin, more expert in law,

* It is apprehended, that genuine Christianity requires not the belief of any such propositions.

† These lines mean only, that censoriousness is a vice more odious than unchastity; this always

His honour posts o'er Italy and France,
Measures St. Peter's dome, and learns to dance.
Thence, having quick through various countries
flown,

Glean'd all their follies and expos'd his own,
He back returns, a thing so strange all o'er,
As never ages past produc'd before ;
A monster of such complicated worth,
As no one single clime could e'er bring forth ;
Half atheist, papist, gamester, bubble, rook,
Half fiddler, coachman, dancer, groom, and cook.

Next, because business is now all the vogue,
And who'd be quite polite must be a rogue,
In parliament he purchases a seat,
To make th' accomplish'd gentleman complete.
There safe in self-sufficient impudence,
Without experience, honesty, or sense,
Unknowing in her interest, trade, or laws,
He vainly undertakes his country's cause :

Forth from his lips, prepar'd at all to rail,
Torrents of nonieuse burst, like bottled ale,
* Though shallow, maddy ; brisk, though mighty
dull ;

Fierce without strength ; o'erflowing, though not full.

Now quite a Frenchman in his garb and air,
His neck yok'd down with bag and solitaire,
The liberties of Britain he supports,
And storms at place-men, ministers, and courts ;
Now in cropt greasy hair, and leather breeches,
He loudly bellows out his patriot speeches ;
King, lords, and commons ventures to abuse,
Yet dares to show those ears he ought to lose.
From hence to White's our virtuous Cato flies,
There sits with countenance erect and wise,
And talks of games of whist, and pig-tail pies ;
Plays all the night, nor doubts each law to break,
Himself unknowingly has help'd to make ;
Trembling and anxious, stakes his utmost groat,
Peeps o'er his cards, and looks as if he thought ;
Next morn disowns the losses of the night,
Because the fool would fain be thought a bite.

Devoted thus to politics and cards,
Nor mirth, nor wine, nor women, he regards ;
So far is ev'ry virtue from his heart,
That not a gen'rous vice can claim a part ;
Nay, lest one human passion e'er should move
His soul to friendship, tenderness, or love,
To Figg and Broughton * he commits his breast,
To steel it to the fashionable test.

Thus poor in wealth, he labours to no end,
Wretched alone, in crowds without a friend ;
Invisible to all that's good or kind,
Deaf to all merit, to all beauty blind ;
For love too busy, and for wit too grave,
A harden'd, sober, proud, luxurious knave ;

proceeding from malevolence, that sometimes from too much good-nature and compliance.

* Parody on these lines of Sir John Denham.

“ Though deep yet clear, though gentle yet not dull,

“ Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full.”

* One, a celebrated prize-fighter ; the other, a no less famous boxer.

By little actions striving to be great,
And proud to be, and to be thought a cheat.

And yet in this so bad is his success,
That as his fame improves, his rents grow less ;
On parchment wings his acres take their flight,
And his unpeopled groves admit the light ;
With his estate his interest too is done,
His honest borough seeks a warmer sun :
For him, now cash and liquor flows no more,
His independent voters cease to roar ;
And Britain soon must want the great defence
Of all his honesty and eloquence,
But that the gen'rous youth, more anxious grown

For public liberty than for his own,
Marries some jointur'd antiquated crone ;
And boldly, when his country is at stake,
Braves the deep yawning gulf, like Curtius, for its sake.

Quickly again distress'd for want of coin,
He digs no longer in th' exhausted mine,
But seeks preferment, as the last resort,
Cringes each morn at levées, bows at court.
And, from the hand he hates, implores support.

The minister, well pleas'd at small expence
To silence so much rude impertinence,
With squeeze and whisper yields to his demands,
And on the venal list enroll'd he stands ;
A ribbon and a pension buy the slave ;
This bribes the fool about him ; that the knave.
And now arriv'd at his meridian glory,
He sinks apace, despis'd by Whig and Tory ;
Of independence now he talks no more,
Nor shakes the senate with his patriot roar ;
But silent votes, and with court-trappings hung,
Eyes his own glitt'ring star and holds his tongue.
In craft political a bankrupt made,
He sticks to gaming, as the surer trade ;
Turns downright sharper, lives by sucking blood,
And grows, in short, the very thing he would :
Hunts out young heirs who have their fortunes spent,

And lends them ready cash at cent. per cent.
Lays wagers on his own, and others lives,
Fights uncles, fathers, grandmothers, and wives ;
Till death at length, indignant to be made
The daily subject of his sport and trade,
Veils with his sable hand the wretch's eyes,
And, groaning for the betts he loses by't, he dies.

THE MODERN FINE LADY.

“ Miseri quibus
“ Intentata nites.”

HOR.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1750.

SELL'D in each art that can adorn the fair,
The sprightly dance, the soft Italian air,
The tofs of quality and high-bred flier,
Now Lady Harriot reach'd her fifteenth year :
Wing'd with diversions all her moments flew,
Each, as it pass'd, presenting something new ;
Breakfast and auctions wear the morn away,
Each evening gives an opera, or a play ;
Then Brag's eternal joys all night remain,
And kindly usher in the morn again.

For love no time has she, or inclination,
 Yet must coquette it for the sake of fashion;¹
 For this she listens to each fop that's near,
 Th' embroider'd colonel flatters with a sneer,
 And the cropt ensign nuzzles in her ear. }
 But with most warmth her drefs and airs inspire
 Th' ambitious bosom of the landed 'squire,
 Who fain would quit plump Dolly's softer charms
 For wither'd lean Right Honourable arms;
 He bows with reverence at her sacred shrine,
 And treats her as if sprung from race divine,
 Which she returns with insolence and scorn,
 Nor deigns to smile on a plebeian born.

Ere long by friends, by cards, and lovers cross'd,
 Her fortune, health, and reputation lost;
 Her money gone, yet not a tradesman paid,
 Her fame, yet the still damn'd to be a maid;
 Her spirits sink, her nerves are so unstrung,
 * She weeps, if but a handsome thief is hung.
 By mercers, lacemen, mantua-makers prest,
 But most for ready cash for play difrest,
 Where can she turn — The 'squire must all re- } pair,

She condescends to listen to his pray'r,
 And marries him at length in mere despair. }

But soon th' endearments of a husband cloy,
 Her soul, her frame incapable of joy;
 She feels no transports in the bridal bed,
 Of which so oft sh' has heard, so much has read;
 Then vex'd, that she should be condemn'd alone
 To seek in vain this philosophic stone,
 To abler tutors she resolves t' apply,
 A prostitute from curiosity:
 Hence men of ev'ry sort, and ev'ry size,
 † Impatient for Heaven's cordial drop, she tries;
 The sribbling beau, the rough unwieldy clown,
 The ruddy templar newly on the town,
 The Hibernian captain of gigantic make,
 The brimful parson, and th' exhausted rake.

But still malignant fate her wish denies,
 Cards yield superior joys, to cards she flies;
 All night from rout to rout her chairman run,
 Again she plays, and is again undone.

Behold her now in ruin's frightful jaws!
 Bonds, judgments, executions ope their paws;
 Seize jewels, furniture, and plate, nor spare
 The gilded chariot, or the tassell'd chair;
 For lonely seat she's forc'd to quit the town,
 And † Tubbs conveys the wretched exile down.

Now rumbling o'er the stones of Tyburn-road,
 Ne'er prest'd with a more griev'd or guilty load,
 She bids adieu to all the well-known streets,
 And envies ev'ry cinder-wench she meets:
 And now the dreaded country first appears,
 With sighs unfeign'd the dying noise she hears

* Some of the brightest eyes were at this time in tears for one M^{rs} Lean, condemned for a robbery on the highway.

† "The cordial drop Heav'n in our cup has " thrown,
 " To make the nauseous draught of life go
 " down." Roeb.

† A person well known for supplying people of quality with hired equipages.

Of distant coaches fainter by degrees,
 Then starts and trembles at the sight of trees.
 Silent and sullen, like some captive queen,
 She's drawn along unwilling to be seen,
 Until at length appears the ruin'd hall
 Within the grafs green moat and ivy'd wall;
 The doleful prison where for ever she,
 But not, alas! her griefs, must bury'd be.

Her coach the curate and the tradesmen meet,
 Great-coated tenants her arrival greet,
 And boys with stubble bonfires light the street, }
 While bells her ears with tongues discordant
 grate,

Types of the nuptial ties they celebrate:
 But no rejoicings can unbend her brow,
 Nor deigns she to return one aukward bow,
 But bounces in, disdainful once to speak,
 And wipes the trickling tear from off her cheek.

Now see her in the sad decline of life,
 A peevish mistress, and a sulky wife;
 Her nerves unbrac'd, her faded cheek grown pale
 With many a real, and many a fancy'd ail;
 Of cards, admirers, equipage bereft,
 Her insolence and title only left;
 Severely humbled to her one-horse chair,
 And the low pastimes of a country fair:
 Too wretched to endure one lonely day,
 Too proud one friendly visit to repay,
 Too indolent to read, too criminal to pray,
 At length half dead, half mad, and quite confin'd,
 Shunning, and shunn'd by all of human kind,
 Ev'n robb'd of the last comfort of her life,
 Insulting the poor curate's callous wife,
 Pride, disappointed pride, now stops her breath,
 And with true scorpion rage she stings herself to death.

THE
 FIRST EPISTLE
 OF THE
 SECOND BOOK OF HORACE,
 IMITATED.

To the Right Hon. Philip, Lord Hardwicke, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1748.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE following piece is a burlesque imitation: a species of poetry, whose chief excellence consists in a lucky and humorous application of the words and sentiments of any author, to a new subject totally different from the original. This is what is usually forgot both by the writers and readers of these kind of compositions; the first of whom are apt to strike out new and independent thoughts of their own, and the latter to admire such injudicious excrescences: these immediately lose sight of their original, and those scarce ever cast an eye towards him at all. It is thought proper therefore to advertise the reader, that in the following epistle he is to expect nothing more than an apposite conversion of the serious sentiments of Horace on the Roman poetry, into more ludicrous ones on the subject of English politics; and if he thinks it not worth while to compare it line for line with the original, he will find in it neither wit, humour, nor even common sense; all the little merit it can pretend to, consisting solely in the closeness of so long, and uninterrupted an imitation.

WHILST you, my Lord, such various toils sustain,
Preside o'er Britain's peers, her laws explain,
With ev'ry virtue ev'ry heart engage,
And live the bright example of the age;
With tedious verse to trespass on your time,
Is sure impertinence, if not a crime.

All the fam'd heroes, statesmen, admirals,
Who after death within the sacred walls
Of Westminster with kings have been receiv'd,
Met with but sorry treatment, while they liv'd;
And though they labour'd in their country's cause,
With arms defended her, and form'd with laws,
Yet ever mourn'd they till'd a barren soil,
And left the world ungrateful to their toil.
Ev'n * he who long the House of Commons led,
That hydra dire, with many a gaping head,
Found by experience to his latest breath,
Envy could only be subdu'd by death.
Great men whilst living must expect disgraces,
Dead they're ador'd—when none desire their places.

This common fate, my lord, attends not you,
Above all equal, and all envy too;
With such unrivall'd eminence you shine,
That in this truth alone all parties join,
The seat of justice in no former reign
Was e'er so greatly fill'd, nor ever can again.

But though the people are so just to you,
To none besides will they allow their due,
No minister approve, who is not dead,
Nor till h' has lost it, own he had a head;
Yet such respect they bear to ancient things,
They've some for former ministers and kings;
And, with a kind of superstitious awe,
Deem Magna Charta still a sacred law.

But if because the government was best
Of old in France, when freedom she possess'd,
In the same scale resolv'd to weigh our own,
England's we judge was so, who then had none;
Into most strange absurdities we fall,
Unworthy to be reason'd with at all.
Brought to perfection in these days we see
All arts, and their great parent liberty;
With skill profound we sing, eat, dress, and dance,
And in each goût polite, excel ev'n France,

If age of ministers is then the test,
And, as of wines, the oldest are the best,
Let's try and fix some æra, if we can,
When good ones were extinct, and bad began:
Are they all wicked since Eliza's days?
Did none in Charles' or James' merit praise?
Or are they knaves but since the revolution?
If none of these are facts, then all's confusion;
And by the self-same rule one cannot fail
To pluck each hair out singly from the tail.

* Sir Robert Walpole;

Wife Cecil, lov'd by people and by prince,
As often broke his word as any sinner:
Of Arthur's days we almost nothing know,
Yet sing their praise, because they're long ago.

Oft as 'tis doubted in their several ways
Which of past orators best merit praise,
We find it to decide extremely hard,
If Harley's head deserv'd the most regard,
Or Windham's tongue, or Jekyl's patriot heart,
Old Shippen's gravity, or Walpole's art.
These were ador'd by all with whom they voted,
And in the fullest houses still are quoted;
These have been fam'd from Anna's days till ours,

When Pelham has improv'd, with unknown pow'rs,
The art of ministerial eloquence,
By adding honest truth to nervous sense.
Oft are the vulgar wrong, yet sometimes right;
The late rebellion in the truest light
By chance they saw; but were not once so wise,
Unknown, unheard, in damning the excise:
If former reigns they fancy had no fault,
I think their judgment is not worth a groat:
But if they frankly own their politics,
Like ours, might have somē blunders, and some tricks,

With such impartial sentiments I join,
And their opinions tally just with mine.

I would by no means church or king destroy,
And yet the doctrines taught me when a boy
By Crab the curate, now seem wond'rous odd,
That either came immediately from God:
In all the writings of those high-flown ages,
You meet with now and then some scatter'd pages
Wrote with some spirit and with sense enough;
These fell the book, the rest is wretched stuff:
I'm quite provok'd, when principles, though true,
Must stand impeach'd by fools, because they're new.

Should I but question, only for a joke,
If all was flow'rs, when pompous Hanmer spoke,
If things went right, when St. John trod the stage,

How the old Tories all would storm and rage!
They shun conviction, or because a truth
Confess'd in age implies they err'd in youth;
Or that they scorn to learn of junior wits:
What!—to be taught by Lytteltons and Pitts.

When angry patriots or in prose or rhymes
Extol the virtuous deeds of former times,
They only mean the present to disgrace,
And look with envious hate on all in place:
But had the patriots of those ancient days
Play'd the same game for profit, or for praise,
The trade, though now so flourishing and new,
Had long been ruin'd and the nation too.

England, when once of peace and wealth possess'd,
Began to think frugality a jest,
So grew polite; hence all her well-bred heirs
Gamblers and jockeys turn'd, and cricket-play'rs;
Pictures and busts in ev'ry house were seen;
What should have paid the butcher, bought
Pouffin;

Now operas, now plays were all the fashion,
Then whist became the business of the nation,
That, like a froward child, in wanton play
Now cries for toys, then tosses them away;

Each hour we chang'd our pleasures, drefs, and diet;

These were the blest effects of being quiet.

Not thus behav'd the true old English 'squire,
He smok'd his pipe each morn by his own fire,
There justice to dispense was ever willing,
And for his warrants pick'd up many a shilling:
To teach his younger neighbours always glad,
Where for their corn best markets might be had,
And from experienc'd age as glad to learn,
How to defraud unfeen the parson's barn.

But now the world's quite alter'd; all are bent
To leave their seats, and fly to parliament:
Old men and boys in this alone agree,
And vainly courting popularity,
Ply their obftrep'rous voters all night long
With bumpers, toasts, and now and then a fong:
Ev'n I, who swear these follies I despise,
Than statesmen, or their porters, tell more lies;
And, for the fashion sake, in spite of nature,
Commence sometimes a most important creature.
Buty as Car—w rave for ink and quills,
And stuff my head and pockets full of bills.

Few landmen go to sea unless they're prest,
And quacks in all professions are a jest;
None dare to kill, except most learn'd physicians,
Learn'd, or unlearn'd, we all are politicians;
There's not a soul but thinks, could he be sent,
H' has parts enough to shine in parliament.

Though many ills this modern taste produces,
Yet still, my Lord, 'tis not without its uses;
These minor politicians are a kind
Not much to selfish avarice inclin'd;
Do but allow them with applause to speak,
They little care, though all their tenants break;
They form intrigues with no man's wife or daughter,

And live on pudden, chicken-broth, and water;
Fierce Jacobites, as far as bluftring words,
But loth in any cause to draw their swords.

Were smaller matters worthy of attention,
A thousand other uses I could mention;
For instance, in each monthly magazine
Their essays and orations still are seen,
And magazines teach boys and girls to read,
And are the canons of each tradesman's creed;
Apprentices they serve to entertain,
Instead of smutty tales, and plays profane;
Instruct them how their passions to command,
And to hate none—but those who rule the land:
Facts they record, births, marriages, and deaths,
Sometimes receipts for claps, and stinking breaths.

When with her brothers misf comes up to town,
How for each play can she afford a crown;
Where find diversions gratis, and yet pretty,
Unless she goes to church, or a committee;
And sure committees better entertain,
Than hearing a dull parson pray for rain,
Or whining beg deliverance from battle,
Dangers, and sins, and sickness amongst cattle;
At church she hears with unattentive ear
The pray'rs for peace, and for a plenteous year,
But here quite charm'd with so much wit and sense,

She falls a victim soon to eloquence:
Well may she fall; since eloquence has power
To govern both the Upper House and Lower.

Our ancient gentry, frugal, bold, and rough,
Were farmers, yet liv'd happily enough;
They, when in barns their corn was safely laid,
For harvest-homes, great entertainments made,
The well-rubb'd tables crack'd with beef and pork,
And all the supper shar'd who shar'd the work:
This gave freeholders first a taste for eating,
And was the source of all election-treating;
A while their jests, though merry, yet were wise,
And they took none but decent liberties.
Brandy and punch at length such riots bred,
No sober family cou'd sleep in bed.

All were alarm'd, ev'n those who had no hurt
Call'd in the law, to stop such dang'rous sport.
Rich citizens at length new arts brought down
With ready cash, to win each country town;
This less disorders caus'd than downright drink,
Freemen grew civil, and began to think;
But still all canvassing produc'd confusion,
The relics of its rustic institution

'Tis but of late since thirty years of peace
To useful sciences have giv'n increase,
That w' have inquir'd how Rome's lost sons of old
Barter'd their liberties for feasts and gold;
What treats proud Sylla, Cæsar, Crassus gave,
And try'd, like them, to buy each hungry knave:
Nor try'd in vain; too fortunately bold,
Many have purchas'd votes, and many sold;
No laws can now amend this venal land,
That dreads the touch of a reforming hand.

Some think an int'rest may be form'd with ease,
Because the vulgar we must chieffy please;
But for that reason 'tis the harder task,
For such will neither pardon, grant, nor ask.
See how Sir W——, master of this art,
By different methods wins each C——n heart.
He tells raw youths, that whoring is no harm,
And teaches their attentive fires to farm;
To his own table lovingly invites
Insidious pimps, and hungry parasites:
Sometimes in slippers, and a morning gown,
He pays his early visits round a town,
At every house relates his stories over,
Of place-bills, taxes, turnips, and Hanover;
If tales will money save, and business do,
It matters little, are they false or true.

Who'er prefers a clam'rous mob's applause,
To his own conscience, or his country's cause,
Is soon elated, and as soon cast down
By every drunken cobbler's smile or frown;
So small a matter can depress or raise
A mind that's meanly covetous of praise:
But if my quiet must dependent be
On the vain breath of popularity,
A wind each hour to diff'rent quarters veering,
Adieu, say I, to all electioneering.

The boldest orator it disconcerts,
To find the many, though of meanest parts,
Illic'rate, squabbling, discontented prigs,
Fitter t' attend a boxing-match at Figg's,
To all good sense and reason shut their ears,
Yet take delight in S—d—m's bulls and bears.

Young knights now sent from many a distant shire
Are better pleas'd with what they see than hear;
Their joy's to view his majesty approach,
Drawn by eight milkwhite steeds in gilded coach,
The pageant show and bustle to behold, [gold,
The guards, both horse and foot, lac'd o'er with

The rich insignia from the Tower brought down,
The iv'ry sceptre, and the radiant crown.
The mob huzza, the thund'ring cannons roar,
And business is delay'd at least an hour;
The Speaker calls indeed to mind what passes,
But might as well read orders to deaf asses.

But now see honest V—— rise to joke!
The House all laugh: "What says he? Has he spoke?"

No not a word; then whence this sudden mirth?
His phiz foretels some jest's approaching birth.

But lest I seem these orators to wrong;
Envious because I share no gift of tongue,
Is there a man whose eloquence has pow'r
To clear the fullest house in half an hour,
Who now appears to rave, and now to weep,
Who sometimes makes us swear, and sometimes sleep,

Now fills our headswith false alarms from France,
Then conjurer-like, to India bids us dance,
Then eulogies on him we own are true,
For surely he does all that man can do.

But whilst, my Lord, these makers of our laws
Thus speak themselves into the world's applause,
Let bards for such attempts too modest share
What more they prize, your patronage and care,
If you would spur them up the Muses' hill,
Or ask their aid your library to fill.

We poets are in ev'ry age and nation,
A most absurd, wrong-headed generation;
This in a thousand instances is shown
(Myself as guilty as the rest I own);
As when on you our nonsense we impose,
Tir'd with the nonsense you have heard in prose;
When w' are offended, if some honest friend
Presumes one unharmonious verse to mend;
When undesir'd our labours we repeat,
Grieve they're no more regarded by the great,
And fancy, shou'd you once but see our faces,
You'd bid us write, and pay us all with places.

'Tis yours, my Lord, to form the soul to verse,
Who have such num'rous virtues to rehearse;
Great Alexander once, in ancient days,
Pay'd Chorus for daubing him with praise;
And yet the same fam'd hero made a law,
None but Apelles shou'd his picture draw;
None but Lyfippus cast his royal head
In brass: it had been treason if in lead:
A prince he was in valour ne'er surpass'd,
And had in painting too perhaps some taste;
But as to verse, undoubted is the matter,
He must be dull, as a Dutch commentator.
But you, my Lord, a fav'rite of the Muse,
Wou'd choose good poets, were there good to choose,

You know they paint the great man's soul as like,
As can his features Kneller or Vandyke.
Had I such pow'r, I never wou'd compose
Such creeping lines as these, nor verse, nor prose;
But rather try to celebrate your praise,
And with your just encomiums swell my lays:
Had I a genius equal to my will,
Gladly would I exert my utmost skill
To consecrate to fame Britannia's land
Receiving law from your impartial hand;
By your wise councils once more pow'ful made,
Her fleets rever'd, and flourishing her trade;

Exhausted nations trembling at her sword,
And peace*, long wish'd-for, to the world restor'd.

But your true greatness suffers no such praise,
My verse would link the theme it meant to raise;
Unequal to the task wou'd surely meet
Deserv'd contempt, and each presumptuous sheet
Could serve for nothing, scrawl'd with lines so fimple,
Unless to wrap up sugar-loaves for Wimple †.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD,

ON HIS BEING INSTALLED KNIGHT OF THE GARTER †.

THESE trophies, Stanhope, of a lovely dame,
Once the bright object of a monarch's flame,
Who with such just propriety can wear,
As thou, the darling of the gay and fair?
See ev'ry friend to wit, politeness, love,
With one consent thy sovereign's choice approve!
And liv'd Plantagenet her voice to join,
Herself and garter both were surely thine.

TO A LADY IN TOWN.

SOON AFTER HER LEAVING THE COUNTRY.

WHILST you, dear maid, o'er thousands born to reign,
For the gay town exchange the rural plain,
The cooling breeze and ev'ning walk forsake
For sissing crowds, which your own beauties make;

Through circling joys while you incessant stray,
Charm in the Mall, and sparkle at the play;
Think (if successive vanities can spare
One thought to love) what cruel pangs I bear,
Left in these plains all wretched, and alone,
To weep with fountains, and with echoes groan,
And mourn incessantly that fatal day,
That all my bliss with Chloe snatch'd away.

Say by what arts I can relieve my pain,
Music, verse, all I try, but try in vain;
In vain the breathing flute my hand employs,
Late the companion of my Chloe's voice,
Nor Handel's nor Corelli's tuneful airs
Can harmonize my soul, or sooth my cares;
Those once-lov'd medicines unsuccessful prove,
Music, alas, is but the voice of love!
In vain I oft harmonious lines peruse,
And seek for aid from Pope's and Prior's muse;
Their treach'rous numbers but assist the foe,
And call forth scenes of sympathizing woe:
Here Heloise mourns her absent lover's charms,
There parting Emma sighs in Henry's arms;
Their loves like mine ill-fated I bemoan,
And in their tender sorrows read my own.

Restless sometimes, as oft the mournful dove
Forsakes her nest, forsaken by her love,

* A general peace was at this time just concluded at Aix la Chapelle.

† Lord Hardwicke's seat in Cambridgeshire.

‡ He was installed at Windsor on the 18th of June
1730, at the same time with the Duke of Cumberland and the Earl of Burlington.

I fly from home, and seek the sacred fields
 Where Cam's old urn its silver current yields,
 Where solemn tow'rs o'erlook each mossy grove,
 As if to guard it from th' assaults of love;
 Yet guard in vain, for there my Chloe's eyes
 But lately made whole colleges her prize;
 Her sons, though few, not Pallas cou'd defend,
 Nor Dullness's succour to her thousands lend;
 Love, like a fever with infectious rage,
 Scorch'd up the young, and thaw'd the frost of
 age:

To gaze at her, ev'n Dons were seen to run,
 And leave unfinished pipes, and authors—scarce begun.

* So Helen look'd, and mov'd with such a
 grace,

When the grave seniors of the Trojan race
 Were forc'd those fatal beauties to admire,
 That all their youth consum'd, and set their town on fire.

At fam'd Newmarket oft I spend the day,
 An unconcern'd spectator of the play;
 There pitiless observe the ruin'd heir
 With anger fir'd, or melting with despair;
 For how shou'd I his trivial loss bemoan,
 Who feel one, so much greater, of my own?
 There while the golden heaps, a glorious prize,
 Wait the decision of two rival dice,
 Whilst long disputes 'twixt seven and five remain,
 And each, like parties, have their friends for
 gain,

Without one wish I see the guineas shine,
 "Fate, keep your gold; I cry, make Chloe mine."
 Now see, prepar'd their utmost speed to try,
 O'er the smooth turf the bounding racers fly!
 Now more and more their slender limbs they strain,

And foaming stretch along the velvet plain!
 Ah stay! swift steeds, your rapid flight delay,
 No more the jockey's snarling lash obey:
 But rather let my hand direct the rein,
 And guide your steps a nobler prize to gain;
 Then swift as eagles cut the yielding air,
 Bear me, oh bear me to the absent fair.

Now when the winds are hush'd, the air serene,

And cheerful sun-beams gild the beauteous scene,
 Pensive o'er all the neighb'ring fields I stray,
 Where'er or choice or chance directs the way:
 Or view the op'ning lawns, or private woods,
 Or distant bluish hills, or silver floods:
 Now harmless birds in silken nets insnare,
 Now with swift dogs pursue the flying hare:
 Dull sports! for oh my Chloe is not there!

Fatigu'd at length, I willingly retire
 To a small study, and a cheerful fire,
 There o'er some folio pore; I pore 'tis true,
 But oh my thoughts are fled, and fled to you!
 I hear you, see you, feast upon your eyes,
 And clasp with eager arms the lovely prize;
 Here for a while I cou'd forget my pain,
 Whilst I by dear affliction live again:
 But ev'n these joys are too sublime to last,
 And quickly fade, like all the real ones past;
 For just when now beneath some silent grove
 I hear you talk—and talk perhaps of love,

* Vid. Hom. Il. lib. 3. ver. 150.

Or charm with thrilling notes the list'ning ear,
 Sweeter than angels sing, or angels hear,
 My treach'rous hand its weighty charge lets go,
 The book falls thund'ring on the floor below,
 The pleasing vision in a moment's gone,
 And I once more am wretched, and alone.

So when glad Orpheus from th' infernal shade
 Had just recall'd his long-lamented maid,
 Soon as her charms had reach'd his eager eyes,
 Lost in eternal night—again she dies.

TO A LADY.

SENT WITH A PRESENT OF SHELLS AND STONES
 DESIGNED FOR A GROTTO.

WITH gifts like these, the spoils of neighb'ring shores,

The Indian swain his sable love adores.
 Off'rings well suited to the dusky shrine
 Of his rude goddess, but unworthy mine:
 And yet they seem not such a worthless prize,
 If nicely view'd by philosophic eyes;
 And such are yours, that nature's works admire
 With warmth like that, which they themselves inspire.

To such how fair appears each grain of sand,
 Or humblest weed as wrought by nature's hand!
 How far superior to all human pow'r
 Springs the green blade, or buds the painted flow'r!
 In all her births, though of the meanest kinds,
 A just observer entertainment finds,
 With fond delight her low productions sees,
 And how the gently rises by degrees;
 A shell or stone he can with pleasure view,
 Hence trace her noblest works, the heav'ns—and
 you.

Behold, how bright these gaudy trifles shine,
 The lovely sportings of a hand divine!
 See with what art each curious shell is made,
 Here carv'd in fret-work, there with pearl inlaid!
 What vivid streaks th' enamell'd stones adorn,
 Fair as the paintings of the purple morn!
 Yet still not half their charms can reach our eyes,
 While thus confus'd the sparkling chaos lies;
 Doubly they'll please, when in your grotto plac'd,
 They plainly speak their fair disposer's taste;
 Then glories yet unseen shall o'er them rise,
 New order from your hand, new lustre from your eyes.

How sweet, how charming will appear this grot,

When by your art to full perfection brought;
 Here verdant plants and blooming flow'rs will grow,
 There bubbling currents through the shell-work
 flow;

Here coral mix'd with shells of various dyes,
 There polish'd stones will charm our wand'ring
 eyes;

Delightful bower of bliss! secure retreat!

Fit for the muses, and Statira's seat,

But still how good must be that fair one's mind,
 Who thus in solitude can pleasure find!

The muse her company, good sense her guide,
 Resistless charms her pow'r, but not her pride;
 Who thus forsakes the town, the park, and play,
 In silent shades to pass her hours away;

Who better likes to breathe fresh country air,
Than ride imprison'd in a velvet chair;
And makes the warbling nightingale her choice,
Before the thrills of Farnelli's voice;
Prefers her books, and conscience void of ill,
To concerts, balls, assemblies, and quadrille:
Sweet bow'r's more pleas'd than gilded chariot
fees,

For groves the playhouse quits, and beaus for trees.

Blest is the man, whom Heav'n shall grant one hour

With such a lovely nymph, in such a lovely
bow'r!

TO A LADY.

IN ANSWER TO A LETTER WROTE IN A VERY-FINE HAND.

WHILST well-wrote lines our wond'ring eyes command,

The beauteous work of Chloe's artful hand,
Throughout the finish'd picce we see display'd
The exactest image of the lovely maid;
Such is her wit, and such her form divine,
This pure, as flows the style through ev'ry line,
That like each letter, exquisitely fine.

See with what art the fable currents stain
In wand'ring mazes all the milk-white plain!
Thus o'er the meadows wrapp'd in silver snow
Unfrozen brooks in dark meanders flow;
Thus jetty curls in shining ringlets deck
The ivory plain of lovely Chloe's neck:
See, like some virgin, whose unmeaning charms
Receive new lustre from a lover's arms,
The yielding paper's pure but vacant breast,
By her fair hand and flowing pen impress'd,
At ev'ry touch more animated grows,
And with new life and new ideas glows,
Fresh beauties from the kind defiler gains,
And shines each moment brighter from its stains.

Let mighty love no longer boast his darts,
That strike unerring, aim'd at mortal hearts;
Chloe, your quill can equal wonders do,
Wound full as sure, and at a distance too:
Arm'd with your feather'd weapons in your hands,
From pole to pole you send your great commands;
To distant climes in vain the lover flies,
Your pen o'ertakes him, if he 'scapes your eyes;
So those who from the sword in battle run,
But perish victims to the distant gun.

Beauty's a short-liv'd blaze, a fading flow'r,
But these are charms no ages can devour
These, far superior to the brightest face,
Triumph alike o'er time as well as space.
When that fair form, which thousands now adore,
By years decay'd, shall tyrannize no more,
These lovely lines shall future ages view,
And eyes unborn, like ours, be charm'd by you.

How oft do I admire with fond delight
The curious piece, and wish like you to write!
Alas, vain hope! that might as well aspire
To copy Paul's stroke, or Titian's fire:
Ev'n now your splendid lines before me lie,
And I in vain to imitate them try:
Believe me, fair, I'm practising this art,
To steal your hand, in hopes to steal your heart.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LADY MARGARET CAVENDISH HARLEY*.

PRESENTED WITH A COLLECTION OF POEMS.

THE tuneful throng was ever beauty's care,
And verse a tribute sacred to the fair;
Hence in each age the loveliest nymph has been,
By undisputed right, the muses queen;
Her smiles have all poetic bosoms fir'd,
And patroniz'd the verse themselves inspir'd:
Lestbia presided thus in Roman times,
Thus Sachariffa reign'd o'er British rhymes.
And present bards to Margareta bow,
For what they were of old, is Harley now.

From Oxford's house, in these dull busy days,
Alone we hope for patronage, or praise;
He to our slightest labours still is kind,
Beneath his roof, w^e are ever sure to find
(Reward sufficient for the world's neglect)
Charms to inspire, and goodness to protect;
Your eyes with rapture animate our lays,
Your fire's kind hand uprears our drooping bays;
Form'd for our glory and support, ye seem,
Our constant patron he, and you our theme.
Where shou'd poetic homage then be pay'd?
Where ev'ry verse, but at your feet, be lay'd?
A double right you to this empire bear,
As first in beauty, and as Oxford's heir.

Illustrious maid! in whose sole person join'd
Ev'ry perfection of the fair we find;
Charms that might warrant all her sex's pride,
Without one foible of her sex to hide;
Good-nature, artless as the bloom that dyes
Her cheeks, and wit as piercing as her eyes.
Oh Harley! cou'd but you these lines approve,
These children sprung from idleness and love,
Cou'd they, (but ah how vain is the design!)
Hope to amuse your hours, as once they've mine,
Th' ill-judging world's applause, and critics blame,
Alike I'd scorn: Your approbation's fame.

HORACE,

BOOK II. ODE XVI. IMITATED.

To the Honourable Philip Yorke, Esq. soon after the general election in 1747.

FOR quiet, Yorke, the sailor cries,
When gathering storms obscure the skies,
The stars no more appearing;
The candidate for quiet prays,
Sick of the bumpers and huzzas
Of blest electioneering.

Who thinks, that from the speaker's chair
The Serjeant's mace can keep off care,
Is wond'rously mistaken:
Alas! he is not half so blest
As those wh^o have liberty. and rest,
And dine on beans and bacon.

* Only daughter and heir of Edward Earl of Oxford and Mortimer, by Lady Henrietta Cavendish, only daughter and heir of John Holles, Duke of Newcastle. She was afterwards Duchess of Portland, and died July 17. 1785.

Why should we then to London run,
 And quit our cheerful country fun,
 For business, dirt, and smoke?
 Can we, by changing place and air,
 Ourselves get rid of, or our care?
 In troth, 'tis all a joke.

Care climbs proud ships of mightiest force,
 And mounts behind the general's horse,
 Outstrips hussars and pandours;
 Far swifter than the bounding hind,
 Swifter than clouds before the wind,
 Or ——— before the Highlanders.

A man, when once he's safely chose,
 Shou'd laugh at all his threat'ning foes,
 Nor think of future evil:
 Each good has its attendant ill;
 A feat is no bad thing, but still
 Elections are the devil.

Its gifts with hand impartial Heav'n
 Divides: to Oxford it was giv'n
 To die in full-blown glory;
 To ——— indeed a longer date,
 But then with unrelenting hate
 Pursu'd by Whig and Tory.

The gods to you with bounteous hand
 Have granted seats, and parks, and land;
 Brocades and silks you wear;
 With claret and ragouts you treat,
 Six neighing steeds with nimble feet
 Whirl on your gilded car:

To me they've given a small retreat,
 Good port and mutton, best of meat,
 With broad-cloth on my shoulders,
 A soul that scorns a dirty job,
 Loves a good rhyme, and hates a mob,
 I mean who a'n't freeholders.

HORACE,

BOOK IV. ODE VIII. IMITATED.

To the same.

DID but kind fate to me impart
 Wealth equal to my gen'rous heart,
 Some curious gift to ev'ry friend,
 A token of my love, I'd send;
 But still the choicest and the best
 Shou'd be consign'd to friends at Wrest*.

An organ, which, if right I guess,
 Wou'd best please Lady Marchioness,
 Shou'd first be sent by my command,
 Worthy of her inspiring hand:
 To Lady Bell of nicest mould
 A coral set in burnish'd gold:
 To you, well knowing what you like,
 Portraits by Lely or Vandyke,
 A curious bronze, or bust antique.

But since these gifts exceed my power,
 And you, who need not wish for more,
 Already blest with all that's fine,
 Are pleas'd with verse, though such as mine;
 As poets us'd in ancient times,
 I'll make my presents all in rhymes;

* The seat of the Marchioness of Kent, wife of Lord Hardwicke.

And lest you should forget their worth,
 Like them I'll set their value forth.

Not monumental bras or stones,
 The guardians of heroic bones,
 Not victories won by Marlbro's sword,
 Nor titles which these feats record,
 Such glories o'er the dead diffuse,
 As can the labours of the muse.
 But if she should her aid deny,
 With you your virtues all must die,
 Nor tongues unborn shall ever say
 How wise, how good, was Lady Grey.

What now had been th' ignoble doom
 Of him who built imperial Rome?
 Or him deserving ten times more,
 Who fed the hungry, cloth'd the poor,
 Clear'd streams, and bridges laid across,
 And built the little church of Rofs?
 Did not th' eternal powers of verse
 From age to age their deeds rehearse.

The muse forbids the brave to die,
 Bestowing immortality;
 Still by her aid in blest abodes
 Alcides feasts among the gods;
 And royal Arthus still is able
 To fill his hospitable table
 With English beef, and English knights,
 And looks with pity down on White's.

TO THE HON. MISS YORKE,

ON HER MARRIAGE TO LORD ANSON, APRIL 25, 1748.

VICTORIOUS Anson see returns
 From the subjected main!
 With joy each British bosom burns,
 Fearless of France and Spain.

Honours his grateful sovereign's hand,
 Conquest his own bestows,
 Applause unfeign'd his native land,
 Unenvy'd wealth her focs.

"But still, my son," Britannia cries,
 "Still more thy merits claim;
 Thy deeds deserve a richer prize
 Than titles, wealth, or fame:

"Twice wafed safe from pole to pole,
 "Thou'lt sail'd the globe around;
 "Contains it aught can charm thy soul?
 "Thy fondest wishes bound?

"Is there a treasure worth thy care
 "Within th' encircling line?
 "Say, and I'll weary Heav'n with pray'r,
 "To make that treasure thine."

Heav'n listen'd to Britannia's voice,
 Agreed that more was due:
 He chose ———, the gods approv'd his choice,
 And paid him all in you.

CHLOE TO STREPHON.

A SONG.

Too plain, dear youth, these tell-tale eyes
 My heart your own declare;
 But, for Heav'n's sake, let it suffice,
 You reign triumphant there.

Forbear your utmost pow'r to try,
Nor farther urge your sway;
Prefs not for what I must deny,
For fear I should obey.

Could all your arts successful prove,
Would you a maid undo,
Whose greatest failing is her love,
And that her love for you?

Say, would you use that very pow'r
You from her fondness claim,
To ruin in one fatal hour
A life of spotless fame?

Ah cease, my dear, to do an ill,
Because perhaps you may!
But rather try your utmost skill
To save me than betray.

Be you yourself my virtue's guard,
Defend, and not pursue;
Since 'tis a task for me too hard,
To fight with love and you.

A SONG.

CEASE, Sally, thy charms to expand,
All thy arts and thy witchcraft forbear,
Hide those eyes, hide that neck and that hand,
And those sweet flowing tresses of hair.

Oh, torture me not, for love's sake,
With the smirk of those delicate lips,
With that head's dear significant shake,
And the toss of the hoop and the hips!

Oh, fight still more fatal! look there,
O'er her tucker what murderers peep!
So — now there's an end of my care,
I shall never more eat, drink, or sleep.

Do you sing too? Ah, mischievous thought!
Touch me, touch me not there any more;
Who the devil can 'scape being caught
In a trap that's thus baited all o'er?

But why to advise should I try?
What nature ordains we must prove;
You no more can help charming, than I
Can help being charm'd, and in love.

A SONG.

WHEN first I fought fair Cælia's love,
And ev'ry charm was new,
I swore by all the gods above,
To be for ever true.

But long in vain did I adore,
Long wept, and sigh'd in vain,
She still protested, vow'd, and swore
She ne'er would ease my pain.

At last o'ercome, she made me blest,
And yielded all her charms,
And I forsook her when possess'd,
And fled to others arms.

But let not this, dear Cælia, now
To rage thy breast incline;
For why, since you forget your vow,
Should I remember mine?

THE CHOICE.

HAD I, Pigmalion-like, the pow'r
To make the nymph I would adore,
The model should be thus design'd,
Like this her form, like this her mind.

Her skin should be as lilies fair,
With rosy cheeks and jetty hair;
Her lips with pure vermilion spread,
And soft and moist, as well as red;
Her eyes should shine with vivid light,
At once both languishing and bright;
Her shape should be exact and small,
Her stature rather low than tall;
Her limbs well turn'd, her air and mien
At once both sprightly and serene;
Besides all this, a nameless grace
Should be diffus'd all o'er her face:
To make the lovely piece complete,
Not only beautiful, but sweet.

This for her form; now for her mind;
I'd have it open, gen'rous, kind,
Void of all coquetish arts,
And vain designs of conquering hearts,
Not sway'd by any views of gain,
Nor fond of giving others pain;
But soft, though bright, like her own eyes,
Discreetly witty, gayly wise.

I'd have her skill'd in ev'ry art
That can engage a wand'ring heart;
Know all the sciences of love,
Yet ever willing to improve;
To press the hand, and roll the eye,
And drop sometimes an amorous sigh,
To lengthen out the balmy kiss,
And heighten ev'ry tender bliss;
And yet I'd have the charmer be
By nature only taught—or me.

I'd have her so strict honour ty'd,
And yet without one spark of pride;
In company well dress'd and fine,
Yet not ambitious to outshine;
In private always neat and clean,
And quite a stranger to the spleen;
Well pleas'd to grace the park and play,
And dance sometimes the night away,
But oft'ner fond to spend her hours
In solitude and shady bow'rs,
And there beneath some silent grove,
Delight in poetry and love.

Some sparks of the poetic fire
I said would have her soul inspire,
Enough, at least, to let her know
What joys from love and virtue flow;
Enough, at least, to make her wise,
And sops and fopperies despise;
Prefer her books, and her own muse,
To visits, scandal, chat, and news;
Above her sex exalt her mind,
And make her more than womankind.

TO A YOUNG LADY,

GOING TO THE WEST-INDIES.

FOR universal sway design'd,
To distant realms Clorinda flies,
And scorns, in one small isle confin'd,
To bound the conquests of her eyes.

From our cold climes to India's shore
 With cruel haste the wings her way,
 To scorch their fultry plains still more,
 And rob us of our only day.

Whilst ev'ry streaming eye o'erflows
 With tender floods of parting tears,
 Thy breast, dear cause of all our woes,
 Alone unmov'd, and gay appears.

But still, if right the muses tell,
 The fated point of time is nigh,
 When grief shall that fair bosom swell,
 And trickle from thy lovely eye.

Though now, like Philip's son, whose arms
 Did once the vassal world command,
 You rove with unrecited charms,
 And conquer both by sea and land;

Yet when (as soon they must) mankind
 Shall all be doom'd to wear your chain,
 You too, like him, will weep to find
 No more unconquer'd worlds remain.

CHLOE ANGLING.

ON yon fair brook's enamell'd side,
 Behold my Chloe stands!
 Her angle trembles o'er the tide,
 As conscious of her hands.

Calm as the gentle waves appear,
 Her thoughts serenely flow,
 Calm as the softly-breathing air
 That curls the brook below.

Such charms her sparkling eyes disclose,
 With such soft pow'r endu'd,
 She seems a new-born Venus rose
 From the transparent flood.

From each green bank, and mossy cave,
 The scaly race repair,
 They sport beneath the crystal wave,
 And kiss her image there.

Here the bright silver eel enroll'd
 In shining volumes lies,
 There basks the carp bedropt with gold
 In the sunshine of her eyes.

With hungry pikes in wanton play
 The tim'rous trouts appear,
 The hungry pikes forget to prey,
 The tim'rous trouts to fear.

With equal haste the thoughtless crew
 To the fair tempter fly,
 Nor grieve they, whilst her eyes they view,
 That by her hand they die.

Thus I too view'd the nymph of late,
 Ah, simple fish, beware!
 Soon will you find my wretched fate,
 And struggle in the snare.

But, fair one, though these toils succeed,
 Of conquest be not vain,
 Nor think o'er all the scaly breed
 Unpunish'd thus to reign;

Remember, in a wat'ry glass
 His charms Narcissus spy'd,

When for his own bewitching face
 The youth despair'd, and dy'd.

No more then harmless fish ensnare,
 No more such wiles pursue;
 Left whilst your baits for them prepare,
 Love finds out one for you.

CHLOE HUNTING.

WHILST thousands court fair Chloe's love,
 She fears the dang'rous joy,
 But, Cynthia-like, frequents the grove,
 As lovely, and as coy.

With the same speed she seeks the hind,
 Or hunts the flying hare;
 She leaves pursuing swains behind,
 To languish and despair.

Oh, strange caprice in thy dear breast!
 Whence first this whim began;
 To follow thus each worthless beast,
 And shun their sovereign man!

Consider, fair, what 'tis you do,
 How thus they both must die,
 Not surer they, when you pursue,
 Than we whene'er you fly.

ON LUCINDA'S RECOVERY FROM THE SMALL-POX.

BRIGHT Venus long with envious eyes
 The fair Lucinda's charms had seen,
 "And shall she still," the goddess cries,
 "Thus dare to rival beauty's queen!"

She spoke, and to th' infernal plains
 With cruel haste indignant goes,
 Where death, the prince of terrors, reigns
 Amidst diseases, pains, and woes.

To him her pray'rs she thus applies:
 "O sole in whom my hopes confide!
 To blast my rival's potent eyes,
 "And in her fate all mortal pride;

"Let her but feel thy chilling dart;
 "I will forgive, tremendous god,
 "Ev'n that which pierc'd Adonis' heart:"
 He hears, and gives th' assenting nod.

Then calling forth a fierce disease
 Impatient for the beauteous prey,
 Bids him the loveliest fabric seize
 The gods e'er form'd of human clay.

Assur'd he meant Lucinda's charms,
 To her th' infectious daemon flies,
 Her neck, her cheeks, her lips disarms,
 And of their lightning robs her eyes.

The Cyprian queen with cruel joy
 Beholds her rival's charms o'erthrown,
 Nor doubts, like mortal fair, t' employ
 Their ruins to augment her own.

From out the spoils of ev'ry grace
 The goddess picks some glorious prize,
 Transplants the roses from her face,
 And arms young Cupids from her eyes.

Now death (ah veil the mournful scene) !
Had kinder fate not slept between,
And turn'd aside th' uplifted dart.

"What phrenzy bids thy hand essay,"
He cries, "to wound thy surest friend,
Whose beauties to thy realms each day
Such num'rous crowds of victims send?"

"Are not her eyes, where-e'er they aim,
As thine own silent arrows sure?
Or who that once has felt their flame,
Dar'd e'er indulge one hope of cure?"

Death thus reprov'd his hand restrains,
And bids the dire dissempier fly;
The cruel beauty lives, and reigns,
That thousands may adore, and die.

WRITTEN IN MR. LOCKE'S ESSAY ON HUMAN UNDERSTANDING.

LONG had the mind of man with curious art
Search'd nature's wond'rous plan through ev'ry
part,

Measur'd each tract of ocean, earth and sky,
And number'd all the rolling orbs on high;
Yet still, so learn'd, herself she little knew,
Till Locke's unerring pen the portrait drew:
So beauteous Eve a while in Eden stray'd,
And all her great Creator's works survey'd;
By sun, and moon, she knew to mark the hour;
She knew the genus of each plant and flow'r;
She knew, when sporting on the verdant lawn,
The tender lambkin, and the nimble fawn:
But still a stranger to her own bright face,
She guess'd not at its form, nor what she was;
Till led at length to some clear fountain's side,
She view'd her beauties in the crystal tide;
The shining mirror all her charms displays,
And her eyes catch their own rebounded rays.

WRITTEN IN A LADY'S VOLUME OF TRAGEDIES.

SINCE thou, relentless maid, can'st daily hear
Thy slave's complaints without one sigh or tear,
Why beats thy breast, or thy bright eyes o'er-
flow

At these imaginary scenes of woe?
Rather teach these to weep, and that to heave,
At real pains themselves to thousands give;
And if such pity to feign'd love is due,
Consider how much more you owe to true.

CUPID RELIEVED.

As once young Cupid went astray,
The little god I found;
I took his bow and shafts away,
And fast his pinious bound.

At Chloe's feet my spoils I cast,
My conquest proud to show;
She saw his godship fetter'd fast,
And smil'd to see him so.

VOL. XI.

But ah! that simile such fresh supplies
Of arms resistless gave!
I'm forc'd again to yield my prize,
And fall again his slave.

THE WAY TO BE WISE.

IMITATED FROM LA FONTAINE.

POOR Jenny, am'rous, young, and gay,
Flav'ing by man been led astray,
To nunn'ry dark retir'd;
There liv'd and look'd so like a maid,
So seldom eat, so often pray'd,
She was by all admir'd.

The lady Abbess oft would cry,
If any sister trod awry,
Or prov'd an idle flatterer;
"See wife and pious Mrs. Jane!
"A life so strict, so grave a mien
"Is sure a worthy pattern."

A pert young slut at length replies,
"Experience, madam, makes folks wise,
"Tis that has made her such;
"And we, poor souls, no doubt should be
"As pious, and as wise, as she,
"If we had seen as much."

THE SNOW-BALL.

FROM PETRONIUS AFRANIUS.

WHITE as her hand fair Julia threw
A ball of silver snow;
The frozen globe fir'd as it flew,
My bosom felt it glow.

Strange pow'r of love! whose great command
Can thus a snow-ball arm;
When sent, fair Julia, from thine hand,
Ev'n ice itself can warm.

How should we then secure our hearts?
Love's pow'r we all must feel,
Who thus can, by strange magic arts,
In ice his flames conceal.

'Tis thou alone, fair Julia, know,
Can'st quench my fierce desire;
But not with water, ice, or snow,
But with an equal fire.

ANACREON, ODE XX.

A ROCK on Phrygian plains we see
That once was beauteous Niobe:
And Progne, too revengeful fair!
Now sits a wand'ring bird in air:
Thus I a looking-glass would be,
That you, dear maid, might gaze on me;
Be chang'd to flays, that straitly lac'd,
I might embrace thy slender waist;
A silver stream I'd bathe thee, fair,
Or shine pomatum on thy hair;
In a soft sable tippet's form
I'd kiss thy snowy bobbies warm;

In shape of pearl thy bosom deck,
And hang for ever round thy neck,
Pleas'd to be aught that touches you,
Your glove, your garter, or your shoe.

A TRANSLATION OF SOME LATIN VERSES ON THE CAMERA OBSCURA.

THE various pow'rs of blended shade and light,
The skilful Zeuxis of the dusky night;
The lovely forms that paint the snowy plain
Free from the pencil's violating stain;
In tuneful lines, harmonious Phœbus, sing,
At once of light and verse celestial king.

Divine Apollo! let thy sacred fire
Thy youthful bard's unskilful breast inspire,
Like the fair empty sheet he hangs to view,
Void, and unfurnish'd, till inspir'd by you;
O let one beam, one kind enlight'ning ray
At once upon his mind and paper play!
Hence shall his breast with bright ideas glow,
Hence num'rous forms the silver field shall strew.

But now the muse's useful precepts view,
And with just care the pleasing work pursue.
First choose a window that convenient lies,
And to the north directs the wand'ring eyes;
Dark be the room; let not a straggling ray
Intrude, to chase the shadowy forms away,
Except one bright resplendent blaze convey'd
Through a strait passage in the shutter made,
In which th' ingenious artist first must place
A little, convex, round, transparent glass,
And just behind th' extended paper lay,
On which his art shall all its pow'r display:
There rays reflected from all parts shall meet,
And paint their objects on the silver sheet;
A thousand forms shall in a moment rise,
And magic landscapes charm our wand'ring
eyes;

'Tis thus from ev'ry object that we view,
If Epicurus' doctrine teaches true,
The subtle parts upon our organs play,
And to our minds th' external forms convey.

But from what causes all these wonders flow,
'Tis not permitted idle bards to know,
How through the centre of the convex glass,
The piercing rays together twist'd pass,
Or why revers'd the lovely scenes appear,
Or why the sun's approaching light they fear;
Let grave philosophers the cause inquire,
Enough for us to see, and to admire.

See then what forms with various colours stain
The painted surface of the paper plain!
Now bright and gay, as shines the heavenly bow,
So late a wide, unpeopled waste of snow:
Here verdant groves, there golden crops of corn
The new uncultivated fields adorn;
Here gardens deck'd with flow'rs of various dyes,
There slender tow'rs, and little cities rise:
But all with tops inverted downward bend,
Earth mounts aloft, and skies and clouds descend:

Thus the wise vulgar on a pendent land
Imagine our antipodes to stand,
And wonder much, how they securely go,
And not fall headlong on the heav'ns below.

The charms of motion here exalt each part
Above the reach of great Apelles' art;
Zephyrs the waving harvests gently blow,
The waters curl, and brooks incessant flow;
Men, beasts, and birds in fair confusion stray,
Some rise to fight, whilst others pass away

On all we seize that comes within our reach,
The rolling coach we stop, the horse-man catch;
Compel the posting traveller to stay;
But the short visit causes no delay.

Again, behold what lovely prospects rise!
Now with the loveliest feast your longing eyes.
Nor let strict modesty be here afraid,
To view upon her head a beauteous maid:
See in small folds her waving garments flow,
And all her slender limbs still slenderer grow;
Contracted in one little orb is found
The spacious hoop, once five vast ells around:
But think not to embrace the flying fair,
Soon will she quit your arms unseen as air,
In this resembling too a tender maid,
Coy to the lover's touch, and of his hand afraid.

Enough w' have seen; now let th' intruding day
Chase all the lovely magic scenes away;
Again th' unpeopled snowy waste returns,
And the lone plain its faded glories mourns;
The bright creation in a moment flies,
And all the pigmy generation dies.

Thus, when still night her gloomy mantle spreads,
The fairies dance around the flow'ry meads!
But when the day returns, they wing their flight
To distant lands, and shun th' unwelcome light.

THE TEMPLE OF VENUS.

In her own isle's remotest grove
Stands Venus' lovely shrine,
Sacred to beauty, joy, and love,
And built by hands divine.

The polish'd structure, fair and bright
As her own ivory skin,
Without is alabaster white,
And ruby all within.

Above a cupola charms the view,
White as unfully'd snow;
Two columns of the same fair hue
Support the dome below.

Its walls a trickling fountain laves,
In which such virtue reigns,
That, bath'd in its balsamic waves,
No lover feels his pains.

Before th' unfolding gates there spreads
A fragrant spicy grove,
That with its curling branches shades
The labyrinths of love.

Bright beauty here her captives holds,
Who kiss their easy chains,
And in the softest closest folds
Her willing slaves detain.

Would'st thou, who ne'er these seas hast try'd,
Find where this island lies,
Let pilot love the rudder guide,
And steer by Chloë's eyes.

ON A NOSEGAY IN THE COUNTESS OF COVENTRY'S BREST.

IN IMITATION OF WALLER.

DELIGHTFUL scene! in which appear
At once all beauties of the year!
See how the zephyrs of her breath
Fan gently all the flow'rs beneath!
See the gay flow'rs, how bright they glow,
Though planted in a bed of snow!
Yet see how soon they fade, and die,
Scorch'd by the sunshine of her eye!
No wonder if, o'ercome with bliss,
They droop their heads to steal a kiss;
Who would not die on that dear breast?
Who would not die to be so blest?

THE 'SQUIRE AND THE PARSON.

AN ECGUQUE.

WRITTEN ON THE CONCLUSION OF THE PEACE,
1748.

By his hall chimney, where in rusty grate
Green faggots wept their own untimely fate,
In elbow-chair the penfive 'Squire reclin'd,
Revolving debts and taxes in his mind:
A pipe just fill'd upon a table near
Lay by the London-Ev'ning stain'd with beer,
With half a Bible, on whose remnants torn
Each parish round was annually forsworn.
The gate now claps, as ev'ning just grew dark,
Tray starts, and with a growl prepares to bark;
But soon discerning with sagacious nose
The well-known flavour of the Parson's toes,
Lays down his head, and sinks in soft repose. }
The doctor ent'ring to the tankard ran,
Takes a good hearty pull, and thus began:

'Parson.

Why fitt'st thou thus forlorn and dull, my friend,

Now war's rapacious reign is at an end?
Hark, how the distant bells inspire delight!
See bonfires spangle o'er the veil of night!

'Squire.

What peace, alas! in foreign parts to me?
At home, nor peace nor plenty can I see;
Joyless I hear drums, bells, and fiddles found,
'Tis all the same—Four shillings in the pound.
My wheels, though old, are clogg'd with a new tax;
My oaks, though young, must groan beneath the
My barns are half unthatch'd, unty'd my house;
Lost by this fatal sickness all my cows:
See there's the bill my late damn'd lawsuit cost!
Long as the land contended for,—and lost:
Ev'n Ormond's head I can frequent no more,
So short my pocket is, so long the score;
At shops all round I owe for fifty things.—
This comes of fetching Hanoverian kings.

'Parson.

I must confess the times are bad indeed;
No wonder, when we scarce believe our creed;
When purblind reason's deem'd the surest guide,
And heav'n-born faith at her tribunal try'd;

I

When all church-pow'r is thought to make men slaves,
Saints, martyrs, fathers, all call'd fools and knaves.
'Squire.

Come, preach no more, but drink, and hold your tongue:
I'm for the church;—but think the parson's wrong.

'Parson.

See there! free-thinking now so rank is grown,
It spreads infection through each country town;
Deistic scoffs fly round at rural boards,
'Squires, and their tenants too, profane as lords,
Vent impious jokes on every sacred thing.

'Squire.

Come drink;—
'Parson.

—Here's to you then, to church and king.
'Squire.

Here's church and king; I hate the glass should stand,
Though one takes tythes, and t' other taxes land.

'Parson.

Heav'n 'with new plagues will scourge this sinful nation,
Unless we soon repeal the Toleration,
And to the church restore the Convocation.

'Squire.

Plagues we should feel sufficient, on my word,
Starv'd by two houses, priest-rid by a third.
For better days we lately had a chance,
Had not the honest Plaids been trick'd by France.

'Parson.

Is not most gracious George our faith's defender?
You love the church, yet wish for the Pretender!

'Squire.

Preferment, I suppose, is what you mean;
Turn Whig, and you, perhaps, may be a dean:
But you must first learn how to treat your betters.
What's here? sure some strange news! a boy
with letters:

Oh, ho! here's one, I see, from parson Sly:
"My rev'rend neighbour Squab being like to die,

"I hope, if heav'n should please to take him
"To ask the living wou'd be no offence."

'Parson.

Have you not sworn that I shou'd Squab succeed?
Think how for this I taught your sons to read;
How oft discover'd pufs on new-plow'd land;
How oft supported you with friendly hand,
When I cou'd scarcely go, nor cou'd your worship stand.

'Squire.

'Twas yours, had you been honest, wise, or civil;
Now ev'n go court the bishops or the devil.

'Parson.

If I meant any thing, now let me die;
I'm blunt, and cannot fawn and cant, not I,
Like that old Presbyterian rascal Sly. }
I am, you know, a right tree hearted Tory,
Love a good glass, a merry song or story.

'Squire.

Thou art an honest dog, that's truth indeed—
Talk no more nonsense then about the creed.
I can't, I think, deny thy first request;
'Tis thine; but first a bumper to the best.

3 S ij

Parson.

Most noble 'Squire, more gen'rous than your wine,

How pleasing's the condition you assign!

Give me the sparkling glass, and here, d'ye see,

With joy I drink it on my bended knee:

Great queen! who governest this earthly ball,

And mak'st both kings and kingdoms rise and fall;

Whose wond'rous pow'r in secret all things rules,

Makes fools of mighty peers, and peers of fools;

Dispenses mitres, coronets, and stars;

Involves far distant realms in bloody wars,

Then bids the snaky tresses cease to hiss,

And gives them peace again—* nay gav'st us

this;

Whose health does health to all mankind impart,

Here's to thy much-lov'd health:—

*Squire, rubbing his hands.

—With all my heart.

ON THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

Translated from the Latin of Isaac Harwkins Browne, Esq.

BOOK I.

To all inferior animals 'tis giv'n

T' enjoy the state allotted them by Heav'n;

No vain researches e'er disturb their rest,

No fears of dark futurity molest.

Man, only man, solicitous to know

The springs whence nature's operations flow,

Plods through a dreary waste with toil and pain,

And reasons, hopes, and thinks, and lives in vain;

For fable death still hovering o'er his head,

Cuts short his progress, with his vital thread.

Wherefore, since nature errs not, do we find,

These seeds of science in the human mind,

If no congenial fruits are predesign'd?

For what avails to man this pow'r to roam

Through ages past, and ages yet to come,

T' explore new worlds o'er all th' etherial way,

Chain'd to a spot, and living but a day?

Since all must perish in one common grave,

Nor can these long laborious searches save,

Were it not wiser far, supinely laid,

To sport with Phillis in the noontide shade?

Or at thy jovial festivals appear,

Great Bacchus, who alone the soul can clear

From all that it has felt, and all that it can fear?

Come on then, let us feast; let Chloe sing,

And soft Næra touch the trembling string;

Enjoy the present hour, nor seek to know

What good or ill to-morrow may bestow.

But these delights soon pall upon the taste;

Let's try then if more serious cannot last:

Wealth let us heap on wealth, or fame pursue,

Let pow'r and glory be our points in view;

In courts, in camps, in senates let us live,

Our levees crowded like the buzzing hive:

Each weak attempt the same sad lesson brings!

Alas! what vanity in human things!

What means then shall we try? where hope to find

A friendly harbour for the restless mind?

* Madam de P—mp—dour.

Who still, you see, impatient to obtain

Knowledge immense, (so Nature's laws ordain)

Ev'n now, though fetter'd in corporeal clay,

Climbs step by step the prospect to survey,

And seeks unwearied truth's eternal ray.

No fleeting joys she asks which must depend

On the frail senses, and with them must end;

But such as suit her own immortal fame,

Free from all change, eternally the same.

Take courage then, these joys we shall attain;

Almighty wisdom never acts in vain;

Nor shall the soul, on which it has bestow'd

Such pow'rs, e'er peri'sh like an earthly clod;

But purg'd at length from foul corruption's stain,

Freed from her prison and unbound her chain,

She shall her native strength and native skies re-

gain;

To heav'n an old inhabitant return, [tual virt.

And draw nectareous streams from truth's percep-

Whilst life remains, (if life it can be call'd

T' exist in fleshly bondage thus enthral'd)

Tir'd with the dull pursuit of worldly things,

The soul scarce wakes, or opens her gladsome wings,

Yet still the godlike exile in disgrace

Retains some marks of her celestial race;

Else whence from mem'ry's store can she produce

Such various thoughts, or range them so for use?

Can matter these contain, dispose, apply?

Can in her cells such mighty treasures lie?

Or can her native force produce them to the eye?

Whence is this pow'r, this foundress of all arts,

Serving, adorning life, through all its parts,

Which names impos'd, by letters mark'd those names,

Adjusted properly by legal claims,

From woods and wilds collected rude mankind,

And cities, laws, and governments design'd?

What can this be, but some bright ray from heav'n,

Some emanation from Omniscience given?

When now the rapid stream of eloquence

Bears all before it, passion, reason, sense,

Can its dread thunder, or its lightning's force

Derive their essence from a mortal source?

What think you of the bard's enchanting art,

Which, whether he attempts to warm the heart

With fabled scenes, or charm the car with rhyme,

Breathes all pathetic, lovely, and sublime?

Whilst things on earth roll round from age to age,

The same dull farce repeated on the stage,

The poet gives us a creation new,

More pleasing, and more perfect than the true;

The mind, who always to perfection hastes,

Perfection such as here she never tastes,

With gratitude accepts the kind deceit,

And thence foresees a system more complete.

Of those what think you, who the circling race

Of suns, and their revolving planets trace,

And comets journeying through unbounded space?

Say, can you doubt, but that th' all-searching soul,

That now can traverse heav'n from pole to pole,

From thence descending visits but this earth,

And 'hall once more regain the regions of her birth?

Could she thus act, unless some power unknown,

From matter quite distinct and all her own,

Supported, and impell'd her? She approves

Self-conscious, and condemns; she hates and loves,

Mourns and rejoices, hopes and is afraid,
 Without the body's unrequested aid:
 Her own internal strength her reason guides,
 By this she now compares things, now divides;
 Truth's scatter'd fragments piece by piece collects,
 Rejoins, and thence her edifice creëts;
 Piles arts on arts, effects to causes ties,
 And rears the aspiring fabric to the skies;
 From whence, as on a distant plain below,
 She sees from causes consequences flow,
 And the whole chain distinctly comprehends,
 Which from the Almighty's throne to earth descends:

And lastly, turning inwardly her eyes,
 Perceives how all her own ideas rise,
 Contemplates what she is, and whence she came,
 And almost comprehends her own amazing frame.
 Can mere machines be with such pow'rs endu'd,
 Or conscious of those pow'rs, suppose they cou'd?
 For body is but a machine alone

Mov'd by external force, and impulse not its own.

Rate not th' extension of the human mind
 By the plebeian standard of mankind,
 But by the size of those gigantic few
 Whom Greece and Rome still offer to our view,
 Or Britain, well deserving equal praise,
 Parent of heroes too in better days.
 Why shou'd I try her numerous sons to name,
 By verse, law, eloquence consign'd to fame;
 Or who have forc'd fair science into fight,
 Long lost in darknes, and afraid of light?
 O'er all superior, like the solar ray,
 First Bacon usher'd in the dawning day,
 And drove the mists of sophistry away;
 Pervaded nature with amazing force.

Following experience still throughout his course,
 And finishing at length his destin'd way,
 To Newton he bequeath'd the radiant lamp of day.

Illustrious souls! if any tender cares
 Affect angelic breasts for man's affairs,
 If in your present happy heav'nly state,
 You're not regardless quite of Britain's fate,
 Let this degenerate land again be blest
 With that true vigour which she once possess;
 Compel us to unfold our slumbering eyes,
 And to our ancient dignity to rise.
 Such wond'rous pow'rs as these must sure be giv'n
 For most important purposes by Heav'n;
 Who bids these stars as bright examples shine,
 Besprinkled thinly by the hand divine,
 To form to virtue each degenerate time,
 And point out to the soul its origin sublime.
 That there's a self which after death shall live,
 All are concern'd about, and all believe;
 That something's ours, when we from life depart,
 This all conceive, all feel it at the heart;
 The wife of learn'd antiquity proclaim
 This truth, the public voice declares the same;
 No land so rude but looks beyond the tomb
 For future prospects in a world to come.
 Hence, without hopes to be in life repaid,
 We plant slow oaks posterity to shade;
 And hence vast pyramids aspiring high
 Lift their proud heads aloft, and time defy.
 Hence is our love of fame; a love so strong,
 We think no dangers great, or labours long,
 By which we hope our beings to extend,
 And to remotest times in glory to descend.

For fame the wretch beneath the gallows lies,
 Disowning every crime for which he dies;
 Of life profuse, tenacious of a name,
 Fearless of death, and yet afraid of shame.
 Nature has wove into the human mind
 This anxious care for names we leave behind,
 T' extend our narrow views beyond the tomb,
 And give an earnest of a life to come:
 For if when dead we are but dust or clay,
 Why think of what posterity shall say?
 Her praise or censure cannot us concern,
 Nor ever penetrate the silent urn.

What mean the nodding plumes, the fun'ral
 train,
 And marble monument that speaks in vain,
 With all those cares which ev'ry nation pays
 To their unfeeling dead in diff'rent ways!
 Some in the flower-strewn grave the corpse have lay'd,

And annual obsequies around it pay'd,
 As if to please the poor departed shade;
 Others on blazing piles the body burn,
 And strew their ashes in the faithful urn;
 But all in one great principle agree,
 I'o give a fancy'd immortality.
 Why shou'd I mention those, whose ouzy foil
 Is render'd fertile by the o'erflowing Nile?
 Their dead they bury not, nor burn with fires,
 No graves they dig, erect no fun'ral pires,
 But washing first th' embowel'd body clean,
 Gums, spice, and melted pitch they pour within;
 Then with strong fillets bind it round and round,
 To make each flaccid part compact and found;
 And lastly paint the varnish'd surface o'er
 With the same features which in life it wore:
 So strong their preface of a future state,
 And that our nobler part survives the body's fate.

Nations behold, remote from reason's beams,
 Where Indian Ganges rolls his sandy streams,
 Of life impatient rush into the fire,
 And willing victims to their gods expire!
 Persuaded the loos'd soul to regions flies,
 Blest with eternal spring, and cloudless skies.

Nor is less fam'd the oriental wife
 For steadfast virtue, and contempt of life:
 These heroines mourn not with loud female cries
 Their husbands lost, or with o'erflowing eyes;
 But, strange to tell! their funeral piles ascend,
 And in the same sad flames their sorrows end;
 In hopes with them beneath the shades to rove,
 And there renew their interrupted love.

In climes where Boreas breathes eternal cold,
 See num'rous nations, warlike, fierce, and bold,
 To battle all unanimously run,
 Nor fire, nor sword, nor instant death they shun.
 Whence this disdain of life in ev'ry breast,
 But from a notion on their minds impress,
 That all who for their country die, are blest?
 Add too to these the once-prevailing dreams;
 Of sweet Elysian groves, and Stygian streams;
 All show with what consent mankind agree
 In the firm hope of immortality.
 Grant these inventions of the crafty priest,
 Yet such inventions never cou'd subsist,
 Unless some glimmerings of a future state
 Were with the mind coeval, and innate;
 For ev'ry fiction which can long persuade,
 In truth must have its first foundations laid.

Because we are unable to conceive
 How unembod' d souls can act, and live,
 The vulgar give them forms, and limbs, and faces,
 And habitations in peculiar places :
 Hence reas'ners more refin' d, but not more wise,
 Struck with the glare of such absurdities,
 Their whole existence fabulous suspect,
 And truth and falsehood in a lump reject ;
 Too indolent to learn what may be known,
 Or else too proud that ignorance to own.
 For hard's the task the daubing to pervade
 Folly and fraud on truth's fair form have laid :
 Yet let that task be our's ; for great the prize ;
 Nor let us truth's celestial charms despise,
 Because that priests or poets may disguise.

That there's a God, from nature's voice is clear ;

And yet what errors to this truth adhere ?
 How have the fears and follies of mankind
 Now multiply'd their gods, and now subjoin'd
 To each the frailties of the human mind ?
 Nay superstition spread at length so wide,
 Beasts, birds, and onions too were deify'd.

Th' Athenian sage, revolving in his mind
 This weakness, blindness, madness of mankind,
 Foretold, that in maturer days, though late,
 When time should ripen the decrees of fate,
 Some God would light us, like the rising day,
 Through errors maze, and chase these clouds away.

Long since has time fulfill'd this great decree,
 And brought us aid from this divinity.

Well worth our search discoveries may be made
 By nature, void of this celestial aid :
 Let's try what her conjectures then can reach,
 Nor scorn plain reason, when she deigns to teach.

That mind and body often sympathize,
 Is plain ; such is this union nature ties :
 But then as oft'n too they disagree,
 Which proves the soul's superior progeny.
 Sometimes the body in full strength we find,
 Whilst various ails debilitate the mind ;
 At others, whilst the mind its force retains,
 The body sinks with sickness and with pains :
 Now, did one common fate their beings end,
 Alike they'd sicken, and alike they'd mend.
 But sure experience, on the slightest view,
 Shows us, that the reverse of this is true ;
 For when the body oft' expiring lies,
 Its limbs quite senseless, and half clos'd its eyes,
 The mind new force and eloquence acquires,
 And with prophetic voice the dying lips inspires.

Of like materials were they both compos'd,
 How comes it that the mind, when sleep has clos'd
 Each avenue of sense, expatriates wide,
 Her liberty restor'd, her bonds unty'd ?
 And like some bird who from its prison flies,
 Claps her exulting wings, and mounts the skies.
 Grant that corporeal is the human mind,
 It must have parts in infinitum join'd ;
 And each of these must will, perceive, design,
 And draw confus'dly in a diff'rent line ;
 Which then can claim dominion o'er the rest,
 Or stamp the ruling passion in the breast ?

Perhaps the mind is form'd by various arts
 Of modelling and figuring these parts ;
 Just as if circles wiser were than squares :
 But surely common sense aloud declares

That site and figure are as foreign quite
 From mental pow'rs, as colours black or white.
 Allow that motion is the cause of thought,
 With what strange pow'rs must motion then be fraught ?

Reason, sense, science must derive their source
 From the wheel's rapid whirl, or pulley's force ;
 Tops whipp'd by school-boys sages must commence,

Their hoops, like them, be cudgell'd into sense,
 And boiling pots o'erflow with eloquence.

Whence can this very motion take its birth ;
 Not sure from matter, from dull clods of earth :
 But from a living spirit lodg'd within,
 Which governs all the bodily machine :

Just as th' Almighty Universal Soul
 Informs, directs, and animates the whole.

Cease then to wonder how th' immortal mind
 Can live, when from the body quite disjoin'd ;
 But rather wonder, if she e'er could die,
 So fram'd, so fashion'd for eternity ;
 Self-mov'd, not form'd of parts together ty'd,
 Which time can dissipate, and force divide ;
 For beings of this make can never die,
 Whose pow'rs within themselves and their own
 essence lie.

If to conceive how any thing can be
 From shape extracted and locality
 Is hard, what think you of the Deity ?
 His being not the least relation bears,
 As far as to the human mind appears,
 To shape or size, similitude or place,
 Cloth'd in no form, and bounded by no space.
 Such then is God, a Spirit pure, refin'd
 From all material dross ; and such the human mind.

For in what part of essence can we see
 More certain marks of immortality ?
 Ev'n from this dark confinement with delight
 She looks abroad, and prunes herself for flight ;
 Like an unwilling inmate longs to roam
 From this dull earth, and seek her native home.

Go then, forgetful of its toils and strife,
 Pursue the joys of this fallacious life ;
 Like some poor fly, who lives but for a day,
 Sip the fresh dews, and in the sunshine play,
 And into nothing then dissolve away.
 Are these our great pursuits ? Is this to live ?
 These all the hopes this much-lov'd world can give ?

How much more worthy envy is their fate,
 Who search for truth in a superior state ?
 Not groping step by step, as we pursue,
 And following reason's much-entangled clue,
 But with one great and instantaneous view.

But how can sense remain, perhaps you'll say,
 Corporeal organs if we take away ?
 Since it from them proceeds, and with them must decay.

Why not ? or why may not the soul receive
 New organs, since ev'n art can these retrieve ?
 The silver trumpet aids th' obstructed ear,
 And optic glasses the dim eye can clear ;
 These in mankind new faculties create,
 And lift him far above his native state ;
 Call down revolving planets from the sky,
 Earth's secret treasures open to his eye,

The whole minute creation make his own,
With all the wonders of a world unknown.

How could the mind, did she alone depend
On sense, the errors of those senses mend?
Yet oft we see those senses she corrects,
And oft their information quite rejects.
In distances of things, their shapes and size,
Our reason judges better than our eyes.
Declares not this the soul's pre-eminence
Superior to, and quite distinct from sense?
For sure 'tis likely, that, since now so high
Clogg'd and unledg'd she dares her wings to try,
Loos'd and mature she shall her strength display,
And soar at length to truth's resplendent ray.

Inquire you how these pow'rs we shall attain,
'Tis not for us to know; our search is vain:
Can any now remember or relate
How he exist'd in the embryo state?
Or one from birth insensible of day
Conceive ideas of the solar ray?
That light's deny'd to him, which others see,
He knows, perhaps you'll say,—and so do we.

The mind contemplative finds nothing here
On earth that's worthy of a wish or fear:
He whose sublime pursuit is God and truth,
Burns, like some absent and impatient youth,
To join the object of his warm desires;
Thence to sequester'd shades, and streams retires,
And there delights his passion to rehearse,
In wisdom's sacred voice, or in harmonious verse.

To me most happy therefore he appears,
Who having once, unmov'd by hopes or fears,
Survey'd this sun, earth, ocean, clouds, and flame,
Well satisfy'd returns from whence he came.
Is life an hundred years, or e'er so few,
'Tis repetition all, and nothing new:
A fair, where thousands meet, but none can stay;

An inn, where travellers bait, then pass away;
A sea, where man perpetually is tost,
Now plung'd in business, no in trifles lost:
Who leave it first, the peaceful port first gain;
Hold then! nor farther launch into the main:
Contract your sails; life nothing can bestow
By long continuance, but continued woe;
The wretched privilege daily to deplore
The fun'erals of our friends, who go before;
Diseases, pains, anxieties, and cares,
And age surrounded with a thousand snares.

But whither, bury'd by a gen'rous scorn
Of this vain world, ah whither am I borne?
Let's not unbud th' Almighty's standard quit;
Howe'er severe our post, we must submit.

Could I a firm persuasion once attain,
That after death no being would remain;
To those dark shades I'd willingly descend,
Where all must sleep, this drama at an end,
Nor life accept, although renew'd by fate,
Ev'n from its earliest and its happiest state.

Might I from fortune's bounteous hand receive
Each boon, each blessing in her pow'r to give,
Genius, and science, morals, and good sense,
Unenvy'd honours, wit, and eloquence;
A nam'rous offspring to the world well known,
Both for paternal virtues, and their own;
Ev'n at this mighty price I'd not be bound,
To tread the same dull circle round and round;

The soul requires enjoyments more sublime,
By space unbounded, undefroy'd by time

BOOK II.

God then through all creation gives, we find,
Sufficient marks of an indulgent mind,
Excepting in ourselves; ourselves of all
His works the chief on this terrestrial ball,
His own bright image, who alone unblest
Feel ill's perpetual, happy all the rest.
But hold, presumptuous! charge not Heaven's decrees

With such injustice, such partiality.
Yet true it is, survey we life around,
Whole hoils of ill's on ev'ry side are found;
Who wound not here and there by chance a foe,
But at the species meditate the blow.
What millions perish by each other's hands
In war's fierce rage? or by the dread commands
Of tyrants languish out their lives in chains,
Or lose them in variety of pains?
What numbers pinch'd by want and hunger die,
In spite of nature's liberality?
(Those, still more numerous, I to name disdain,
By lewdness and intemperance justly slain)
What numbers guiltless of their own disease
Are snatch'd by sudden death, or waste by slow degrees?

Where then is virtue's well-deserv'd reward?—
Let's pay to virtue ev'ry due regard;
That she enables man, let us confess,
To bear those evils which she can't redress,
Gives hope, and conscious peace, and can assuage
Th' impetuous tempests both of lust and rage;
Yet she's a guard so far from being sure,
That oft her friends peculiar ill's endure:
Where vice prevails severest is their fate,
Tyrants pursue them with a threefold hate;
How many struggling in their country's cause,
And from their country meriting applause,
Have fall'n by wretches fond to be enslav'd,
And perish'd by the hands themselves had sav'd?

Soon as superior worth appears in view,
See knaves and fools united to pursue!
The man so form'd they all conspire to blame,
And envy's poisonous tooth attacks his fame:
Should he at length so truly good and great,
Prevail, and rule with honest views the state,
Then must he toil for an ungrateful race,
Submit to clamour, libels, and disgrace,
Threaten'd, oppos'd, defeated in his ends,
By foes seditious, and aspiring friends.
Hear this, and tremble! all who would be great,
Yet know not what attends that dang'rous wretched state.

Is private life from all these evils free?
Vice of all kinds, rage, envy there we see,
Deceit, that friendship's mask insidious wears,
Quarrels and feuds, and law's enangling snares.
But there are pleasures still in human life,
Domestic ease, a tender loving wife,
Children whose dawning smiles your heart engage,
The grace and comfort of soft-tealing age:
If happiness exists, 'tis surely here;
But are these joys exempt from care and fear?

Need I the miseries of that state declare,
When diff'rent passions draw the wedded pair?
Or say how hard those passions to discern,
Ere the dye's cast, and 'tis too late to learn?
Who can insure, that what is right, and good,
These children shall pursue? or if they should,
Death comes when least you fear so black a day,
And all your blooming hopes are snatch'd away.

We say not that these ills from virtue flow;
Did her wife precepts rule the world, we know
The golden ages wou'd again begin;
But 'tis our lot in this to suffer, and to sin.
Observing this, some sages have decreed,
That all things from two causes must proceed;
Two principles with equal pow'r endu'd,
This wholly evil, that supremely good.
From this arise the mis'ries we endure,
Whilst that administers a friendly cure;
Hence life is chequer'd still with bliss and woe,
Hence tares with golden crops promiscuous grow,
And pois'nous serpents make their dread repose
Beneath the covert of the fragrant rose.

Can such a system satisfy the mind?
Are both these gods in equal pow'r conjoin'd,
Or one superior? Equal if you say,
Chaos returns, since neither will obey:
Is one superior? good or ill must reign,
Eternal joy or everlasting pain:
Which e'er is conquer'd must entirely yield,
And the victorious god enjoy the field:
Hence with these fictions of the magi's brain!
Hence ouzy Nile, with all her monstrous train!

Or comes the Stoic nearer to the right?
He holds, that whatsoever yields delight,
Wealth, fame, externals all, are useless things;
Himself half-starving happier far than kings.
'Tis fine indeed to be so wond'rous wise!
By the same reasoning too he pain denies;
Roast him, or flay him, break him on the wheel,
Retract he will not, though he can't but feel:
Pain's not an ill, he utters with a groan:
What then? An inconvenience 'tis, he'll own!
What vigour, health, and beauty? are these good?
No; they may be accepted, not pursued:
Absurd to squabble thus about a name,
Quibbling with diff'rent words that mean the same.

Stoic, were you not fram'd of flesh and blood,
You might be blest without external good;
But know, be self-sufficient as you can,
You are not spirit quite, but frail and mortal man.

But since these fates, so absurdly wise,
Vainly pretend enjoyments to despise,
Because externals, and in fortune's pow'r,
Now mine, now thine, the blessing of an hour;
Why value, then, that strength of mind they boast,
As often varying, and as quickly lost?
A head-ach hurts it, or a rainy day,
And a slow fever wipes it quite away.

See * one whose councils, one † whose con-
qu'ring hand
Once sav'd Britannia's almost sinking land,
Examples of the mind's extensive pow'r;
Examples too how quickly fades that flow'r.

* Lord Somers.

† Duke of Marlborough.

Him let me add, whom late we saw excel
‡ In each politer kind of writing well:
Whether he strove out follies to expose
In easy verse, or droll and hum'rous prose;
Few years, alas! compel his throne to quit
This mighty monarch o'er the realms of wit:
See self-surviving he's an idiot grown!

A melancholy proof our parts are not our own.
Thy tenets, Stoic, yet we may forgive,
If in a future state we cease to live.
For here the virtuous suffer much 'tis plain,
If pain is evil, this must God arraign;
And on this principle confess we must,
Pain can no evil be, or God must be unjust.

Blind man! whose reason such strait bounds
confine,
That ere it touches truth's extremest line,
It stops amaz'd, and quits the great design.
Own you not, Stoic, God is just and true?
Dare to proceed; secure this path pursue:
'Tis soon conduct you far beyond the tomb,
To future justice, and a life to come.
This path, you say, is hid in endless night;
'Tis self-conceit alone obstructs your sight;
You stop ere half your destin'd course is run,
And triumph when the conquest is not won!
By this the Sophists were of old misled;
See what a monstrous race from one mistake is bred!

Hear then my argument:—Confess we must,
A God there is, supremely wise and just:
If so, however things affect our sight,
As sings our bard, whatever is, is right.
But is it right what here so oft appears,
That vice should triumph, virtue sink in tears?
The inference then that closes this debate,
Is, that there must exist a future state,
The wise extending their inquiries wide,
See how both states are by connection ty'd;
Fools view but part, and not the whole survey,
So crowd existence all into a day.
Hence are they led to hope, but hope in vain,
That justice never will resume her reign;
On this vain hope adulterers, thieves rely,
And to this altar vile assassins fly.

“But rules not God by general laws divine:
“Man's vice or virtue change not the design:”
What laws are these? Instruct us if you can:—
There's one design'd for brutes, and one for man:
Another guides inactive matter's course,
Attracting, and attracted by its force:
Hence mutual gravity subsists between
Far distant worlds, and ties the vast machine.

The laws of life, why need I call to mind,
Obey'd by birds and beasts of ev'ry kind?
By all the sandy desert's savage brood,
And all the num'rous offspring of the flood;
Of these none uncontrol'd and lawless rove,
But to some destin'd end spontaneous move:
Led by that instinct Heav'n itself inspires,
Or so much reason as their state requires:
See all with skill acquire their daily food,
All use those arms which nature has bestow'd;
Produce their tender progeny, and feed
With care parental, whilst that care they need;

‡ Dean Swift.

In these lov'd offices completely blest,
No hopes beyond them, nor vain fears molest.

Man o'er a wider field extends his views:
God through the wonders of his works pursues:
Exploring thence his attributes and laws,
Adores, loves, imitates th' Eternal Cause;
For sure in nothing we approach so nigh
The great example of divinity,
As in benevolence: the patriot's soul
Knows not self-center'd for itself to roll,
But warms, enlightens, animates the whole:
Its mighty orb embraces first his friends,
His country next, then man; nor here it ends,
But to the meanest animal descends.

Wife nature has this social law confirm'd
By forming man so helpless and unarm'd:
His want of others' aid, and pow'r of speech
T' implore that aid, this lesson daily teach:
Mankind with other animals compare,
Single, how weak and impotent they are!
But view them in their complicated state,
Their pow'rs how wond'rous, and their strength
how great,

When social virtue individuals joins,
And in one solid mass, like gravity combines!
This then's the first great law by nature giv'n,
Stamp'd on our souls, and ratify'd by Heav'n;
All from utility this law approve,
As ev'ry private bliss must spring from social love.

Why deviate then so many from this law!
See passions, custom, vice, and folly draw!
Survey the rolling globe from east to west,
How few, alas! how very few are blest!
Beneath the frozen poles, and burning line,
What poverty and indolence combine
To cloud with error's mists the human mind?
No trace of man, but in the form we find.

And are we free from error and distress,
Whom Heav'n with clearer light has pleas'd to blest?

Whom true religion leads! (for she but leads
By soft persuasion, not by force proceeds);
Behold how we avoid this radiant sun,
This proffer'd guide how obstinately shun,
And after sophistry's vain systems run!
For these as for essentials we engage

In wars and massacres with holy rage;
Brothers by brothers' impious hands are slain,
Mistaken zeal, how savage is thy reign!

Unpunish'd vices here so much abound,
All right and wrong, all order they confound;
These are the giants who the gods defy,
And mountains heap on mountains to the sky:
Sees this th' Almighty Judge, or seeing spares,
And deems the crimes of man beneath his cares?
He sees, and will at last rewards bestow,
And punishments, not less assur'd for being slow.

Nor doubt I, though this state confus'd appears,

That ev'n in this God sometimes interferes;
Sometimes, lest man should quite his pow'r dis-
own,

He makes that pow'r to trembling nations known:
But rarely this; not for each vulgar end,
As superstition's idle tales pretend,
Who thinks all foes to God who are her own,
Directs his thunder, and usurps his throne.

Nor know I not how much a conscious mind
Avails to punish, or reward mankind;
Ev'n in this life thou, impious wretch, must feel
The fury's scourges, and th' infernal wheel;
From man's tribunal though thou hop'st to run,
Thyself thou canst not, nor thy conscience shun:
What must thou suffer when each dire disease,
The progeny of vice, thy fabric seize?
Consumption, fever, and the racking pain
Of spasms, and gout, and stone, a frightful train!
When life new tortures can alone supply,
Life thy sole hope thou'lt hate, yet dread to die.

Should such a wretch to num'rous years arrive,
It can be little worth his while to live:
No honours, no regards his age attend,
Companions fly; he ne'er could have a friend:
His flatterers leave him, and with wild affright
He looks within, and shudders at the sight:
When threat'ning death uplifts his pointed dart,
With what impatience he applies to art,
Life to prolong amidst disease and pains!
Why this, if after it no sense remains?
Why should he choose these miseries to endure,
If death could grant an everlasting cure?
'Tis plain there's something whispers in his ear,
(Though fain he'd hide it) he has much to fear.

See the reverse, how happy those we find,
Who know by merit to engage mankind?
Prais'd by each tongue, by ev'ry heart belov'd,
For virtues practis'd, and for arts improv'd;
Their early aspects shine with smiles serene,
And all is peace and happiness within:
Their sleep is ne'er disturb'd by fears or strife,
Nor lust, nor wine, impair the springs of life.

Him fortune cannot sink, nor much elate,
Whose views extend beyond this mortal state:
By age when summon'd to resign his breath,
Calm, and serene, he sees approaching death,
As the safe port, the peaceful silent shore,
Where he may rest, life's tedious voyage o'er;
He, and he only, is of death afraid,
Whom his own conscience has a coward made;
Whilst he who virtue's radiant course has run,
Descends like a serenely setting sun,
His thoughts triumphant Heav'n alone employ,
And hope anticipates his future joys.

So good, so blest th' illustrious * Hough we find,

Whose image dwells with pleasure on my mind;
The mitre's glory, freedom's constant friend,
In times which ask'd a champion to defend;
Who after near an hundred virtuous years,
His senses perfect, free from pains and fears,
Replete with life, with honours, and with age,
Like an applauded actor left the stage;
Or like some victor in th' Olympic games,
Who, having run his course, the crown of glory claims.

From this just contrast plainly it appears,
How conscience can inspire both hopes and fears:
But whence proceed these hopes, or whence this
dread,

If nothing really can affect the dead?
See all things join to promise, and preface
The sure arrival of a future age!

Whate'er their lot is here, the good and wife
Nor doat on life, nor peevishly despise.
An honest man, when fortune's storms begin,
Has consolation always sure within;
And if she sends a more propitious gale,
He's pleas'd, but not forgetful it may fall.

Nor fear that he who sits so loose to life,
Should too much shun its labours, and its strife;
And, scorn'ing wealth, contented to be mean,
Shrunk from the duties of this bustling scene;
Or, when his country's safety claims his aid,
Avoid the fight, inglorious and afraid:
Who scorns life most must surely be most brave,
And he who pow'r contemns, be least a slave:
Virtue will lead him to ambition's ends,
And prompt him to defend his country and his friends.

But still his merit you can not regard,
Who thus pursues a posthumous reward;
His soul, you cry, is uncorrupt and great,
Who, quite uninfluenc'd by a future state,
Embraces virtue from a nobler sense
Of her abstracted, native excellence,
From the self-conscious joy her essence brings,
The beauty, sweets, harmony of things.
It may be so: yet he deserves applause,
Who follows where instructive nature draws;
Aims at rewards by her indulgence giv'n,
And toars triumphant on her wings to heav'n.

Say what this venal virtuous man pursues;
No mean rewards, no mercenary views;
Not wealth usurious, or a num'rous train,
Not fame by fraud acquir'd, or title vain!
He follows but where nature points the road,
Rising in virtue's school, till he ascends to God.

But we th' inglorious common herd of man,
Sail without compass, toil without a plan;
In fortune's varying storms for ever tost,
Shadows pursue, that in pursuit are lost;
See infants all till life's extremest day,
Scrambling for toys, then tossing them away.
Who rests of immortality assur'd
Is safe, whatever ills are here endur'd:
He hopes not vainly in a world like this,
To meet with pure uninterrupted bliss;
For good and ill, in this imperfect state,
Are ever mix'd by the decrees of fate.
With wisdom's richest harvest folly grows,
And baleful hemlock mingles with the rose;
All things are blended, changeable, and vain,
No hope, no wish we perfectly obtain;
God may perhaps (might human reason's line
Pretend to fathom infinite design)
Have thus ordain'd things, that the restless mind
No happiness complete on earth may find;
And, by this friendly chastisement made wise,
To Heav'n her safest best retreat may rise.

Come then, since now in safety we have past
Through error's rocks, and see the port at last;
Let us review and recollect the whole.—
Thus stands my argument.—The thinking soul
Cannot terrestrial, or material be,
But claims by nature immortality;
God, who created it, can make it end,
We question not, but cannot apprehend
He will; because it is by him endued
With strong ideas of all perfect good;

With wond'rous pow'rs to know and calculate
Things too remote from this our earthly state
With sure presages of a life to come;
All false and useless, if beyond the tomb
Our beings cease: we therefore can't believe
God either acts in vain, or can deceive.

If ev'ry rule of equity demands,
That vice and virtue from the Almighty's hands
Should due rewards and punishments receive,
And this by no means happens whilst we live;
It follows, that a time must surely come,
When each shall meet their well-adjusted doom:
Then shall this scene, which now to human sight
Seems so unworthy Witdom Infinite,
A system of consummate skill appear,
And ev'ry cloud dispers'd, be beautiful and clear.

Doubt we of this! what solid proof remains,
That o'er the world a wise Disposer reigns?
Whilst all creation speaks a pow'r divine,
Is it deficient in the main design?
Not so: the day shall come, (pretend not now
Presumptuous to inquire or when, or how,
But) after death shall come th' important day,
When God to all his justice shall display;
Each action with impartial eyes regard,
And in a just proportion punish and reward.

WRITTEN IN THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
THE EARL OF OXFORD'S LIBRARY AT
WIMPLE *, 1729.

Who, uninspir'd, can tread this sacred ground,
With all the sons of fame encompass'd round?
Where, crown'd with wreaths of ever-verdant bays,

Each sifter art her willing charms displays:
Mellow'd by time, here beauteous paintings glow;
There marble busts illustrious faces show:
And in old coins are little heroes seen,
With venerable rust of ages green:
Around, unwounded by the teeth of age,
By Gothic fire, and persecution's rage,
Perfect and fair unnumber'd volumes stand,
By Providence preserv'd for Oxford's hand.

Whilst thus within these magic walls I stray,
At once all climes and ages I survey:
On fancy's wings I fly from shore to shore,
Recal past time, and live whole eras o'er:

* Wimple-Hall, with the estate round it, was formerly the possession of the Cutts family, an ancient family in the county of Cambridge, and a descendant of which was the gallant Lord Cutts, who so frequently distinguished himself in the several sieges and battles during the war in which the great Duke of Marlborough commanded.—This estate was sold by the Cutts family to the famous Sir John Cutler, who settled it on the marriage of his daughter with Lord Radnor. Lord Radnor afterwards sold it to John Hollis, Duke of Newcastle, in the partition of whose estates it came to the Earl of Oxford, who married his only daughter. This he made his country residence, and here was kept his famous library till the time of his death. After his death, it was sold by his family to the Chancellor Lord Hardwicke, from whom it descended to the present Earl Hardwicke.

Converse with heroes fam'd in ancient song,
And bards, by whom those heroes breathe to long:
Observe the quick migrations learning makes,
How haras'd nations trembling she forsakes,
And hastes away to build her downy nest
In happier climes, with peace and plenty blest.

See how, in fam'd Augustus' golden days,
Wit triumph's, crown'd with universal praise!
Approach thrones with a majestic air,
The prince's mistress, and the statesman's care.
Mecænas shines in ev'ry classic page,
Mecænas, once the Harley of his age.
Nor with less glory she her charms display'd,
In Albion once when Royal Anna sway'd.
See Oxford smiles! and all the tuneful train,
In his Britannia's sons revive again;
Prior, like Horace, strikes the sounding strings,
And in harmonious Pope once more great Mara sings.

Again the waves her pinions to be gone,
And only hopes protection from his son:
Chas'd from the senate and the court she flies,
There craft and party zeal her place supplies.
Yet still, since fix'd in Wimple's happy plain,
(Her last retreat) she knows not to complain.
There in great Oxford's converse does engage
Th' instructed ear, and shames a vicious age;
Or in his consort's accents stands consent,
And charms with graceful ease each list'ning
guest;

Or with her lov'd companions gladly tied,
Goodness sincere, and beauty void of pride,
Fixes her throne in Margaretta's * face,
And from her lips acquires a new refiners grace.

* Lady Margaret Cavendish Harley, afterwards married to William, the second Duke of Portland.

BONFONIUS *,

BAS. XI.

Exoptat se florem illum esse, quo uteretur amica.

ERGO, floscule, tu meæ puellæ
Hoc florente sinu usque conquisces?
Ergo tu domiæ meæ papillis
Beatus nimis infidebis usque?

O si, floscule, mi tuâ liceret
Ista sorte frui, et meæ puellæ
Incubare sinu, atque desiderare
Hos inter globulos-papillarum,
Non sic lentus inersque conquiscescam,
Non sic infideam otiosus usque.
Sed toto spatio iniquictus errem,
Et feram sinui, feramque collo
Mille basta, mille et huic et illi
Impingam globulo osculationes.

Nec mihi fatis hæc putes futura:
Namque et discere curiosus optem,
Quid discriminis inter hunc et illum,
Et quantus tumor hujus illiusque;
Quantum albedine præstet hic vel ille;
Quantum duritie hic vel ille vincat;
Sinisterne globus, globusne dexter
Figura placeat rotundiore;
An dexter globus, an globus sinister
Papilla rubeat rubentiore:
Explorem quoque, quo beata ducat
Illa semita, quæ globos gemellos
Sic discriminat, et subesse clamat
Mellitum magis elegansque quiddam:
Indagem quoque, quicquid est latentis,
Et labar tacitus, ferarque sensum,
Usque Cypridis ad beata regna.

At mi Pancharidis meæ papillas
Nec summo licet ore suaviari,
Nec levi licet attigisse palmâ.
O sortem nimis asperam atque iniquam!
Tantillum illa negat mihi petenti,
Tantillum illa negat mihi scienti;
Quæ tantum huic tribuit nec id petenti,
Quæ tantum huic tribuit nec id scienti.

TO A NOSEGAY IN PANCHARILLA'S
BREAST.

WRITTEN IN 1729.

MUST you alone then, happy flow'rs,
Ye short-liv'd sons of vernal show'rs,
Must you alone be still thus blest,
And dwell in Pancharilla's breast?
Oh would the gods but hear my pray'r,
To change my form and place me there!
I should not sure so quickly die,
I shou'd not so inactive lie;
But ever wand'ring to and fro,
From this to that fair ball of snow,
Enjoy ten thousand thousand blisses
And print on each ten thousand kisses.
Nor would I thus the task give o'er;
Curious new secrets to explore,
I'd never rest till I had found
Which globe was softest, which most round—
Which was most yielding, smooth, and white,
Or the left bosom or the right;
Which was the warmest, easiest bed,
And which was tip'd with purest red.

Nor cou'd I leave theauteons scene,
Till I had trac'd the path between,
That milky way so smooth and even,
That promises to lead to heav'n:
Lower and lower I'd descend,
To find where it at last wou'd end;
Till fully blest I'd wand'ring rove
O'er all the fragrant Cyprian grove.

But ah! those wishes all are vain,
The fair one triumphs in my pain;
To flow'rs that know not to be blest,
The nymph unveils her snowy breast;
While to her slave's desiring eyes,
The heav'nly prospect she denies:
Too cruel fate, too cruel fair,
To place a senseless nosegay there,
And yet refuse my lips the bliss
To taste one dear transporting kiss.

the nearest to the grace, ease, and softness of Tibullus.

GIVEN TO A LADY

With a Watch which she had borrowed to hang at her Bed's Head.

WHILST half asleep my Chloe lies,
And all her softest thoughts arise;
Whilst, tyrant honour laid at rest,
Love steals to her unguarded breast;
Then whisper to the yielding fair,
Thou witness to the pains I bear,
How oft her slave with open eyes,
All the long night despairing lies;
Impatient till the rosy day
Shall once again his beams display,
And with it he again may rise,
To greet with joy her dawning eyes.
Tell her as all thy motions stand,
Unless, recruited by her hand,
So shall my life forget to move;
Unless, each day, the fair I love
Shall new repeated vigour give
With smiles, and make me fit to live.
Tell her, when far from her I stray,
How oft I chide thy slow delay;
But when beneath her smiles I live,
Blest with all joys the gods can give,
How often I reprove thy haste,
And think each precious moment flies too fast.

BELPHEGOR;

A FABLE.

From Machiavel.

—"Fugit indignata sub umbras." VIRG.

TH' infernal monarch once, as stories tell,
Review'd his subjects from all parts of hell;
Around his throne unnumber'd millions wait,
He scarce believ'd his empire was so great;
Still as each pass'd, he ask'd with friendly care
What crime had caus'd their fall, and brought them there:

Scarce one he question'd, but replied the same,
And on the marriage noose laid all the blame;
Thence ev'ry fatal error of their lives
They all deduce, and all accuse their wives.

Then to his peers, and potentates around,
Thus Satan spoke: hell trembled with the sound.
My friends, what vast advantages wou'd flow
To these our realms, could we but folly know
The form and nature of these marriage chains,
That send such crowds to our infernal plains;
Let some bold patriot then, who dares to show
His gen'rous love to this our state below,
For his dear country's good the task essay,
And animate awhile some human clay;
Ten years in marriage bonds he shall remain,
Enjoy its pleasures, and endure its pain,
Then to his friends return'd, with truth relate
The nature of the matrimonial state.

He spoke; the list'ning crowds his scheme approv'd:

But who so much his prince, or country lov'd,
As thus, with fearless heart, to undertake
His hymeneal trial, for their sake?

At length with one consent they all propose,
That fortune shall by lot the task impose;
The dreaded chance on bold Belphegor fell,
Sighing h' obey'd, and took his leave of hell.
First in fair Florence he was pleas'd to fix,
Bought a large house, fine plate, a coach and six;
Dress'd rich and gay, play'd high, drank hard,
and whor'd,

And liv'd in short in all things like a lord:
His feasts were plenteous, and his wines were strong,

So poets, priests, and pimps his table throng,
Bring dedications, sermons, whores, and plays,
The dev'l was ne'er so flatter'd in his days:
The ladies too were kind, each tender dame
Sigh'd, when she mention'd Roderigo's name;
For so he's call'd: rich, young, and debonnaire,
He reigns sole monarch of the longing fair;
No daughter, sure, of Eve could e'er escape
The dev'l, when cloth'd in such a tempting shape.

One nymph at length, superior to the rest,
Gay, beautiful, and young, inspir'd his breast;
Soft looks and sighs his passion soon betray'd,
Awhile he woos, then weds the lovely maid.
I shall not now, to grace my tale, relate
What feasts, what balls, what dresses, pomp and state,

Adorn'd their nuptial day, lest it should seem
As tedious to the reader, as to him,
Who big with expectation of delight,
Impatient waited for the happy night;
The happy night is come, his longing arms
Press close the yielding maid in all her charms,
The yielding maid, who now no longer coy
With equal ardour loves, and gives a loose to joy:
Dissolv'd in bliss more exquisite than all
He e'er had felt in heav'n, before his fall,
With rapture clinging to his lovely bride,
In murmurs to himself Belphegor cry'd: [fears:]
Are these the marriage chains? are these my
Oh had my ten, but been ten thousand years!

But ah these happy moments last not long!
For in one month his wife has found her tongue,
All thoughts of love and tenderness are lost,
Their only aim is, who shall squander most;
She dreams of nothing now but being fine,
Whilst he is ever guzzling nasty wine;
She longs for jewels, equipage, and plate,
And he, sad man! stays out so very late!
Hence ev'ry day domestic wars are bred,
A truce is hardly kept, while they're abed;
They wrangle all day long, and then at night,
Like wooing cats, at once they love and fight.

His riches too are with his quiet flown,
And they once spent, all friends on course are gone;

The sum design'd his whole ten years to last,
is all consum'd before the first is past:
Where shall he hide? ah whither must he fly?
Legions of duns abroad in ambush lie,
For fear of them, no more he dares to roam,
and the worst dun of all, his wife's at home.

Quite tir'd at length, with such a wretched life,
He flies one night at once from debts, and wife;
ut ere the morning dawn his flight is known;
And crowds pursue him close from town to town:

He quits the public road, and wand'ring strays
Through unfrequented woods, and pathless ways;
At last with joy a little farm he sees,
Where liv'd a good old man, in health and ease;
Matthew his name: to him Belphegor goes,
And begs protection from pursuing foes,
With tears relates his melancholy case,
Tells him from whence he came, and who he was,
And vows to pay for his reception well,
When next he should receive his rents from hell:
The farmer hears his tale with pitying ear,
And bids him live in peace, and safety there;
Awhile he did; no duns, no noise, or strife,
Disturb'd him there;—for Matt had ne'er a wife.
But ere few weeks in this retreat are past
Matt too himself becomes a dun at last;
Demands his promis'd pay with heat and rage,
Till thus Belphegor's words his wrath assuage.

My friend, we dev'ls, like English peers, he cry'd,

Though free from law, are yet by honour ty'd;
Though tradesmen's cheating bills I scorn to view,
I pay all debts that are by honour due;
And therefore have contriv'd long since a way,
Beyond all hopes thy kindness to repay;
We subtle spirits can, you know, with ease
Possess whatever human breasts we please,
With sudden frenzy can o'ercast the mind,
Let passions loose, and captive reason bind:
Thus I three mortal bosoms will infect,
And force them to apply to you for rest;
Vast sums for cure they willingly shall pay,
Thrice, and but thrice, your pow'r I will obey.

He spoke, then fled unseen, like rushing wind,
And breathless left his mortal frame behind:
The corps is quickly known, and news is spread
That Roderigo's in the desert dead;
His wife in fashionable grief appears,
Sighs for one day, then mourns two tedious years.

A beauteous maid, who then in Florence dwelt,
In a short time unusual symptoms felt;
Physicians came; prescrib'd, then took their fees,
But none could find the cause of her disease;
Her parents thought 'twas love disturb'd her rest,
But all the learn'd agreed she was possess'd;
In vain the doctors all their art apply'd,
In vain the priests their holy trump'ry try'd;
No pray'rs nor med'cines could the demon tame,
Till Matthew heard the news, and hast'ning came:
He asks five hundred pounds; the money's paid;
He forms the magic spell, then cures the maid:
Hence chas'd, the dev'l to rich houses flies,
And makes their heirs successively his prize,
Who both by Matthew's skill reliev'd from pains,
Reward his wond'rous art with wond'rous gains.

And now Belphegor, having thrice obey'd,
With reason thinks his host is fully paid;
Next free to range, to Gallia's king he flies,
As dev'l's ambitious ever love to rise;
Black hideous scenes distract his royal mind,
From all he seeks relief, but none can find,
And vows vast treasures shall his art repay,
Whoe'er can chase the strange disease away:
At length, instructed by the voice of fame,
To Matthew tends: poor Matt reluctant came;
He knew his pow'r expir'd, refus'd to try,
But all excuses fail'd, he must, or die;

At last despairing he the task essay'd,
Approach'd the monarch's ear, and whispering said:
Since force, not choice, has brought thy servant
here,

Once more, Belphegor, my petition hear,
This once at my request, thy post resign,
And save my life, as once I refus'd thine.

Cruel Belphegor, deaf to his request,
Disdain'd his pray'rs, and made his woes a jest;
With tears and sighs he beg'd, and beg'd again,
Still the ungrateful fiend but mock'd his pain;
Then turning round he told th' expecting court,
This dev'l was of a most malignant sort;
And that he could but make one trial more,
And if that fail'd, he then must give him o'er:
Then placing num'rous drums, and trumpets
round,

Instructed when he mov'd his hand to sound,
He whisper'd in his patient's ear again,
Belphegor answer'd all his arts were vain;
He gives the sign, they found; th' outrageous din
Startles the king, and frights the dev'l within;
He asks what 'tis, and vows that in his life
He ne'er had heard the like—except his wife;
By Heav'n's, 'tis she, Matt cries, you'd best be gone,
She comes once more to seize you for her own;
Belphegor frighted, not one word replies,
But to th' infernal shades for refuge flies;
There paints a dreadful sketch of marry'd lives,
And feelingly confirms the charge on wives:
Matthew o'erpaid with honours, fame, and fees,
Returns to least obscurity, and ease,
With joy triumphant to Pæan sings,
And vows to deal no more with dev'ls or kings.

A DIALOGUE

BETWEEN THE RIGHT HON. HENRY PELHAM, AND MADAM POPULARITY*.

IN IMITATION OF HORACE, BOOK III. ODE IX.

H. Pelham.

I. WHILEST I was pleasing in your eyes,
And you were constant, chaste, and wise;
Ere yet you had your favours granted
To ev'ry knave or fool who canted,
In peaceful joy I pass'd each hour,
Nor env'y'd Walpole's wealth and pow'r.

Madam Popularity.

2. While I possess'd your love alone,
My heart and voice were all your own;
But on my soul 'twould vex a faint,
When I've most reason for complaint,

* From the commencement of the Spanish war in 1739, to the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, signed October 7, 1748, the land tax was raised from two shillings to four shillings. In 1749, it was lowered to three shillings, at which rate it was continued till 1752, when Mr. Pelham, at that time the minister, reduced it to two shillings, at which rate it continued till the time of his death in 1754. This was one, amongst others, of those popular measures which gilded the evening of this minister's life, and rendered his death an object of public lamentation. To this event we owe this happy imitation, wrote soon after the land-tax act of that year passed.

To hear you thus begin to scold:
Think on Britannia! proud and old!
Are not her interests all your theme,
Your daily labour, nightly dream?

H. Pelham.

3. My just regard I can't deny
For her and her prosperity;
Nor am ashamed it is so great,
That, to deliver her from debt,
From foreign wars and civil strife,
I'd freely sacrifice my life.

Madam Popularity.

4. To her your warmest vows are plighted,
For her I ev'ry day am slighted;
Her welfare always is prefer'd,
And my neglected voice unheard:
Examples numerous I could mention,
A peace! bad as the old convention;
Money reduc'd to three per cent,
No pity on the poor who lent;
Armies that must for ever stand,
And still three shillings laid on land.

H. Pelham.

5. Suppose now, Madam, I was willing
For once to bait this grievous shilling,
To humour you—I know 'tis wrong,
But you have such a cursed tongue.

Madam Popularity.

6. Why then, though rough as winds or seas,
You scorn all little arts to please,
Yet thou art honest, faith, and I
With thee alone will live and die.

A SIMILE.

CORINA, in the country bred,
Harbour'd strange notions in her head,
Notions in town quite out of fashion;
Such as that love's a dangerous passion,
That virtue is the maiden's jewel,
And to be safe, she must be cruel.

Thus arm'd she'd long secur'd her honour
From all assaults yet made upon her,
Had scratch'd th' impetuous captain's hand,
Had torn the lawyer's gown and band,
And gold refus'd from knights and squires
To bribe her to her own desires:
For, to say truth, she thought it hard,
To be of pleasures thus debarr'd,
She saw by others freely tasted,
So pouted, pin'd, grew pale, and wasted:
Yet, notwithstanding her condition,
Continu'd firm in opposition.

At length a troop of horse came down,
And quarter'd in a neighbour'ing town;
The cornet he was tall and young,
And had a most bewitching tongue.
They saw and lik'd: the siege begun:
Each hour he some advantage won.
He ogled first;—she turn'd away;—
But met his eyes the following day;
Then her reluctant hand he seizes,
That soon she gives him, when he pleases:
Her ruby lips he next attacks:—
She struggles;—in a while she smacks:
Her snowy breast he then invades;—
That yields too after some parades;

And of that fortress once possess'd,
He quickly masters all the rest.
No longer now, a dupe to fame,
She smothers or resists her flame,
But loves without or fear or shame.

So have I seen the Tory race
Long in the pouts for want of place,
Never in humour, never well,
Wishing for what they dar'd not tell,
Their heads with country-notions fraught,
Notions in town not worth a groat,
These tenets all reluctant quit,
And step by step at last submit
To reason, eloquence, and Pitt.

At first to Hanover a plum
Was sent;—They said—A trivial sum,
But if he went one title further,
They vow'd and swore they'd cry out murder;
Ere long a larger sum is wanted;
They pish'd and frown'd—but still they granted;
He push'd for more, and more agen—
Well—Money's better sent, than Men:
Here virtue made another stand.—
No—not a man shall leave the land.

What?—not one regiment to Embden?
They start—but now they're fairly hem'd in:
These soon, and many more are sent;—
They're silent—Silence gives consent.
Our troops, they now can plainly see,
May Britain guard in Germany:
Hanoverians, Hessians, Prussians
Are paid, t'oppose the French and Russians:
No scruple they with truth to say,
They're fighting for America:
No more they make a fiddle-faddle
About an Hessian horse or fiddle;
No more of continental measures,
No more of wasting British treasures;
Ten millions, and a vote of credit.—
'Tis right—He can't be wrong, who did it:
They're fairly fous'd o'er head and ears,
And cur'd of all their ratic fears.

A PASSAGE IN OSSIAN VERSIFIED.

The deeds of ancient days shall be my theme;
O Lora, the soft murmurs of thy stream,
Thy trees, Garmallar, rustling in the wind,
Recal those days with pleasure to my mind.

See'st thou that rock, from whose heath-cover'd
crown,

Melvira, three old bended firs look down?
Green is the plain which at its feet is spread,
The mountain flower there shakes its milk-white
head;

Two stones, memorials of departed worth,
Uplift their moss-cap'd heads, half sunk in earth;
The mountain deer, that crop the grass around,
See the pale ghosts who guard the sacred ground,
Then starting, fly the place, and at a distance
bound.

ON SEEING THE EARL OF CHESTER- FIELD AT A BALL AT BATH.

WRITTEN IN 1770.

In times by selfishness and faction sour'd
When dull importance has all wit devour'd;

When rank, as if t'insult alone design'd,
Affects a proud seclusion * from mankind;
And greatness, to all social converse dead,
Esteems it dignity to be ill-bred:
See! Chesterfield alone resists the tide,
Above all party, and above all pride,
Vouchsafes each night these brilliant scenes to grace,
Augments and shares the amusements of the place;
Admires the fair, enjoys the sprightly ball,
Deigns to be pleas'd, and therefore pleases all.
Hence, though unable now this style to hit,
Learn what was once politeness, ease, and wit.

THE AMERICAN COACHMAN.

CROWN'D be the man with lasting praise,
Who first contriv'd the pin
From vicious steeds to loose a chaise,
And save the necks within.

See how they prance, and bound, and skip,
And all controul disdain;
Defy the terrors of the whip,
And rend the silken rein!

Awhile we try if art or strength
Are able to prevail;
But hopeless, when we find at length
That all our efforts fail,

With ready foot the spring we press,
Out flies the magic plug,
Then, disengag'd from all distress,
We sit quite safe and snug.

The pamper'd steeds, their freedom gain'd,
Run off full speed together;
But having no plan ascertain'd,
They run they know not whither.

Boys, who love mischief, and of course
Enjoying the disaster,
Bawl, Stop them! Stop them! till they're hoarse,
But mean to drive them faster.

Each claiming now his native right,
Scorns to obey his brother;
So they proceed to kick and bite,
And worry one another.

Hungry at length, and blind, and lame,
Bleeding at nose and eyes;
By sufferings growing mighty tame,
And by experience wise;

With bellies full of liberty,
But void of oats and hay;
They both sneak back, their folly see,
And run no more away.

Let all who view th' instructive scene,
And patronize the plan,
Give thanks to Gloucester's honest Dean,
For, Tucker †,—thou't the man.

* Alluding to the supercilious airs of some of our people of quality, who affect to avoid frequenting the public rooms.

† Early in the unfortunate contest between the mother country and the American colonies, the Rev. Dr. Tucker Dean of Gloucester, published a pamphlet, intitled, An Address and Appeal to the Landed Interest; in which he proposed and recommended to the nation a total

BURLESQUE ODE.

I'll combat nature, interrupt her course,
And baffle all her stat'd laws by force;
Tear from its bed the deeply-rooted pine,
And hurl it up the craggy mountain's side;
Divert the tempest from its destin'd line,
And stem the torrent of th' impetuous tide;
Teach the dull ox to dance, the ass to play,
And even obstinate Americans t' obey.

Like some dread herald, tygers I'll compel
In the same field with stags in peace to dwell:
The rampant lion now erect shall stand,
Now couchant at my feet shall lie deprest;
And if he dares but question my command,
With one strong blow I'll halve him to a crest.
Thus spoke the giant Gogmagog: the found
Reverberates from all the echoing rocks around.
Now morning, rob'd in saffron-colour'd gown,
Her head with pink and pea-green ribbands dress'd,
Climbs the celestial staircase, and looks down
From out the gilt balcony of the east;
From whence around the seas
The crystal lakes and tufted trees,
The lawns all powder'd o'er with straggling flocks,
The scarce-enlighten'd vales, and high o'er-shadow-

ing rocks.
Enamour'd with her newly-dawning charms,
Old ocean views her with desiring eyes,
And longs once more to clasp her in his arms,
Repenting he had suffer'd her to rise;
Forth from his tumbled bed,
From whence the just had fled,
To the slow, loitering hours he roars amain,
To hasten back the lovely fugitive again.

Parent of life! resplendent lamp of day!
Without whose genial animating ray
Men, beasts, the teeming earth, and rolling seas,
Courts, camps, and mighty cities, in a trice
Must share one common fate, intensely freeze,
And all become one solid mass of ice;
Ambition would be froze, and faction numb,
Speeches congeal'd, and orators be dumb.
Say, what new worlds and systems you survey!
In circling round your planetary way;
What beings Saturn's orb inhabit, tell,
Where cold in everlasting triumph reigns;
Or what their frames, who unconsum'd can dwell
In Mercury's red-hot and molten plains;
Say! for most ardently I wish to know,
What bodies can endure eternal fire, or snow!

And thou, sweet moon! canst tell a softer tale;
To thee the maid, thy likeness, fair and pale,
In passive contemplation of applies,
When parted from her lov'd and loving swain,
And looks on you with tear-besprinkled eyes,
And sighs and looks, and looks and sighs again;

separation from the colonies, offering at the same time to enter into alliance of friendship and treaties of commerce with them, as with any other sovereign independent states. This pamphlet was the foundation of the preceding short poem, written about a year after it, in which the author, with that conciseness as to the matter, and humour in the manner, so peculiar to himself, recommends and supports the Dean's plan.

Say, for thou know'st what constant hearts endure;

And by thy frequent changes teach the cure.

Thy gentle beams the lonely hermit sees,
Gleam through the waving branches of the trees,
Which, high-embow'd ring, shade his gloomy cell,

Where undisturb'd perpetual silence reigns,
Unless the owl is heard, or distant bell,

Or the wind whistling o'er the furzy plains.

How blest to dwell in this sequester'd spot:

Forgetting parliaments; by them forgot!

Now lovely Spring her velvet mantle spreads,

And with green and gold the flow'ry meads;

Fruit-trees in vast white perriwigs are seen,

Resembling much some antiquated beau,

Which north-east winds, that blow so long and keen,

Powder full oft with gentle flakes of snow;

Soft nightingales their tuneful vigils hold,

And sweetly sing and shake—and shake with cold.

Summer succeeds; in ev'nings soft and warm,

Thrice-happy lovers saunter arm and arm;

The gay and fair now quit the dusty town,

O'er turnpike-roads incessant chaises sweep,

And whirling, bear their lovely ladings down;

To brace their nerves beneath the briny deep;

There with success each swain his nymph assails,

As birds, they say, are caught—can we but fast their tails.

Then Autumn, more serene, if not so bright,

Regales at once our palate, and our sight;

With joy the ruddy orchards we behold,

And of its purple clusters rob the vine;

The spacious fields arc cover'd o'er with gold,

Which the glad farmer counts as ready coin;

But disappointment oft his hopes attend—

In tithes and mildews the rich prospect ends.

Last, Winter comes; decrepit, old, and dull;

Yet has his comforts too—his barns are full;

The social converse, circulating glass,

And cheerful fire, are his: to him belong

Th' enlivening dance that warms the chilly lass,

The serious game at whist, and merry song;

Nor wants he beauties—see the sun-beams glow

O'er lakes of crystal ice, and plains of silver snow!

Thus roll the seasons o'er Britannia's land,

But none her freeborn-weather can command;

Seasons unlike to those in servile climes,

Which o'er Hispania's or Italia's plains

Disperse, at regular and stated times,

Successive heat and cold, and drought and rains;

Her's scorning, like her sons, to be controul'd,

Breathe heat in Winter oft, and oft in summer cold.

Hail, Liberty, fair goddess of this isle!

Deign on my verses and on me, to smile;

Like them unfetter'd by the bonds of sense,

Permit us to enjoy life's transient dream,

To live, and write, without the least pretence

To method, order, meaning, plan, or scheme:

And shield us safe beneath thy guardian wings,

From law, religion, ministers, and kings.

WROTE AT THE COUNTESS OF SALISBURY'S ASSEMBLY, 1787.

FROM Salisbury's garter droop'd the historian knows,

Th' illustrious order so entitled rose!

Another Salisbury now our bosoms warms,

With equal elegance and equal charms.

Let then her form, her trophies, and her name,

With justice be consign'd to equal fame;

Let kings with no less pride her garter wear,

Then every noble knight may have a pair.

EPITAPH ON DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON.

HERE lies Sam Johnson:—Reader have a care,

Tread lightly, lest you wake a sleeping bear:

Religious, moral, generous, and humane

He was; but self-sufficient, proud, and vain,

Fond of, and overbearing in dispute,

A Christian, and a scholar—but a brute.

ON A LATE EXECRABLE ATTEMPT ON HIS MAJESTY'S LIFE, 1786.

LONG had our gracious George, with gentle hand,

And love paternal; Britain's sceptre sway'd;

To render this a free and happy land,

Was all for which he wish'd to be obey'd.

With radiance bright, though mild, his virtues shone,

For he of every virtue was possess,

Which can add lustre to a monarch's throne,

Or warm an undissembling patriot's breast.

Pattern of female excellence! his toils

His royal comfort ever sooths and shares;

Imparting sweet domestic bliss, with smiles

That can disperse the heaviest cloud of cares.

Though faction, disappointment's restless child,

Has sometimes dar'd to interrupt his peace;

Yet aw'd at once, and charm'd, when'er he smil'd,

She bad disorder and confusion cease.

Lov'd and ador'd by all, to all a friend,

Caution seem'd needless to protect his life;

Till hell and madness sent abroad a fiend;

And arr'd that fiend with a destructive knife.

But Britain's guardian angel, who still watch'd,

To shield her favourite son from every harm,

Just in th' important moment trembling catch'd,

And turn'd aside th' assassinating arm.

Let then earth, air, and the high-vaulted sky,

With praises, pray'rs, and loud thanksgivings ring,

Joy fire each breast, and sparkle in each eye,

That heav'n has thus preserv'd our country and our king.

THE
OF JOHN LOGAN.

Containing

ODES, SONGS,

TALES,
HYMNS,

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

While youthful Bards their verse inspire
Alone with Fancy's sparkling fire,
They form the rhyme in vain;
Unless, like you, they join the glow,
That melts the soul to gentlest woe,
In soft impassion'd strain.

Then will poetic transports rise,
And mildly brighten in our eyes;
Then tears begin to flow:
And as we own the potent lay,
Our dutious hands will twine the bay
Around the Poet's brow.

THE LIFE OF LOGAN.

Of the personal history of LOGAN there is no written memorial. With talents and virtues that commanded the admiration and esteem of his contemporaries, he has not had the good fortune to find a biographer. Perhaps the time approaches, when the public is to be presented with a full and candid representation of him and his writings. It is expected to accompany an edition of his "Miscellaneous Works," which has been long meditated by his friend and executor the Rev. Dr. Thomas Robertson, minister of Dalmeny, already advantageously known to the public by his "Inquiry into the Fine Arts," "History of Mary Queen of Scots," and other learned and ingenious performances.

In the mean time, the present writer is able to give no other account of this accomplished and amiable man, than such as is supplied by casual information, and a very slight personal knowledge.

John Logan was born at Soutra, in the parish of Fala, in the county of Mid Lothian, about the year 1748. He was the second son of George Logan, a farmer at that place, and afterwards at Gossford, in the parish of Aberlady, in the county of East Lothian. He was a man of strong parts, and equally distinguished for his industry and skill as a farmer, and his integrity and friendliness of disposition as a neighbour. In the latter part of his life he was visited with a disorder that affected his imagination and spirits, and produced an unhappy vacillation of mind, from which he was never perfectly relieved. His mother, Janet Waterston, was the daughter of John Waterston, a small proprietor of land at Howden, in the parish of Stowe, on Gala Water, and remarkable for nothing but the mildness of her piety, the gentleness of her disposition, and the simplicity of her manners. They had two sons, of whom the poet was the youngest. James, the eldest, followed the occupation of his father, which he quitted soon after his death for the profession of physic. He settled in America, and served some time as a surgeon in the American army; and died several years before the poet. Both parents were Seceders, of the class called Burghers.

Early in life he discovered a propensity to learning; and the uncommon proficiency which he made in those branches of education usually taught in remote country villages, determined his parents to educate him for the clerical profession.

After passing through the usual course of school-education in the country, he was sent to the University of Edinburgh, where he attended the several classes of languages, and afterwards applied himself to the several branches of philosophy and theology with remarkable assiduity and success.

Soon after his coming to Edinburgh, he contracted an intimacy with Dr. Robertson, then a student at the university; which improved with their years, undisturbed by any casual mistake, or jealousy on either side. He also became acquainted with Bruce, who was his contemporary at the university. A similarity of taste and of pursuits, soon brought on an intimacy between them, which continued without abatement till the death of Bruce.

He had before this time given evident signs of a propensity to the study of poetry, and discovered an early predilection for that more perfect species of poetical composition, which abounds in fiction and fancy, picturesque description, and romantic imagery. Hence the compositions of Spenser, Milton, Collins, Akenfide, Gray, and Mason, became his favourite study; and from admiring their poetical beauties, the transition was easy to his believing himself capable of producing similar excellencies. He began to write verses early; but unluckily none of his pieces are dated, so that it cannot be said at what precise age he composed them.

After the death of Bruce, he made a selection from his MSS. of such poems as he thought worthy of publication, and gave them to the world in a small 12mo volume, intitled "Poems on Several Occasions, by Michael Bruce," printed at Edinburgh by subscription, in 1770, with a Preface, giving a short account of his life and character, and "some poems wrote by different authors." His share in this miscellany is variously represented by Dr. Robertson, and the friends of Bruce.

While he resided in the country, during the vacation of the college, the reputation of his abilities procured him the notice of Lord Elibank, who then resided at Ballencrief, in the parish of Aberlady; a nobleman, who to a consummate knowledge of polite literature, and other accomplishments becoming his rank, joined an exemplary spirit of true patriotism, whereof that part of the country with which he was connected, still feels the salutary influence.

When he had completed his theological studies, he resided for some time in the family of Mr. Sinclair of Ulbster, as private tutor to his son, the present Sir John Sinclair, Bart. an employment in which he was succeeded by his friend Dr. Robertson. It is unnecessary to add, that the nation is indebted to the laudable patriotism of the pupil of Logan, and of Dr. Robertson, for the "Statistical Account of Scotland," and the establishment of the "Board of Agriculture."

After undergoing the usual trials appointed by the Church, he was admitted a probationer of the Presbytery of Edinburgh, and soon obtained so much distinction as an eloquent and affecting preacher, that he was chosen by the Kirk-Session and Incorporations of South-Leith, to be one of the ministers of that parish, and ordained in 1773.

While he was engaged in the duties of his clerical function, he was not negligent of literature; but continued from time to time to exert his poetical faculties in various kinds of metrical composition, to which nature gave him a strong impulse.

In 1779, he delivered to a voluntary set of pupils, in St. Mary's Chapel, Edinburgh, during the Winter Session of the College, a series of lectures on The Philosophy of History, and met with the countenance, approbation, and friendship of Dr. Robertson, Principal of the University, Dr. Blair, Dr. Ferguson, and other men of genius and learning.

He read the same course of lectures during the Session of the College 1780, with such general approbation, that he was encouraged to become a candidate for the Professorship of Universal History in the University, then vacant by the resignation of John Pringle, Esq. : but this chair having been always filled by an advocate, he was reckoned inadmissible; and Alexander Fraser Tytler, Esq. was elected by the Magistrates and Council of the city, Feb. 16. 1780. upon a lect presented by the Faculty of Advocates.

The reading of his lectures the year following, not meeting with encouragement, he resolved to commit them to the press, and published an analysis of them, so far as they relate to ancient history, under the title of Elements of the Philosophy of History, 8vo, 1781, which was followed by one of the lectures on the Manners and Government of Asia, 8vo, 1782. This excellent production exhibits one of the most successful attempts to apply the science of moral philosophy to the illustration of the history of mankind, that has yet appeared.

The same year, 1781, he published his Poems, 8vo, in which he reprinted, with some alterations, the Ode to the Cuckoo, originally inserted in the collection of poems published under the name of Bruce. A second edition of his poems appeared in 1782.

In 1783, he offered his Runnede, a tragedy, to Mr. Harris, the manager of Covent-Garden Theatre, who put it in rehearsal; but a stop was put to its representation by an injunction from the Chamberlain's Office, on account of the allusions it was supposed to contain to the politics of the time. It was therefore first presented from the press; and notwithstanding the prejudice the world is apt to conceive against dramatic compositions that have not been exhibited on the stage, was very favourably received.

It was afterwards acted at the theatre in Edinburgh, with considerable applause.

The failure of his scheme of giving lectures, and the prohibition of his play, made a deep impression on his spirits, which had always been unequal, and had a considerable effect on his health, which from this time began visibly to decline. The pensive melancholy, which he felt in common with men of genius and feeling, aggravated, perhaps, by a constitutional defect in his nervous system, that inexplicable part of our frame, now became in some degree habitual, and discovered itself in deviations from the modes of the world, and violations of professional decorum, which offended his parishioners, and made it eligible for him to discontinue the exercise of his clerical function.

An agreement to that purpose was completed between him and the Kirk-Session and Incorporations of South Leith, in 1786; in consequence of which Mr. Dickson was appointed his assistant and successor; and he retired upon a moderate annuity.

While this scheme was ripening, he went to London, in October 1785, and was for some time concerned in the "English Review."

In 1788, he published, without his name, a pamphlet intitled A Review of the Principal Charges against Mr. Hastings, 8vo, which attracted the public attention in an uncommon degree. Some passages in it reflecting on the conduct of the managers of the prosecution, being considered by the House of Commons as an infringement on their privileges, the Attorney-General was ordered to prosecute the publisher, Mr. Stockdale, who was tried 9th December 1789, and acquitted.

This was the last publication which he gave to the world. After a lingering indisposition, he died in London, the 28th of December 1788, in the 40th year of his age.

By his will, he appointed Dr. Robertson, and the Rev. Dr. Donald Grant, his joint executors, and left them his books and manuscripts, to be sold for the payment of legacies to the amount of 600 l. which he bequeathed to his friends and relations.

In 1792, a volume of Sermons, selected from his MSS. was published at Edinburgh, in 8vo, under the superintendance of Dr. Blair, Dr. Robertson, and Dr. Hardy, Professor of Ecclesiastical History, in the University. A second volume was published in 8vo, 1791. and his MSS. in the possession of Dr. Robertson, would furnish an additional volume. The third edition of the two volumes was printed in 1793.

The following list of his unpublished works, and uncollected pieces, was communicated to the present writer, in a letter from Dr. Robertson, dated Dalmeny, Sept. 19. 1795.

"Those in verse consist of Electra, a tragedy; the Wedding Day, a tragedy, being a translation into blank verse of the Deserteur of Mercier; the Carthaginian Heroine, a tragedy, but of which there is only the first act finished; and about half-a-dozen of short lyric poems. Those in prose consist of eight numbers of an intended periodical paper, called the Guardian. The subject of one of the numbers is a capital essay on the genius and writings of Addison. Besides these, I have also in my possession Mr. Logan's MS. Lectures on Roman History, about twenty-five in number, with six or seven introductory ones to his Course of Lectures on Universal History. His Lectures on Roman History begin with Romulus, and come down to the fall of the empire, and the establishment of the feudal system.

"In the small volume of poems published under the title of "Poems by Michael Bruce," the following were composed by Mr. Logan: Damon, Menalcas, and Melibæus; Pastoral Song, to the tune of the "Yellow-Hair'd Laddie;" Eclogue in the manner of Ossian; Ode to a Fountain; two Danish Odes; Chorus of "Anacreontic to a Wasp;" the tale of Levina (278 lines), in the poem of "Lochleven;" Ode to Paoli; Ode to the Cuckoo."

It is of importance to the reputation of Bruce, to subjoin the following account of his share in the volume of poems published under his name, given by his friend Mr. David Pearson, in a letter to the present writer, dated, Little Balgedie, near Kinrosswood, Aug. 29. 1795.

"I need not inform you concerning the bad treatment that his [Bruce's] poems met with from the Rev. Mr. Logan, when he received from his father the whole of his manuscripts, published only his own pleasure, and kept back those poems that his friends would most gladly have embraced; and since published many of them in his own name. The Cuckoo and the Hymns in the end of Logan's book, are assuredly Mr. Bruce's productions."

The facts stated in Mr. Pearson's letter are more circumstantially related in the following extract of a letter to the present writer, from Mr. John Birrel, dated Kinrosswood, Aug. 31. 1795. The veneration with which this worthy and intelligent man regards the memory of Bruce, and the enthusiasm with which he cultivates his favourite studies, are only less meritorious than his benevolent exertions to relieve the necessities, and sooth the afflictions of his aged mother, which afford an example worthy the imitation of persons of superior rank and education.

"Some time before the poet's father died, he delivered the book containing the first draught of some of Michael's poems, his sermons, and other papers, into my hand, desiring I would keep them, saying, "I know of none to whom I would rather give them than you, for you mind me more of my Michael than any body;" a compliment which I never deserved, and which in modesty I should conceal. Some years after I entered upon terms with Mr. Morison of Perth, to sell the MSS. for the benefit of auld Annie [the poet's mother], who was in very destitute circumstances. But in the mean time, Dr. Baird wrote for them, with a view to republish Michael's poems, with any others that could be procured of his. I sent them to him gladly, hoping soon to see the whole in print, and the old woman decently provided for in consequence. The finished book of Michael's poems was given to Mr. Logan, who never returned them. Many a time, with tears trickling down his cheeks, has old Alexander told me how much he was disappointed in Logan, who came unexpectedly and got all the papers, letters, and the books away, without giving him time to take a note of the titles, or getting a receipt for the papers, &c. After the publication, he went over to Edinburgh to recover them. Mr. Logan desired him to call again, and they would be ready. He did so; but he was gone out, and no message left. He saw Mr. Logan on the street, who told him that he had left the poems with the servants, but that, as he did not get them, he was afraid the servants had taken them, and singled fowls with them.—David Pearson," he adds in another place, "does not remember of seeing the Ode to the Fountain, The Vernal Ode, Ode to Paoli, Chorus of Elysian Bards, or the Danish Odes, until he saw them in print. But the rest of the publication he decidedly ascribes to Michael, and in a most particular manner the Cuckoo, Salgar and Morna, and the other Eclogue."

Such are the facts which the present writer esteems it a part of his duty to state, as they have been communicated to him by the respective friends of Logan and Bruce. He shall not intrude upon the admirers of these two poets any opinion of his own concerning the claims of their respective friends, since his only intention is to enable them, from a consideration of the facts, to form their own conclusions; leaving them still open to the impression of any additional, or more satisfactory evidence that may hereafter arise.

It must not be concealed, that an unauthorized report is wandering about in the literary circles of Edinburgh, which ascribes the first sketch of the Ode to the Cuckoo to Bruce, and the composition, as it now stands, to Logan, who, it is said, improved and embellished it so much, as to make it in a great measure his own. On the other hand, his cousin Mrs. Hutchison, wife of Mr. John Hutchison, merchant in Edinburgh, informs the present writer that she saw the Ode in Logan's hand-writing before it was printed. If the testimonies of Dr. Robertson and Mrs. Hutchison went the length of establishing the existence of the Ode in Logan's hand-writing in Bruce's lifetime, or before his MSS. came into Logan's possession, they might be considered as decisive of the controversy. The suppression of Bruce's MSS. it must be owned, is a circumstance unfavourable to the pretensions of Logan.

No new edition of his Poems has been called for since his death. They are now, reprinted from the edition 1782, received, for the first time, into a collection of classical English poetry. In this edition the present writer has not ventured, upon the authority of Dr. Robertson, to give him the pieces ascribed to him in Bruce's "Poems," which he did not think proper to claim himself; neither has he presumed, upon the authority of Mr. Pearson, to deprive him of the Ode to the Cuckoo, to which he has put his name. In justice to both poets, he has followed the collection of their poems, printed under their respective names, in the present edition, distinguishing the pieces which have been claimed for the one or the other by their respective friends.

Logan was a man of very amiable dispositions, and of very agreeable manners. He loved and esteemed his friends, and was by them loved and esteemed. He was respected by the world as a man of superior talents, learning, and virtue. Genius, a sufficient stock of professional erudition, and a happy facility of communication, distinguished him as a public instructor. Failings he had undoubtedly; many of his friends will remember them; but he had no failings which did not proceed from an unhappy constitutional temperament. In feeling minds passions naturally burn with too much vehemence. His sensibility was too ardent, his passions were too easily moved. His spirits were always much elated, or much depressed. After the failure of his schemes of literary ambition, the frequency and duration of his periods of melancholy became more remarkable. His health continually declined. He grew burdensome to himself, and with the usual weakness of men so diseased, eagerly snatched that temporary relief which the bottle supplies; a weakness which, in his unhappy circumstances, reflects no dishonour on his memory, and cannot be remembered, but with pity and sadness.

As an author, Logan has distinguished himself as an historian, a divine and a poet.

His Elements of the Philosophy of History, display the deep penetration, comprehensive views, and animated composition, which distinguished his course of "Lectures on Ancient and Modern History." He appears from these outlines, to have taken a very comprehensive and philosophical survey of the history of mankind. Though they were particularly intended for his pupils, they may be of use to readers of history in general, in leading them to contemplate events in their connection with each other, and in relation to their causes, and in suggesting hints of speculation and inquiry. In this excellent production, as well as in his Dissertation on Asia, he shows himself to be both a man of erudition and a philosopher. But, besides this, we discover in them some of the principal qualifications of a poet, a vein of imagery and invention, and the true flame of genius.

It is no unpleasant reflection, to be able to find so many elegant writers of sermons among the Scottish preachers; in the first rank of which Logan stands very high. Leechman, Craig, Farquhar, Walker, Logan, Drysdale, Gerard, Lamont, Chartres, and Blair, are such writers of sermons, as any country might with justice be proud of. It is remarkable, that an art which has been so long and so constantly practised as that of preaching, should hitherto have furnished so very few models of eloquence. It was in France that the first attempts appear to have been made towards any improvement in this species of composition. In the reign of Lewis XIV. the eloquence of the pulpit was carried to a perfection which has not since been exceeded by the writers of that or any other country. The first who distinguished themselves in France by their eloquence in preaching, were Bossuet, Flechier, and Bourdaloue; and the two former were surpassed by the latter, who united with considerable warmth, and remarkable correctness and purity of expression, great force and strength of reasoning. These were followed by Massillon, who exceeded all his predecessors, and has afforded the most perfect models of pulpit-eloquence that have yet appeared in any country. Bourdaloue, nervous in his style, simple in his expression, and acute in his reasoning, aims at convincing the understanding, rather than at touching the heart. Massillon, not less nervous in his style, but more acute in his expression, expresses himself in a language dictated by the richest imagination and the most delicate taste; and, addressing himself to the heart, hurries us along with a never-failing torrent of the warmest and most passionate eloquence.

In England the art of preaching has made a less distinguished progress, and is yet far from having arrived at that degree of perfection which the French have attained. Before the Restoration, there is hardly a preacher whose sermons deserve to be read. The spirit of religious controversy gave them some warmth; but, utterly void of taste, and destitute of elegance of expression, they abound in cold divisions and scholastic jargon. Then appeared Sanderfon and Barrow, who, deviating from the involved method of their predecessors, introduced a more less formal, though not quite pure from the parade of artificial composition. In that reign, Scott, diffuse, figurative, serious, and fervent, formed a manner peculiar to himself, which, without an equal portion of congenial talents, it was impossible to imitate. About the end of the last, and the beginning of the present century, some improvements were made. In the sermons of Tillotson there is remarkable good sense, accompanied with simplicity, and considerable purity of expression. Clarke pondered his subjects with patience, compared the Bible carefully with itself, argued coolly, decided with caution, wrote with precision, and seldom admitted an improper word, or gave it a wrong position; but he is generally dry and uninteresting. Butler's sermons are for the most part upon very abstruse metaphysical points, little suited to the pulpit, or to the generality of readers. In the sermons of Sead there is sound and clear reasoning; the expression is lively and elegant, and the manner warm and interesting; but his style is often too artificial, as opposed to natural. The sermons of Hoadly, Sherlock, Secker, Jortin, and many others, though justly celebrated for their sound and clear reasoning, and nervous expression, yet hardly ever afford any examples of an animated and passionate eloquence. Atterbury is almost the only English preacher who has attained any remarkable elegance, or who approaches in any degree to the eloquence of the French. His style is more nervous, his expression more elegant, and his manner more warm and affecting than almost any of the English preachers; but he is sometimes careless and incorrect, and sometimes even flat and insipid.

If the English preachers have fallen short of the eloquence of the French, those of Scotland have been still farther behind. The genius of presbytery, and the manners of the people, were unfavourable to a refined and polished eloquence. Of late, however, together with other improvements, good sense, elegance, and correctness, have come to be attempted in the discourses from the pulpit; and some preachers have appeared, who, in sound and dispassionate reasoning, in order and clearness, and even in purity and elegance of expression, have rivalled the most celebrated preachers of our neighbouring country. The first who appears to have distinguished himself in Scotland, by the good sense, sound reasoning, and manly simplicity of his pulpit compositions, was Dr. Leechman. Some improvements were made by succeeding preachers, and sermons became gradually more fashionable. Those of Mr. Walker, as the productions of taste and genius, exercised on important subjects, were deservedly commended. But the polish of Dr. Blair, which gave elegance to sentiments not too profound for common comprehension, nor too obvious to be uninteresting, was wanting to render this species of composition popular and generally pleasing. By employing the utmost exertions of a vigorous mind, and of patient study, to select the best ideas, and to prune off every superfluous thought, by taking pains to embellish them by all the beauties of language and elegant expression, and by repeatedly examining, with the severity of an enlightened critic, every sentence, and erasing every harsh and uncouth phrase, he has produced the most elegant models of pulpit-composition that has yet appeared in these kingdoms. In consequence of Dr. Johnson's approbation, one hundred pounds were given for the first volume of his sermons; which, on account of the extensive sale, the proprietors doubled. They gave him 300*l.* for the second, and 600*l.* for each of the two succeeding volumes; which was more than ever a work of equal bulk procured from booksellers; but they increased the sale of the former volumes.

The Sermons of Logan, though not so exquisitely polished as those of Dr. Blair, possess in a higher degree the animated and passionate eloquence of Massillon and Atterbury. His composition is everywhere excellent. Its leading characteristics are strength, elegance, and simplicity. The formation of his sentences appears the most inartificial, though at the same time it will be found to be strictly correct. But the manner, amidst all its beauties, is on the first perusal lost in the enjoyment the reader feels from the sentiment. Devotional and solemn subjects peculiarly accord with his feelings and genius. In exhibiting deep and solemn views of human life, his sentiments are bold and varied, and his imagination teems with the most soothing and elevated figures. His knowledge of poetry in general, and his relish for its highest beauties, are every where conspicuous. Topics such as these, which we have seen illustrated before a thousand times, are made to pass before the mind in the most impressive and affecting manner; and for a moment we deceive ourselves into a belief that the subjects themselves must be new to us. But it appears to have been no part of his plan, to seek out for new subjects of preaching, or to excite his ingenuity in exhibiting new views of moral and religious topics. To embellish the most common subjects, which are certainly the most proper and useful, with new ornaments; to persuade by a more forcible and more captivating illustration; to unite the beauties of elegant diction, and the splendour of fine imagery; in this lay his chief exertions, and here rests his chief praise. The fourth, ninth, and eleventh discourses, in the first volume, remind us that the Sermons are posthumous, and many of them, at least, not intended for publication. The first head of the fourth sermon, and three short passages in the ninth, are almost literal transcripts from Seed's sermon "On the Path of the Just;" and almost the one-half of the eleventh is taken from Seed's sermon on "Charity." It is evident that he was indolent at times, and did not write up to his powers, contenting himself with producing what was at hand, rather than seeking what was best, and what he could have given. It is also evident that what is his own, is superior to what is foreign, and that he has improved what he has adopted. The Prayers and Addresses to communicants, in the celebration of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the form in which that solemn ordinance is generally administered in the present times in Scotland, are distinguished compositions, and highly devotional.

As a poet, Logan appears to no less advantage than in those departments of literature in which we have surveyed him. He is characterised by that pregnancy of invention, that exquisite sensibility, and that genuine enthusiasm, which are the invariable sanctions bestowed by nature on every true poet. His poems are the productions of a mind tremblingly alive to those fine impulses of passion which form the soul of poetic composition, and familiarised to all the most delicate graces of the poetic art. He discovers taste and delicacy of sentiment, joined to a great share of poetical imagination. His thoughts are always just, and often striking. His images are pleasing and picturesque, and his language is for the most part correct and harmonious. Sprightly subjects he treats with ease; in the pathetic and solemn he is a master. The pensiveness of his disposition, though unfortunate for himself, enriched his poetical vein, and shaded his compositions with a tender melancholy. Melpomene, Erato, and Euterpe, were his favourite muses.

His Runnabede is the greatest effort of his genius. The title is taken from the place where the famous Magna Charta was obtained. The story is founded on the contest between King John and his barons. The under-plot is borrowed, without any acknowledgment, from the Tancrede of Voltaire. This is evident from the following list of correspondent characters: Tancrede, Elvina, Orbasan, Arden, Argive, Albemarle, Aldamon, Edgar, Amenaide, Elvina, the Sultan, and the Dauphin. It is not, however, a mere translation of the Tancrede. It has variations in the circumstances, and variations in the conduct of the story. The savage temper of Amenaide is properly softened in Elvina; an unnatural connection is formed between the love-tale and the contest of the barons with King John; the story terminates happily, and the performance is made more dramatical. The subject is announced in the Prologue, in an elevated tone.

A nameless youth beheld with noble rage
 One subject still a stranger to the stage;
 A name that's music to the British ear!
 A name that's worshipp'd in the British sphere!
 Fair Liberty, the goddess of the isle,
 Who blesses England with a guardian smile.

The play is intended, to awaken sentiments of liberty and public spirit in the hearts of his countrymen. But Liberty is by no means a stranger to the stage. It makes the principal subject of the "Cato" of Addison, and has been brought forward by Voltaire in his "Brutus," and "Death of Cæsar," to omit a crowd of less illustrious examples. The stories which form the most striking exemplification of moral or political heroism, the death of Socrates, or the catastrophe of Cato, though inexpressibly beautiful and engaging in themselves, are by no means calculated to succeed upon the theatre. This has been imputed to the necessity of introducing the passion of love, in order to make a tragedy interesting. But this is by no means the case. The tragedies of Shakspeare, the Atbalie, the Merope, and the Orphelin de la Chine, of the French theatre, have been successful without this subsidiary aid. In reality, nothing more is requisite than an event full of anxiety and uncertainty, and subject to the greatest and most unexpected changes of fortune. Addison found the inability of supporting the representation of five acts, merely by the patriotism of Cato. Logan has also found the necessity of recurring to the aid of an improbable love-tale. Exclusive of the injudiciousness of this circumstance, it must be allowed to be a very interesting and pathetic performance. The diction is nervous and elegant; though it is sometimes deficient in grace, and sometimes chargeable with redundancy and amplification. It has many passages highly dramatic and highly poetical. It has a beauty directly the reverse of amplification. He not unfrequently concentrates a thought which an unskilful poet would have dilated, in a very few words, and by that means gives it a high degree of force and pathos. The whole performance is animated with the noblest enthusiasm for liberty, and is stamped with the peculiar characters of genius. The spirited address to King John, which is put into the mouth of Elvina, asserting the natural rights of mankind, in opposition to tyranny and oppression, is the most singular passage in the play. But it is difficult to interest the generality of readers in sentiments of public virtue, which are in a great measure peculiar to minds of a superior order.

In his Odes he is rather characterised by the sprightly and tender, than by the sublime; yet his muse preserves her dignity, and retains that pleasing wildness, that exursive humour, which necessarily enter into the genius of lyric poetry. She discovers not by the barbarity of her accent, and the harshness of her numbers, that she has acquired her first ideas of harmony and modulation north of the Tweed. The numbers are easy, the language is elegant, and the stanzas are regular throughout. The regular measure is always preferable to loose and irregular numbers, while the length and variety of the stanza prevent the disgust of monotony; because in poetry, as in music, it is necessary that there should be a proportion of parts, so that the ear should be accustomed with the modulation. The selection of his subjects displays at once the delicacy of his taste, and the sensibility of his heart.

The Ode to the Cuckoo, which he is supposed to have written, and certainly improved, is distinguished by the delicate graces of simplicity and tenderness, in the highest degree. The hint of this exquisite performance was probably taken from "A Song to the Cuckoo," the earliest specimen of songwriting extant in our language; but the train of the thoughts is purely original. His Ode to Women is sprightly and poetical, but inclines more to the beautiful than to the sublime species of lyric composition. It is more in the manner of Anacreon than Pindar. We cannot, however, admit that any modern breathes the true spirit of Anacreon. There is, in the found of the Teian lyre, an irresistible and ineffable magic, when struck by the hand of its original master, which no other touch can extort. His Odes written in Spring and Autumn, and his other descriptive and allegorical performances, are not destitute of pathetic sentiment and agreeable description; but their spirit and genius are of a more abstracted kind, and will be most admired by those few congenial minds, who can discern and feel the finer influences of fancy, who can enjoy the enthusiasm of visionary communications, and aspire to the regions of ideal existence. But, abstracted from all external praise, there is a charm in the indulgence of poetic fancy; and in this respect poetry, like virtue, is its own reward.

Of his Lovers and Tale the sentiments are delicate and noble, and the narration is animated and agreeable. He judiciously avoids that minuteness, which anticipates every reflection of the reader, and supports attention without an affectation of brilliancy, and without wandering from his purpose, like an ordinary artist, in search of flowers and embellishment. He well knew that poetry, when it fails to interest the affections, is no longer the animated language of nature. His Brass of Tarrow is an imitation of Hamilton's beautiful ballad of that name; but his story of the bereaved bride surpasses the original. Ovid, Propertius, and Tibullus, never composed a more affecting and impassioned elegy. The poem on Hero and Leander cannot boast a stronger infusion of the soft and tender, of energy and pathos.

His Hymns may challenge a comparison with the most popular compositions of that kind in our language; but they add little to his poetical reputation. Most of them were originally printed, with some variations, in the collection of "Translations and Paraphrases of Sacred Scripture," 1781, used in public worship in Scotland. It appears from a copy of the "Paraphrases, &c." in the possession of Dr. Robertson, in which the several authors are distinguished by Logan, that he is the most considerable, as well as the most poetical contributor to that collection of sacred poems. In majesty and sublimity of sentiment, grandeur and solemnity of description, and beauty and simplicity of expression, he maintains a distinguished superiority over his competitors. His version of Genesis xxvii. 20—22. has exceeding merit. If his efforts to smooth the path of duty by the powers of imagination, and to win our attention to the precepts of life by ornament and harmony, are sometimes unsuccessful, his motives at least deserve applause. He is even entitled to some praise, for having done better than others, what no versifier of the sacred writings has done well. "Poetical devotion," to use the emphatical words of Dr. Johnson, in his Life of Waller, "cannot often please. Contemplative piety, or the intercourse between God and the human soul, cannot be poetical. Man, admitted to implore the mercy of his Creator, and plead the merits of his Redeemer, is already in a higher state than poetry can confer. Whatever is great, desirable, or tremendous, is comprised in the name of the Supreme Being. Omnipotence cannot be exalted, Infinity cannot be amplified, Perfection cannot be improved. Of sentiments purely religious, it will be generally found that the most simple expression is the most sublime. Poetry loses its lustre and its power, because it is applied to the decoration of something more excellent than itself. The ideas of Christian theology are too simple for eloquence, too sacred for fiction, and too majestic for ornament; to recommend them by tropes and figures, is to magnify by a concave mirror the sidereal hemisphere." But besides this want of conformity and assimilation between piety and poetry, there is another reason why the versification of the sacred writings should not be attended with success; the want of conformity and assimilation between language and sentiment. Nothing can be more striking and opposite than the different genius of the English and the Hebrew poetry. The Eastern Muse is daring, fervent, and unsubdued in her progress; snatching at figures remote in their nature and disposition, frequently inattentive to consistency and connection, desultory in sentiment, and abrupt in expression. These qualities are utterly unfit for the regular and limited walks of rhyme. The songs of Zion will no more bend to the genius of a strange language, than their singers would of old to the commands of their conquerors, when called upon to sing them in a strange land.

THE WORKS OF LOGAN.

P O E M S.

ODE TO THE CUCKOO.

HAIL, beauteous stranger of the grove!
Thou messenger of Spring!
Now Heaven repairs thy rural seat,
And woods thy welcome sing.

What time the daisy decks the green,
Thy certain voice we hear;
Hast thou a star to guide thy path,
Or mark the rolling year?

Delightful visitant! with thee
I hail the time of flowers,
And hear the sound of music sweet
From birds among the bowers.

The school-boy, wandering through the wood
To pull the primrose gay,
Starts, the new voice of Spring to hear,
And imitates thy lay.

What time the pea puts on the bloom
Thou fliest thy vocal vale,
An annual guest in other lands,
Another Spring to hail.

Sweet bird! thy bower is ever green,
Thy sky is ever clear;
Thou hast no sorrow in thy song,
No winter in thy year!

O could I fly, I'd fly with thee!
We'd make, with joyful wing,
Our annual visit o'er the globe,
Companions of the Spring.

SONG.

THE BRAES OF YARROW.

" Thy braes were bonny, Yarrow stream!
" When first on them I met my lover;
" Thy braes how dreary, Yarrow stream!
" When now thy waves his body cover!
" For ever now, O Yarrow stream!
" Thou art to me a stream of sorrow;

" For never on thy banks shall I
" Behold my love, the flower of Yarrow.
" He promised me a milk-white steed,
" To bear me to his father's bowers;
" He promised me a little page,
" To 'squire me to his father's towers;
" He promised me a wedding-ring,—
" The wedding-day was fix'd to-morrow;
" Now he is wedded to his grave,
" Alas, his watery grave in Yarrow!
" Sweet were her words when last we met;
" My passion I as freely told him!
" Clasp'd in his arms, I little thought
" That I should never more behold him!
" Scarce was he gone, I saw his ghost;
" It vanish'd with a shriek of sorrow;
" Thrice did the water-wraith ascend,
" And gave a doleful groan through Yarrow.
" His mother from the window look'd;
" With all the longing of a mother;
" His little sister weeping walk'd
" The green-wood path to meet her brother;
" They fought him east, they fought him west,
" They fought him all the forest thorough;
" They only saw the cloud of night,
" They only heard the roar of Yarrow.
" No longer from thy window look,
" Thou hast no son, thou tender mother!
" No longer walk, thou lovely maid!
" Alas, thou hast no more a brother!
" No longer seek him east or west,
" And search no more the forest thorough;
" For, wandering in the night so dark,
" He fell a lifeless corse in Yarrow.
" The tear shall never leave my cheek,
" No other youth shall be my marrow;
" I'll seek thy body in the stream,
" And then with thee I'll sleep in Yarrow."
The tear did never leave her cheek,
No other youth became her marrow;
She found his body in the stream,
And now with him she sleeps in Yarrow.

ODE

ON THE DEATH OF A YOUNG LADY.

The peace of Heaven attend thy shade,
My early friend, my favourite maid!
When life was new, companions gay,
We hail'd the morning of our day.

Ah, with what joy did I behold
The flower of beauty fair unfold!
And fear'd no storm to blast thy bloom,
Or bring thee to an early tomb!

Untimely gone! for ever fled
The roses of the cheek so red;
Th' affection warm, the temper mild,
The sweetness that in sorrow smil'd.

Alas! the cheek where beauty glow'd,
The heart where goodness overflow'd,
A clod amid the valley lies,
And "dust to dust" the mourner cries.

O from thy kindred early torn,
And to thy grave untimely borne!
Vanish'd for ever from my view,
Thou sister of my soul, adieu!

Fair with my first ideas twin'd,
Thine image oft will meet my mind;
And, while remembrance brings thee near,
Affection sad will drop a tear.

How oft does sorrow bend thy head,
Before we dwell among the dead!
Scarce in the years of manly prime,
I've often wept the wrecks of time.

What tragic tears bedew the eye!
What deaths we suffer ere we die!
Our broken friendships we deplore,
And loves of youth that are no more!

No after-friendship e'er can raise
Th' endearments of our early days;
And ne'er the heart such fondness prove,
As when it first began to love.

Affection dies, a vernal flower;
And love, the blossom of an hour;
The spring of fancy cares controul,
And mar the beauty of the soul.

Vers'd in the commerce of deceit,
How soon the heart begins to beat!
The blood runs cold at int'rest's call:—
They look with equal eyes on all.

Then lovely nature is expell'd,
And friendship is romantic held;
Then prudence comes with hundred eyes:—
The veil is rent: the vision flies.

The dear illusions will not last;
The era of enchantment's past;
The wild romance of life is done;
The real history is begun.

The follies of the soul are o'er,
The feast of fancy is no more;
And ill the banquet is supply'd
By form, by gravity, by pride.

Ye gods! whatever ye withhold,
Let my affections ne'er grow old;
Ne'er may the human glow depart,
Nor nature yield to frigid art!

Still may the generous bosom burn,
Though doom'd to bleed o'er beauty's urn;
And still the friendly face appear,
Though moisten'd with a tender tear!

ODE TO WOMEN.

YE virgins! fond to be admir'd,
With mighty rage of conquest fir'd,
And universal sway;
Who heave th' uncover'd bosom high,
And roll a fond, inviting eye,
On all the circle gay!

You miss the fine and secret art
To win the cattle of the heart,
For which you all contend;
The coxcomb tribe may crowd your train,
But you will never, never gain
A lover, or a friend.

If this your passion, this your praise,
To shine, to dazzle, and to blaze,
You may be call'd divine:
But not a youth beneath the sky
Will say in secret, with a sigh,
"O were that maiden mine!"

You marshal, brilliant, from the box,
Fans, feathers, diamonds, castled locks,
Your magazine of arms;
But 'tis the sweet sequester'd walk,
The whispering hour, the tender talk,
That gives your genuine charms.

The nymph-like robe, the natural grace,
The smile, the native of the face,
Refinement without art;
The eye where pure affection beams,
The tear from tenderness that streams,
The accents of the heart;

The trembling frame, the living cheek,
Where, like the morning, blushes break
To crimson o'er the breast;
The look where sentiment is seen,
Fine passions moving o'er the mien,
And all the soul exprest;

Your beauties these: with these you shine,
And reign on high by right divine,
The sovereigns of the world;
Then to your court the nations flow;
The muse with flowers the path will strew,
Where Venus' car is hurl'd.

From dazzling deluges of snow,
From summer noon's meridian glow,
We turn our aching eye,
To nature's robe of vernal green,
To the blue curtain all serene,
Of an Autumnal sky.

The favourite tree of beauty's queen,
Behold the myrtle's modest green,
The virgin of the grove!

Soft from the circlet of her star,
The tender turtles draw the car
Of Venus and of Love.

The growing charm invites the eye;
See morning gradual paint the sky
With purple and with gold!
See Spring approach with sweet delay!
See rosebuds open to the ray,
And leaf by leaf unfold!

We love th' alluring line of grace,
That leads the eye a wanton chace,
And lets the fancy rove;
The walk of beauty ever bends,
And still begins, but never ends,
The labyrinth of love.

At times, to veil, is to reveal,
And to display, is to conceal;
Mysterious are your laws!
The vision's finer than the view;
Her landscape nature never drew
So fair as fancy draws.

A beauty, carelessly betray'd,
Enamours more, than if display'd
All woman's charms were given;
And, o'er the bosom's vestal white,
The gauze appears a robe of light,
That veils, yet opens, Heav'n.

See virgin Eve, with graces bland,
Fresh blooming from her Maker's hand,
In orient beauty beam!
Fair on the river-margin laid,
She knew not that her image made
The angel in the stream.

Still ancient Eden blooms your own;
But artless innocence alone
Secures the heavenly post;
For if, beneath an angel's mien,
The serpent's tortuous train is seen,
Our Paradise is lost.

O nature, nature, thine the charm!
Thy colours woo, thy features warm,
Thy accents win the heart!
Parisian paint of every kind,
That stains the body or the mind,
Proclaims the harlot's art.

The midnight minstrel of the grove,
Who still renews the hymn of love,
And woos the wood to hear;
Knows not the sweetness of his strain,
Nor that, above the tuneful train,
He charms the lover's ear.

The zone of Venus, heavenly-fine,
Is nature's handy-work divine,
And not the web of art;
And they who wear it never know
To what enchanting charm they owe
The empire of the heart.

OSSIAN'S HYMN TO THE SUN.

O THOU whose beams the sea-girt earth array,
King of the sky, and father of the day!

O fun! what fountain, hid from human eyes,
Supplies thy circle round the radiant skies,
For ever burning and for ever bright,
With heaven's pure fire, and everlasting light?
What awful beauty in thy face appears!
Immortal youth, beyond the power of years!

When gloomy darkness to thy reign resigns,
And from the gates of morn thy glory shines,
The conscious stars are pent to sudden flight,
And all the planets hide their heads in night;
The queen of heaven forsakes th' ethereal plain,
To sink inglorious in the western main.
The clouds refulgent deck thy golden throne,
High in the heavens, immortal and alone!
Who can abide the brightness of thy face!
Or who attend thee in thy rapid race?
The mountain-oaks, like their own leaves, decay;

Themselves the mountains wear with age away;
The boundless main that rolls from land to land,
Lessens at times, and leaves a waste of sand;
The silver moon, refulgent lamp of night,
Is lost in heaven, and emptied of her light:
But thou for ever shalt endure the fame,
Thy light eternal, and unspent thy flame.

When tempests with their train impend on high,
Darken the day, and load the labouring sky;
When heaven's wide convex glows with lightnings dire,
All ether flaming, and all earth on fire;
When loud and long the deep-mouth'd thunder rolls,
And peals on peals redoubled rend the poles;
If from the opening clouds thy form appears,
Her wonted charm the face of nature wears;
Thy beauteous orb restores departed day,
Looks from the sky, and laughs the storm away.

ODE WRITTEN IN SPRING.

No longer hoary winter reigns,
No longer binds the streams in chains,
Or heaps with snow the meads;
Array'd with robe of rainbow-dye,
At last the Spring appears on high,
And, smiling over earth and sky,
Her new creation leads.

The snows confess a warmer ray,
The loosen'd streamlet loves to stray,
And echo down the dale;
The hills uplift their summits green,
The vales more verdant spread between,
The cuckoo in the wood unseen
Coos ceaseless to the gale.

The rainbow arching woos the eye
With all the colours of the sky,
With all the pride of Spring;
Now Heaven descends in funny showers,
The sudden fields put on the flowers,
The green leaves wave upon the bowers,
And birds begin to sing.

The cattle wander in the wood,
And find the wonted verdant food,
Beside the well-known rills;
Blithe in the sun the shepherd swain

Like Pan attunes the past'ral strain,
While many echoes send again
The music of the hills.

At eve, the primrose path along,
The milkmaid shortens with a song
Her solitary way;
She sees the fairies, with their queen,
Trip hand-in-hand the circled green,
And hears them raise at times, unseen,
The ear-inchanting lay.

Maria, come! Now let us rove,
Now gather garlands in the grove,
Of every new-sprung flower:
We'll hear the warblings of the wood,
We'll trace the windings of the flood;
O come thou, fairer than the bud
Unfolding in a shower!

Fair as the lily of the vale,
That gives its bosom to the gale,
And opens in the sun;
And sweeter than thy favourite dove,
The Venus of the vernal grove,
Announcing to the choirs of love
Their time of bliss begun.

Now, now, thy spring of life appears;
Fair in the morning of thy years,
And May of beauty crown'd:
Now vernal visions meet thine eyes,
Poetic dreams to fancy rise,
And brighter days in better skies;—
Elysium blooms around.

Now, now's the morning of thy day;
But, ah! the morning flies away,
And youth is on the wing;
'Tis nature's voice, "O pull the rose,
" Now while the bud in beauty blows,
" Now while the opening leaves disclose
" The incense of the Spring!"

What youth, high-favour'd of the skies,
What youth shall win the brightest prize
That nature has in store?
Whose conscious eyes shall meet with thine;
Whose arms thy yielding waste entwine;
Who, ravish'd with thy charms divine,
Requires of Heaven no more!

Not happier the primæval pair,
When new-made earth, supremely fair,
Smiled on her virgin Spring;
When all was fair to God's own eye,
When stars consenting fung on high,
And all Heaven's chorus made the sky
With hallelujahs ring.

Devoted to the muses' choir,
I tune the Caledonian lyre
To themes of high renown:—
No other theme than you I'll choose,
Than you invoke no other muse:
Nor will that gentle hand refuse
Thy bard with bays to crown.

Where hills by storied streams ascend,
My dreams and waking wishes tend
Poetic ease to woo;

Where fairy fingers curl the grove,
Where Grecian spirits round me rove,
Alone enamour'd with the love
Of nature and of you!

SONG.

The day is departed, and round from the cloud
The moon in her beauty appears;
The voice of the nightingale warbles aloud
The music of love in our ears:
Maria, appear! now the season so sweet
With the beat of the heart is in tune;
The time is so tender for lovers to meet
Alone by the light of the moon.

I cannot when present unfold what I feel,
I sigh—Can a lover do more?
Her name to the shepherds I never reveal,
Yet I think of her all the day o'er.
Maria, my love! Do you long for the grove?
Do you sigh for an interview soon?
Does e'er a kind thought run on me as you rove
Alone by the light of the moon?

Your name from the shepherds whenever I hear,
My bosom is all in a glow;
Your voice when it vibrates so sweet through mine ear,
My heart thrills—my eyes overflow.
Ye powers of the sky, will your bounty divine
Indulge a fond lover his boon?
Shall heart spring to heart, and Maria be mine,
Alone by the light of the moon?

ODE TO SLEEP.

In vain I court till dawning light,
The coy divinity of night;
Refrels from side to side I turn,
Arise, ye musings of the morn!

Oh, Sleep! though banish'd from those eyes,
In visions fair to Delia rise;
And o'er a dearer form diffuse
Thy healing balm, thy lenient dews.

Blest be her night as infants rest,
Lull'd on the fond maternal breast,
Who sweetly-playful smiles in sleep,
Nor knows that he is born to weep.

Remove the terrors of the night,
The phantoms-forms of wild affright,
The shrieks from precipice or flood,
And starting scene that swims with blood.

Lead her aloft to blooming bowers,
And beds of amaranthine flowers,
And golden skies, and glittering streams,
That paint the paradise of dreams.

Venus! present a lover near,
And gently whisper in her ear
His woes, who, lonely and forlorn,
Counts the slow clock from night till morn.

Ah! let no portion of my pain,
Save just a tender trace, remain;
Asleep consenting to be kind,
And wake with Daphnis in her mind.

ODE TO A YOUNG LADY.

MARIA bright with beauty's glow,
In conscious gaiety you go
The pride of all the park:
Attracted groupes in silence gaze,
And soft behind you hear the praise
And whisper of the spark.

In fancy's airy chariot whirl'd,
You make the circle of the world,
And dance a dizzy round;
The maids and kindling youths behold
You triumph o'er the envious old,
The queen of beauty crown'd.

Where'er the beams of fortune blaze,
Or fashion's whispering zephyr plays,
The insect tribe attends;
Gay-glittering through a summer's day,
The silken myriads melt away
Before a sun descends.

Divorc'd from elegant delight,
The vulgar Venus holds her night
An alien to the skies;
Her bosom breathes no finer fire,
No radiance of divine desire
Illumes responsive eyes.

Gods! shall a fordid son of earth
Enfold a form of heavenly birth,
And ravish joys divine?
An angel blest unconscious arms?
The circle of surrender'd charms
Unhallowed hands entwine?

The absent day; the broken dream;
The vision wild; the sudden scream;
Tears that unbidden flow!—
Ah! let no sense of griefs profound,
That beauteous bosom ever wound
With unavailing woe!

The wild enchanter youth beguiles,
And fancy's fairy landscape smiles
With more than nature's bloom;
The spring of Eden paints your bowers,
Unsetting suns your promis'd hours
With golden light illumine.

A hand advancing strikes the bell!
That sound dissolves the magic spell,
And all the charm is gone!
The visionary landscape flies:
At once th' aerial music dies;
In wild you walk alone!

Howe'er the wind of fortune blows,
Or sadly-fevering fate dispose
Our everlasting doom;
Impressions never felt before,
And transports to return no more,
Will haunt me to the tomb!

My God! the pangs of nature past,
Will e'er a kind remembrance last
Of pleasures sadly sweet?
Can love assume a calmer name?
My eyes with friendship's angel-flame
An angel's beauty meet?

Ah! should that first of finer forms
Require, through life's impending storms,
A sympathy of soul;
The lov'd Maria of the mind
Will fend me, on the wings of wind,
To Indus or the Pole.

ODE TO A MAN OF LETTERS.

Lo, Winter's hoar dominion past!
Arrested in his eastern blast
The fiend of nature flies;
Breathing the Spring, the zephyrs play,
And re-enthron'd the lord of day
Refumes the golden skies.

Attendant on the genial hours,
The voluntary shades and flowers
For rural lovers spring;
Wild choirs unseen in concert join,
And round Apollo's rustic shrine
The sylvan muses sing.

The finest vernal bloom that blows,
The sweetest voice the forest knows,
Arise to vanish soon;
The rose unfolds her robe of light,
And Philomela gives her night
To Richmond and to June.

With bounded ray, and transient grace,
Thus, Varro, holds the human race
Their place and hour assign'd;
Loud let the venal trumpet sound,
Responsive never will rebound
The echo of mankind.

You forms divine that deck the sphere,
The radiant rulers of the year,
Confess a nobler hand;
Thron'd in the majesty of morn,
Behold the king of day adorn
The skies, the sea, the land.

Nor did th' Almighty raise the sky,
Nor hang th' eternal lamps on high,
On one abode to shine;
The circle of a thousand suns
Extends, while nature's period runs
The theatre divine.

Thus some, whom smiling nature hail,
To sacred springs, and chosen vales,
And streams of old renown;
By noble toils and worthy scars,
Shall win their mansion 'mid the stars,
And wear th' immortal crown.

Bright in the firmament of fame
The lights of ancient ages flame
With never setting ray,
On worlds unbound from history torn,
O'er ages deep in time unborn,
To pour the human day.

Won from neglected wastes of time,
Apollo hails his fairest clime,
The provinces of mind;

An Egypt *, with eternal towers,
See Montefqueu redeem the hours,
From Lewis, to mankind.

No tame remission genius knows;
No interval of dark repose,
To quench the ethereal flame;
From Thebes to Troy the victor hies,
And Homer with his hero vies
In varied paths to fame.

The orb which rul'd thy natal night
And usher'd in a greater light
Than sets the pole on fire,
With undiminish'd lustre crown'd,
Unwearied walks th' eternal round,
Amid the heav'nly quire.

Proud in triumphal chariot hurl'd,
And crown'd the master of the world,
Ah! let not Philip's son,
His soul in Syrian softness drown'd,
His brows with Persian garlands bound.
The race of pleasure run!

With crossing thoughts Alcides prest,
The awful goddess thus address,
And pointing to the prize:
"Behold the wreath of glory shine!
And mark the onward path divine
That opens to the skies!

"The heavenly fire must ever burn,
"The hero's step must never turn
"From yon sublime abodes;
"Long must thy life of labours prove
"At last to die the son of Jove,
"And mingle with the gods."

THE LOVERS.

[The lovers in the following poem were descended of houses that had been long at variance. The lady is first introduced as leaving her father's house, and venturing out in the darkness of the night, to meet with her lover. They meet at the appointed hour. The rest of the dialogue passes in the chariot.]

Harriet.

'Tis midnight dark: 'tis silence deep,
My father's house is hush'd in sleep;
In dreams the lover meets his bride,
She sees her lover at her side;
The mourner's voice is now suppress'd,
While the weary are at rest:
A while midnight dark; 'tis silence deep;
I only wake, and wake to weep.

The window's drawn, the ladder waits,
I spy no watchman at the gates;
No tread re-echoes through the hall,
No shadow moves along the wall.
I am alone. 'Tis dreary night,
O come, thou partner of my flight!
Shield me from darkness, from alarms;
O take me trembling to thine arms!

* The finest provinces of Egypt, gained from a neglected waste.

The dog howls dismal in the heath,
The raven croaks the dirge of death;
Ah me! disaster's in the sound!
The terrors of the night are round;
A sad mischance my fears forebode,
The demon of the dark's abroad,
And lures, with apparition dire,
The night-struck man through flood and fire.

The howlet screams ill-boding sounds,
The spirit walks unholy rounds;
The wizard's hour eclipsing rolls;
The shades of hell usurp the poles;
The moon retires; the heaven departs.
From opening earth a spectre starts:
My spirit dies—Away my fears,
My love, my life, my lord appears!

Henry.

I come, I come, my love! my life!
And nature's dearest name, my wife!
Long have I lov'd thee; long have fought;
And dangers brav'd, and battles fought;
In this embrace our evils end;
From this our better days ascend;
The year of suffering now is o'er,
At last we meet to part no more!

My lovely bride! my consort, come!
The rapid chariot rolls thee home.

Harriet.

I fear to go—I dare not stay.
Look back.—I dare not look that way.

Henry.

No evil ever shall betide
My love, while I am at her side.
Lo! thy protector and thy friend,
The arms that fold thee will defend.

Harriet.

Still beats my bosom with alarms:
I tremble while I'm in thy arms!
What will impassion'd lovers do?
What have I done—to follow you?
I leave a father torn with fears;
I leave a mother bath'd in tears;
A brother girding on his sword,
Against my life, against my lord.

Now, without father, mother, friend,
On thee my future days depend;
Wilt thou, for ever true to love,
A father, mother, brother prove?
O Henry!—to thy arms I fall,
My friend! my husband! and my all!
Alas! what hazards may I run?
Shouldst thou forsake me—I'm undone.

Henry.

My Harriet, dissipate thy fears,
And let a husband wipe thy tears;
For ever join'd our fates combine,
And I am yours, and you are mine.
The fires the firmament that rend,
On this devoted head descend,
If e'er in thought from thee I rove,
Or love thee less than now I love!

Although our fathers have been foes,
From hatred stronger, love arose;

From adverse briars that threat'ning stood,
And threw a horror o'er the wood,
Two lovely roses met on high,
Transplanted to a better sky,
And, grafted in one flock, they grow,
In union spring, in beauty blow.

Harriet.

My heart believes my love ; but still
My boding mind presages ill :
For luckless ever was our love,
Dark as the sky that hung above.
While we embraced, we shook with fears,
And with our kisses mingled tears ;
We met with murmurs and with sighs,
And parted still with watery eyes.

An unforeseen and fatal hand
Cross'd all the measures love had plann'd ;
Intrusion marr'd the tender hour,
A demon started in the bower ;
If, like the past, the future run,
And my dark day is but begun,
What clouds may hang above my head ?
What tears may I have yet to shed ?

Henry.

O do not wound that gentle breast,
Nor sink, with fancied ills oppress ;
For softness, sweetness, all, thou art,
And love is virtue in thy heart.
That bosom ne'er shall heave again
But to the poet's tender strain ;
And never more these eyes o'erflow
But for a hapless lover's woe.

Long on the ocean tempest-tost,
At last we gain the happy coast ;
And safe recount upon the shore
Our sufferings past, and dangers o'er :
Past scenes ; the woes we wept erewhile
Will make our future minutes smile :
When sudden joy from sorrow springs,
How the heart thrills through all its strings !

Harriet.

My father's castle springs to fight ;
Ye towers that gave me to the light !
O hills ! O vales ! where I have play'd ;
Ye woods, that wrap me in your shade !
O scenes I've often wander'd o'er !
O scenes I shall behold no more !
I take a long, last, lingering view :
Adieu ! my native land adieu !

O father, mother, brother dear !
O names still utter'd with a tear !
Upon whose knees I've sat and smil'd,
Whose griefs my blandishments beguil'd ;
Whom I forsake in sorrows old,
Whom I shall never more behold !
Farewel, my friends, a long farewell,
Till time shall toll the funeral knell !

Henry.

Thy friends, thy father's house resign ;
My friends, my house, my all is thine,
Awake, arise, my wedded wife,
To higher thoughts, and happier life !
For thee the marriage feast is spread,
For thee the virgins deck the bed ;

Vol. XI.

The star of Venus shines above,
And all thy future life is love.

They rise, the dear domestic hours !
The May of love unfolds her flow'rs ;
Youth, beauty, pleasure spread the feast,
And friendship sits a constant guest ;
In cheerful peace the morn ascends,
In wine and love the evening ends ;
At distance grandeur sheds a ray,
To gild the evening of our day.

Connubial love has dearer names,
And finer ties, and sweeter claims,
Than e'er unwedded hearts can feel,
Than wedded hearts can e'er reveal ;
Pure as the charities above,
Rise the sweet sympathies of love ;
And closer-cords than those of life
Unite the husband to the wife.

Like cherubs new come from the skies,
Henry and Harriets round us rise ;
And playing wanton in the hall,
With accent sweet their parents call ;
To your fair images I run,
You clasp the husband in the son ;
O how the mother's heart will bound !
O how the father's joy be crown'd !

A TALE.

WHERE past'ral Tweed, renown'd in song,
With rapid murmur flows ;
In Caledonia's classic ground,
The hall of Arthur rose.

A braver Briton never arm'd
To guard his native isle ;
A gentler friend did never make
The social circle smile.

Twice he arose, from rebel rage
To save the British crown ;
And in the field where heroes strove
He won him high renown.

But to the ploughshare turn'd the sword,
When bloody war did cease ;
And in the arbour which he rear'd,
He rais'd the song of peace.

An only daughter in his age
Solac'd a father's care ;
And all the country bless'd the name
Of Emily the fair.

The picture of her mother's youth,
(Now faint'd in the sky) ;
She was the angel of his age,
And apple of his eye.

Something unseen o'er all her form
Did nameless grace impart ;
A secret charm that won the way
At once into the heart.

Her eye the pure ethereal blue,
Than that did fairer show,
Whene'er she watch'd a father's look,
Or wept a lover's woe :

For now the lover of her youth
 To Indian climes had rov'd,
 To conquer fortune's cruel rage,
 And match the maid he lov'd.

Her voice, the gentle tone of love,
 The heart a captive folo;
 The tender accent of her tongue
 Went thrilling through the soul.

The graces, that for nature fair
 Present us mimic art;
 The false refinements that refine
 Away the human heart,

She knew not; in the simple robe
 Of elegance and ease,
 Complete she shone, and ever pleas'd,
 Without the thought to please.

Instruct th' unplanted forest crab
 To leave its genius wild;
 Subdue the monster of the wood,
 And make the savage mild:

But who would give the rose a hue,
 Which nature has not giv'n?
 But who would tame the nightingale,
 Or bring the lark from heav'n?

The father watching o'er his child,
 The joy of fathers found;
 And, blest himself, he stretch'd his hand
 To bless the neighbours round.

A patriarch in the vale of peace,
 To all he gave the law;
 The good he guarded in their rights,
 And kept the bad in awe.

Lord of his own paternal field,
 He liberal dealt his store:
 And call'd the stranger to his feast,
 The beggar to his door.

But, ah! what mortal knows the hour
 Of fate? A hand unseen
 Upon the curtain ever rests,
 And sudden shifts the scene.

Arthur was surety for his friend,
 Who fled to foreign climes,
 And left him to the gripe of laws,
 The victim of his crimes.

The sun, that, rising saw him lord
 Of hill and valley round,
 Beheld him, at his setting hour,
 Without one foot of ground.

Forth from the hall no longer his,
 He is a pilgrim gone,
 And walks a stranger o'er the fields,
 He lately call'd his own.

The blast of Winter whistled loud
 And shrill through the void hall;
 And heavy on his hoary locks
 The shower of night did fall.

Clasp'd in his daughter's trembling hand,
 He journey'd sad and slow;

At times he stop'd to look behind,
 And tears began to flow.

Wearied, and faint, and cold, and wet,
 To shelter he did hie;
 "Beneath the covert of this rock,
 "My daughter, let us die!"

At midnight in the weary waste,
 In sorrow sat the pair;
 She chaff'd his shiv'ring hands, and wrung
 The water from his hair.

The sigh spontaneous rose, the tear
 Involuntary flow'd;
 No word of comfort could she speak,
 Nor would she weep aloud.

"In yonder hall my fathers liv'd,
 "In yonder hall they died;
 "Now in that church-yard's aisle they sleep,
 "Each by his spouse's side.

"Oft have I made yon hall resound
 "With social sweet delight;
 "And marked not the morning hour,
 "That stole upon the night.

"When there the wanderers of the dark,
 Reposing, ceas'd to roam;
 "And strangers, happy in the hall,
 "Did find themselves at home:

"I little thought that, thus forlorn,
 "In deserts I should bide,
 "And have not where to lay the head,
 "Amid the world so wide?"

A stranger, wandering through the wood,
 Beheld the hapless pair;
 Long did he look in silence sad,
 Then shriek'd as in despair.

He ran, and lowly at the feet
 Of his late lord he fell;
 "Alas, my master, have I liv'd
 "To bid your house farewell!"

"But I will never bid adieu
 "To him I pris'd so high:
 "As with my master I have liv'd,
 "I'll with my master die.

"I saw the Summer-friend, who shar'd
 "The banquet in your hall,
 "Depart, nor cast one look behind
 "On the forsaken wall.

"I saw the daily, nightly guest
 "The changing scene forsake;
 "Nor drop a tear, nor turn his steps
 "The long farewell to take:

"Then to the service of my lord
 "I vow'd a throbbing heart;
 "And in the changes of your life
 "To bear an humble part.

"Forgive the fond officious zeal
 "Of one that loves his lord!
 "The new possessor of your field
 "A suppliant I implor'd.

" I told the treachery of your friend,
 " The story of your woe,
 " And fought his favour, when I saw
 " His tears begin to flow.
 " I ask'd the hamlet of the hill,
 " The lone sequester'd seat,
 " Your chosen haunt and favourite bower,
 " To be your last retreat.
 " I offer'd—what was all your own—
 " The gold I had in store;
 " Low at his feet I fell, and wept
 " That I could give no more.
 " Your gold is your's," the generous youth
 With gentle accent said;
 " Your master's be that little field,
 " And cheerful be his shed!"
 " Now Heav'n has heard my prayer; I've wish'd
 " I could in part repay
 " The favours your extended hand
 " Bestow'd from day to day.
 " I yet may see a garland green
 " Upon the hoary head;
 " Yet see my master blest, before
 " I dwell among the dead!"

In silence Arthur look'd to Heav'n,
 And clasp'd his Edwin's hand;
 The eyes of Emily in tears
 Express'd affection bland.

From opening heaven the moon appear'd;
 Fair was the face of night;
 Bright in their beauty shone the stars;
 The air was flowing light.

Arthur resum'd the pilgrim's staff;
 They held their lonely way.
 Dim through the forest's darksome bourne,
 Till near the dawning day.

Then a long line of ruddy light,
 That quiver'd to and fro,
 Reveal'd their lone retreat, and clos'd
 The pilgrimage of woe.

He enter'd solemn, slow, and sad,
 The destin'd hermitage,
 A little and a lonely hut,
 To cover hapless age.

He clasp'd his daughter in his arms,
 And kiss'd a falling tear;
 " I have my all, ye gracious powers!
 " I have my daughter here!"

A sober banquet to prepare,
 Emilia cheerful goes;
 The faggot blaz'd the window glanc'd,
 The heart of age arose.

" I would not be that guilty man,
 " With all his golden store;
 " Nor change my lot with any wretch
 " That counts his thousands o'er.

" Now here at last we are at home,
 " We can no lower fall;

" Low in the cottage peace can dwell,
 " As in the lordly hall.

" The wants of nature are but few;
 " Her banquet soon is spread;
 " The tenant of the vale of tears
 " Requires but daily bread.

" The food that grows in every field
 " Will life and health prolong;
 " And water from the spring suffice
 " To quench the thirsty tongue.

" But all the Indies, with their wealth,
 " And earth, and air, and seas,
 " Will never quench the sickly thirst
 " And craving of disease.

" My humble garden to my hand
 " Contentment's feast will yield;
 " And, in the season, harvest white
 " Will load my little field.

" Like nature's simple children here,
 " With nature's self we'll live,
 " And, of the little that is left,
 " Have something still to give.

" The sad vicissitudes of life
 " Long have I learn'd to bear;
 " But, oh! my daughter, thou art new
 " To sorrow and to care!

" How shall that fine and flow'ry form,
 " In silken folds confin'd,
 " That scarcely fac'd the Summer's gale,
 " Endure the Wint'ry wind?

" Ah! how wilt thou sustain a sky
 " With angry tempest red?
 " How wilt thou bear the bitter storm
 " That's hanging o'er thy head?

" Whate'er thy justice dooms, O God!
 " I take with temper mild;
 " But, oh! repay it thousand-fold
 " In blessings on my child!"

" Weep not for me, thou father fond!"
 The virgin soft did say;
 " Could I contribute to thy peace,
 " O, I would bless the day!

" The Parent who provides for all,
 " For us will now provide;
 " These hands have learn'd the gayer arts
 " Of elegance and pride;

" What once amus'd a vacant hour,
 " Shall now the day engage;
 " And vanity shall spread the board
 " Of poverty and age.

" At eventide, how blithe we'll meet,
 " And, while the faggots blaze,
 " Recount the trifles of the time,
 " And dream of better days!

" I'll read the tragic tales of old,
 " To sooth a father's woes;
 " I'll lay the pillow for thy head,
 " And sing thee to repose."

The father wept. "Thy wond'rous hand,
"Almighty, I adore!

"I had not known how blest I was,
"Had I not been so poor!

"Now blest be God for what is rest,
"And blest for what is given!

"Thou art an angel, O my child!
"With thee I dwell in heaven!"

Then, in the garb of ancient times,
They trod the pastoral plain:
But who describes a Summer's day,
Or paints the halcyon main:

One day, a wanderer in the wood
The lonely threshold prest;
'Twas then that Arthur's humble roof
Had first receiv'd a guest.

The stranger told his tender tale:
"I come from foreign climes;
"From countries red with Indian blood,
"And stain'd with Christian crimes.

"O may Britannia never hear
"What these sad eyes have seen!
"May an eternal veil be drawn
"That world and this between!

"No frantic avarice fir'd my soul,
"And Heav'n my wishes crown'd;
"For soon a fortune to my mind
"With innocence I found.

"From exile sad, returning home,
"I kiss'd the sacred earth;
"And flew to find my native woods
"And walls that gave me birth.

"To church on Sunday fond I went,
"In hopes to mark unseen,
"All my old friends assembled round
"The circle of the green.

"Alas, the change that time had made!
"My ancient friends were gone;
"Another race possess'd the walls,
"And I was left alone!

"A stranger among strangers, long
"I look'd from pew to pew;
"But not the face of one old friend
"Rose imag'd to my view.

"The horrid plough had ras'd the green,
"Where we have often play'd;
"The ax had fell'd the hawthorn tree,
"The school-boy's Summer shade.

"One maid, the beauty of the vale,
"To whom I vow'd my care,
"And gave my heart, had fled away,
"And none could tell me where,

"My cares and toils in foreign climes
"Were for that peerless maid;
"She rose in beauty by my side:
"My toils were all repaid.

"By Indian streams I sat alone,
"While on my native isle,

"And on my ancient friends, I thought,
"And wept the weary while.

"'Twas she that cheer'd my captive hours,
"She came in every dream,
"As, smiling on the rear of night,
"Appears the morning beam.

"In quest of her, I wander wild,
"O'er mountain, stream, and plain;
"And, if I find her not, I fly
"To Indian climes again."

The father thus began: "My son,
"Mourn not thy wretched fate;
"For he that rules in heaven decrees
"This life a mixed state.

"The stream that carries us along,
"Flows through the vale of tears;
"Yet, on the darkness of our day,
"The bow of heav'n appears.

"The rose of Sharon, king of flowers,
"Is fenc'd with prickles round;
"Queen of the vale, the lily fair
"Among the thorns is found.

"Ev'n while we raise the song, we sigh
"The melancholy while;
"And, down the face of mortal man,
"The tear succeeds the smile.

"Nought pure or perfect here is found;
"But when this night is o'er,
"Th' eternal morn will spring on high,
"And we shall weep no more.

"Beyond the dim horizon far,
"That bounds the mortal eye,
"A better country blooms to view,
"Beneath a brighter sky."—

Unseen the trembling virgin heard
The stranger's tale of woe;
Then enter'd, as an angel bright,
In beauty's highest glow.

The stranger rose, he look'd, he gaz'd,
He stood a statue pale;
His heart did throb, his cheek did change,
His fault'ring voice did fail.

At last, "My Emily herself
"Alive in all her chagms!"
The father kneel'd; the lover's rush'd
To one another's arms.

In speechless ecstasy entranc'd
Long while they did remain;
They glow'd, they trembl'd, and they sobb'd,
They wept and wept again.

The father lifted up his hands,
To bless the happy pair;
Heav'n smil'd on Edward the belov'd,
And Emily the fair.

MONIMIA;

AN ODE.

IN weeds of sorrow wildly dight,
Alone beneath the gloom of night,
Monimia went to mourn;

She left a mother's fond alarms ;
She left a father's folding arms ;
Ah ! never to return !

The bell had struck the midnight hour,
Disastrous planets now had pow'r,
And evil spirits reign'd ;
The lone owl from the cloister'd isle,
O'er falling fragments of the pile,
Ill-boding prophet plain'd.

While down her devious footsteps stray,
She tore the willows by the way,
And gaz'd upon the wave :
Then raising wild to heav'n her eyes,
With sobs and broken accent, cries,
" I'll meet thee in the grave."

Bright o'er the border of the stream,
Illumin'd by a transient beam,
She knew the wonted grove ;
Her lover's hand had deck'd it fine,
And roses mix'd with myrtles twine,
To form the bower of love.

The tuneful Philomela rose,
And sweetly mournful fang her woes,
Enamour'd of the tree :
Touch'd with the melody of woe,
More tender tears began to flow,
" She mourns her mate like me."

" I lov'd my lover from a child,
And sweet the youthful cherub smil'd,
" And wanton'd o'er the green ;
" He train'd my nightingale to sing ;
" He spoil'd the gardens of the spring,
" To crown me rural queen.

" My brother died before his day ;
" Sad through the church-yard's dreary way,
" We went to walk at eve ;
" And bending o'er th' untimely urn,
" Long at the monument to mourn,
" And look upon his grave.

" Like forms funereal while we stand,
" In tender mood he held my hand,
" And laid his cheek to mine ;
" My bosom beat unknown alarms,
" We wept in one another's arms,
" And mingled tears divine.

" From sweet compassion love arose,
" Our hearts were wedded by our woes,
" And pair'd upon the tomb ;
" Attesting all the powers above,
" A fond romance of fancied love
" We vow'd our days to come.

" A wealthy lord from Indian skies,
" Illustrious in my parent's eyes,
" Implor'd a mutual mind ;
" Sad to my chamber I withdrew,
" But Harry's footsteps never flew
" The wonted scene to find.

" Three nights in dire suspense I sat
" Alone ; the fourth convey'd my fate,
" Sent from a foreign shore ;—

" Go, where thy wandering wishes tend,
" Go, and embrace thy father's friend,
" You never see me more!"—

" Despair ! distraction ! I obey'd,
" And one disorder'd moment made
" An ever-wretched wife ;
" Ah ! in the circuit of one fun,
" Heaven ! I was wedded and undone,
" And desolate for life!

" Apart my wedding robes I tore,
" And guarded tears now gushing o'er
" Distain'd the bridal bed :
" Wild I involk'd the funeral yell,
" And fought devoted now to dwell
" For ever with the dead.

" My lord to Indian climates went,
" A letter from my lover sent
" Renew'd eternal woes ;—
" Before my love my last words greet,
" Wrapt in the weary winding sheet,
" I in the dust repose !

" Perhaps your parents have deceiv'd,
" Perhaps too rashly I believ'd
" A tale of treach'rous art ;
" Monimia ! could you now behold
" The youth you lov'd in sorrows old,
" Oh ! it would break thy heart !

" Now in the grave for ever laid,
" A constant solitary shade,
" Thy Harry hangs o'er thee !
" For you I fled my native sky ;
" Loaded with life for you I die ;
" My love, remember me !"

" Of all the promises of youth,
" The tears of tenderness and truth,
" The throbs that lovers send ;
" The vows in one another's arms,
" The secret sympathy of charms ;
" My God ! is this the end ?"

She said, and rushing from the bow'r,
Devoted sought in evil hour
The promontory steep ;
Hung o'er the margin of the main,
Her fix'd and earnest eyeballs strain
The dashing of the deep.

" Waves that resound from shore to shore !
" Rocks loud rebellowing to the roar
" Of ocean, storm, and wind !
" Your elemental war is tame,
" To that which rages in my frame,
" The battle of the mind !"

With downcast eye and musing mood,
A lurid interval the food
The victim of despair ;
Her arms then tossing to the skies,
She pour'd in nature's ear her cries,
" My God ! my father ! where ?"

Wild on the summit of the steep
She ruminated long the deep,
And felt her freezing blood :

Approaching feet she heard behind,
Then swifter than the winged wind
She plung'd into the flood.

Her form emerging from the wave
Both parents saw, but could not save;
The shriek of death arose!
At once she sunk to rise no more;
And sadly founding to the shore,
The parted billows close!

ODE

WRITTEN IN A VISIT TO THE COUNTRY IN AUTUMN.

'Tis past! no more the Summer blooms!

Ascending in the rear,
Behold congenial Autumn comes,
The Sabbath of the year!

What time thy holy whispers breathe,
The pensive evening shade beneath,
And twilight consecrates the floods;
While nature strips her garment gay,
And wears the vesture of decay,

O let me wander through the founding woods!

Ah! well-known streams! ah! wonted groves,
Still pictur'd in my mind!

Oh! sacred scene of youthful loves,
Whose image lives behind!

While sad I ponder on the past,
The joys that must no longer last;
The wild-flow'r strown on Summer's bier,
The dying music of the grove,
And the last elegies of love,

26 Dissolve the soul, and draw the tender tear!

Alas! the hospitable hall,

Where youth and friendship play'd,
Wide to the winds a ruin'd wall
Projects a death-like shade!

The charm is vanish'd from the vales;
No voice with virgin-whisper hails

A stranger to his native bow'rs:
No more Arcadian mountains bloom,
Nor Enna valleys breathe perfume,

30 The fancied Eden fades with all its flowers!

Companions of the youthful scene,
Endear'd from earliest days!

With whom I sported on the green,
Or rov'd the woodland maze?

Long-exil'd from your native clime,
Or by the thunder-stroke of time

Snatch'd to the shadows of despair;
I hear your voices in the wind,

Your forms in every walk I find,
I stretch my arms: ye vanish into air! 45

My steps, when innocent and young,
These fairy paths pursu'd;
And wand'ring o'er the wild, I sung
My fancies to the wood.

I moura'd the linnet-lover's fate,
Or turtle from her murder'd mate,
Condemn'd the widow'd hours to wail:
Or while the mournful vision rose,
I fought to weep for imag'd woes,
Nor real life believ'd a tragic tale! 50

Alas! misfortune's cloud unkind

May Summer soon o'ercast!
And cruel fate's untimely wind
All human beauty blast!

The wrath of nature smites our bowers,
And promis'd fruits and cherish'd flowers,

The hopes of life in embryo sweeps;
Pale o'er the ruins of his prime,
And desolate before his time,
In silence sad the mourner walks and weeps! 60

Relentless power! whose fated stroke
O'er wretched man prevails!

Ha! love's eternal chain is broke,
And friendship's covenant fails!
Upbraiding forms! a moment's ease—
O memory! how shall I appease

The bleeding shade, the unaid ghost?

What charm can bind the gushing eye?
What voice console th' incessant sigh,
And everlasting longings for the lost? 70

Yet not unwelcome waves the wood,
That hides me in its gloom,

While lost in melancholy mood
I muse upon the tomb.

Their chequer'd leaves the branches shed;
Whirling in eddies o'er my head,

They sadly sigh that Winter's near:
The warning voice I hear behind,
That shakes the wood without a wind,
And solemn sounds the death-bell of the year. 80

Nor will I court Lethæan streams,

The sorrowing sense to steep;
Nor drink oblivion of the themes

On which I love to weep.

Belated oft by fabled rill,
While nightly o'er the hallowed hill

Aereal music seems to mourn;

I'll listen Autumn's closing strain;
Then woo the walks of youth again,
And pour my sorrows o'er th' untimely urn! 90

HYMNS.

HYMN I.

THE PRAYER OF JACOB.

O God of Abraham! by whose hand
Thy people still are fed;

Who, through this weary pilgrimage,
Hast all our fathers led!

Our vows, our prayers, we now present

Before thy throne of grace;

God of our fathers, be the God

Of their succeeding race

Through each perplexing path of life

Our wandering footsteps guide,

Give us by day our daily bread,
And raiment fit provide!

O spread thy covering wings around,
Till all our wand'ring cease,
And at our fathers' lov'd abode
Our feet arrive in peace!

Now with the humble voice of prayer
Thy mercy we implore;
Then with the grateful voice of praise
Thy goodness we'll adore!

HYMN II.

THE COMPLAINT OF NATURE.

Few are thy days and full of woe,
O man of woman born!
Thy doom is written, dust thou art,
And shalt to dust return.

Determin'd are the days that fly
Successive o'er thy head;
The number'd hour is on the wing,
That lays thee with the dead.

Alas! the little day of life
Is shorter than a span;
Yet black with thousand hidden ills
To miserable man.

Gay is thy morning, flattering hope
Thy sprightly step attends;
But soon the tempest howls behind,
And the dark night descends.

Before its splendid hour the cloud
Comes o'er the beam of light;
A pilgrim in a weary land,
Man carries but a night.

Behold! sad emblem of thy state,
The flowers that paint the field;
Or trees that crown the mountain's brow,
And boughs and blossoms yield.

When chill the blast of Winter blows,
Away the Summer flies,
The flowers resign their sunny robes,
And all their beauty dies.

Nipt by the year the forest fades;
And shaking to the wind,
The leaves tofs to and fro, and streak
The wilderness behind.

The Winter past, reviving flowers
Anew shall paint the plain,
The woods shall hear the voice of Spring,
And flourish green again.

But man departs this earthly scene,
Ah! never to return!
No second Spring shall e'er revive
The ashes of the urn.

Th' inexorable doors of death
What hand can e'er unfold?
Who from the carments of the tomb
Can raise the human mold?

The mighty flood that rolls along
Its torrents to the main,

The waters loft can ne'er recal
From that abyss again.

The days, the years, the ages, dark
Descending down to night,
Can never, never be redeem'd
Back to the gates of light.

So man departs the living scene,
To night's perpetual gloom;
The voice of morning ne'er shall break
The slumbers of the tomb.

Where are our fathers! Whither gone
The mighty men of old?
"The patriarchs, prophets, princes, kings,
"In sacred books enroll'd."

"Gone to the resting-place of man,
"The everlasting home,
"Where ages past have gone before,
"Where future ages come."

Thus nature pour'd the wail of woe,
And urged her earnest cry;
Her voice in agony extreme
Ascended to the sky.

Th' Almighty heard: Then from his throne
In majesty he rose;
And from the Heaven, that open'd wide,
His voice in mercy flows.

"When mortal man resigns his breath,
"And falls a clod of clay,
"The soul immortal wings its flight,
"To never-setting day."

"Prepar'd of old for wicked men
"The bed of torment lies;
"The just shall enter into bliss
"Immortal in the skies."

HYMN III.

TRUST IN PROVIDENCE.

ALMIGHTY father of mankind,
On thee my hopes remain;
And when the day of trouble comes,
I shall not trust in vain.

Thou art our kind Preserver, from
The cradle to the tomb;
And I was cast upon thy care,
Even from my mother's womb.

In early ears thou wast my guide,
And of my youth the friend;
And as my days began with thee,
With thee my days shall end.

I know the power in whom I trust,
The arm on which I lean;
He will my Saviour ever be,
Who has my Saviour been.

In former times, when trouble came,
Thou didst not stand afar;
Nor didst thou prove an absent friend
Amid the din of war.

My God, who caus'dst me to hope,
When life began to beat,

And when a stranger in the world,
Didst guide my wandering feet;
Thou wilt not cast me off, when age
And evil days descend;
Thou wilt not leave me in despair,
To mourn my latter end.
Therefore in life I'll trust to thee,
In death I will adore;
And after death will sing thy praise,
When time shall be no more.

HYMN IV.

HEAVENLY WISDOM.

O HAPPY is the man who hears
Instruction's warning voice,
And who celestial wisdom makes
His early, only choice.
For she has treasures greater far
Than east or west unfold,
And her reward is more secure
Than is the gain of gold.
In her right hand she holds to view
A length of happy years,
And in her left, the prize of fame
And honour bright appears.
She guides the young, with innocence,
In pleasure's path to tread,
A crown of glory she bestows
Upon the hoary head.
According as her labours rise,
So her rewards increase,
Her ways are ways of pleasantness,
And all her paths are peace.

HYMN V.

BEHOLD! the mountain of the Lord
In latter days shall rise,
Above the mountains and the hills,
And draw the wond'ring eyes.
To this the joyful nations round
All tribes and tongues shall flow,
Up to the Hill of God they'll say,
And to his house we'll go.
The beam that shines on Zion hill
Shall lighten every land;
The King who reigns in Zion towers
Shall all the world command.
No strife shall vex Messiah's reign,
Or mar the peaceful years,
To ploughshares soon they beat their swords,
To pruning-hooks their spears.
No longer hosts encountering hosts,
Their millions slain deplora;
They hang the trumpet in the hall,
And study war no more.
Come then—O come from every land,
To worship at his shrine;
And, walking in the light of God,
With holy beauty's shine.

HYMN VI.

BEHOLD! th' Ambassador divine,
Descending from above,
To publish to mankind the law
Of everlasting love!
On him in rich effusion pour'd
The heavenly dew descends;
And truth divine he shall reveal,
To earth's remotest ends.
No trumpet-sound, at his approach,
Shall strike the wondering ears;
But still and gentle breathe the voice
In which the God appears.
By his kind hand the shaken reed
Shall raise its falling frame;
The dying embers shall revive,
And kindle to a flame.
The onward progress of his zeal
Shall never know decline,
Till foreign lands and distant isles
Receive the law divine.
He who spread forth the arch of heaven,
And bade the planets roll,
Who laid the basis of the earth,
And form'd the human soul.
Thus saith the Lord, "Thee have I sent,
" A prophet from the sky,
" Wide o'er the nations to proclaim
" The message from on high.
" Before thy face the shades of death
" Shall take to sudden flight,
" The people who in darkness dwell
" Shall hail a glorious light;
" The gates of brass shall 'sunder burst,
" The iron fetters fall;
" The promis'd jubilee of Heaven
" Appointed rise o'er all.
" And lo! prefiging thy approach,
" The Heathen temples shake,
" And trembling in forsaken fanes,
" The fabled idols quake.
" I am Jehovah: I am One:
" My name shall now be known;
" No idol shall usurp my praise,
" Nor mount into my throne."
Lo, former scenes, predicted once,
Conspicuous rise to view;
And future scenes, predicted now,
Shall be accomplish'd too.
Now sing a new song to the Lord!
Let earth his praise resound;
Ye who upon the ocean dwell,
And fill the isles around.
O city of the Lord! begin
The universal song;
And let the scatter'd villages
The joyful notes prolong.
Let Kedar's wilderness afar
Lift up the lonely voice;

And let the tenants of the rock
With accent rude rejoice.

O from the streams of distant lands
Unto Jehovah sing!
And joyful from the mountain tops
Shout to the Lord the King!

Let all combin'd with one accord
Jehovah's glories raise,
Till in remotest bounds of earth
The nations found his praise.

HYMN VII.

MESSIAH! at thy glad approach
The howling wilds are still;
Thy praises fill the lonely waste,
And breathe from every hill.

The hidden fountains, at thy call,
Their sacred stores unlock;
Loud in the desert sudden streams
Burst living from the rock.

The incense of the Spring ascends
Upon the morning gale;
Red o'er the hill the roses bloom
The lilies in the vale.

Renew'd, the earth a robe of light,
A robe of beauty wears;
And in new heavens a brighter sun
Leads on the promis'd years.

The kingdom of Messiah come,
Appointed times disclose;
And fairer in Emanuel's land
The new creation glows.

Let Israel to the Prince of Peace
The loud hosannah sing!
With hallelujahs and with hymns,
O Zion, hail thy King!

HYMN VIII.

WHEN Jesus, by the virgin brought,
So runs the law of Heaven,
Was offer'd holy to the Lord,
And at thy altar given;

Simeon the just and the devout,
Who frequent in the sanctuary

Had for the Saviour wailed long,
But waited still in vain;

Came Heaven-directed at the hour
When Mary held her son;
He stretched forth his aged arms,
While tears of gladness run:

With holy joy upon his face
The good old father smil'd,
While fondly in his wither'd arms
He clasp'd the promis'd child.

And then he lifted up to Heaven
An earnest asking eye;
My joy is full, my hour is come,
Lord let thy servant die.

At last my arms embrace my Lord,
Now let their vigour cease;
At last my eyes my Saviour see,
Now let them close in peace!

The star and glory of the land
Hath now begun to shine;
The morning that shall gild the globe
Breaks on these eyes of mine!

HYMN IX.

WHERE high the heavenly temple stands
The house of God not made with hands,
A great high priest our nature wears,
The patron of mankind appears.

He who for men in mercy stood,
And pour'd on earth his precious blood,
Pursues in Heaven his plan of grace,
The Guardian God of human race.

Though now ascended up on high,
He bends on earth a brother's eye,
Partaker of the human name,
He knows the frailty of our frame.

Our fellow-suff'rer yet retains
A fellow-feeling of our pains;
And still remembers in the skies
His tears, and agonies, and cries.

In every pang that rends the heart,
The Man of Sorrows had a part;
He sympathizes in our grief,
And to the suff'rer sends relief.

With boldness, therefore, at the throne
Let us make all our sorrows known,
And ask the aids of heavenly power,
To help us in the evil hour.

Lo! where on Isis' bank, fair England's muse
Laments the leader of her laureat train;
Whose art, with chivalry's romantic hues,
Combines the chasteness of the classic strain:
She mourns that sage, whose patient toil pursues
Her faltering steps through time's extensive plain;
And from primeval shades her progress shows,
Down to the brightness of Eliza's reign:
With the rich meed of some melodious tear,
Fain would she now that cruel stroke deplore,
Which stopt her darling in his fair career
Of antiquarian search, and critic lore:
For still, while taste or she can honour claim,
Each age shall venerate her WARTON's name!

THE LIFE OF WARTON.

THOMAS WARTON, the "Historian of English Poetry," was born in the year 1728. He belonged to a poetical family. His father, Thomas Warton, B. D. was fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and afterwards Poetry Professor in that University, from 1718 to 1728, and Vicar of Basingstoke in Hants, and of Cobham in Surrey. He married Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. Joseph Richardson, Rector of Dunsfold, in Surrey, by whom he had two sons, Joseph, the present respectable Master of Winchester School, the poet, and one daughter, Jane. He does not appear to have published any thing in his lifetime; but after his death, which happened at Basingstoke, in 1745, a volume of poems was printed by subscription in 1748. Amhurst's "Terræ Filius" contains some anecdotes of him. His mother died at Winchester, in 1762. His brother, Dr. Joseph Warton, is advantageously known to the world, by his "Ode to Fancy," and other ingenious poems in "Doddley's Collection," "Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope," "Translation of the Pastorals and Eclogues of Virgil," and an edition of the "Works of Pope," with notes.

By his quotation from Gray's Ode, in his Description of the City College and Cathedral of Winchester, and his Latin poem on Catharine Hill, we learn that he received his education at the seminary over which his brother now presides.

In due time he became a member of Trinity College, Oxford; took the degree of Master of Arts in 1750, of Bachelor of Divinity in 1767; but did not succeed to the Mastership of his college, as might have been expected, when it became vacant in 1776, though he continued to reside in it till his death.

In a life passed within the limits of a college, where the transitions from the study to the common-room, and from thence back to the study, mark the passing day with scarce any variation, nothing of incident is to be expected, nothing will be found important enough to be recorded. Yet a life thus spent is not to be contemned. The writings of Warton shew, that one at least has been productive of much entertainment, much usefulness to the world.

He very early exerted his poetical talents, as may be seen by the dates of his several publications; which may be considered as the principal landmarks in his life.

In 1745, he published Five Pastoral Eclogues; the scenes of which are supposed to lie among the shepherds oppressed by the war in Germany, &c. These Eclogues have not been collected in his works, and have eluded the diligence of the present writer.

In 1747, he published The Pleasures of Melancholy, written in 1745, 4to, reprinted in "Doddley's Collection," which was followed by The Progress of Discontent, a Poem, written at Oxford in 1746, first printed in "The Student;" and Newmarket, a Satire, fol. 1750, reprinted in "Pearch's Collection," and again in "Doddley's Collection."

At a time when few are capable of distinguishing themselves in any extraordinary degree, he rendered a service to his Alma Mater, which could not but be acceptable.

It is well known that Tory, if not Jacobite principles, were suspected to prevail much in the University of Oxford, about the time of the Rebellion in 1745; and soon after its suppression, the folly and drunken extravagance of several young men belonging to one of the colleges, gave offence to the friends of the House of Hanover, in a manner which occasioned a prosecution in the Court of King's Bench, and a stigma on the Vice-Chancellor and some of the heads of houses.

In 1748, while this matter was the subject of conversation, Mr. Mason published his "Iris, an elegy," in which, after celebrating the worthies she formerly boasted, she laments her degenerate sons, that,

madly bold
To Freedom's foes infernal orgies hold.

In answer to Mr. Mason's elegy, which was much applauded, and with great reason, at the time of its publication, Warton published his Triumph of Isis, an elegy, 4to, 1749, which was equally deserving of praise. His eulogium on Dr. King is particularly worthy of notice. It was reprinted in Pearch's Collection.

It is remarkable, that though neither Mason nor Warton ever excelled these performances, each of them, as by consent, when he first collected his poems into a volume, omitted his own production,

In 1751, he published An Ode for Music, performed at the Theatre, Oxford, July 2, 1751, being the day appointed by the late Lord Crew, Bishop of Durham, for the commemoration of the benefactors of the university 4to. In this Ode, Minerva, after having assisted Queen Bonduca in a battle, is feigned to request drink of the river Jfus, and, in reward of the favour, to promise that her banks shall become the seat of learning, and the pride of Britain.

In 1753, he published The Union, or Select Scots and English Poems, 12mo.

These were only the lighter productions of Warton's genius. In 1753, he published Observations on the Faery Queen of Spenser, 8vo, which he corrected and enlarged in 2 vols, 12mo, 1762. He sent a copy of the first edition to Dr. Johnson, which he acknowledged in a letter to him, dated July 16, 1754, containing the following merited compliment: "I now pay you a very honest acknowledgment for the advancement of the literature of our native country. You have shown to all who shall hereafter attempt the study of our ancient authors, the way to success, by directing them to the perusal of the books which these authors had read. Of this method Hughes, and men much greater than Hughes, seem never to have thought. The reason why the authors, which are yet read, of the sixteenth century, are so little understood, is, that they are read alone, and no help is borrowed from those who lived with them, or before them."

Some time before, he seems to have taken orders, and to have become Fellow of his College; for, in his notes on Dr. Johnson's letter, preserved by Mr. Boswell, he mentions his design of publishing a volume of "Observations on the best of Spenser's Works," being hindered by his taking pupils. "I am glad of your hindrance in your Spenserian design," Dr. Johnson writes him, Nov. 28, 1754, "yet I would not have it delayed."

At this time his friend Collins was at Oxford, on a visit to him; but labouring under the most deplorable languor of body, and dejection of mind. "Poor dear Collins!" says Dr. Johnson, "would a letter give him any pleasure? I have a mind to write." Soon after he writes him: "I had lately a letter from your brother, with some account of poor Collins, for whom I am much concerned. I have a notion, that by very great temperance, or more properly abstinence, he may yet recover."

In February 1755, he procured for Dr. Johnson the degree of Master of Arts, by diploma, from the University of Oxford; which was considered as an honour of considerable importance, in order to grace the title-page of his Dictionary, which came out soon after.

In 1756, he published a pamphlet, intitled, The Observer Observed, 8vo, on the publication of Upton's "Spenser." This year he was elected by the university, Poetry Professor, on the death of Mr. Hawkins; which office he held the usual term of ten years.

In 1758, when Dr. Johnson began the "Idler," he gave his assistance, and contributed Nos. 33, 93, and 96. The same year he published Inscriptionum Metricarum Delectus, Accedunt Notulae, 4to, 1758, and wrote A Panegyric on Ale, printed in Doddsley's "Collection."

About this time he published A Description of the City College and Cathedral of Winchester, exhibiting a complete and comprehensive detail of their antiquities and present state, 8vo, without date or name.

In 1760, he contributed the Life of Sir Thomas Lopez to the 5th volume of the "Biographia Britannica."

The year following, he published The Life and Literary Remains of Ralph Bathurst, M. D. Dean of Wells, and President of Trinity College, Oxford, 8vo. In the Life of Dr. Bathurst, he has supplied some defects, and rectified some mistakes in the account given of him in the "Biographia Britannica."

In 1761, he contributed to the "Oxford Collection of Verses," a poem on the death of George II. addressed to Mr. Secretary Pitt, and verses on the Marriage of the King, and on the Birth of the Prince of Wales, 1762.

About 1762, he published A Companion to the Guide, and a Guide to the Companion, being a Supplement to all the Accounts of Oxford hitherto published, 12mo, without a date; a burlesque on Oxford Guides, and Companions.

His next publication was the Oxford Sausage, or Select Poetical Pieces, written by the most celebrated Wits of the University of Oxford, 12mo, 1764. In this collection, the Newsmen's Verses, and several other pieces of pleasantry, were contributed by Warton.

In 1768, he was presented to the Vicarage of Shalfield, in Wiltshire,

In 1770, he published from the Clarendon Press, Theocriti Syracusii Cum Scholiis Græcis, Historibus Emendationibus et nimadversoribus in Scholia Editoris et Joannis Toupii Glossis selectis ineditis, Indicibus amplissimis. Premittuntur Editoris Dissertatio de Bucolicis Græcorum, Vita Theocritæ Ionis Barnesio Scriptæ, cum nonnullis aliis auctoriis. Accedunt Editoris et variorum Notæ perpetuæ Epistola Joannis Toupii de Syracusis ejusdem addenda in Theocritum necnon Collectiones quindecim Codicum; Oxon. 2 vols., 4to. "This," says Dr. Harwood, "is a very splendid edition; and, after a very careful perusal, I can pronounce it as correct as it is splendid. Every lover of Greek literature is under great obligations to the very learned and ingenious Mr. Warton, for this magnificent edition of Theocritus, and for several other immortal productions." Some additional notes and observations, by way of Appendix to Warton's edition of Theocritus, were published by Mr. Toup in 1772, Curæ Posterioris, Sive Appendicula Notarum atque Emendationum in Theocritum Oxonii nuperissimi publicatum, 4to.

In 1771, he published an improved account of The Life of Sir Thomas Pope, Founder of Trinity College, Oxford, chiefly compiled from Original Evidences; with an Appendix of Papers never before published, 8vo. The attention and research which he has lavished in composing the memoirs of the munificent and meritorious founder of Trinity College, evince his gratitude and ability; but it cannot but be considered as an unhappiness that he was called upon by his situation and connections to attend to a subject on which even the vigorous genius of Milton could stamp no considerable value.

The same year he was presented by the Earl of Litchfield to the Rectory of Kiddington, in Oxfordshire, and elected a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries.

In 1774, he gave to the world the first volume of his History of English Poetry, from the close of the eleventh, to the commencement of the eighteenth century; to which are prefixed two Dissertations, on the Origin of Romantic Fiction in Europe, and on the Introduction of Learning into England, 4to. The second volume appeared in 1778, and the third, which is brought down to the commencement of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in 1781. To the third volume is prefixed a third dissertation on the Gesta Romanorum. The fourth and last volume was announced, as "speedily to be published," in the end of his edition of Milton's smaller poems 1785, and it is said, a considerable portion of it was actually printed off at the time of his death. It is expected to be completed, and given to the world, with every possible advantage, by his brother, whose abilities, both in poetry and other literary provinces, have justly obtained the full sanction of public applause. A few mistakes and inaccuracies in these volumes were pointed out, with illiberal exaggeration, by Mr. Ritson, a writer of acknowledged, but misapplied talents, in a pamphlet, intitled "Observations on the three first volumes of the History of English Poetry, in a Familiar Epistle to the Author," 4to, 1782. A vindication of Warton appeared in various communications in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for 1782 and 1783.

In 1777, he collected his Poems into an 8vo volume, containing Miscellaneous Pieces, Odes, and Sonnets. In this collection he omitted his Pastoral Eclogues, the Triumph of Isis, Newmarket, a Satire, The Progress of Discontent, and other pieces of humour. The publication may be considered as, in some measure, original, there being only seven pieces that had before appeared, and near three times that number which were then first printed. Alluding to this publication, Mrs. Piozzi, in her entertaining "Anecdotes of Dr. Johnson," reports the following conversation: "Such a one's verses are come out, said I: "Yes (replied Johnson) and this frost has struck them in again. Here are some verses I have written to ridicule them; but remember that I love the fellow dearly, now, for all that I laugh at him.

Wherefo'er I turn my view,
All is strange, yet nothing new:
Endless labour all along,
Endless labour to be wrong;
Phrase that time has flung away;
Uncouth words in disarray,
Trick'd in antique ruff and bonnet,
Ode, and elegy, and sonnet."

In 1781, he printed for private use, a few copies of A History of Kiddington Parish, 4to, intended as a specimen of a history of Oxfordshire. A second edition was published, "corrected and enlarged," for sale, in 1783. This admirable specimen of parochial history, and of his general idea of such history, serves but to make us regret that he had not opportunity to execute more of such a plan.

But why regret this exertion of his talents, when his History of Gothic Architecture, which he more than promised in the History of English Poetry, is now, it is to be feared, lost to the world?

In 1784, he engaged, as might be expected, on the side of Chatterton, in the Rowleian controversy, and published An Inquiry into the Authenticity of the Poems attributed to Thomas Rowley; in which the arguments of the Dean of Exeter and Mr. Bryant are examined, 8vo, which bears conviction with every unprejudiced mind. This year he was presented to the donative of Hill Farrance, in Somersetshire.

The same year he published his Verses on Sir Joshua Reynolds's painted Window at New College, Oxford, 4to.

In 1785, he was elected Camden Professor of Ancient History, on the resignation of Dr. Scott; and the same year he was made Poet Laureat, on the death of Whitehead.

His next publication was Poems on Several Occasions, English, Latin, and Italian, with Translations by John Milton, viz. Lycidas, L'Allegro Il Penseroso, Arcades, Comus, Odes, Sonnets, Miscellanies, English Psalms, Elegiarum Liber, Epigrammatum Liber, Sylvarum Liber, with Notes Critical and Explanatory, and other Illustrations, 8vo, 1785. A second edition, with corrections and improvements, appeared after his death, in 1790. The chief purpose of the Notes is to explain Milton's allusions, to illustrate or to vindicate his beauties, to point out his imitations, both of others and of himself, to elucidate his obsolete diction, and by the adduction and juxtaposition of parallels universally gleaned both from his poetry and his prose, to ascertain his favourite words, and to shew the peculiarities of his phraseology. His commentary is enriched with some occasional illustrations by his brother Dr. Warton. In the second edition, the Notes appear to have undergone an entire revision. Some notes, which were in the first edition, he has omitted in the second; intending, as is evident by the references, to introduce them, and probably with considerable additions, in his edition of Milton's larger poems, which he was preparing for the press. Many of his own notes, not to be found in the first edition, are inserted in the second, together with some which are marked with the initials of the names of Warburton and Hurd. A multitude of corrections are also made, in which he probably availed himself of the hints of friendly criticism.

This was the last publication he gave to the world, except his official Odes, and many excellent notes in the variorum edition of Shakspeare 1786, which are distinguished by his name.

His health began to decline a little time before his death, but not in such a manner as to give much alarm to his friends. He had been some time ill with the gout; but was thought in a fair way of recovery. On Thursday, May 20. 1790. he appeared remarkably cheerful, and supped, and passed the evening in the common-room. Between ten and eleven o'clock he sunk in his chair, His friends thought him only dozing; but on approaching, found him struck with the palsy, and quite dead on one side. He was immediately conveyed to his room, and continued insensible till his death, on Friday, about two o'clock, in the sixty-second year of his age. On the 27th of May, in the afternoon, his remains were interred in the Chapel of Trinity College, with the highest academical honours.

A new edition of his Poems, including the pieces omitted in the edition 1777, and the New-Year and Birth-Day Odes, for 1786, 1787 and 1788, was printed in 1791. They are now, reprinted from the edition 1791, with his Birth-Day Odes for 1789 and 1790, Sonnet in imitation of Spenser, and his Latin poems ad Somnum and Qui fit Mæcenas, omitted in former editions, received for the first time into a collection of classical English poetry.

His character was truly amiable and respectable. To his friends he was endeared by his simple, open, and friendly manners; to the University of Oxford by his long residence and many services; and to the public by the valuable additions which have been made by his talents to English poetry, antiquities, and criticism. His mind was more fraught with wit and mirth than his outward appearance promised. His person was unwieldy and ponderous, and his countenance somewhat inert; but the fascination of his converse was wonderful. He was the delight of the jovial Attic board, anniversaries, music meetings, &c. and possessed beyond most men the art of communicating variety to the dull sameness of an Oxford life. With eminent abilities, and scholastic accomplishments, he united those conciliatory talents, that amiable sociability of manners, which could, to the claim of respect for the author, add that of esteem for the man. He was a liberal scholar, an agreeable companion, a warm philanthropist, a disinterested Christian, and an amiable man.

"His social qualities," says a writer in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for 1790, "had long endeared him to the members of his own society, among whom he constantly resided. The brilliancy of his wit, the solidity of his judgment, and the affability of his temper, give to all who had the happiness of his acquaintance, the most pungent regret for his irreparable loss. His literary productions have rendered him peculiarly eminent as an annotator, a biographer, an antiquary, and a poet; and he may be deservedly considered as the ornament, not only of the university, but of the literary world at large. Such, indeed, was the vigour of his mind, the classical purity of his taste, the extent and variety of his learning, that his memory will be for ever revered as a profound scholar, and a man of true genius. Learning must deplore him as one of her best and most valuable ornaments."

As an author, he has chiefly distinguished himself as a biographer, a historian, a critic, and a poet.

In his Lives of Dr. Bathurst and Sir Thomas Pope, we find that art, propriety, and ease, which characterize the productions of those whose talents have been carefully cultivated by reflection and study. But they will not, perhaps, by the generality of readers, be deemed either instructive or entertaining. Of the memorials of Dr. Bathurst, which have been transmitted to posterity, few are at this time interesting or affecting enough to engage the attention of the public; but he may be credited for his industry, and the difficulties he surmounted in attaining the necessary information to complete his work. The insufficiency of the materials which time has preserved concerning Sir Thomas Pope, has engaged him to enter occasionally into historical digressions. Among other national transactions, he gives an interesting relation of the persecutions of the Princess Elizabeth. But on losing sight of Sir Thomas Pope, he detracts from the merit of his performance, considered as a composition. The principal figure in the picture being eclipsed by the decorations that surround it, the eye is fixed on the latter, and neglects the former. Indeed, the life of a person whose capacity was slender and limited, who never sustained or merited any important office, and whose sphere of action was narrow, is not properly an object of curiosity. The mind does not willingly bestow its attention on insignificant circumstances; its sensibilities can only be awakened by what is shining and illustrious. The literary toil which should be employed in narrations concerning those who have displayed valour in the field, or wisdom in the cabinet, should never be wasted in inquiries concerning men who have acted in inferior or subordinate stations. The portion of the laborious drudge, who is put in motion at the command of a master, and who neither plans nor thinks, is silence and obscurity.

As an historian, his reputation is founded on his History of English Poetry; the very name of which warms the heart of every man of taste and elegance. An history of English poetry has long been a desideratum in the learned world. A plan of this kind had been agitated by Pope, in which our poets were classed under their supposed respective schools. It was afterwards adopted by Gray. The substance of Gray's plan, which was that of Pope, considerably enlarged, extended, and improved, is given in his "Life." Both these plans Warton has rejected, and has chosen to conduct his work in a chronological series; for this obvious reason, that it exhibits, without transposition, the gradual improvements of our poetry, at the same time that it uniformly represents the progression of our language. Yet he has not always adhered so scrupulously to the regularity of annals, but that he has often deviated into occasional digressions. His reasons for commencing his annals with the Norman accession, rather than the Saxon government, seem conclusive; the former being the era when our national character began to dawn. His work is introduced by a Preface, which is at once elegant and instructive, and two dissertations, on the Origin of Romantic Fiction, and, on the introduction of learning into England; in which are discovered such exquisite and genuine elegance, such profound and extensive erudition, such acute and rational deductions, that we are at a loss to determine what is their prevailing beauty; yet the analogy between European and Arabian legends, and the probable accounts how the same spirit and genius of fiction might be transferred from Asia to these northern climes, are not, as it should seem, a probable solution, even with the assistance of the Crusades, for the nature and variety of European romances. Much, we conceive, must still be left for the native exertions and the original product of invention. The innumerable hords that migrated from the North-East, and overflowed the West, were not without their romantic fictions; of a different species, indeed, from the Arabic fabling; but the latter came quickly to incorporate with them; and the romance of the Arab seemed only as a splendid caparison to the chivalry of the Goth. To his opinion with respect to the peculiar influence of women under the Gothic establishments, we readily subscribe; but the small degree of attention and respect which the Greeks and Romans treated the fair sex, and that inconsiderable share which they were permitted to take in conversation, and the general commerce of life, seem carried to an extreme which the classical writers (to whom he appeals) will scarcely warrant. Had the female insignificance and seclusion, ascribed to classic times, been predicated of the women of modern Greece, the remark had been just. But fixed on the eras of Sophocles and Alcibiades, of Propertius and Tibullus Brutus and Cato, it loses all manner of propriety. In regard to the second dissertation, and that on the Gesta Romanorum, prefixed to the third volume, we have nothing to do but to approve and admire. The period of antiquity at which he commences his work, is by no means a field for popular recreation. Some of the flowers, indeed, which may be collected in a scene so vast and uncultivated, are neither without fragrance nor beauty; but these are not to be enjoyed by a taste formed upon modern composition. The obsolete terms, and uncouth numbers, through which the few rays of genius which appear in that remote era must appear, almost eclipse their lustre, and leave it entirely indiscernible, except to such eyes as are accustomed to derive pleasure from a long and distant retrospect. These observations will apply to the various extracts given of metrical romances, and other legendary performances, from the commencement of the history till the days of Chaucer. We do not deny but that Langland has merit; his descriptions are picturesque, his characters just and natural, and his satire poignant; but the harsh versification, and antiquated style in which he writes, must render these beauties imperceptible to the greatest number of readers; and we must still denominate the age of Chaucer not only the era of refinement in English versification, but even the dawn of poetical genius. How glorious the meridian at which it arrived, under the auspices of Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton, we need not attempt to describe.

The predominant features of this agreeable and instructive work, are elegant composition, acute and genuine criticism, and literary research. But it is not Warton's principal merit, that he investigates his subject with the patience of an antiquary, and the acuteness of a critic; from his accurate delineation of character, it is evident that he has inspected the manners of mankind as they occasionally pass before him, with the penetrating eye of a philosopher. This praise he has merited by his preliminary Dissertations, by his elaborate account of Chaucer and his poetry, and by his reflections tending to establish a full estimate of the genius of the poetry of Queen Elizabeth's reign; which compose the concluding section of his third volume. The History of English Poetry has rare and striking merits, and may be justly considered as a valuable accession to English literature. But it is not without its defects. He has shown, it would seem, more solicitude in collecting his materials, than perspicuity and accuracy in arranging them. Hence it has been found so dry and oppressive; as to subdue the eagerness of the generality of readers; and hence nearly one-fourth of the second volume is filled with errata and amendments to the first; a circumstance the more remarkable, as he was not tied down to precipitate publication by a subscription; as his business was literature; as he had been long accustomed to the use of the press; and as he was equally possessed of learning and leisure.

As a Critic, his Observations on Spenser, an edition of Theocritus, and notes on Milton, entitle him to rank with Mr. Tyrwhitt, Mr. Spence, Dr. Johnson, Dr. Hurd, and Dr. Warton, the most elegant and classical critics of our nation.

His Observations on the Faery Queen, have deservedly obtained the approbation of the learned world. He has been indefatigable in illustrating the obscurities; and bringing out the beauties of the great father of allegorical poetry; but his work has not obtained any very extensive popularity, and has failed to recall the attention of the public to the writings of this neglected English classic.

On the merits of his Inquiry into the authenticity of the Poems attributed to Rowley, it is unnecessary to enlarge, as they have been already considered and acknowledged in the "Life of Chatterton."

His elegant and accurate edition of Theocritus, the great father of pastoral poetry, does honour to the literature of our country. In his Dissertation on Bucolic poetry, if too much is advanced upon conjecture, it must be allowed that there is considerable learning and ingenuity. Though the Scholia on Theocritus are not so numerous as those on some other Greek authors, they are not less valuable. They boast some of the most distinguished names among the school-critics and restorers. The principal observations of these scholiasts, Warton has, with great labour, collected and digested, and has at the same time enriched the common treasury with contributions of his own. The reputation of his coadjutor Mr. Toup, as a Greek scholar, is too well established to receive any addition from the highest praise which the present writer can bestow.

For a commentator on Milton he was peculiarly qualified, being not only conversant with the elegant remains of Grecian and Roman learning, but intimately acquainted with those treasures of Gothic and Old English literature, with which Milton, in his younger days, appears to have been singularly delighted, and to which frequent allusions are made even in the "Paradise Lost." In spite of objections which may occasionally be made, his Notes and Illustrations must be allowed to contain a rich body of anecdote and criticism. They are manifestly the result of diligent reading and patient research; serving to unfold the treasures whence Milton drew most of his beautiful imagery; to explain his Gothic and classical allusions; to point out the source of many of his conceptions; and, at the same time, to demonstrate and display the strength and sublimity of his genius. These notes, which may be called bi-historical, and those at the end of the larger poems, containing a kind of general critique on them, abound with valuable information, and are drawn up with much judgment and taste. Though in some instances his labour appears superfluous, we cannot but admire the extent of his reading, and the pains he has taken to collate passages, in order to show whence Milton stole every balmy sweet. It by no means indubitably follows, that Milton was indebted to preceding writers to the extent which his collations intimate. Critics, when employed in detecting imitations, are very apt to pursue the matter too far. Later poets are generally represented by them as imitating their predecessors, in instances where it is more reasonable to conclude them alike copied from nature. We coincide in opinion with Walsh, when he says, in one of his letters to Pope, "In all common subjects of poetry, the thoughts are so obvious (at least if they are natural), that whoever writes last, must write things like what have been said before." His observations on Milton's religious principles, are such as the text by no means justifies, and seem rather suggested by prejudices than dispassionate reason. But he does ample justice to his genius, and even directly affirms, "that what was enthusiasm in most of the puritanical writers, was poetry in Milton."

As a poet, his genius was directed by classic taste and judgment; and his fancy, however seductive, led him not to an affectation of over-laboured ornament. Simplicity and perspicuity, supported by elegance, are the distinguishing marks of his poetry. His compositions are highly finished and original, as far as perpetual classic imitations and allusions will allow; his versification is nervous and correct, his reading extensive, and his knowledge of real nature acquired from an actual survey of her works. It seems as if the most considerable of his poems had been cast in the mould of some gifted predecessor; but, according to those critics, who ascribe the invention of every species of poetry to the Greeks, even Horace himself had his archetypes. It will easily be perceived by readers of taste, that he is of the school of Spenser and Milton, rather than that of Pope. He has manifestly and confessedly imitated other poets, Gray, J. Philips, and, in his New-market, Pope; but in his descriptive poetry, Milton was not only his model, in respect of language and versification, but of ideas. It must, however, be allowed, that he has extended Milton's kind of imagery to more objects, and painted on a larger canvass. His imitations of Milton, like the pictures of Raphael painted by Giulio Romano, are perfectly copied; but still they are copies.

The Pleasures of Melancholy, one of his earliest productions, is a beautiful Miltonic poem, abounding with bold metaphors and highly-coloured pictures. The indulgence of melancholy, by attending the cathedral service during winter evenings, and the luxury of tragic tears at the theatre, are feelingly and poetically described. The Triumph of Isis, in fertility of invention, and felicity of expression, may challenge a comparison with Mr. Mason's admirable "Elegy," which occasioned it. The Inscription in a Hermitage at Anstey Hall, is beautifully simple and characteristic. The Monody written at Stratford upon Avon, is well appropriated and picturesque. The graphical painting of the river, and the fine enthusiasm that follows, are of the happiest execution. The poem on the Death of George II. is one of the best of his performances. It is elegant and harmonious, in the highest degree. The verses on the Marriage of the King have equal merit. The whole is finely imagined, and animated with a noble love of his country, its glory and its constitution. His New-market, a satire, has lost none of its stings by time, as the vices at which they are darted are still in full force. The lines are admirably turned, and their severity is by no means overcharged. The Pastoral in the Manner of Spenser, is an ingenious imitation, and the Ode on the Approach of Summer is replete with true poetry; but the imagery is Miltonic, and perpetually reminds us of the source whence it was drawn. The use of old words in a poem not called an imitation of some old bard, seems a studied imperfection; such are the words age, eld, murky, watchet. The frequent mixture of regular trochaics of seven syllables, and iambics of eight, seems a defect. If authority will justify this metrical irregularity, he has Milton in his "Allegro" and "Penseroso" on his side, and Gray in his "Descent of Odin," "Triumphs of Owen," and "Death of Hoel;" but convenience or inadvertence seem to have occasioned these deviations from regularity, rather than choice or system. The Hamlet is a delightful picture of rural life, or rather of the life of the husbandman. Felix si sua bona norit. But to enjoy what the poet describes, he must possess the poet's enthusiasm. The Ode sent to a Friend on his leaving a favourite Village in Hampshire, is another very agreeable specimen of his talent for descriptive poetry. The Suicide is characterized by bold personification, picturesque description, and pathetic sentiment. The Ode written at Vale-Royal Abbey, is much in the style and manner of Gray's "Church-Yard Elegy," and appears to be modelled upon it; yet it wants the simplicity of the latter; but that possibly the magnificence of the subject would not easily allow. He seems also to have had Gray in view in his Crusade and the Grave of King Arthur; for they are much in the wild strains of his Cambrian lyre. They are not inferior to Gray's "Triumphs of Owen" and "Death of Hoel;" at the same time, they have more perspicuity. In the Ode for Music, are spirit, force, and fancy, which will give pleasure to an Englishman, as long as the present language remains intelligible.

Among the pieces of pleasantry and humour, The Progress of Discontent is one of the most agreeable. The Castle Barber's Soliloquy, and the Oxford Newsmen's Verses, are Hudibraslic compositions; of which much of the merit consists in the rhymes. The Prologue on the old Winchester Play-House, over the Butcher's Shambles, is full of wit and humour. The Phoenix and the One-Horse Chair, is a manifest imitation of Smart's fable of "The Bag-Wig and Tobacco-Pipe." The Grizzle, and the Epistle to Thomas Hearn, are locally humorous. The Panegyric on Oxford Ale, is so close an imitation of J. Philip's "Splendid Shilling," that many of the ideas and epithets are the same. Much humour and pleasantry, however, are displayed in this burlesque poem.

In the construction of Sonnets in the Italian measures, he seems more ingenious and happy than most of those who have attempted that difficult species of composition; but we perceive a stiffness and constraint even in those of Warton, which show them to be aliens, and heterogeneous to our language. The Sonnets, written at Winslade, and to the River Loden, are eminently beautiful.

It has been observed, that he is particularly happy in descriptive poetry; and he has, in his New-Year and Birth-Day Odes, rendered it necessary to extend this praise to his felicity in Gothic painting, for which he probably qualified himself, by his study of Chaucer, Spenser, and other old authors, who have described the feats of "knights and barons bold;" who

In sage and solemn tunes have sung
Of turneys, and of trophies hung.

The Odes for 1787 and 1788, while he had no splendid foreign or domestic events to celebrate, nor any calamities to deplore, abound with Gothic pictures and embellishments, which give that kind of mellowness to these poems, that time confers on medals and productions of the pencil. Birth-day Odes have so long been treated with obloquy and contempt, that however well they may be written, they are not only read with unwillingness, but with determined severity; and yet we find in those of Warton a Pindaric boldness and fire, which scholars of taste and candour must perceive, however they may withhold their praise. Others, who are not qualified to relish the sublime beauties, and animated graces of the higher poetry, will find ample scope for ridicule in the Gothic pomp and garniture of his verse;

His Norman minstrelsy, and ivied towers,
Knight-errant tales, and Spenser's fancy bowers.

Among the modern Latin poets, there are few who do not yield to Warton. His Latin Poems are valuable, as much for their fancy and genius, as for their style and expression. They discover true classical feeling, and abound with ideas and expressions which have been conceived in the same language in which they are written. The poem on the rebuilding the Chapel of Trinity College, 1748, is not only the most considerable in length, but seems to contain a greater proportion of beautiful lines than any of his other pieces; all of which have, however, their several merits, and are such as would not disgrace a Roman in the days of Augustus.

THE TRIUMPH OF ISIS.

OCCASIONED BY ISIS, AN ELEGY.
WRITTEN IN 1749.

“ Quid mihi nescio quam, proprio cum Ty-“ bride, Roman
“ Semper in ore geris? Referunt si vera parentes, “ Hanc urbem infano nullus qui Marte petivit,
“ Lætatus violasse redit. Nec numina sedem
“ Destituunt——” CLAUDIAN.

ON closing flowers when genial gales diffuse
The fragrant tribute of refreshing dews;
When chants the milk-maid at her balmy pail,
And weary reapers whistle o'er the vale;
Charm'd by the murmurs of the quivering shade,
O'er Isis' willow-fringed banks I stray'd:
And calmly musing through the twilight way,
In pensive mood I fram'd the Doric lay.
When lo! from opening clouds a golden gleam
Pour'd sudden splendours o'er the shadowy stream;
And from the wave arose it's guardian queen,
Known by her sweeping stole of glossy green;
While in the coral crown that bound her brow,
Was wove the Delphic laurel's verdant bough.

As the smooth surface of the dimply flood
The silver-slipper'd virgin lightly trod;
From her loose hair the dropping dew she pres'd,
And thus mine ear in accents mild address'd:

No more, my son, the rural reed employ,
Nor trill the tinkling strain of empty joy;
No more thy love-resounding sonnets suit
To notes of pastoral pipe, or oaten flute.
For hark! high-thron'd on yon majestic walls,
To the dear muse afflicted freedom calls:
When freedom calls, and Oxford bids thee sing,
Why stays thy hand to strike the sounding string?
While thus, in Freedom's and in Phebus' spite,
The venal sons of slavish Cam unite;
To shake yon towers when malice rears her crest,
Shall all my sons in silence idly rest?

Still sing, O Cam, your fav'rite freedom's cause;
Still boast of freedom, while you break her laws:
To power your songs of gratulation pay,
To Courts address soft flattery's servile lay.
What though your gentle Mason's plaintive verse
Has hung with sweetest wreaths Musæus' herse;

What though your vaunted bard's ingenuous woe,
Soft as my stream, in tuneful numbers flow;
Yet strove his muse, by fame or envy led,
To tear the laurels from a sister's head?—
Misguided youth! with rude unclassic rage
To blot the beauties of thy whiter page!
A rage that sullies e'en thy guiltless lays,
And blasts the vernal bloom of half thy bays.

Let —— boast the patrons of her name,
Each splendid fool of fortune and of fame:
Still of preferment let her shine the queen,
Prolific parent of each bowing dean:
Be her's each prelate of the pamper'd cheek,
Each courtly chaplain, sanctified and sleek:
Still let the drones of her exhaustless hive
On rich pluralities supinely thrive:
Still let her senates titled slaves revere,
Nor dare to know the patriot from the peer;
No longer charm'd by virtue's lofty song,
Once hear'd sage Milton's manly tones among,
Where Cam, meandering through the matted
reeds,

With loitering wave his groves of laurel feeds.
'Tis our's, my son, to deal the sacred bay,
Where honour calls, and justice points the way
To wear the well-earn'd wreath that merit brings,
And snatch a gift beyond the reach of kings.
Scorning and scorn'd by courts, yon muse's bower
Still nor enjoys, nor seeks, the smile of power.
Though wakeful vengeance watch my crystal
spring,

Though persecution wave her iron wing,
And, o'er yon spiry temples as she flies,
“ These destin'd seats be mine,” exulting cries;
Fortune's fair smiles on Isis still attend:
And, as the dews of gracious Heaven descend
Unask'd, unseen, in still but copious show'rs,
Her stores on me spontaneous bounty pours.
See, science walks with recent chaplets crown'd;
With fancy's strain my fairy shades resound;
My muse divine still keeps her custom'd state,
The mien erect, and high majestic gait:
Green as of old each oliv'd portal smiles,
And still the graces build my Grecian piles:
My Gothic spires in ancient glory rise,
And dare with wonted pride to rush into the skies.
E'en late, when Radcliffe's delegated train
Auspicious shone in Isis' happy plain:

When yon proud * domè, fair learning's amplest shrine,

Beneath its Attic roofs receiv'd the nine;
Was rapture mute, or ceas'd the glad acclaim,
To Radcliffe due, and Isis' honour'd name?
What free-born crowds adorn'd the festive day,
Nor blush'd to wear my tributary bay!
How each brave breast with honest ardors heav'd,
When Sheldon's fane the patriot band receiv'd;
While, as we loudly hail'd the chosen few,
Rome's awful senate rush'd upon the view!

O may the day in latest annals shine,
That made a Beaufort and an Harley mine:
That bade them leave the loftier scene awhile,
The pomp of guiltless state, the patriot toil,
For bleeding Albion's aid the sage design,
To hold short dalliance with the tuneful nine.
Then music left her silver sphere on high,
And bore each strain of triumph from the sky;
Swell'd the loud song, and to my chiefs around
Pour'd the full peans of mellifluous sound.
My Naiads blithe the dying accents caught,
And listening dauc'd beneath their pearly grot:
In gentler eddies play'd my conscious wave,
And all my reeds their softest whispers gave;
Each lay with brighter green adorn'd my bowers,
And breath'd a fresher fragrance on my flowers.

But lo! at once the pealing concert ceas'd,
And crowded theatres are hush'd in peace.
See, on yon sage how all attentive stand,
To catch his darting eye, and waving hand.
Hark! he begins, with all a Tully's art,
To pour the dictates of a Cato's heart:
Skill'd to pronounce what noblest thoughts inspire,
He blends the speaker's with the patriot's fire;
Bold to conceive, nor timorous to conceal,
What Britons dare to think, he dares to tell.
'Tis his alike the ear and eye to charm,
To win with action, and with sense to warm;
Untaught in flowery periods to dispense
The lulling sounds of sweet impertinence:
In frowns or smiles he gains an equal prize,
Nor meanly fears to fall, nor creeps to rise;
Bids happier days to Albion be restor'd,
Bids ancient justice rear her radiant sword;
From me, as from my country, claims applause,
And makes an Oxford's, a Britannia's cause.

While arms like these my stedfast sages wield,
While mine is truth's impenetrable shield;
Say shall the puny champion fondly dare
To wage with force like this scholastic war?
Still vainly scribble on with pert pretence,
With all the rage of pedant impotence?
Say, shall I foster this domestic pest,
This parricide, that wounds a mother's breast?

Thus in some gailant ship, that long has bore
Britain's victorious crosses from shore to shore,
By chance, beneath her close sequester'd cells,
Some low-born worm, a lurking mischief dwells;
Eats his blind way; and saps with secret guile
The deep foundations of the floating pile:
In vain the forest lent its flatelick pride,
Rear'd her tall mast, and fram'd her knotty side;
The martial thunder's rage in vain she flood,
With every conflict of the stormy flood;

* The Radcliffe Library.

More sure the reptile's little arts devour,
Than wars or waves, or Eurus' wint'ry power.

Ye fretted pinnacles, ye fanes sublime,
Ye towers that wear the mossy vest of time!
Ye massy piles of old munificence,
At once the pride of learning and defence;
Ye cloisters pale, that lengthening to the sight,
To contemplation, step by step, invite;
Ye high-arch'd walks, where oft the whispers

clear
Of harps unseen have swept the poet's ear;
Ye temples dim, where pious duty pays
Her holy hymns of ever-echoing praise;
Lo! your lov'd Isis, from the bordering vale,
With all a mother's fondness bids you hail!—
Hail, Oxford, hail! of all that's good and great,
Of all that's fair, the guardian and the seat;
Nurse of each brave pursuit, each generous aim,
By truth exalted to the throne of fame!
Like Greece in science and in liberty,
As Athens learn'd, as Lacedemon free!

Ev'n now, confess'd to my adoring eyes,
In awful ranks thy gifted sons arise.
Tuning to nightly tale his British reeds,
Thy genuine bards immortal Chaucer leads:
His hoary head o'erlooks the gazing choir,
And beams on all around celestial fire.
With graceful step see Addison advance,
The sweetest child of Attic elegance:
See Chillingworth the depths of doubt explore,
And Selden ope the rolls of ancient lore:
To all but his beiov'd embrace deny'd,
See Locke lead reason, his majestic bride:
See Hammond pierce religion's golden mine,
And spread the treasur'd stores of truth divine.

All who to Albion gave the arts of peace,
And best the labours pannon'd of letter'd ease:
Who taught with truth, or with persuasion mov'd;
Who sooth'd with numbers, or with sense improv'd;

Who rang'd the powers of reason, or refin'd,
All that adorn'd or humaniz'd the mind;
Each priest of health, that mix'd the balmy bowl,
To rear frail man, and slay the fleeting foul;
All crowd around, and echoing to the sky,
Hail, Oxford, hail! with filial transport cry.

And see yon sapient train! with liberal aim,
'Twas theirs new plans of liberty to frame;
And on the Gothic gloom of slavish sway
To shed the dawn of intellectual day.
With mild debate each musing feature glows,
And well-weigh'd counsels mark their meaning brows.

“Lo! these the leaders of thy patriot line,”
A Raleigh, Hamden, and a Somers shine.
These from thy source the bold contagion caught,
Their future sons the great example taught:
While in each youth th' hereditary flame
Still blazes, unextinguish'd, and the same!
Nor all the talks of thoughtful peace engage,
'Tis thine to form the hero as the sage.
I see the sable-suited prince advance
With lilies crown'd, the spoils of bleeding France,
Edward. The muses, in yon cloister'd shade,
Bound on his maiden thigh the martial blade:
Bade him the steel for British freedom draw,
And Oxford taught the deeds that Cressy saw.

And fee, great father of the sacred band,
The patriot king before me seems to stand.
He by the bloom of this gay vale beguild
That cheer'd with lively green the shaggy wild,
Hither of yore, forlorn, forgotten maid,
The muse in prattling infancy convey'd;
From Vandal rage the helpless virgin bore,
And fix'd her cradle on my friendly shore:
Soon grew the maid beneath his fostering hand,
Soon stream'd her blessings o'er the enlighten'd land.

Though simple was the dome, where first to dwell
She deign'd, and rude her early Saxon cell,
Lo! now she holds her state in sculptur'd bowers,
And proudly lifts to Heav'n her hundred towers.
'Twas Alfred first, with letters and with laws,
Adorn'd, as he advanc'd, his country's cause:
He bade relent the Briton's stubborn soul,
And sooth'd to soft society's controul
A rough untutor'd age. With raptur'd eye
Elate he views his laurel'd progeny:
Serene he smiles to find, that not in vain
He form'd the rudiments of learning's reign:
Himself he marks in each ingenuous breast,
With all the founder in the race express'd:
Confiscous he sees fair freedom still survive
In yon bright domes, ill-fated fugitive!
(Glorious, as when the goddess pour'd the beam
Unfulfill'd on his ancient diadem);
Well-pleas'd, that at his own Fierian springs
She rests her weary feet, and plumes her wings;
That here at last she takes her destin'd stand,
Here deigns to linger, ere she leave the land.

ELEGY

ON THE DEATH OF THE LATE FREDERIC
PRINCE OF WALES.

O FOR the warblings of the Doric ote, [tide!
That wept the youth deep-whelm'd in ocean's
Or Mulla's muse, who chang'd her magic note
To chant how dear the laurel'd Sidney died!
Then should my woes in worthy strain be sung,
And with due cypress-crown thy here, O Frederic,
hung.

But though my novice-hands are all too weak
To grasp the founding pipe, my voice unskill'd
The tuneful phrase of poetry to speak,
Uncouth the cadence of my carols wild:
A nation's tears shall teach my song to trace
The prince that deck'd his crown with every milder grace.

How well he knew to turn from flattery's shrine,
To drop the sweeping pall of scepter'd pride;
Led by calm thought to paths of eglantine,
And rural walks on Isis' tufted side:
To rove at large amid the landkips still, [hill.
Where contemplation sat on Clifden's beech-clad

How, lock'd in pure affection's golden band,
Through sacred wedlock's unambitious ways,
With even step he walk'd, and constant hand,
His temples binding with domestic bays:
Rare pattern of the chaste connubial knot,
Firm in a palace kept, as in the clay-built cot!

* Alfred.

How with discerning choice, to nature true,
He cropp'd the simple flowers, or violet,
Or crocus-bud, that with ambrosial hue
The banks of silver Helicon beset:
Nor feldom wak'd the muse's living lyre
To sounds that call'd around Aonia's listening choir.

How to the few with sparks ethereal stor'd,
He never barr'd his castle's genial gate, [board,
But bade sweet Thomson share the friendly
Soothing with verse divine the toil of state:
Hence fir'd, the bard forsook the flowery plain,
And deck'd the regal mask, and try'd the tragic strain.

INSCRIPTION IN A HERMITAGE

AT ANSLEY-HALL, IN WARWICKSHIRE.

BENEATH this stony roof reclin'd,
I sooth to peace my pensive mind:
And while, to shade my lowly cave,
Embowering elms their umbrage wave;
And while the maple dish is mine,
The beechen cup, unstain'd with wine:
I scorn the gay licentious crowd,
Nor heed the toys that deck the proud.

Within my limits lone and still,
The blackbird pipes in artless trill;
Fast by my couch, congenial guest,
The wren has wove her mossy nest;
From busy scenes, and brighter skies,
To lurk with innocence, she flies;
Here hopes in safe repose to dwell,
Nor aught suspects the sylvan cell.

At morn I take my custom'd round,
To mark how buds yon shrubby mound;
And every opening primrose count,
That trimly paints my blooming mount:
Or o'er the sculptures, quaint and rude,
That grace my gloomy solitude,
I teach in winding wreaths to stray
Fantastic ivy's gadding spray.

At eve, within yon studious nook,
I ope my brass-embossed book,
Pourtray'd with many a holy deed
Of martyrs, crown'd with heavenly meed:
Then, as my taper waxes dim,
Chant, ere I sleep, my measur'd hymn;
And, at the close, the gleams behold
Of parting wings bedropt with gold.

While such pure joys my bliss create,
Who but would smile at guilty state?
Who but would wish his holy lot
In calm oblivion's humble lot?
Who but would cast his pomp away,
To take my staff, and amice gray;
And to the world's tumultuous stage
Prefer the blameless hermitage?

MONODY,

WRITTEN NEAR STRATFORD UPON AVON.

AON, thy rural views, thy pastures wild,
The willows that o'erhang thy twilight edge,
The boughs entangling with th' embattled sedge;

Thy brink with watery foliage quaintly fring'd,
 Thy surface with reflected verdure ting'd;
 Sooth me with many a pensive pleasure mild.
 But while I muse, that here the bard divine
 Whose sacred dust yu high arch'd aisles enclose,
 Where the tall windows rise in stately rows
 Above th' embowering shade,
 Here first, at fancy's fairy-circled shrine,
 Of daises pied his infant offering made;
 Here playful yet, in stripling years unripe,
 Fram'd of thy reeds a shrill and artless pipe:
 Sudden thy beauties, Avon, all are fled,
 As at the waving of some magic wand;
 An holy trance my charmed spirit wings,
 And awful shapes of warriors and of kings
 People the busy mead,
 Like spectres swarming to the wizard's hall;
 And slowly pace, and point with trembling hand
 The wounds ill-cover'd by the purple pall.
 Before me pity seems to stand
 A weeping mourner, smote with anguish fore,
 To see misfortune rend in frantic mood
 His robe, with regal woos embroider'd o'er.
 Pale terror leads the visionary band,
 And sternly shakes his sceptre, dropping blood.

ON THE
 DEATH OF KING GEORGE THE SECOND.

TO MR. SECRETARY PITT.

So stream the sorrows that embalm the brave,
 The tears that science sheds on glory's grave!
 So pure the vows which classic duty pays
 To bless another Brunswick's rising rays!
 O Pitt, if chosen strains have power to steal
 Thy watchful breast awhile from Britain's weal;
 If votive verse from sacred Isis sent,
 Might hope to charm thy manly mind, intent
 On patriot plans, which ancient freedom drew,
 A while with fond attention deign to view
 This ample wreath, which all th' assembled nine
 With skill united have conspir'd to twine.
 Yes, guide and guardian of thy country's cause!
 Thy conscious heart shall hail with just applause
 The duteous muse, whose haste officious brings
 Her blameless offering to the shrine of kings:
 Thy tongue, well-tutor'd in historic lore,
 Can speak her office and her use of yore:
 For such the tribute of ingenuous praise
 Her harp dispens'd in Grecia's golden days;
 Such were the palms in isles of old renown,
 She cull'd, to deck the guiltless monarch's crown;
 When virtuous Pindar told, with Tuscan gore
 How scepter'd Hiero stain'd Sicilia's shore,
 Or to mild Theron's raptur'd eye disclos'd
 Bright vales, where spirits of the brave repos'd:
 Yet still beneath the throne, unbrib'd, she sate;
 The decent handmaid, not the slave of state;
 Pleas'd in the radiance of the regal name
 To blend the lustre of her country's fame:
 For, taught like our's, she dar'd, with prudent
 pride,
 Obedience from dependence to divide:

* Afterwards Lord Chatham. This and the two following poems close the collections of Oxford Verses on their respective occasions; and were written while the author was poetry professor.

Though princes claim'd her tributary lays,
 With truth severe the temper'd partial praise;
 Conscious she kept her native dignity,
 Bold as her flights, and as her numbers free.
 And sure if e'er the muse indulg'd her strains,
 With just regard, to grace heroic reigns,
 Where could her glance a theme of triumph own
 So dear to fame as George's trophied throne?
 At whose firm base thy stedfast soul aspires,
 To wake a mighty nation's ancient fires:
 Aspires to baffle faction's specious claim,
 Rouze England's rage, and give her thunder aim:
 Once more the main her conquering banners
 sweep,

Again her commerce darkens all the deep.
 Thy fix'd resolve renews each firm decree
 That made, that kept of yore, thy country free.
 Call'd by thy voice, nor deaf to war's alarms,
 Its willing youth the rural empire arms:
 Again the lords of Albion's cultur'd plains
 March the firm leaders of their faithful swains;
 As erst stout archers, from the farm or fold.
 Flam'd in the van of many a baron bold.

Nor thine the pomp of indolent debate,
 The war of words, the sophistries of state;
 Nor frigid caution checks thy free design,
 Nor stops thy stream of eloquence divine:
 For thine the privilege, on few bestow'd,
 To seal, to think, to speak, for public good.
 In vain corruption calls her venal tribes:
 One common cause one common end prescribes:
 Nor fear nor fraud, or spares or screens, the foe,
 But spirit prompts, and valour strikes, the blow.

O Pitt, while honour points thy liberal plan,
 And o'er the minister exalts the man,
 Isis congenial greets thy faithful sway,
 Nor scorns to bid a statesman grace her lay.
 For 'tis not her's, by false connections drawn,
 At splendid slavery's sordid shrine to fawn;
 Each native effort of the feeling breast,
 To friends, to foes, in equal fear, suppress:
 'Tis not for her to purchase or pursue
 The phantom favours of the cringing crew:
 More useful toils her studious hours engage,
 And fairer lessons fill her spotless page:
 Beneath ambition, but above disgrace,
 With nobler arts she forms the rising race:
 With happier tasks, and less refin'd pretence,
 In elder times, she woo'd munificence
 To rear her arched roofs in regal guise,
 And lift her temples nearer to the skies;
 Princes and prelates stretch'd the social hand,
 To form, diffuse, and fix, her high command:
 From kings she claim'd, yet scorn'd to seek, the prize, [wife.
 From kings, like George, benignant, just, and
 Lo, this her genuine lore.—Nor thou refuse
 This humble present of no partial muse [ful youth
 From that calm bower*, which nurs'd thy thought—
 In the pure precepts of Athenian truth:
 Where first the form of British liberty
 Beam'd in full radiance on thy musing eye;
 That form, whose mich sublime, with equal awe,
 In the same shade unblemish'd Somers saw:

* Trinity College, Oxford; in which also Lord Somers, and James Harrington, author of the Oceano, were educated.

Where once (for well she lov'd the friendly grove
Which every classic grace had learn'd to rove)
Her whisper's wak'd sage Harrington to feign
The blessings of her visionary reign;
That reign, which now no more an empty theme,
Adorns philosophy's ideal dream,
But crowns at last, beneath a George's smile,
In full reality this favour'd isle.

ON THE MARRIAGE OF THE KING,
TO HER MAJESTY. 1761.

WHEN first the kingdom to thy virtues due
Rose from the billow deep in distant view;
When Albion's isle, old ocean's peerless pride,
Tower'd in imperial state above the tide;
What bright ideas of the new domain
Form'd the fair prospect of thy promis'd reign!
And well with conscious joys thy breast might beat

That Albion was ordain'd thy regal seat:
Lo! this the land, where freedom's sacred rage
Has glow'd untam'd through many a martial age.
Here patriot Alfred, stain'd with Danish blood,
Rear'd on one base the king's the people's good:
Here Henry's archers fram'd the stubborn bow
That laid Alanzon's haughty helmet low;
Here wak'd the flame, that still superior braves
The proudest threats of Gaul's ambitious slaves:
Here chivalry, stern school of valour old,
Her noblest feats of knightly fame enroll'd;
Heroic champions caught the clarion's call,
And throng'd the feast in Edward's banner'd hall:
While chiefs, like George, approv'd in worth alone,
Unlock'd chaste beauty's adamant zone.
Lo! the fam'd isle, which hails thy chosen sway,
What fertile fields her temperate suns display!
Where property secures the conscious swain,
And guards, while plenty gives, the golden grain:
Hence with ripe stores her villages abound,
Her airy downs with scatter'd sheep resound;
Fresh are her pastures with unceasing rills,
And future navies crown her darksome hills.
To bear her formidable glory far,
Behold her opulence of hoarded war!
See, from her ports a thousand banners stream;
On every coast her vengeful lightnings gleam!
Meantime, remote from ruin's armed hand,
In peaceful majesty her cities stand;
Whose splendid domes, and busy streets, declare,
Their firmest fort, a king's parental care.

And O! blest queen, if e'er the magic powers
Of warbled truth have won thy musing hours;
Here poetry, from awful days of yore,
Has pour'd her genuine gifts of raptur'd lore.
Mid oaken bowers, with holy verdure wreath'd,
In druid-songs her solemn spirit breath'd:
While cunning bards at ancient banquets hung
Of paynim foes defied, and trophies hung.
Here Spenser tun'd his mystic minstrelsy,
And dress'd in fairy robes a queen like thee.
Here, boldly mark'd with every living hue,
Nature's unbounded portrait Shakspeare drew:
But chief, the dreadful groupe of human woes
The daring artist's tragic pencil chose;
Explos'd the pangs that rend the royal breast,
Those wounds that lurk beneath the tissued vest!

Lo! this the land, whence Milton's muse of fire
High soar'd to steal from heaven a seraph's lyre;
And told the golden ties of wedded love
In sacred Eden's amaranthine grove.

Think too, majestic bride, the favour'd clime,
Where science sits enshrin'd in roofs sublime.
O mark, how green her wood of ancient bays
O'er Isis' marge in many a chaplet strays!
Thither, if haply some distinguish'd flower
Of these mix'd blooms from that ambrosial bower,
Might catch thy glance, and rich in nature's hue,
Entwine thy diadem with honour due;
If seemly gifts the train of Phebus pay,
To deck imperial Hymen's festive day;
Thither thyself shall haste, and mildly deign
To tread with nymph-like step the conscious plain;
Pleas'd in the muse's nook, with decent pride,
To throw the scepter's pall of state aside:
Nor from the shade shall George be long away,
That claims Charlotta's love, and courts her stay.

These are Britannia's praises. Deign to trace
With rapt reflection freedom's favourite race!
But though the generous isle, in arts and arms,
Thus stand supreme, in nature's choicest charms;
'Though George and conquest guard her sea-girt
throne,
One happier blessing still she calls her own;
And, proud to cull the fairest wreath of fame,
Crowns her chief honours with a Charlotte's
name.

ON THE

BIRTH OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

WRITTEN AFTER THE INSTALLATION AT WINDSOR, IN THE SAME YEAR, 1762.

IMPERIAL dome of Edward wife and brave!
Where warlike honour's brightest banners wave;
At whose proud tilts, unmatch'd for hardy deeds,
Heroic kings have frown'd on barbed steeds:
Though now no more thy crested chiefs advance
In arm'd array, nor grasp the glittering lance;
Though knighthood boasts the martial pomp no
more

That grac'd its gorgeous festivals of yore;
Say, conscious dome, if e'er thy marshal'd knights
So nobly deck'd their old majestic rites,
As when, high thron'd amid thy trophied shrine,
George shone the leader of the garter'd line?

Yet future triumphs, Windsor, still remain;
Still may thy bowers receive as brave a train;
For lo! to Britain and her favour'd pair,
Heaven's high command has sent a sacred heir!
Him the bold pattern of his patriot sire
Shall fill with early fame's immortal fire:
In life's fresh spring, ere buds the promis'd prime,
His thoughts shall mount to virtue's meed sublime.
The patriot fire shall catch, with sure preface,
Each liberal omen of his opening age;
Then to thy courts shall lead, with conscious joy,
In rippling beauty's bloom, the princely boy;
There firmly wreath the braid of heavenly dye,
True valour's badge, around his tender thigh.

Meantime, thy royal piles that rise elate
With many an antique tower, in massy state,
In the young champion's musing mind shall raise
Vast images of Albion's elder days.

While, as around his eager glance explores
Thy chambers, rough with war's constructed stores,
Rude helms, and bruised shields, barbaric spoils
Of ancient chivalry's undaunted toils;
Amid the dusky trappings, hung on high
Young Edward's fable mail shall strike his eye:
Shall fire the youth, to crown his riper years
With rival Cressy's, and a new Poitiers;
On the fame wall, the same triumphal base,
His own victorious monuments to place.

Nor can a fairer kindred title move
His emulative age to glory's love
Than Edward, laureate prince. In letter'd truth,
Oxford, sage mother, school'd his studious youth:
Her simple institutes, and rigid lore,
The royal nursing unreluctant bore;
Nor shunn'd, at pensive eve, with lonesome pace
The cloister's moonlight-chequer'd floor to trace;
Nor scorn'd to mark the sun, at mattins due,
Stream through the storied window's holy hue.

And O, young prince, be thine his moral praise;
Nor seek in fields of blood his warrior bays.
War has its charms terrific. Far and wide
When stands th' embattled host in banner'd pride;
O'er the vext plain when the shrill clangours run,
And the long phalanx flashes in the sun;
When now no dangers of the deathful day
Mar the bright scene, nor break the firm array;
Full oft, too rashly glews with fond delight
The youthful breast, and asks the future fight;
Nor knows that horror's form, a spectre wan,
Stalks, yet unseen, along the gleamy van.

May no such rage be thine: No dazzling ray
Of specious fame thy stedfast feet betray.
Be thine domestic glory's radiant calm,
Be thine the sceptre wreath'd with many a palm:
Be thine the throne with peaceful emblems hung,
The silver lyre to milder conquest strung!

Instead of glorious feats achiev'd in arms,
Bid rising arts display their mimic charms!
Just to thy country's fame, in tranquil days,
Record the past, and rouse to future praise:
Before the public eye, in breathing brass,
Bid thy fam'd father's mighty triumphs pass:
Swell the broad arch with haughty Cuba's fall,
And clothe with Minden's plain th' historic hall.

Then mourn not, Edward's dome, thine ancient boast,

Thy tournaments, and lifted combats lost!
From Arthur's board, no more, proud castle, mourn
Adventurous valour's Gothic trophies torn!
Those elfin charms, that held in magic night
His elder fame, and dimm'd its genuine light,
At length dissolve in truth's meridian ray,
And the bright order bursts to perfect day:
The mystic round, begirt with bolder peers,
On virtues base it's rescued glory rears:
Sees civil prowess mightier acts achieve,
Sees meek humanity distress relieve;
Adopts the worth that bids the conflict cease,
And claims its honours from the chiefs of peace.

VERSES

ON SIR JOSHUA REYNOLD'S PAINTED WINDOW
AT NEW-COLLEGE, OXFORD.

Art, stay thy treacherous hand, forbear to trace
Those faultless forms of elegance and grace!

Ah, cease to spread the bright transparent mass,
With Titian's pencil, o'er the speaking glass!
Nor steal, by strokes of art with truth combin'd,
The fond illusions of my wayward mind!
For long, enamour'd of a barbarous age,
A faithless truant to the classic page;
Long have I lov'd to catch the simple chime
Of minstrel-harps, and spell the fabling rime;
To view the festive rites, the knightly play,
That deck'd heroic Albion's elder day;
To mark the mould'ring halls of barons bold,
And the rough castle, cast in giant mould;
With Gothic manners Gothic arts explore,
And muse on the magnificence of yore.

But chief, enraptur'd have I lov'd to roam,
A lingering votary, the vaulted dome,
Where the tall shafts, that mount in massy pride,
Their mingling branches shoot from side to side,
Where elfin sculptors, with fantastic elw,
O'er the long roof their wild embroidery drew;
Where superstition, with capricious hand
In many a maze the wreathed window plann'd,
With hues romantic ting'd the gorgeous pane,
To fill with holy light the wondrous fane;
To aid the builder's model, richly rude,
By no Vitruvian symmetry subdu'd;
To suit the genius of the mystic pile:
Whilst as around the far-retiring isle,
And fretted shrines, with hoary trophies hung,
Her dark illumination wide she flung,
With new solemnity, the nooks profound,
The caves of death, and the dim arches frown'd.
From bliss long felt unwillingly we part:
Ah, spare the weakness of a lover's heart!
Chase not the phantoms of my fairy dream,
Phantoms that shrink at reason's painful gleam!
That softer touch, insidious artist stay,
Nor to new joys my struggling breast betray!

Such was a pensive bard's mistaken strain.—
But, oh, of ravish'd pleasures why complain?
No more the matchless skill I call unkind
That strives to disenchant my cheated mind.
For when again I view thy chaste design,
The just proportion, and the genuine line;
Those native portraitures of Attic art,
That from the lucid surface seem to start
Those tints, that steal no glories from the day;
Nor ask the sun to lend his streaming ray:
The doubtful radiance of contending dyes,
That faintly mingle, yet distinctly rise;
Twixt light and shade the transitory strife;
The feature blooming with immortal life:
The stole in casual foldings taught to flow,
Nor with ambitious ornaments to glow;
The tread majestic, and the beaming eye
That lifted speaks its commerce with the sky;
Heaven's golden emanation, gleaming mild
O'er the mean cradle of the virgin's child:
Sudden, the sombrous imagery is fled,
Which late my visionary rapture fed:
Thy powerful hand has broke the Gothic chain,
And brought my bosom back to truth again:
To truth, by no peculiar taste confin'd,
Whose universal pattern strikes mankind;
To truth, whose bold and unresisted aim
Checks frail caprice, and fashion's fickle claim;
To truth, whose charms deception's magic quell,
And bind coy fancy in a stronger spell.

Ye brawny prophets, that in robes so rich,
 At distance due, possess the crisped nich;
 Ye rows of patriarchs, that sublimely rear'd
 Diffuse a proud primeval length of beard:
 Ye faints, who clad in crimson's bright array,
 More pride than humble poverty display:
 Ye virgins meek, that wear the palmy crown
 Of patient faith, and yet so fiercely frown:
 Ye angels, that from clouds of gold recline,
 But boast no semblance to a race divine:
 Ye tragic tales of legendary lore,
 That draw devotion's ready tear no more;
 Ye martyrdoms of unenlighten'd days,
 Ye miracles, that now no wonder raise:
 Shapes, that with one broad glare the gazer strike,
 Kings, bishops, nuns, apostles, all alike!
 Ye colours, that th' unwary sight amaze,
 And only dazzle in the noontide blaze!

No more the sacred window's round disgrace,
 But yield to Grecian groupes the shining space.
 Lo, from the canvas beauty shifts her throne,
 Lo, picture's powers a new formation own!
 Behold, the prints upon the crystal plain,
 With her own energy, th' expressive stain!
 The mighty master spreads his mimic toil
 More wide, nor only blends the breathing oil;
 But calls the lineaments of life complete
 From genial alchymy's creative heat;
 Obedient forms to the bright fusion gives,
 While in the warm enamel nature lives. [height,
 Reynolds, 'tis thine, from the broad window's
 To add new lustre to religious light:
 Not of its pomp to strip this ancient shrine,
 But bid that pomp with purer radiance shine:
 With arts unknown before, to reconcile
 The willing graces to the Gothic pile.

O D E S.

ODE I:

TO SLEEP:

ON this my pensive pillow, gentle sleep!
 Descend, in all thy downy plumage drest:
 Wipe with thy wing these eyes that wake to weep,
 And place thy crown of poppies on my breast.

O sleep my senses in oblivion's balm,
 And sooth my throbbing pulse with lenient hand;
 This tempest of my boiling blood be calm!—
 Despair grows mild at thy supreme command.

Yet ah! in vain, familiar with the gloom,
 And sadly toiling through the tedious night,
 I seek sweet slumber, while that virgin bloom,
 For ever hovering, haunts my wretched sight.

Nor would the dawning day my sorrows charm:
 Black midnight, and the blaze of noon, alike
 To me appear, while with uplifted arm
 Death stands prepar'd, but still delays, to strike.

ODE II,

THE HAMLET.

Written in Whitewood Forest.

THE hinds how blest, who ne'er beguil'd
 To quit their hamlet's hawthorn-wild;
 Nor haunt the crowd, nor tempt the main,
 For splendid care, and guilty gain!

When morning's twilight-tinctur'd beam
 Strikes their low thatch with slanting gleam,
 They rove abroad in ether blue,
 To dip the scythe in fragrant dew:
 The sheaf to bind, the beech to fell
 That nodding shades a craggy dell.

Midst gloomy glades, in warbles clear,
 Wild nature's sweetest notes they hear:

On green untrodden banks they view
 The hyacinth's neglected hue:
 In their lone haunts, and woodland round,
 They spy the squirrel's airy bounds:
 And startle from her ashen spray,
 Across the glen, the screaming jay:
 Each native charm their steps explore
 Of solitude's sequester'd store.

For them the moon with cloudless ray
 Mounts, to illume their homeward way:
 Their weary spirits to relieve,
 The meadows incense breathe at eve,
 No riot mars the simple fare
 That o'er a glimmering hearth they share:
 But when the curfew's measur'd roar
 Duly, the darkening vallies o'er,
 Has echoed from the distant town,
 They wish no beds of cygnet-down,
 No tropic canopies, to close
 Their drooping eyes in quick repose.

Their little sons, who spread the bloom
 Of health around the clay-built room,
 Or through the primros'd coppice stray,
 Or gambol in the new-mown hay;
 Or quaintly braid the cowslip-twine,
 Or drive afield the tardy kine;
 Or hasten from the sultry hill
 To loiter at the shady rill;
 Or climb the tall pine's gloomy crest
 To robe the raven's ancient nest.

Their humble porch with honied flowers
 The curling woodbine's shade embowers:
 From the small garden's thymy mound
 Their bees in busy swarms resound:
 Nor fell disease, before his time,
 Hastens to consume life's golden prime:
 But when their temples long have wore
 The silver crown of tresses hoar;
 As studious still calm peace to keep,
 Beneath a flowery turf they sleep.

ODE III.

WRITTEN AT VALE-ROYAL ABBEY, IN CHESHIRE*.

As evening slowly spreads his mantle hoar,
No ruder founts the bounded valley fill,
Than the faint din, from yonder sedge shore,
Of rushing waters, and the murmuring mill.

How sunk the scene, where cloister'd leisure
mus'd!

Where war-worn Edward paid his awful vow;
And, lavish of magnificence, diffus'd [brow!
His crowded spires o'er the broad mountain's

The golden fans, that o'er the turrets strown,
Quick-glancing to the sun, wild music made;
Are rest, and every battlement o'ergrown
With knotted thorns, and the tall sapling's shade.

The prickly thistle sheds it's plumy crest,
And matted nettles shade the crumbling mafs,
Where shone the pavement's surface smooth, im-
prest

With rich reflection of the storied glafs.

Here hardy chieftans slept in proud repose,
Sublimely shrin'd in gorgeous imagery;
And through the lessening aisles, in radiant rows,
Their consecrated banners hung on high.

There oxen browse, and there the fable yew
Through the dun void displays its baleful glooms;
And sheds in lingering drops ungenial dew,
O'er the forgotten graves, and scatter'd tombs.

By the slow clock, in stately-measur'd chime,
That from the massy tower tremendous toll'd,
No more the ploughman counts the tedious time,
Nor distant shepherd pens his twilight fold.

High o'er the trackless heath at midnight seen,
No more the windows, rang'd in long array,
(Where the tall shaft and fretted nook between Thick ivy twines) the taper'd rites betray.

Ev'n now, amid the wavering ivy-wreaths, (While kindred thoughts the pensive founts inspire)

When the weak breeze in many a whisper breathes,
I seem to listen to the chanting quire.—

As o'er these shatter'd towers intent we muse,
Though rear'd by charity's capricious zeal,
Yet can our breasts soft pity's sigh refuse,
Or conscious candour's modest plea conceal?

For though the forcerefs, superstition blind,
Amid the pomp of dreadful sacrifice,
O'er the dim roofs, to cheat the tranced mind,
Oft bade her visionary-gleams arise:

Though the vain hours unsocial sloth beguill'd,
While the still cloister's gate oblivion lock'd;
And through the chambers pale, to slumbers mild
Wan indolence her drowsy cradle rock'd:

Yet hence, enthron'd in venerable state,
Proud hospitality dispens'd her store:

* Founded by King Edward the First, about the year 1300, in consequence of a vow which he made when in danger of being shipwrecked, during his return from a crusade.

Ah, see, beneath yon tower's unvaulted gate,
Forlorn she sits upon the brambled floor!

Her ponderous vase, with Gothic portraiture
Emboss'd, no more with balmy moisture flows;
Mid the mix'd shards o'erwhelm'd in dust obscure,
No more, as erst, the golden goblet glows.

Sore beat by storms in glory's arduous way,
Here might ambition muse, a pilgrim sage:
Here raptur'd see, religion's evening ray
Gild the calm walks of his reposing age.

Here ancient art her dedal fancies play'd
In the quaint mazes of the crisped roof;
In mellow glooms the speaking pane array'd,
And rang'd the cluster'd column, massy-proof.

Here learning, guarded from a barbarous age,
Hover'd awhile, nor dar'd attempt the day;
But patient trac'd upon the pictur'd page
The holy legend, or heroic lay.

Hither the solitary minstrel came
An honour'd guest, while the grim evening sky
Hung lowering, and around the social flame
Tun'd his bold harp to tales of chivalry.

Thus sings the muse, all pensive and alone;
Nor scorns, within the deep sanc's inmost cell,
To pluck the gray moss from the mantled stone,
Some holy founder's mouldering name to spell.

Thus sings the muse:—yet partial as the fings,
With fond regret surveys these ruin'd piles:
And with fair images of ancient things
The captive bard's obsequious mind beguiles.

But much we pardon to th' ingenious muse;
Her fairy shapes are trick'd by fancy's pen:
Severer reason forms far other views,
And scans the scene with philosophic ken.

From these deserted domes, new glories rise;
More useful institutes, adorning man,
Manners enlarg'd, and new civilities,
On fresh foundations build the social plan.

Science, on ampler plume, a bolder flight
Essays, escap'd from superstition's shrine:
While freed religion, like primeval light
Bursting from chaos, spreads her warmth divine.

ODE IV.

THE FIRST OF APRIL.

With dalliance rude young zephyr woos
Coy May. Full oft with kind excuse
The boisterous boy the fair denies,
Or, with a scornful smile complies.

Mindful of disaster past,
And shrinking at the northern blast,
The fleet storm returning still,
The morning hoar, and evening chill;
Reluctant comes the timid Spring.
Scarce a bee, with airy ring,
Murmurs the blossom'd boughs around,
That clothe the garden's southern bound:
Scarce a sickly straggling flower
Decks the rough castle's rifted tower:

Scarce the hardy primrose peeps
 From the dark dell's entangled steep:
 O'er the field of waving broom,
 Slowly shoots the golden bloom:
 And, but by fits, the furze-clad dale
 Tinctures the transitory gale.
 While from the shrubbery's naked maze,
 Where the vegetable blaze
 Of Flora's brightest 'broidery shone,
 Every chequer'd charm is flown;
 Save that the lilac hangs to view
 Its bursting gems in clusters blue.

Scant along the ridgy land
 The beans their new-born ranks expand:
 The fresh-turn'd soil with tender blades
 Thinly the sprouting barley shades;
 Fringing the forest's devious edge,
 Half rob'd appears the hawthorn hedge;
 Or to the distant eye displays
 Weakly green its budding sprays.

The swallow, for a moment seen,
 Skims in haste the village green:
 From the gray moor, on feeble wing,
 The screaming plovers idly spring:
 The butterfly, gay-painted soon,
 Explores awhile the tepid noon;
 And fondly trusts its tender dyes
 To fickle suns, and flattering skies.

Fraught with a transient, frozen shower,
 If a cloud should haply lower,
 Sailing o'er the landscape dark,
 Mute on a sudden is the lark;
 But when gleams the sun again
 O'er the pearl-besprinkled plain,
 And from behind his watery veil
 Looks through the thin-defending hail;
 She mouts, and lessening to the light,
 Salutes the blithe return of light,
 And high her tuneful track pursues
 Mid the dim rainbow's scatter'd hues.

Where in venerable rows
 Widely waving oaks enclose
 The moat of yonder antique hall,
 Swarm the rooks with clamorous call;
 And to the toils of nature true,
 Wreath their capacious nests anew.

Musing through the lawnly park,
 The lonely poet loves to mark,
 How various greens in faint degrees
 Tinge the tall groupes of various trees;
 While, carelefs of the changing year,
 The pine cerulean, never fear,
 Towers distinguish'd from the rest,
 And proudly vaunts her winter vest.

Within some whispering osier istle,
 Where Glyn's low banks neglected smile;
 And each trim meadow still retains
 The wint'ry torrent's oozy stains:
 Beneath a willow, long forsook,
 The fisher seeks his custom'd nook;
 And bursting through the crackling sedge
 That crowns the current's cavern'd edge,
 He startles from the bordering wood
 The bashful wild-duck's early brood.

O'er the broad downs, a novel race,
 Frisk the lambs with faultering pace,
 And with eager bleatings fill
 The fofs that skirts the beacon'd hill.

His free-born vigour yet unbroke
 To lordly man's usurping yoke,
 The bounding colt forgets to play,
 Basking beneath the noontide ray,
 And stretch'd among the daifies pide
 Of a green dingle's sloping side:
 While far beneath, where nature spreads
 Her boundless length of level meads,
 In loose luxuriance taught to stray
 A thousand tumbling rills inlay
 With silver veins the vale, or pass
 Redundant through the sparkling grass.

Yet, in these presages rude,
 Midd' her pensive solitude,
 Fancy, with prophetic glance,
 Sees the teeming months advance;
 The field; the forest, green and gay,
 The dappled slope, the tedded hay;
 Sees the reddening orchard blow,
 The harvest wave, the vintage flow:
 Sees June unfold his glossy robe
 Of thousand hues o'er all the globe:
 Sees Ceres grasp her crown of corn,
 And plenty load her ample horn.

ODE V.

SENT TO MR. UPTON, ON HIS EDITION OF THE FAERIE QUEEN.

As oft reclin'd on Cherwell's shelving shore,
 I trac'd romantic Spenser's moral page;
 And sooth'd my sorrows with the dulcet lore
 Which fancy fabled in her elfin age:

Much would I grieve, that envious time so soon
 O'er the lov'd strain had cast his dim disguise;
 As lowering clouds, in April's brightest noon,
 Mar the pure splendours of the purple skies.

Sage Upton came, from every mystic tale
 To chase the gloom that hung o'er Fairy ground:
 His wizard hand unlocks each guarded vale,
 And opens each flowery forest's magic bound.

Thus, never knight with mortal arms essay'd
 The castle of proud Busyrane to quell;
 Till Britomart her beamy shield display'd,
 And broke with golden spear the mighty spell:

The dauntless maid with hardy step explor'd
 Each room, array'd in glistening imagery;
 And through th' enchanted chamber, richly stor'd,
 Saw Cupid's stately mask come sweeping by*—

At this, where'er, in distant region seen,
 She roves, embower'd with many a spangled bough,
 Mild Una, lifting her majestic mien,
 Braids with a brighter wreath her radiant brow.

At this, in hopeless sorrow dropping long,
 Her painted wings imagination plumes;
 Pleas'd that her laureate votary's rescued song
 Its native charm, and genuine grace, resumes.

ODE VI.

THE SUICIDE.

BENEATH the beech, whose branches bare
Smit with the lightning's livid glare,
O'erhang the craggy road,
And whistle hollow as they wave;
Within a solitary grave,
A slayer of himself* holds his accurs'd abode.

Lour'd the grim morn, in murky dyes
Damp mists involv'd the fowling skies,
And dimm'd the straggling day;
As by the brook that lingering laves
Yon rush-grown moor with fable waves,
Full of the dark resolve he took his fullen way.

I mark'd his desultory pace,
His gestures strange, and varying face,
With many a mutter'd sound;
And ah! too late aghast I view'd
The reeking blade, the hand embru'd:
He fell, and groaning grasp'd in agony the ground.

Full many a melancholy night
He watch'd the slow return of light;
And fought the powers of sleep,
To spread a momentary calm
O'er his sad couch, and in the balm
Of bland oblivion's dews his burning eyes to steep.

Full oft, unknowing and unknown,
He wore his endless noons alone,
Amid th' autumnal wood:
Oft was he wont, in hasty fit,
Abrupt the social board to quit,
And gaze with eager glance upon the tumbling
flood.

Beck'ning the wretch to torments new,
Despair, for ever in his view,
A spectre pale, appear'd;
While, as the shades of eve arose
And brought the day's unwelcome close,
More horrible and huge her gaint-shape she rear'd.

"Is this, mistaken scorn will cry,
"Is this the youth, whose genius high
"Could build the genuine rhyme?
"Whose bosom mild the favouring muse
"Had stor'd with all her ample views,
"Parent of fairest deeds, and purposes sublime."

Ah! from the muse that bosom mild
By treacherous magic was beguil'd,
To strike the deathful blow:
She fill'd his soft ingenuous mind
With many a feeling too refin'd,
And rous'd to livelier pangs his wakeful sense of woe.

Though doom'd hard penury to prove,
And the sharp stings of hopeles love;
To griefs congenial prone,
More wounds than nature gave he knew,
While misery's form his fancy drew
In dark ideal hues, and horrors not its own.

* "The Slayer of himself," is used by Dryden for a suicide.

Then wish not o'er his earthy tomb
The baleful night-shade's lurid bloom
To drop its deadly dew:
Nor oh! forbid the twisted thorn,
That rudely binds his turf forlorn,
With spring's green-swelling buds to vegetate anew.

What though no marble-piled bust
Adorn his defoliated dust,
With speaking sculpture wrought?
Pity shall woo the weeping nine,
To build a visionary shrine,
Hung with unfading flowers, from fairy regions brought.

What though refus'd each chanted rite?
Here viewless mourners shall delight
To touch the shadowy shell:
And Petrarch's harp, that wept the doom
Of Laura, lost in early bloom,
In many a pensive pause shall seem to ring his knell.

To sooth a lone, unhallow'd shade,
This votive dirge sad duty paid,
Within an ivied nook:
Sudden the half-funk orb of day
More radiant shot its parting ray,
And thus a cherub-voice my charm'd attention took.

"Forbear, fond bard, thy partial praise;
"Nor thus for guilt in specious lays
"The wreath of glory twine:
"In vain with hues of gorgeous glow
"Gay fancy gives her vest to flow,
"Unleis truth's matron-hand the floating folds
"confine.

"Just Heaven, man's fortitude to prove,
"Permits through life in large to rove
"The tribes of hell-born woe:
"Yet the same power that wisely sends
"Life's fiercest ills, indulgent lends
"Religion's golden shield to break th' embat-
"tled foe.

"Her aid divine had lull'd to rest
"Yon foul self-murderer's throbbing breast,
"And stay'd the rising storm:
"Had bade the sun of hope appear
"To gild his darken'd hemisphere,
"And give the wonted bloom to nature's blasted
"form.

"Vain man! 'tis Heaven's prerogative
"To take, what first it deign'd to give,
"Thy tributary breath:
"In a awful expectation plac'd,
"Await thy doom, nor impious haste
"To pluck from God's right hand his instru-
"ments of death."

ODE VII.

SENT TO A FRIEND, ON HIS LEAVING A FA-VOURITE VILLAGE IN HAMPSHIRE.

Ah mourn, thou lov'd retreat! no more
Shall classic steps thy scenes explore!

When morn's pale rays but faintly peep
 O'er yonder oak-crown'd airy steep,
 Who now shall climb its brows to view
 The length of landscape, ever new,
 Where Summer flings, in carelefs pride,
 Her varied vesture far and wide!
 Who mark, beneath, each village-charm,
 Or grange, or elm-encircled farm:
 The fliny dove-cote's crowded roof,
 Watch'd by the kite that fails aloof:
 The tufted pines, whose umbrage tall
 Darkens the long-deserted hall:
 The veteran beech, that on the plain
 Collects at eve the playful train;
 The cot that smokes with early fire,
 The low-roof'd fane's embosom'd spire!

Who now shall indolently stray
 Through the deep forest's tangled way,
 Pleas'd at his custom'd task to find
 The well known hoary-tressed hind,
 That toils with feeble hands to glean
 Of wither'd boughs his pittance mean!
 Who mid thy nooks of hazle sit,
 Lost in some melancholy fit;
 And listening to the raven's croak,
 The distant flail, the falling oak!
 Who, through the sunshine and the shower,
 Defery the rainbow-painted tower?
 Who, wandering at return of May,
 Catch the first cuckoo's vernal lay?
 Who, nusing waste the summer hour,
 Where high o'er-arching trees embow'r
 The grassy lane, so rarely pac'd,
 With azure flowrets idly grac'd!
 Unnotic'd now, at twilight's dawn
 Returning reapers cross the lawn;
 Nor fond attention loves to note
 The weather's bell from folds remote:
 While, own'd by no poetic eye,
 Thy pensive evenings shade the sky!

For lo! the bard who rapture found
 In every rural sight or sound;
 Whose genius warm, and judgment chaste,
 No charm of genuine nature past;
 Who felt the muse's purest fires,
 Far from thy favour'd haunt retires:
 Who peopled all thy vocal bowers
 With shadowy shapes, and airy powers.

Behold, a dread repose resumes,
 As erst, thy sad sequeter'd glooms!
 From the deep dell, where shaggy roots
 Fringe the rough brink with wreathed shoots,
 Th' unwilling genius flies forlorn,
 His primrose chaplet rudely torn.
 With hollow shriek the nymphs forsake
 The pathlefs copse, and hedge-row brake:
 Where the delv'd mountains' s headlong side
 Its chalky entrails opens wide,
 On the green fummit, ambush'd high,
 No longer echo loves to lie.
 No pearl-crown'd maids, with wily look,
 Rise beckoning from the reedy brook.
 Around the glowworm's glimmering bank,
 No fairies run in fiery rank;
 Nor brush, half-seen, in airy tread,
 The violet's unprinted head.

But fancy, from the thicket's brown,
 The glades that wear a conscious frown,
 The forest-oaks, that pale and lone,
 Nod to the blait with hoarfer tone,
 Rough glens, and fullen waterfalls,
 Her bright ideal offspring calls.

So by some sage inchanter's spell,
 (As old Arabian fablers tell)
 Amid the solitary wild,
 Luxuriant gardens gaily smil'd:
 From sapphire rocks the fountains stream'd,
 With golden fruit the branches beam'd;
 Fair forms, in every wonderous wood,
 Or lightly tripp'd, or solemn flood;
 And oft, retreating from the view,
 Betray'd, at distance, beauties new:
 While gleaming o'er the crisped bowers
 Rich spires arose, and sparkling towers.
 If bound on service new to go,
 The master of the magic show,
 His transitory charm withdrew,
 Away th' illusive landscape flew:
 Dun clouds obscur'd the groves of gold,
 Blue lightning smote the blooming mold;
 In visionary glory rear'd,
 The gorgeous castle disappear'd:
 And a bare heath's unfruitful plain
 Usurp'd the wizard's proud domain.

ODE VIII.

THE COMPLAINT OF CHERWELL*.

ALL pensive from her oster-woven bow'r
 Cherwell arose. Around her darkening edge
 Pale eve began the steaming mist to pour,
 And breezes fann'd by fits the rustling sedge;
 She rose, and thus the cried in deep despair,
 And tore the rusty wreath that bound her streaming hair.

Ah! why, she cried, should Isis share alone,
 The tributary gifts of tuneful fame!
 Shall every song her happier influence own,
 And stamp with partial praise her favourite
 name?

While I, alike to those proud domes allied,
 Nor hear the muse's call, nor boast a classic tide.

No chosen son of all yon fabled band
 Bids my loose locks their glossy length diffuse;
 Nor sees my coral-cinctur'd stole expand
 Its folds, besprent with Spring's unnumber'd hues:

No poet builds my grotto's dripping cell,
 Nor studs my crystal throne with many a speckled shell.

In Isis' vase if fancy's eye discern
 Majestic towers embos'd in sculpture high;
 Lo! milder glories mark my modest urn,
 The simple scenes of pastoral imagery:
 What though the pace sublime, a stately queen?
 Mine is the gentle grace, the meek retiring mien.

* One of the rivers at Oxford.

Proud nymph, since late the muse thy triumphs sung,
 No more with mine thy scornful Naiads play, (While Cynthia's lamp o'er the broad vale is hung),
 Where meet our streams, indulging short delay:
 Nomore, thy crown to braid, thou deign'st to take
 My cress-born flowers that float in many a shady lake.

Vain bards! can Isis win the raptur'd soul,
 Where art each wilder watery charm invades?
 Whose waves, in measur'd volumes taught to roll,
 Or stagnant sleep, or rush in white cascades:
 Whose banks with echoing industry resound,
 Fenc'd by the foam-beat pier, and torrent-braving mound.

Lo! here no commerce spreads the fervent toil,
 To pour pollution o'er my virgin tide;
 The freshness of my pastures to defile,
 Or bruise the matted groves that fringe my side:
 But solitude, on this sequester'd bank,
 Mid the moist lilies sits, attir'd in mantle dank.

No ruder sounds my grazing herds affright,
 Nor mar the milk-maid's solitary song:
 The jealous halcyon wheels her humble flight,
 And hides her emerald wing my reeds among;
 All unalarm'd, save when the genial May Bids wake my peopled shores, and rears the ripen'd hay.

Then scorn no more this unrequited scene;
 So to new notes shall my coy echo string
 Her lonely harp. Hither the brow serene,
 And the slow pace of contemplation bring:
 Nor call in vain inspiring ecstacy
 To bid her visions meet the frenzy-rolling eye.

Whate'er the theme: if unrequited love
 Seek, all unseen, his bashful griefs to breathe;
 Or fame to bolder flights the bosom move,
 Waving aloft the glorious epic wreath;
 Here hail the muses: from the busy throng
 Remote, where fancy dwells, and nature prompts the song.

THE CRUSADE.

Advertisement.

KING RICHARD the first, celebrated for his achievements in the crusades, was no less distinguished for his patronage of the provincial minstrels, and his own compositions in their species of poetry. Returning from one of his expeditions in the holy land, in disguise, he was imprisoned in a castle of Leopold duke of Austria. His favourite minstrel, Blondel de Nefle, having traversed all Germany, in search of his master, at length came to a castle in which he found there was only one prisoner, and whose name was unknown. Suspecting that he had made the desired discovery, he seated himself under a window of the prisoner's apartment; and began a song or ode, which the king and himself had formerly composed together. When the prisoner, who was King Richard, heard the song, he knew that Blondel must be the singer:

and when Blondel paused about the middle, the king began the remainder, and completed it. The following ode is supposed to be this joint composition of the minstrel and King Richard.

BOUND for holy Palestine,
 Nimbly we brush'd the level brine,
 All in azure steel array'd;
 O'er the wave our weapons play'd,
 And made the dancing billows glow;
 High upon the trophied prow,
 Many a warrior-minstrel swung
 His sounding harp, and boldly sung:
 " Syrian virgins, wail and weep,
 " English Richard ploughs the deep!
 " Tremble, watchmen, as ye spy,
 " From distant towers, with anxious eye,
 " The radiant range of shield and lance
 " Down Damascus' hills advance:
 " From Sion's turrets, as afar
 " Ye ken the march of Europe's war!
 " Saladin, thou paynim king,
 " From Albion's isle revenge we bring!
 " On Acon's * spiry citadel,
 " Though to the gale thy banners swell,
 " Pictur'd with the silver moon;
 " England shall end thy glory soon!
 " In vain, to break our firm array,
 " Thy brazen drums hoarse discord bray:
 " Those sounds our rising fury fan:
 " English Richard in the van.
 " On to victory we go,
 " A vaunting infidel the foe."
 Blondel led the tuneful band,
 And swept the wire with glowing hand.
 Cyprus, from her rocky mound,
 And Crete, with piny verdure crown'd,
 Far along the smiling main
 Echoed the prophetic strain.

Soon we kiss'd the sacred earth
 That gave a murder'd Saviour birth:
 Then with ardour fresh endu'd,
 Thus the solemn song renew'd.
 " Lo, the toilsome voyage past,
 " Heaven's favour'd hills appear at last!
 " Object of our holy vow,
 " We tread the Tyrian vallies now.
 " From Carmel's almond-shaded steep
 " We feel the cheering fragrance creep:
 " O'er Engaddi's shrubs of balm
 " Waves the date-empurpled palm,
 " See, Lebanon's aspiring head
 " Wide his immortal umbrage spread!
 " Hail Calvary, thou mountain hoar,
 " Wet with our Redeemer's gore!
 " Ye trampled tombs, ye fanes forlorn,
 " Ye stones, by tears of pilgrims worn;
 " Your ravish'd honours to restore,
 " Fearless we climb this hostile shore!
 " And thou, the sepulchre of God!
 " By mocking pagans rudely trod,
 " Bereft of every awful rite,
 " And quenched thy lamps that beam'd so bright;
 " For thee, from Britain's distant coast,
 " Lo, Richard leads his faithful host!
 " Aloft in his heroic hand,
 " Blazing, like the beacon's brand,

* A capital Christian city and fortress of Syria.

" O'er the far-affrighted fields,
 " Restless Kaliburn he wields *.
 " Proud Saracen, pollute no more
 " The shrines by martyrs built of yore!
 " From each wild mountain's trackless crown
 " In vain, thy gloomy castles frown:
 " Thy battering engines, huge and high,
 " In vain our steel-clad steeds defy;
 " And, rolling in terrific state,
 " On giant-wheels' harsh thunders grate.
 " When eve has hush'd the buzzing camp,
 " Amid the moon-light vapours damp,
 " Thy necromantic forms, in vain,
 " Haunt us on the tented plain:
 " We bid those spectre-shapes a-vant,
 " Ahtaroth, and Termagant!
 " With many a demon, pale of hue,
 " Doom'd to drink the bitter dew
 " That drops from Macon's footy tree,
 " Mid the dread grove of ebony,
 " Nor magic charms, nor fiends of hell,
 " The Christian's holy courage quell.
 " Salem, in ancient majesty
 " Arise, and lift thee to the sky!
 " Soon on thy battlements divine
 " Shall wave the badge of Constantine.
 " Ye barons, to the sun unfold
 " Our cross with crimson wove and gold!"

ODE X.

THE GRAVE OF KING ARTHUR.

Advertisement.

KING HENRY the Second having undertaken an expedition into Ireland, to suppress a rebellion raised by Roderick King of Connaught, commonly called O Connor Dun, or the Brown Monarch of Ireland, was entertained, in his passage through Wales, with the songs of the Welsh bards. The subject of their poetry was King Arthur, whose history had been so disguised by fabulous inventions, that the place of his burial was in general scarcely known or remembered. But in one of these Welsh poems sung before Henry, it was recited, that King Arthur, after the battle of Camlan, in Cornwall, was interred at Glastonbury abbey, before the high altar, yet without any external mark or memorial. Afterwards Henry visited the abbey, and commanded the spot described by the bard to be opened: When digging near 20 feet deep, they found the body, deposited under a large stone, inscribed with Arthur's name. This is the ground-work of the following ode: But for the better accommodation of the story to our present purpose, it is told with some slight variations from the Chronicle of Glastonbury. The castle of Cilgarran, where this discovery is supposed to have been made, now a romantic ruin, stands on a rock descending to the river Teivi, in Pembrokeshire; and was built by Roger Montgomery, who led the van of the Normans at Hastings.

* Kaliburn is the sword of King Arthur. Which, as the monks's historians say, came into the possession of Richard the First; and was given by that monarch, in the crusades, to Tancred King of Sicily, as a royal present of inestimable price, about the year 1190. See the following Ode.

STATELY the feast, and high the cheer:
 Girt with many an armed peer,
 And canopied with golden pail,
 Amid Cilgarran's castle hall,
 Sublime in formidable state,
 And warlike splendour, Henry fate;
 Prepar'd to stain the briny flood
 Of Shaunnon's lakes with rebel blood.

Illumining the vaulted roof,
 A thousand torches flam'd aloof:
 From massy cups, with golden gleam,
 Sparkled the red metheglin's stream:
 To grace the gorgeous festival,
 Along the lofty-window'd hall,
 The storied tapestry was hung:
 With minstrelly the rafters rung
 Of harps, that with reflected light
 From the proud gallery glitter'd bright:
 While gifted bards, a rival throng,
 (From distant Mona, nurse of song,
 From Teivi, fring'd with unbrage brown,
 From Elvy's vale, and Cader's crown,
 From many a slaggy precipice
 That shades Ierne's hoarse abyss,
 And many a sunless solitude
 Of Radnor's inmost mountains rude.)
 To crown the banquet's solemn close,
 Themes of British glory chose;
 And to the strings of various chime
 Attemper'd thus the fabling rhyme:

" O'er Cornwall's cliffs the tempest roar'd,
 " High the screaming sea-mew soar'd;
 " On Tintagel's * topmost tower
 " Darksome fell the fleety shower;
 " Round the rough castle shrilly sung
 " The whirling blast, and wildly flung
 " On each tall rampart's thundering side
 " The furies of the tumbling tide:
 " When Arthur rang'd his red-cross ranks
 " On conscious Camlan's crimson'd banks:
 " By Mordred's faithless guile decreed
 " Beneath a Saxon spear to bleed!
 " Yet in vain a paynim foe
 " Arm'd with fate the mighty blow;
 " For when he fell, an elfin queen,
 " All in secret, and unseen,
 " O'er the fainting hero threw
 " Her mantle of ambrosial blue;
 " And bade her spirits bear him far,
 " In Merlin's agate-axled car,
 " To her green isle's enamel'd steep,
 " Far in the navel of the deep.
 " O'er his wounds she sprinkled dew
 " From flowers that in Arabia grew:
 " On a rich enchanted bed,
 " She pillow'd his majestic head;
 " O'er his brow, with whispers bland,
 " Thrice she wav'd an opiate wand;
 " And to soft music's airy sound,
 " Her magic curtains clos'd around.
 " There, renew'd the vital spring,
 " Again he reigns a mighty king;

* Tintagel, or Tintadgel castle, where King Arthur is said to have been born, and to have chiefly resided. Some of its huge fragments still remain on a rocky peninsular cape, of a prodigious declivity towards the sea, and almost inaccessible from the land side, on the southern coasts of Cornwall.

" And many a fair and fragrant clime,
 " Blooming in immortal prime,
 " By gales of Eden ever fann'd,
 " Owns the monarch's high command:
 " Thence to Britain shall return,
 " (If right prophetic rolls I learn)
 " Borne on victory's spreading plume,
 " His ancient sceptre to resume;
 " Once more, in old heroic pride,
 " His barbed courser to bestride;
 " His knightly table to restore,
 " And the brave tournaments of yore."
 They ceas'd: when on the tuneful stage
 Advanc'd a bard, of aspect sage;
 His silver tresses, thin besprent,
 To age a graceful reverence lent;
 His beard, all white as spangles frore
 'That clothe Plinlimmon's forests hoar,
 Down to his harp descending flow'd;
 With time's faint rose his features glow'd;
 His eyes diffus'd a soften'd fire,
 And thus he wak'd the warbling wire:
 " Listen, Henry, to my reed!
 " Not from fairy realms I lead
 " Bright-rob'd tradition, to relate
 " In forged colours Arthur's fate;
 " Though much of old romantic lore
 " On the high theme I keep in store:
 " But boastful fiction should be dumb,
 " Where truth the strain might best become.
 " If thine ear may still be won
 " With songs of Uther's glorious son;
 " Henry, I a tale unfold,
 " Never yet in rhyme enroll'd,
 " Nor sung nor harp'd in hall or bower;
 " Which in my youth's full early flower,
 " A minstrel, sprung of Cornish line,
 " Who spoke of kings from old Lochrine,
 " Taught me to chant, one vernal dawn,
 " Deep in a cliff-encircled lawn,
 " What time the glistening vapours fled
 " From cloud-envelop'd Clyder's * head;
 " And on its sides the torrents gray
 " Shone to the morning's orient ray.
 " When Arthur bow'd his haughty crest,
 " No prince, veil'd in azure vest,
 " Snatch'd him, by Merlin's potent spell,
 " In groves of golden bliss to dwell;
 " Where, crown'd with wreaths of mistletoe,
 " Slaughter'd kings in glory go:
 " But when he fell, with winged speed,
 " His champions, on a milk-white steed,
 " From the battle's hurricane,
 " Bore him to Joseph's towered fane,
 " In the fair vale of Avalon †;
 " There, with chanted orison,
 " And the long blaze of tapers clear,
 " The stoled fathers met the bier;
 " Through the dim aisles, in order dread
 " Of martial woe, the chief they led,

* Or Glyder, a mountain in Caernarvonshire.

† Glasbury abbey, said to be founded by Joseph of Arimathea, in a spot anciently called the island or valley of Avalonia.

" And deep entomb'd in holy ground,
 " Before the altar's solemn bound.
 " Around no dusky banners wave,
 " No mouldering trophies mark the grave:
 " Away the ruthless Dane has torn
 " Each trace that time's flow touch had worn;
 " And long, o'er the neglected stone,
 " Oblivion's veil its shade has thrown:
 " The faded tomb, with honour due,
 " 'Tis thine, O Henry, to renew!
 " Thither, when conquest has restor'd
 " Yon recreant isle, and sheath'd the sword,
 " When peace with palm has crown'd thy brows,
 " Hasten thee, to pay thy pilgrim vows.
 " There, observant of my lore,
 " The pavement's hallow'd depth explore;
 " And thrice a fathom underneath
 " Dive into the vaults of death.
 " There shall thine eye, with wild amaze,
 " On his gigantic stature gaze;
 " There shalt thou find the monarch laid,
 " All in warrior-weeds array'd;
 " Wearing in death his helmet-crown,
 " And weapons huge of old renown.
 " Martial prince, 'tis thine to save
 " From dark oblivion Arthur's grave!
 " So may thy ships securely stem
 " The western frith: thy diadem
 " Shine victorious in the van,
 " Nor heed the slings of Ulster's clan:
 " Thy Norman pike-men win their way
 " Up the dun rocks of Harald's bay *;
 " And from the steeps of rough Kildare
 " Thy prancing hooft the falcon scare:
 " So may thy bow's unerring yew
 " Its shafts in Roderick's heart imbrew †."

Amid the pealing symphony
 The spiced goblets mantled high;
 With passions new the song imprfs'd
 The listening king's impatient breast:
 Flash the keen lightnings from his eyes;
 He scorns a while his bold emprise;
 Ev'n now he seems, with eager pace,
 The consecrated floor to trace;
 And ope, from its tremendous gloom,
 The treasure of the wonderous tomb:
 Ev'n now, he burns in thought to rear,
 From its dark bed, the ponderous spear,
 Rough with the gore of Pictish kings:
 Ev'n now fond hope his fancy wings,
 To poise the monarch's massy blade,
 Of magic-temper'd metal made;
 And drag to-day the dinted shield
 That felt the storm of Camlan's field.
 O'er the sepulchre profound
 Ev'n now, with arching sculpture crown'd,
 He plans the chantry's choral shrine,
 The daily dirge, and rites divine.

* The bay of Dublin. Harald, or Har-Sager, the Fair-haired King of Norway, is said, in the life of Gryffud ap Conan, Prince of North Wales, to have conquered Ireland, and to have founded Dublin.

† Henry is supposed to have succeeded in this enterprise, chiefly by the use of the long-bow, with which the Irish were entirely unacquainted.

SONNETS.

SONNET I.

WRITTEN AT WINSLADE, IN HAMPSHIRE.

WINSLADE, thy beech-capt hills, with waving grain
Mantled, thy chequer'd views of wood and lawn,
Whilom could charm, or when the gradual dawn
Gan the gray mist with orient purple stain,
Or evening glimmer'd o'er the folded train:
Her fairest landscapes whence my muse has drawn,
Too free with servile courtly phrase to fawn,
Too weak to try the buskin's stately strain:
Yet now no more thy flops of beech and corn,
Nor views invite, since he far distant strays,
With whom I trac'd their sweets at eve and morn,
From Albion far, to cull Hesperian bays;
In this alone they please, how'er forlorn,
That still they can recal those happier days.

SONNET II.

ON BATHING.

WHEN late the trees were stript by winter pale,
Young health, a dryad-maid in vesture green,
Or like the forest's silver-quiver'd queen,
On airy uplands met the piercing gale;
And, ere its earliest echo shook the vale,
Watching the hunter's joyous horn was seen.
But since, gay-thron'd in fiery chariot sheen,
Summer has smote each daisy-dappled dale;
She to the cave retires, high-arch'd beneath
The fount that laves proud Isis' towery brim:
And now, all glad the temperate air to breathe,
While cooling drops distil from arches dim,
Binding her dewy locks with sedgey wreath,
She sits amid the choir of naiads trim.

SONNET III.

WRITTEN IN A BLANK LEAF OF DUGDALE'S MONASTICON.

DEEM not, devoid of elegance, the sage,
By fancy's genuine feelings unbeguil'd,
Of painful pedantry the poring child;
Who turns, of these proud domes, th' historic page,
Now sunk by time, and Henry's fiercer rage.
Think'st thou the warbling muses never smil'd
On his lone hours? Ingentuous views engage
His thoughts, on themes, unclassic falsely styl'd,
Intent. While cloister'd piety displays
Her mouldering roll, the piercing eye explores
New manners, and the pomp of elder days,
Whence culls the pensive bard his pictur'd stores.
Nor rough, nor barren, are the winding ways
Of hoar antiquity, but strown with flowers.

SONNET IV.

WRITTEN AT STONEHENGE.

THOU noblest monument of Albion's isle!
Whether by Merlin's aid from Scythia's shore,
To Amber's fatal plain Pendragon bore,
Huge frame of giant-hands, the mighty pile,
Th' entomb his Britains slain by Hengist's guile *:
Or Druid priests, sprinkled with human gore,
Taught mid thy massy maze their mystic lore:
Or Danish chiefs, enrich'd with savage spoil,
To victory's idol vast, an unshewn shrine,
Rear'd the rude heap: or, in thy hallow'd round,
Repose the kings of Brutus' genuine line;
Or here those kings in solemn state were crown'd:
Studious to trace thy wond'rous origine,
We muse on many an ancient tale renown'd.

SONNET V.

WRITTEN AFTER SEEING WILTON-HOUSE.

FROM Pembroke's princely dome, where mimic
art
Decks with a magic hand the dazzling bow'rs,
Its living hues where the warm pencil pours,
And breathing forms from the rude marble start,
How to life's humbler scene can I depart?
My breast all glowing from those gorgeous tow'rs,
In my low cell how cheat the fullen hours!
Vain the complaint: for fancy can impart
(To fate superior, and to fortune's doom)
Whate'er adorns the stately-storied hall:
She, mid the dungeon's solitary gloom,
Can dress the graces in their Attic hall:
Bid the green landskip's vernal beauty bloom:
And in bright trophies clothe the twilight wall.

SONNET VI.

TO MR. GRAY.

NOT that her blooms are mark'd with beauty's hue,
My rustic muse her votive chaplet brings;
Unseen, unheard, O Gray, to thee she sings!
While slowly-pacing through the churchyard dew,
At curfew-time, beneath the dark-green yew,
Thy pensive genius strikes the moral frow;
Or borne sublime on inspiration's wings,
Hears Cambria's bards devote the dreadful clue
Of Edward's race, with murders foul defil'd:
Can aught my pipe to reach thine ear essay?
No, bard divine! For many a care beguil'd
By the sweet magic of thy soothing lay,
For many a raptur'd thought, and vision wild,
To thee this strain of gratitude I pay.

* One of bardic traditions about Stonehenge.

SONNET VII.

WHILE Summer-suns o'er the gay prospect play'd,
Through Surry's verdant scenes, where Epsom spreads

Mid intermingling elms her flowery meads,
And Hafcombe's hill, in towering groves array'd,
Rear'd its romantic steep, with mind serene
I journey'd blithe. Full pensive I return'd;
For now my breast with hopeless passion burn'd,
Wet with hoar mists appear'd the gaudy scene
Which late in careless indolence I past;
And Autumn all around those hues had cast
Where past delight my recent grief might trace.
Sad change, that nature a congenial gloom
Should wear, when most my cheerless mood to chafe,
I wish'd her green attire and wonted bloom!

SONNET VIII.

ON KING ARTHUR'S ROUND TABLE AT WINCHESTER.

WHERE Venta's Norman castle still appears
Its rafter'd hall, that o'er the grassy foils,
And scatter'd flinty fragments clad in moss,
On yonder steep in naked state warlike;
High-hung remains, the pride of ages years,
Old Arthur's board: on the capacious round

Some British pen has sketch'd the names renown'd,
In marks obscure, of his immortal peers.
Though join'd by magic skill, with many a rhyme,

The Druid frame, unhonour'd falls a prey
To the slow vengeance of the wizard time,
And fade the British characters away;
Yet Spenser's page, that chaunts in verse sublime
Those chiefs shall live, unconscious of decay.

SONNET IX.

TO THE RIVER LODON.

AH! what a weary race my feet have run,
Since first I trod thy banks with alders crown'd,
And thought my way was all through fairy
ground,

Beneath thy azure sky and golden sun:
Where first my muse to lip her notes begun!
While pensive memory traces back the round,
Which fills the varied interval between;
Much pleasure, more of sorrow, marks the scene.
Sweet native stream! those skies and suns so pure

No more return, to cheer my evening road!
Yet still one joy remains, that not obscure,
Nor useless, all my vacant days have flow'd,
From youth's gay dawn to manhood's prime ma-
ture;
Nor with the muse's laurel unbeflow'd.

MISCELLANIES.

INSCRIBED ON A BEAUTIFUL GROTTA
NEAR THE WATER.

The graces fought in yonder stream,
To cool the fervid day,
When love's malicious godhead came,
And stole their robes away.

Proud of the theft, the little god
Their robes bade Delia wear:
While they aham'd to stir abroad,
Remain all naked here.

THE PLEASURES OF MELANCHOLY.

MOTHER of musings, contemplation sage,
Whose grotto stands upon the topmost rock
Of Teneriff; 'mid the tempestuous night,
On which, in calmest meditation held,
Thou hear'st with howling winds the beating rain,
And drifting hail descend; or if the skies
Unclothed shine, and through the blue serene
Pale Cynthia rolls her silver-axled car,
Whence gazing steadfast on the spangled vault
Raptur'd thou sit'st, while murmurs indistinct
Of distant billows sooth thy pensive ear

With hoarse and hollow sounds; secure, self-blest,
There oft thou listen't to the wild uproar
Of fleets encount'ring, that in whispers low
Ascend the rocky summit, where thou dwell'st
Remote from man, conversing with the spheres!

O lead me, queen sublime, to solemn glooms
Congenial with my soul; to cheerless shades,
To ruin's seats, to twilight cells and bow'rs,
Where thoughtful melancholy loves to muse,
Her fav'rite midnight haunts. The laughing scenes

Of purple Spring, where all the wanton train
Of smiles and graces seem to lead the dance
In sportive round; while from their hands they flow'r

Ambrosial blooms and flow'rs, no longer charm;
Tempe, no more I court thy balmy breeze,
Adieu green vales! ye broider'd meads, adieu!

Beneath yon ruin'd abbey's moss-grown piles
Oft let me sit at twilight hour of eve, [moon
Where through some western window the pale
Pours her long-level'd rule of streaming light;
While sullen sacred silence reigns around,
Save the lone screech-owl's note, who builds his
bow'r

Amid the mould'ring caverns dark and damp,

Or the calm breeze, that ruffles in the leaves
Of flaunting ivy, that with mantle green
Invests some wasted tow'r. Or let me tread
Its neighb'ring walk of pines, where mus'd of old
The cloister'd brothers: through the gloomy void

That far extends beneath their ample arch
As on I pace, religious horror wraps
My soul in dread repose. But when the world
Is clad in midnight's raven-colour'd robe,
'Mid hollow chancel let me watch the flame
Of taper dim, shedding a livid glare
O'er the wan heaps; while airy voices talk
Along the glimm'ring walls; or ghostly shape
At distance seen, invites with beck'ning hand
My lonesome steps, through the far-winding vaults.
Nor unlightful is the solemn noon
Of night, when haply wakeful from my couch
I start: lo, all is motionless around!
Roars not the rushing wind; the fons of men
And every beast in mute oblivion lie;
All nature's hush'd in silence and in sleep.
O then how fearful is it to reflect,
That through the still globe's awful solitude,
No being wakes but me! till stealing sleep
My drooping temples bathes in opiate dews.
Nor then let dreams, of wanton folly born,
My senses lead through flow'ry paths of joy;
But let the sacred genius of the night
Such mystic visions send, as Spenser saw,
When through bewild'ring fancy's magic maze,
To the fell house of Buzyrane, he led
Th' unshaken Britomart; or Milton knew,
When in abstracted thought he first conceiv'd
All heav'n in tumult, and the seraphim
Come tow'ring, arm'd in adamant and gold.

Let others love soft Summer's ev'ning smiles,
As list'ning to the distant water-fall,
They mark the blushes of the freaky west;
I choose the pale December's foggy glooms.
Then with the sullen shades of ev'ning close,
Where through the room a blindly-glimm'ring gleam

Thy dying embers scatter, far remote
From mirth's mad shouts, that through the illu-
min'd roof

Resound with festive echo, let me sit,
Blest with the lowly cricket's drowly dirge.
Then let my thought contemplative explore
This fleeting state of things, the vain delights,
The fruitless toils, that still our search elude,
As through the wilderness of life we rove.
This sober hour of silence will unmask
False folly's smile, that like the dazzling spells
Of wily Comus cheat th' unweeting eye
With bleat illusion, and persuade to drink
That charmed cup, which reason's mintage fair
Unmoulds, and stamps the monster on the man.
Eager we taste, but in the luscious draught
Forget the poisonous dregs that lurk beneath.

Few know that elegance of soul refin'd,
Whose soft sensation feels a quicker joy
From melancholy's scenes, than the dull pride
Of tasteless splendour and magnificence
Can e'er afford. Thus Eloise, whose mind
Had languish'd to the pangs of melting love,
More genuine transport found, as on some tomb

Reclin'd, the watch'd the tapers of the dead;
Or through the pillar'd aisles, amid pale shrines
Of imag'd saints, and intermingled graves,
Mus'd a veil'd votarefs; than Flavia feels,
As through the mazes of the festive ball
Proud of her conquering charms and beauty's
blaze,

She floats amid the silken fons of drefs,
And shines the fairest of th' assembled fair.
When azure noontide cheers the dædal globe,
And the blest regent of the golden day
Rejoices in his bright meridian bow'r,
How oft my wishes ask the night's return,
That best befriends the melancholy mind!
Hail, sacred night! thou too shalt share my song!
Sister of ebon-icepter'd Hecate, hail!
Whether in congregated clouds thou wrapp'ft
Thy viewless chariot, or with silver crown
Thy beaming head encirclest, ever hail!
What, though beneath thy gloom the forcerefs
train,

Far in obscured haunt of Lapland moors,
With rhymes untho't the bloody cauldron blefs;
Though murder, wan beneath thy shrouding shade,
Summons her flow-ey'd vot'ries to devise
Of secret slaughter, while by one blue lamp
In hideous conf'rence sits the list'ning band,
And start at each low wind, or wakeful sound;
What though thy stay the pilgrim cursest oft,
As all benighted in Arabian wastes
He hears the wilderness around him howl
With roaming monsters, while on his hoar head
The black-descending tempest ceaseless beats;
Yet more delightful to my pensivè mind
Is thy return, than blooming morn's approach,
Ev'n then, in youthful pride of opening May,
When from the portals of the sabbon east
She sheds fresh roses, and ambrosial dews,
Yet not ungrateful is the morn's approach
When dropping wet she comes, and clad in clouds,
While through the damp air scowls the louring
south,

Blackening the landscape's face, that grove and hill
In formless vapours undistinguish'd swim:
Th' afflicted songsters of the sadden'd groves
Hail not the sullen gloom; the waving elms
That hoar through time, and rang'd in thick array,

Enclose with stately row some rural hall,
Are mute, nor echo with the clamorous hoarse
Of rooks rejoicing on their airy boughs;
While to the shed the dripping poultry crowd,
A mournful train: secure the village-hind Hangs o'er the crackling blaze, nor tempts the storm,

Fix'd in th' unfinished furrow rests the plough:
Rings not the high wood with enliven'd shouts
Of early-hunter: all is silence drear;
And deepest sadness wraps the face of things.

Through Pope's soft song though all the graces
breathe,

And happiest art adorn his Attic page;
Yet does my mind with sweeter transport glow,
As at the foot of mossy trunk reclin'd,
In magic Spenser's wildly-warbled song
I see deserted Una wander wide
Through wasteful solitudes, and lurid heaths,

Weary, forlorn; than when the * fated fair,
Upon the bosom bright of silver Thames,
Launches in all the lustre of brocade,
Amid the splendours of the laughing fun.
The gay description palls upon the sense,
And coldly strikes the mind with feeble bliss.

Ye youths of Albion's beauty-blooming isle,
Whose brows have worn the wreath of luckless
love,

Is there a pleasure like the pensive mood,
Whose magic wont to sooth your soften'd souls?
O tell how rapturous the joy, to melt
To melody's assuasive voice; to bend
Th' uncertain step along the midnight mead,
And pour your sorrows to the pitying moon,
By many a slow trill from the bird of woe,
Oft interrupted; in embow'ring woods
By darksome brook to muse, and there forget
The solemn dullness of the tedious world,
While fancy grasps the visionary fair:
And now no more the abstracted ear attends
The water's murmur'ing lapse, th' entranced eye
Pierces no longer through the extended rows,
Of thick-rang'd trees; till haply from the depth
The woodman's stroke, or distant tinkling team,
Or heifers rustling through the brake alarms
Th' illudged sense, and mars the golden dream.
These are delights that absence drear has made
Familiar to my soul, e'er since the form
Of young Sapphira, beauteous as the Spring,
When from her violet-woven couch awak'd
By frolic zephyr's hand, her tender cheek
Graceful she lifts, and blushing from her bow'r
Issues to clothe in gladsome-glist'ring green
The genial globe, first met my dazzled sight:
These are delights unknown to minds profane,
And which alone the pensive soul can taste.

The taper'd choir, at the late hour of pray'r,
Oft let me tread, while to th' according voice
The many sounding organ peals on high,
The clear flow-dittied chaunt, or varied hymn,
Till all my soul is bath'd in ecstasies,
And lap'd in Paradise. Or let me sit
Far in sequester'd aisles of the deep dome,
There lone some listen to the sacred sounds,
Which, as they lengthen through the Gothic vaults,

In hollow murmurs reach my ravish'd ear.
Nor when the lamps expiring yield to night,
And solitude returns, would I forsake
The solemn mansion, but attentive mark
The due clock swinging slow with sweepy sway,
Measuring time's flight with momentary sound.

Nor let me fail to cultivate my mind
With the soft thrillings of the tragic muse,
Divine Melpomene, sweet pity's nurse,
Queen of the stately step, and flowing pall.
Now let Monimia mourn with streaming eyes
Her joys incestuous, and polluted love:
Now let soft Juliet in the gaping tomb
Print the last kiss on her true Romeo's lips,
His lips yet reeking from the deadly draught.
Or Jaffier kneel for one forgiving look.
Nor seldom let the Moor on Desdemone
Pour the misguided threats of jealous rage.

By soft degrees the manly torrent steals
From my swollen eyes; and at a brother's woe
My big heart melts in sympathizing tears.

What are the splendours of the gaudy court,
Its tinsel trappings, and its pageant poms?
To me far happier seems the banish'd lord
Amid Siberia's unrejoicing wilds
Who pines all lonesome, in the chambers hoar
Of some high castle shut, whose windows dim
In distant ken discover trackless plains,
Where Winter ever whirls his icy car;
While still repeated objects of his view,
The gloomy battlements and ivied spires
That crown the solitary dome, arise;
While from the topmost turret the slow clock,
Far heard along th' inhospitable wastes,
With sad returning chime awakes new grief;
Ev'n he far happier seems than is the proud,
The potent satrap, whom he left behind
Mid Moscow's golden palaces, to drown
In ease and luxury the laughing hours.

Illustrious objects strike the gazer's mind
With feeble bliss, and but allure the sight,
Nor rouse with impulse quick th' unfeeling heart.
Thus seen by shepherd from Hymettus' brow,
What dædal landscapes smile! here palmy groves,
Resounding once with Plato's voice, arise,
Amid whose umbrage green her silver head
Th' unfading olive lifts; here vine-clad hills
Lay forth their purple store, and sunny vales
In prospect vast their level laps expand,
Amid whose beauties glistering Athens tow'rs.
Though through the blissful scenes Ilius roll
His sage-inspiring flood, whose winding marge
The thick-wove laurel shades; though roscate
morn

Pour all her splendours on th' empurpled scene;
Yet feels the hoary hermit truer joys,
As from the cliff that o'er his cavern hangs
He views the piles of fall'n Persepolis
In deep arrangement hide the darksome plain.
Unbounded waste! the mould'ring obelisk
Here, like a blasted oak, ascends the clouds;
Here Parian domes their vaulted halls disclose
Horrid with thorn, where lurks th' unpitied thief.
Whence flits the twilight-loving bat at eve,
And the dead affair wreaths her spotted train,
The dwellings once of elegance and art.
Here temples rise, amid whose hallowed bounds
Spires the black pine, while through the naked street,

Once haunt of tradeful merchants, springs the grass:
Here columns heap'd on prostrate columns, torn
From their firm base, increase the mould'ring mass.

Far as the sight can pierce, appear the spoils
Of sunk magnificence! a blended scene
Of moles, fanes, arches, domes, and palaces,
Where, with his brother horror, ruin sits.

O come then, Melancholy, queen of thought!
O come with faintly look, and stedfast step, [yew,
From forth thy cave embower'd with mournful
Where ever to the curfew's solemn sound
List'ning thou sitt'st, and with thy cypress bind
Thy votary's hair, and seal him for thy son.
But never let Euphrosyne beguile
With toys of wanton mirth my fixed mind,

Nor in my path her primrose garland cast.
 Though 'mid her train the dimpled Hebe bare
 Her rosy bosom to th' enamour'd view ;
 Though Venns, mother of the smiles and loves,
 And Bacchus, ivy-crown'd, in citron bow'r
 With her on nectar-streaming fruitage feast ;
 What though 'tis hers to calm the low'ring skies,
 And at her presence mild th' embattl'd clouds
 Disperse in air, and o'er the face of heav'n
 New day diffusive gleam at her approach ;
 Yet are these joys that melancholy gives,
 Than all her witless revels happier far ;
 These deep-felt joys, by contemplation taught.

Then ever beauteous contemplation, hail !
 From thee began, auspicious maid, my song,
 With thee shall end ; for thou art fairer far
 Than are the nymphs of Cirrha's mossy grot ;
 To loftier rapture thou canst wake the thought,
 Than all the fabling poet's boasted pow'rs.
 Hail, queen divine ! whom, as tradition tells,
 Once, in his evening walk a Druid found,
 Far in a hollow glade of Mona's woods ;
 And piteous bore with hospitable hand
 To the close shelter of his oaken bow'r.
 There soon the sage admiring mark'd the dawn
 Of solemn musing in your pensive thought ;
 For when a smiling babe, you lov'd to lie
 Oft deeply list'ning to the rapid roar
 Of wood-hung Meinai, stream of Druids old.

A PANEGRIC ON OXFORD ALE.

—————" Mea nec Faternæ
 " Temperant vites, neque Formiani
 " Pocula colles." HOR.

BALM of my cares, sweet solace of my toils,
 Hail juice benignant ! O'er the costly cups
 Of roit-stirring wine, unwholesome draught,
 Let pride's loose sons prolong the wasteful night ;
 My sober ev'ning let the tankard bless,
 With toast embrown'd, and fragrant nutmeg draught,

While the rich draught with oft-repeated whiffs
 Tobacco mild improves. Divine repast !
 Where no crude surfeit, or intemperate joys
 Of lawless Bacchus' reign ; but o'er my soul
 A calm Lethæan creeps ; in drowsy trance
 Each thought subsides, and sweet oblivion wraps
 My peaceful brain, as if the leaden rod
 Of magic Morpheus o'er mine eyes had shed
 Its opiate influence. What though fore ills
 Oppress, dire want of chill-dispelling coals
 Or cheerful candle (save the make-weight's gleam
 Haply remaining), heart-rejecting ale
 Cheers the sad scene, and every want supplies.

Meantime, not mindless of the daily talk
 Of tutor sage, upon the learned leaves
 Of deep Smiglecius much I meditate ;
 While ale inspires, and lends its kindred aid,
 The thought-perplexing labour to pursue,
 Sweet Helicon of logic ! But if friends
 Congenial call me from the toilsome page,
 To pot-house I repair, the sacred haunt,
 Where, ale, thy votaries in full resort,
 Hold rites nocturnal. In capacious chair
 Of monumental oak and antique mould,
 That long has flood the rage of conquering years

Inviolate (nor in more ample chair
 Smokes rosy justice, when th' important cause,
 Whether of hen-rooft, or of mirthful rape,
 In all the majesty of patch he tries),
 Studious of ease, and provident, I place
 My gladsome limbs ; while in repeated round
 Returns replenish'd the successive cup,
 And the brisk fire conspires to genial joy :
 While haply to relieve the ling'ring hours
 In innocent delight, amusive putt
 On smooth joint stool in emblematic play
 The vain vicissitudes of fortune shows.
 Nor reckoning, name tremendous, me disturbs,
 Nor call'd for, chills my breast with sudden fear ;
 While on the wonted door, expressive mark,
 The frequent penny stands describ'd to view,
 In snowy characters and graceful row.—

Hail, Ticking ! furcst guardian of distrefs !
 Beneath thy shelter, pennylefs I quaff
 The cheerful cup, nor hear with hopeless heart
 New oylers cry'd :—though much the poet's
 friend,

Ne'er yet attempted in poetic strain,
 Accept this tribute of poetic praise !

Nor proctor thrice with vocal heel alarms
 Our joys secure, nor deigns the lowly roof
 Of pot-house snug to visit, wiser he
 The splendid tavern haunts, or coffee-house
 Of James or Juggins, where the grateful breath
 Of loth'd tobacco ne'er diffus'd its balm ;
 But the lewd spendthrift, falsely deem'd polite,
 While steams around the fragrant Indian bowl,
 Oft dams the vulgar sons of humbler ale :
 In vain—the proctor's voice arreits their joys ;
 Just fate of wanton pride and loose excess !

Nor less by day delightful is thy draught,
 All-pow'rful ale ! whose sorrow-soothing sweets
 Oft I repeat in vacant afternoon,
 When tatter'd stockings ask my mending hand
 Not unexperienced ; while the tedious toil
 Slides unregarded. Let the tender swain
 Each morn regale on nerve-relaxing tea,
 Companion meet of languor-loving nymph :
 Be mine each morn with eager appetite
 And hunger undissembled, to repair
 To friendly buttery ; there on smoking crust
 And foaming ale to banquet unrestrain'd,
 Material breakfast ! Thus in ancient days
 Our ancestors robust, with liberal cups
 Usher'd the morn, unlike the squeamish sons
 Of modern times : nor ever had the might
 Of Britons brave decay'd, had thus they fed ;
 With British ale improving British worth.

With ale irriguous, undimay'd I hear
 The frequent dun ascend my lofty dome
 Importunate : whether the plaintive voice
 Of landress shrill awake my startled ear ;
 Or barber spruce with supple look intrude ;
 Or tailor with obsequious bow advance ;
 Or groom invade me with defying front
 And stern demeanour, whose emaciate steeds
 (Whene'er or Phœbus shone with kindlier beams,
 Or luckier chance the borrow'd boots supple'd)
 Had panted oft beneath my goring steel.
 In vain they plead or threat : All pow'rful ale
 Excuses new supplies, and each descends
 With joyless pace, and debt-despairing looks ;

Even Spacey with indignant brow retires,
Fiercest of duns! and conquer'd quits the field.

Why did the gods such various blessings pour
On hapless mortals, from their grateful hands
So soon the short-liv'd bounty to recal?—
Thus, while improvident of future ill,
I quaff the fuscious tankard uncontroll'd,
And thoughtless riot in unlicens'd bliss;
Sudden (dire fate of all things excellent!)
Th' un pitying Burfar's cross-affixing hand
Blasts all my joys, and stops my glad career.
Nor now the friendly pot-house longer yields
A sure retreat, when night o'er shades the skies;
Nor Sheppard, barbarous matron, longer gives
The wonted trust, and Winter ticks no more.

Thus Adam, exil'd from the beauteous scenes
Of Eden griev'd, no more in fragrant bow'r
On fruits divine to feast, fresh shade and vale
No more to visit, or vine-mantled grot;
But, all forlorn, the dreary wilderness,
And unrejoicing solitudes to trace:
Thus too the matchless bard, whose lay re-sounds
The Splendid Shilling's praise, in nightly gloom
Of lonefome garret, pin'd for cheerful ale;
Whose steps in verse Miltonic I pursue,
Mean follower: like him with honest love
Of ale divine inspir'd, and love of song. [care
But long may bounteous Heav'n with watchful
Avert his hapless lot! Enough for me
That burning with congenial flame I dar'd
His guiding steps at distance to pursue,
And sing his favourite theme in kindred strains.

NEW-MARKET.

A SATIRE.

Παυλοπυτος; επαπειρα

Ο; εμολις αιωνη

Ταδε γα.

Spect. Electr. 508.

His country's hope, when now the blooming heir
Has lost the parent's or the guardian's care;
Fond to possess, yet eager to destroy,
Of each vain youth, say, what's the darling joy?
Of each rash frolic what the source and end,
His sole and first ambition what—to spend.

Some 'squires to Gallia's cooks devoted dupes,
Whole manors melt in sauce, or drown in soups:
Another doats on fiddlers, till he fees
His hills no longer crown'd with tow'ring trees;
Convinc'd too late that modern strains can move,
Like those of ancient Greece, th' obedient grove:
In headless statues rich, and usefess urns,
Marmoreo from the classic tour returns.—
But would ye learn, ye leisure-loving 'squires,
How best ye may disgrace your prudent fires;
How soonest soar to fashionable shame,
Be damn'd at once to ruin—and to fame;
By hands of grooms ambitious to be crown'd,
O greatly dare to tread Olympic ground!

What dreams of conquest stuff'd I Hilario's breast,
When the good knight at last retir'd to rest!
Behold the youth with new-felt rapture mark
Each pleasing prospect of the spacious park:
That park, where beauties undisguis'd engage,
Those beauties less the work of art than age;
In simple state where genuine nature wears
Her venerable dress of ancient years;

Where all the charms of chance with order meet
The rude, the gay, the graceful, and the great.
Here aged oaks appear their branches hoar,
And form dark groves, which druids might adore;
With meeting boughs, and deepening to the view,
Here shoots the broad umbrageous avenue:
Here various trees compose a chequer'd scene,
Glowing in gay diversities of green;
There the full stream through intermingling glades
Shines a broad lake, or falls in deep cascades.
Nor wants there hazle copse, or beechen lawn,
To cheer with sun or shade the bounding fawn.

And see the good old feat, whose Gothic tow'rs
Awful emerge from yonder tufted bow'rs;
Whose rafter'd hall the crowding tenants fed,
And dealt to age and want their daily bread;
Where crested knights with peerless damsels join'd,
At high and solemn festivals have din'd;
Presenting oft fair virtue's shining task,
In mystic pageantrics, and moral mask.
But vain all ancient praise, or boast of birth,
Vain all the palms of old heroic worth!
At once a bankrupt, and a prosperous heir,
Hilario bets,—park, house, dissolve in air.
With antique armour hung, his trophied rooms
Descend to gamesters, prostitutes, and grooms.
He sees his steel-clad fires, and mothers mild,
Who bravely shook the lance, or sweetly smil'd,
All the fair series of the whisker'd race,
Whose pictur'd forms the stately gallery grace;
Debas'd, abus'd, the price of ill-got gold,
To deck some tavern vile, at auctions sold.

The parish wonders at the unopening door,
The chimneys blaze, the tables groan no more.
Thick weeds around th' untrodden courts arise,
And all the social scene in silence lies.
Himself, the loss politely to repair,
Turns atheist, fiddler, highwayman, or play'r.
At length, the scorn, the shame of man and God,
Is doom'd to rub the fleeds that once he rode.

Ye rival youths, your golden hopes how vain,
Your dreams of thousands on the lifted plain!
Not more fantastic Sancho's airy course,
When madly mounted on the magic horse*,
He pierc'd heav'n's opening spheres with dazzled
eyes,

And seem'd to soar in visionary skies.
Nor less, I ween, precarious is the meed,
Of young adventurers on the muse's steed;
For poets have, like you, their destin'd round,
And ours is but a race on classic ground.

Long time, the child of patrimonial ease,
Hippolitus had carv'd furlouns in peace:
Had quaff'd secure, unvex'd by toil or wife,
The mild October of a private life:
Long liv'd with calm domestic conquests crown'd,
And kill'd his game on safe paternal ground:
And, deaf to honour's or ambition's call,
With rural spoils adorn'd his hoary hall.
As bland he puff'd the pipe o'er weekly news,
His bosom kindles with sublimer views. [more!
Lo there, thy triumphs, Taaffe, thy palms, Port-
Tempt him to stake his lands and treasure'd store.
Like a new bruiser on Broughtonic sand,
Amid the lifts our hero takes his stand;
Smack'd by the sharper, to the peer a prey,
He rolls his eyes that "witness huge difmay;"

* Chavileno. See Don Quixote, B. ii. Chap. 41.

When lo! the chance of one inglorious heat,
Strips him of genial cheer, and sung retreat.
How awkward now he bears disgrace and dirt,
Nor knows the poor's last refuge, to be pert!—
The shiftless beggar bears of ills the worst,
At once with dullness and with hunger curst.
And feels the tasteless breast equestrian fires?
And dwells such mighty rage in graver 'quires?

In all attempts, but for their country, bold,
Britain, thy conscript counsellors behold;
(For some, perhaps, by fortune favour'd yet,
May gain a borough, from a lucky bet),
Smit with the love of the laconic boot,
The cap, and wig succinct, the silken suit,
More modern pha-tons usurp the rein,
And scour in rival race the tempting plain.
See, side by side, his jockey and Sir John
Discuss th' important point—of six to one.
For oh! the boasted privilege how dear,
How great the pride, to gain a jockey's ear!—
See, like a routed host, with headlong pace,
Thy members pour amid the mingling race!
All ask, what crowds the tumult could produce—
Is Bedlam, or the Commons all broke loose?
Their way nor reason guides, nor caution checks,
Proud on a high-bred thing to risk their necks.—
Thy fages hear, amid th' admiring crowd
Adjudge the stakes, most eloquently loud:
With critic skill, o'er dubious bets preside,
The low dispute, or kindle, or decide:
All empty wisdom, and judicious prate,
Of distanc'd horses gravely fix the fate:
And with paternal care unwearied watch
O'er the nice conduct of a daring match.

Meantime, no more the mimic patriots rise,
To guard Britannia's honour, warm and wise:
No more in senates dare assert her laws,
Nor pour the bold debate in freedom's cause:
Neglect the counsels of a sinking land,
And know no rostrum, but New-Market's stand.

Is this the band of civil chiefs design'd
On England's weal to fix the pondering mind?
Who, while their country's rights are set to sale,
Quit Europe's balance for the jockey's scale,
O say, when least their sapient schemes are crost,
Or when a nation, or a match is lost?
Who dams and fires with more exactness trace,
Than of their country's kings the sacred race:
Think London journeys are the worst of ills;
Subscribe to articles, instead of bills:
Strangers to all our annalists relate,
T'hears are the memoirs of the equestrian state:
Who lost to Albion's past and present views,
Heber's, thy chronicles alone peruse.

Go on, brave youths, till in some future age,
Whips shall become the senatorial badge;
Till England see her thronging senators
Meet all at Westminster, in boots and spurs;
See the whole House, with mutual frenzy mad,
Her patriots all in leathern breeches clad:
Of bets, not taxes, learnedly debate,
And guide with equal reins a steed or state. [dain,
How would a virtuous † Hounhym neigh dis-
To see his brethren brook the imperious rein;

* Author of an Historical List of the Running Horses, &c.

† Vide Gulliver's Travels. Voyage to the Houhnyms.

Bear slavery's wanton whip, or galling goad,
Smoke through the glebe, or trace the destin'd road;

And robb'd of * manhood by the murderous knife,
Sustain each fordid toil of servile life. [mind,
Yet oh! what rage would touch his generous
To fee his sons of more than human kind;
A kind, with each exalted virtue blest,
Each gentler feeling of the liberal breast,
Afford diversion to that monster base,
That meanest spawn of man's half-monkey race;
In whom pride, avarice, ignorance, conspire,
That hated animal, a Yahoo 'quire.

How are the Throns of these modern days,
Chang'd from those chiefs who toil'd for Grecian bays;

Who fir'd with genuine glory's sacred lust,
Whirl'd the swift axle through the Pythian dust.
Theirs was the Pisan olive's blooming spray,
Theirs was the Theban bard's recording lay.
What though the grooms of Greece ne'er took the odds?

They won no bets—but then they soar'd to gods;
And more an Hero's palm, a Pindar's ode,
Than all th' united plates of George bestow'd.

Greece! how I kindle at thy magic name,
Feel all thy warmth, and catch the kindred flame.
Thy scenes sublime; and awful visions rise,
In ancient pride before my musing eyes.
Here Sparta's sons in mute attention hang,
While just Lycurgus pours the mild harangue;
There Xerxes' hosts, all pale with deadly fear,
Shrink at her fat'd † hero's flashing spear.
Here hung with many a lyre of silver string,
The laureate alleys of Iliiss spring:
And lo, where wrapt in beauty's heavenly dream
Hoar Plato walks his oliv'd academe.—

Yet ah! no more the land of arts and arms
Delights with wisdom, or with virtue warm.
Lo! the stern Turk, with more than Vandal rage,
Has blasted all the wreaths of ancient age:
No more her groves by fancy's feet are trod,
Each Attic grace has left the lov'd abode.
Fall'n is fair Greece! by luxury's pleasing bane
Seduc'd, she drags a barbarous foreign chain.

Britannia, watch! O trim thy withering bays,
Remember thou last rivall'd Grecia's praise,
Great nurse of works divine! Yet oh! beware
Lest thou the fate of Greece, my country, share.
Recal thy wonted worth with conscious pride,
Thou too hast seen a Solon in a Hyde;
Hast bade thine Edwards and thine Henrys rear
With Spartan fortitude the British spear;
Alike has seen thy sons deserve the meed
Or of the moral or the martial deed.

THE CASTLE BARBER'S SOLILOQUY.

WRITTEN IN THE LATE WAR.

I who with such success—alas! till
The war came on—have shav'd the castle;
Who by the nose, with hand unshaken,
The boldest heroes oft have taken;
In humble strain, am doom'd to mourn
My fortune chang'd, and state forlorn!

* A copy in the Harleian Library, reads Horse-hood.
† Leonidas.

My soap scarce ventures into froth,
 My razors rust in idle sloth!
 Wisdom*! to you my verse appeals;
 You share the griefs your barber feels:
 Scarce comes a student once a whole age,
 To stock your desolated college.
 Our trade how ill an army suits!
 This comes of picking up recruits.
 Loft is the robber's occupation,
 No robbing thrives—but of the nation:
 For hardy necks no rope is twisted,
 And e'en the hangman's self is lifted.—
 Thy publishers, O mighty Jackson!
 With scarce a scanty coat their backs on,
 Warning to youth no longer teach,
 Nor live upon a dying speech.
 In cassock clad, for want of breeches,
 No more the castle-chaplain preaches.
 Oh! were our troops but safely landed,
 And every regiment disbanded!
 They'd make, I trust, a new campaign
 On Henley's hill, or Campsfield's plain:
 Destin'd at home, in peaceful state,
 By me fresh shav'd, to meet their fate!

Regard, ye Justices of Peace!
 The Castle-Barber's piteous case:
 And kindly make some snug addition,
 To better his distress'd condition.
 Not that I mean, by such expressions,
 To shave your worshipp at the sessions;
 Or would, with vain presumption big,
 Aspire to comb the judge's wig:—
 Far less ambitious thoughts are mine,
 Far humbler hopes my views confine.—
 Then think not that I ask amiss;
 My small request is only this,
 That I, by leave of Leigh or Pardo,
 May, with the castle—have Bocardo.

Thus, as at Jesus oft I've heard,
 Rough servitors in Wales prefer'd,
 The Joneses, Morgans, and Ap-Rices,
 Keep fiddles with their benefices.

THE OXFORD NEWSMAN'S VERSES.

FOR THE YEAR 1760.

THINK of the palms, my masters dear!
 That crown this memorable year!
 Come fill the glass, my hearts of gold,
 To Britain's heroes brisk and bold;
 While into rhyme I strive to turn all
 The fam'd events of many a journal.
 France feeds her sons on meagre soup,
 'Twas hence they lost their Guadaloup:
 What though they dress so fine and ja'nty?
 They could not keep Marigalante.
 Their forts in Afric could not repel
 The thunder of undaunted Keppel:
 Brave commodore! how we adore ye
 For giving us success at Goree.
 Ticonderoga, and Niagara,
 Make each true Briton sing O fare a!
 I trust the taking of Crown-Point
 Has put French courage out of joint.

* The Governor of Oxford Castle.

Can we forget the timely check
 Wolfe gave the scoundrels at * Quebec?—
 That name has stopp'd my glad career,—
 Your faithful newsmen drops a tear!—

But other triumphs still remain,
 And rouse to glee my rhymes again.

On Minden's plains, ye meek Mounseers!
 Remember Kingsley's grenadiers.
 You vainly thought to ballargue us
 With your fine squadron off Cape Lagos;
 But when Boscawen came, † La Clue
 Sheer'd off, and look'd confounded blue.
 Conflans ‡, all cowardice and puff,
 Hop'd to demolish hardy Duff;
 But soon unlook'd-for guns o'er-aw'd him,
 Hawke darted forth, and nobly claw'd him.
 And now their vaunted Formidable
 Lies captive to a British cable.
 Would you demand the glorious cause
 Whence Britain every trophy draws?
 You need not puzzle long your wit;—
 Fame, from her trumpet, answers—Pitt.

FOR THE YEAR 1767.

DISMAL the news which Jackson's yearly bard
 Each circling Christmas brings,—“The times are ‘hard!’”

There was a time when Granby's grenadiers
 Trimm'd the lac'd jackets of the French Mounseers;

When every week produc'd some lucky hit,
 And all our paragraphs were plann'd by Pitt.
 We newsmen drank—as England's heroes fought,
 While every victory procur'd—a pot.
 Abroad we conquer'd France, and humbled Spain,
 At home rich harvests crown'd the laughing plain.
 Then ran in numbers free the newsmen's verses,
 Blithe were our hearts, and full our leathern purses.
 But now no more the stream of plenty flows,
 No more new conquests warm the newsmen's nose.
 Our shatter'd cottages admit the rain,
 Our infants stretch their hands for bread in vain.
 All hope is fled, our families are undone;
 Provisions all are carry'd up to London;
 Our copious granaries distillers thin,
 Who raise our bread—but do not cheapen gin.
 Th' effects of exportation still we rue;—
 I wish th' exporters were exported too!
 In every pot-house is unpaid our score;
 And generous Captain Jolly ticks no more!

Yet still in store some happiness remains,
 Some triumphs that may grace these annual strains.
 Misfortunes past no longer I repeat—
 George has declar'd—that we again shall eat.
 Sweet Willhelminy, spite of wind and tide,
 Of Denmark's monarch shines the blooming bride:
 She's gone! but there's another in her stead,
 For of a princess Charlotte's brought to bed:—
 Oh, cou'd I but have had one single sup,
 One single sniff at Charlotte's caudle-cup!—

* Before this place fell the brave Wolfe, yet with the satisfaction of first bearing that his troops were victorious.—The other places here enumerated were con-
 quets of the preceding year.

† The French Admiral.

‡ Another French Admiral.

I hear—God blefs it—'tis a charming girl,
So here's her health in half a pint of purl.
But much I fear this rhyme-exhausted fong
Has kept you from your Christmas cheer too
long.

Our poor endeavours view with gracious eye,
And bake these lines beneath a Christmas-pie!

FOR THE YEAR 1768.

STILL shall the newfman's annual rhymes
Complain of taxes and the times?
Each year our copies shall we make on
The price of butter, bread, and bacon?
Forbid it, all ye pow'rs of verse!
A happier subject I rehearse.
Farewel distress, and gloomy cares!
A merrier theme my muse prepares.
For lo! to save us, on a sudden,
In shape of porter, beef, and pudding,
Though late, electioneering comes!—
Strike up, ye trumpets, and ye drums!
At length we change our wonted note,
And feast, all winter, on a vote.
Sure, canvassing was never hotter!
But whether Harcourt, Nares, or Cotter*,
At this grand crisis will succeed,
We freemen have not yet decreed.—
Methinks, with mirth your sides are shaking,
To hear us talk of member-making!
Yet know, that we direct the state;
On us depends the nation's fate.—
What though some doctor's cast-off wig
O'er shades my pate, not worth a fig;
My whole apparel in decay;
My beard unshav'd—on new year's day;
In me behold (the land's protector),
A freeman, newfman, and elector!
Though cold, and all unshod, my toes:—
My breast for Britain's freedom glows:—
Though turn'd, by poverty my coat,
It ne'er was turn'd to give a vote.

Meantime, howe'er improv'd our fate is
By jovial cups, each evening, gratis;
Forget not, 'midst your Christmas cheer,
The customs of the coming year:—
In answer to this short epistle,
Your tankard send, to wet our whistle!

FOR THE YEAR 1770.

As now petitions are in fashion
With the first patriots of the nation;
In spirit high, in pocket low,
We patriots of the Butcher-Row,
Thus, like our betters, ask redress
For high and mighty grievances,
Real, though penn'd in rhyme, as those
Which oft our journal gives in prose:—
“Ye rural squires, so plump and sleek,
“Who study—Jackson, once a week;
“While now your hospitable board
“With cold surloin is amply stor'd,
“And old October, nutmeg'd nice,
“Send us a tankard and a slice!

* Candidates for the city of Oxford.

“Ye country parsons, stand our friends,
“While now the driving sleet descends!
“Give us your antiquated canes,
“To help us through the miry lanes;
“Or with a rusty grizzle wig
“This Christmas deign our pates to rig.
“Ye noble gem'men of the gown,
“View not our verses with a frown!
“But, in return for quick dispatches,
“Invite us to your buttery-hatches!
“Ye too, whose houses are so handy,
“For coffee, tea, rum, wine, and brandy;
“Pride of fair Oxford's gawdy streets,
“You too our strain submissive greets!
“Hear Horseman, Spindlow, King, and Har“per*!—
“The weather sure was never sharper:—
“Matron of Matrons, Martha Baggs!
“Dram your poor newfman clad in rags!
“Dire mischiefs folks above are brewing,
“The nation's—and the newfman's ruin:—
“'Tis your's our sorrows to remove;
“And if thus generous ye prove,
“For friends so good we're bound to pray
“Till—next returns a new-year's day!
“Giv'n at our melancholy chamber,
“The cellar of the Sheep's-Head Tavern.”

FOR THE YEAR 1771.

DELICIOUS news—a war with Spain!
New rapture fires our Christmas strain.
Behold, to strike each Briton's eyes,
What bright victorious scenes arise!
What paragraphs of English glory
Will Master Jackson set before ye!
The governor of Buenos Ayres
Shall dearly pay for his vagaries;
For whether North, or whether Chatham,
Shall rule the roast, we must have-at-tem:
Galloons—Havannah—Porto Bello,—
Ere long, will make the nation mellow:—
Our late trite themes we view with scorn,
Bellas the bold, and Parson Horne:
Nor more, through many a tedious winter,
The triumphs of the patriot Squinter,
The ins and outs, with cant eternal,
Shall crowd each column of our Journal.—
After a dreary season past,
Our turn to live is come at last:
Gen'ral's, and admirals, and Jews,
Contractors, printers, men of news,
All thrive by war, and line their pockets,
And leave the works of peace to blockheads.
But stay, my muse, this hafty fit—
The war is not declar'd as yet:
And we, though now so blithe we sing,
May all be pres'd to serve the king!
Therefore, meantime, our masters dear,
Produce your hospitable cheer:—
While we, with much sincere delight,
(Whether we publish news—or fight)
Like England's undegenerate fons,
Will drink—confusion to the Dons!

THE PHAETON, AND THE ONE-HORSE CHAIR.

AT Blagrave's* once upon a time,
There flood a phaeton sublime:
Unfulfill'd by the dusty road,
Its wheels with recent crimson glow'd;
Its sides display'd a dazzling hue,
Its harness tight its lining new:
No scheme-enamour'd youth, I ween,
Survey'd the gaily-deck'd machine,
But fondly long'd to seize the reins,
And whirl o'er Campsfield's† tempting plains.
Meantime it chanc'd, that hard at hand
A one-horse chair had took its stand:
When thus our vehicle begun
To sneer the luckless chaise and one.

“ How could my master place me here
Within thy vulgar atmosphere?
From classic ground pray shift thy station,
Thou scorn of Oxford education!—
Your homely make, believe me, man,
Is quite upon the Gothic plan;
And you, and all your clumsy kind,
For lowest purposes design'd:
Fit only, with a one-eye'd mare,
To drag, for benefit of air,
The country parson's pregnant wife,
Thou friend of dull domestic life!
Or, with his maid and aunt, to school
To carry Dicky on a stool:
Or, happily to some christening gay,
A brace of godmothers convey.—
Or, when blest Saturday prepares
For London tradesmen rest from cares,
'Tis thine to make them happy one day,
Companion of their genial Sunday!
'Tis thine, o'er turnpikes newly made,
When timely show'r's the dust have laid,
To bear some alderman serene
To fragrant Hampstead's sylvan scene.
Nor higher scarce thy merit rises
Among the polish'd sons of Isis.
Hir'd for a solitary crown,
Canst thou to schemes invite the gown?
Go, tempt some prig, pretending taste,
With hat new cock'd, and newly lac'd,
O'er mutton-chops, and scanty wine,
At humble Dorchester to dine!
Meantime remember, lifeless drone!
I carry Bucks and Bloods alone.
And oh! 'whene'er the weather's friendly,
What inn at Abingdon or Henly,
But still my vast importance feels,
And gladly greets my entering wheels!
And think, obedient to the throng,
How yon gay freet we smoke along:
While all with envious wonder view
The corner turn'd so quick and true.”

To check an upstart's empty pride,
Thus sage the one-horse chair reply'd.
“ Pray, when the consequence is weigh'd,
What's all your spirit and parade?
From mirth to grief what sad transitions,
To broken bones and impositions!

Or if no bones are broke, what's worse,
Your schemes make work for Glafs and Nourse.—
On us pray spare your keen reproaches,
From one-horse chairs men rise to coaches;
If calm discretion's steadfast hand,
With cautious skill the reins command.
From me fair health's fresh fountain springs,
O'er me soft snugness spreads her wings:
And innocencé reflects her ray
To gild my calm sequester'd way:
E'en kings might quit their state to share
Contentment and a one-horse chair.—
What though, o'er yonder echoing street
Your rapid wheels rebound so sweet;
Shall Isis sons thus vainly prize
A rattle of a larger size?”

Blagrave, who during the dispute,
Stood in a corner, snug and mute,
Surpris'd, no doubt, in lofty verse,
To hear his carriages converse,
With solemn face, o'er Oxford ale,
To me disclos'd this wondrous tale:
I frain't dispatch'd it to the muse,
Who brush'd it up for Jackson's news,
And, what has oft been penn'd in prose,
Added this moral at the close.

“ Things may be useful though obscure;
“ The pace that's slow is often sure:
“ When empty pageantries we prize,
“ We raise but dust to blind our eyes.
“ The golden mean can best bestow
“ Safety for unsubstantial show.”

MORNING. AN ODE.

THE AUTHOR CONFINED TO COLLEGE, 1745.

Scribimus inclusi. — — — — PERS. Sat. I. v. 13.

ONCE more the vernal fun's ambrosial beams
The fields, as with a purple robe adorn:
Charwell, thy sedge banks, and glistering streams
All laugh and sing at mild approach of morn;
Through the deep groves I hear the chaunting birds,
And through the clover'd vale the various-lowing
herds.

Up mounts the mower from his lowly thatch,
Well pleas'd the progress of the spring to mark,
The fragrant breath of breezes pure to catch,
And startle from her couch the early lark;
More genuine pleasure sooths his tranquil breast,
Than high-thron'd kings can boast, in eastern glory dress.

The pensive poet through the green-wood steals
Or treeds the willow'd marge of murmuring brook;
Or climbs the steep ascent of airy hills;
There fits him down beneath a branching oak,
Whence various scenes, and prospects wide below,
Still teach his musing mind with fancies high to glow.

But I nor with the day awake to bliss,
(Inelegant to me fair nature's face,
A blank the beauty of the morning is,
And grief and darkness all for light and grace);
Nor bright the sun, nor green the meads appear,
Nor colour charms mine eye, nor melody mine ear.

* Well known at Oxford for letting out carriages, 1763.

† In the road to Blenheim.

Me, void of elegance and manners mild,
 With leaden rod, stern discipline restrains;
 Stiff pedantry, of learned pride the child,
 My roving genius binds in Gothic chains;
 Nor can the cloister'd muse expand her wing,
 Nor bid these twilight roofs with her gay carols ring.

ODE TO A GRIZZLE WIG.

BY A GENTLEMAN WHO HAD JUST LEFT OFF
 HIS BOB.

ALL hail, ye curls, that rang'd in reverend row,
 With snowy pomp my conscious shoulders hide!
 That fall beneath in venerable flow,
 And crown my brows above with feathery pride!

High on your summit, wisdom's mimic'd air
 Sits thron'd, with pedantry her solemn fire,
 And in her net of awe-diffusing hair,
 Entangles fools, and bids the crowd admire.

O'er every lock, that floats in full display,
 Sage ignorance her gloom scholastic throws;
 And stamps o'er all my visage, once so gay,
 Unmeaning gravity's serene repose.

Can thus large wigs our reverence engage?
 Have barbers thus the pow'r to blind our eyes?
 Is science thus conferr'd on every page,
 By Baylis, Blenkinsop, and lofty Wife*?

But thou, farewell, my bob! whose thin-wove
 thatch [wiles,

Was stor'd with quips and cranks, and wanton
 That love to live within the one-curl'd scratch,
 With fun, and all the family of smiles.

Safe in thy privilege, near Isis' brook,
 Whole afternoons at Wolvercot I quaff'd;
 At eve my careles' round in High-Street took,
 And call'd at Jolly's for the casual draught.

No more the wherry feels my stroke so true;
 At kittles, in a grizzle, can I play?
 Woodstock, farewell! and Wallingford, adieu!
 Where many a scheme reliev'd the lingering day.

Such were the joys that once Hilario crown'd,
 Ere grave preferment came my peace to rob:
 Such are the less ambitious pleasures found
 Beneath the liceat of an humble bob.

Who won't sit at eve to pace the long-lost hounds
 Of lonesome Osney! What malignant fiend
 Thy cloister-loving mind from ancient lore
 Hath base seduc'd? urg'd thy apostate pen
 To trench deep wounds on antiquaries sage,
 And drag the venerable fathers forth,
 Victims to laughter? Cruel as the mandate
 Of mitred priests, who Basket late enjoind

JOB, CHAP. XXXIX.

DECLARE, if heav'nly wisdom blest thy tongue,
 When teems the mountain goat with promis'd young;

The stated seasons tell, the month explain,
 When feels the bounding hind a mother's pain;
 While, in th' oppressive agonies of birth,
 Silent they bow the sorrowing head to earth?
 Why crop their lusty feed the verdant food?
 Why leave their dams to search the gloomy wood?

Say, whence the wild-afs wantons o'er the plain,
 Sports uncontrou'd, unconscious of the rein?
 'Tis his o'er scenes of solitude to roam,
 The waste his house, the wilderness his home;
 He scorns the crowded city's pomp and noise,
 Nor heeds the driver's rod, nor hears his voice;
 At will on ev'ry various verdure fed,
 His pasture o'er the shaggy cliffs is spread.

Will the fierce unicorn obey thy call,
 Enslav'd to man, and patient of the stall?
 Say, will he stubborn stoop thy yoke to bear,
 And through the furrow drag the tardy share?
 Say, canst thou think, O wretch of vain belief,
 His lab'ring limbs will draw thy weighty sheaf?
 Or canst thou tame the temper of his blood
 With faithful sect to trace the destin'd road?
 Who paints the peacock's train with radiant eyes,
 And all the bright diversity of dyes?
 Whose hand the stately ostrich has supply'd
 With glorious plumage, and her snowy pride?
 Thoughtless she leaves amid the dusty way,
 Her eggs, to ripen in the genial ray;
 Nor heeds, that some fell beast, who thirsts for
 blood,

Or the rude foot may crush the future brood.
 In her no love the tender offspring share,
 No soft remembrance, no maternal care:

For God has steel'd her unrelenting breast,
 Nor feeling sense, nor instinct mild impress,
 Bade her the rapid-rushing steed despise,
 Outstrip the rider's rage, and tow'r amidst the skies. [deck?
 Didst thou the horse with strength and beauty
 Hast thou in thunder cloth'd his nervous neck?
 Will he, like groveling grasshoppers afraid,
 Start at each sound, at ev'ry breeze dismay'd?
 A cloud of fire his lifted nostrils raise,
 And breathe a glorious terror as they blaze.
 He paws indignant, and the valley spurns,
 Rejoicing in his might, and for the battle burns.
 When quivers rattle, and the frequent spear
 Flies flashing, leaps his heart with languid fear?
 Swallowing with fierce and greedy rage the ground, [found?"
 "Is this," he cries, "the trumpet's warlike
 Eager he scents the battle from afar,
 And all the mingling thunder of the war.
 Flies the fierce hawk by thy supreme command,
 To seek soft climates, and a southern land?
 Who bade th' aspiring eagle mount the sky,
 And build her firm aerial nest on high?
 On the bare cliff, or mountain's shaggy steep,
 Her fortrefs of defence she dares to keep;
 Thence darts her radiant eye's pervading ray,
 Inquisitive to ken the distant prey.
 Seeks with her thirsty brood th' enanguin'd plain,
 There bathes her beak in blood, companion of the slain.

THE PROGRESS OF DISCONTENT.

WRITTEN AT OXFORD IN THE YEAR 1746.

WHEN now mature in classic knowledge,
 The joyful youth is sent to college,
 His father comes, a vicar plain,
 At Oxford bred—in Anna's reign,
 And thus, in form of humble suitor,
 Bowing accosts a reverend tutor.
 "Sir, I'm a Gloucestershire divine,
 "And this my eldest son of nine;
 "My wife's ambition and my own
 "Was that this child should wear a gown;
 "I'll warrant that his good behaviour
 "Will justify your future favour;
 "And for his parts, to tell the truth,
 "My son's a very forward youth;
 "Has Horace all by heart—you'd wonder—
 "And mouths out Homer's Greek like thunder.
 "If you'd examine—and admit him,
 "A scholarship would nicely fit him:
 "That he succeeds 'tis ten to one;
 "Your vote and interest, Sir!"—'Tis done.
 Our pupil's hopes, though twice defeated,
 Are with a scholarship completed:
 A scholarship but half maintains,
 And college rules are heavy chains:
 In garret dark he smokes and puns,
 A prey to discipline and duns;
 And now intent on new designs,
 Sighs for a fellowship—and fines.
 When nine full tedious winters past,
 That utmost wish is crown'd at last:
 But the rich prize no sooner got,
 Again he quarrels with his lot:

"These fellowships are pretty things,
 "We live indeed like petty kings:
 "But who can bear to waste his whole age
 "Amid the dullness of a college,
 "Debar'd the common joys of life,
 "And that prime bliss—a loving wife!
 "O! what's a table richly spread
 "Without a woman at its head!
 "Would some snug benefice but fall,
 "Ye feasts, ye dinners! farewell all!
 "To offices I'd bid adieu,
 "Of Dean, Vice Pres.—of Burfar too;
 "Come joys, that rural quiet yields,
 "Come, tithes, and house, and fruitful fields!"
 Too fond of freedom and of ease
 A patron's vanity to please,
 Long time he watches, and by stealth,
 Each frail incumbent's doubtful health;
 And length—and in his fortieth year,
 A living drops—two hundred clear!
 With breast elate beyond expression,
 He hurries down to take possession,
 With rapture views the sweet retreat—
 "What a convenient house! how neat!
 "For fuel here's sufficient wood:
 "Pray God the cellars may be good!
 "The garden—that must be new plann'd—
 "Shall these old-fashion'd yew-trees stand?
 "O'er yonder vacant plot shall rise
 "The flow'ry shrub of thousand dyes:—
 "Yon wall, that feels the southern ray,
 "Shall blush with ruddy fruitage gay:
 "While thick beneath its aspect warm
 "O'er well-rang'd hives the bees shall swarm,
 "From which, ere long, of golden gleam
 "Methueglin's luscious juice shall stream.
 "This awkward hut, o'ergrown with ivy,
 "We'll alter to a modern privy:
 "Up yon green slope, of hazel's trim,
 "An avenue so cool and dim,
 "Shall to an arbour, at the end,
 "In spite of gout, entice a friend.
 "My predecessor lov'd devotion—
 "But of a garden had no notion."
 Continuing this fantastic farce on,
 He now commences country parson.
 To make his character entire,
 He weds—a cousin of the 'quire;
 Not over weighty in the purse,
 But many doctors have done worse:
 And though his boasts no charms divine,
 Yet he can carve and make birch wine.
 Thus fixt, content he taps his barrel,
 Exhorts his neighbours not to quarrel;
 Finds his church-wardens have discerning
 Both in good liquor and good learning;
 With tithes his barns replete he fees,
 And chuckles o'er his surplice fees;
 Studies to find out latent dues,
 And regulates the state of pews;
 Rides a sleek mare with purple housings,
 To share the monthly clubs carousing;
 Of Oxford pranks facetious tells,
 And—but on Sundays—hears no bells;
 Sends presents of his choicest fruit,
 And prunes himself each sapless shoot;
 Plants colliflow'rs, and boasts to rear
 The earliest melons of the year;

Thinks alteration charming work is,
Keeps Bantam cocks, and feeds his turkies;
Builds in his copse a fav'rite bench,
And stores the pond with carp and tench.—

But ah! too soon his thoughtless breast
By cares domestic is opprest;
And a third butcher's bill, and brewing,
Threaten inevitable ruin:

For children fresh expences yet,
And Dicky now for school is fit.

"Why did I sell my college life
(He cries) for beneficence and wife?
Return, ye days! when endless pleasure
I found in reading, or in leisure!

"When calm around the common room
I puff'd my daily pipe's perfume!

"Rode for a stomach, and inspected,
At annual bottlings, corks selected:

"And din'd untax'd, untroubled, under
The portrait of our pious founder!

"When impositions were supply'd
To light my pipe—or foath my pride—

"No cares were then for forward peas
A yearly-longing wife to please;

"My thoughts no christ'ning dinners crost,
No children cry'd for butter'd toast;

"And ev'ry night I went to bed,
"Without a modus in my head!"

Oh! trifling head, and fickle heart!

Chagrin'd at whatso'er thou art;

A dupe to follies yet untry'd,

And sick of pleasures, scarce enjoy'd!

Each prize possess'd, thy transport ceases,
And in pursuit alone it pleases.

PROLOGUE

ON THE OLD WINCHESTER PLAYHOUSE, OVER
THE BUTCHER'S SHAMBLES.

WHOE'ER our stage examines, must excuse
The wond'rous shifts of the dramatic muse;
Then kindly listen, while the prologue rambles
From wit to beef, from Shakspeare to the shambles!

Divided only by one flight of stairs,
The monarch swaggers, and the butcher swears!
Quick the transition when the curtain drops,
From meek Monimia's moans to mutton-chops!

While for Lothario's loss Lavinia cries,
Old women scold, and dealers d—n your eyes!

Here Juliet listens to the gentle lark,
There in harsh chorus hungry bull-dogs bark.

Cleavers and scymitars give blow for blow,
And heroes bleed above, and sheep below!

While tragic thunders shake the pit and box,
Rebells to the roar the staggering ox.

Cow-horns and trumpets mix their martial tones,
Kidnies and kings, mousing and marrow-bones.

Suet and sighs, blank verse and blood abound,
And form a tragi-comedy around.

With weeping lovers, dying calves complain,
Confusion reigns—chaos is come again!

Hither your steelyards, butchers, bring, to weigh
The pound of flesh, Antonio's bond must pay!

Hither your knives, ye Christians, clad in blue,
Bring to be whetted by the ruthless Jew!

Hard is our lot, who, seldom doom'd to eat,
Cast a sheep's-eye on this forbidden meat—
Gaze on furlouns, which ah! we cannot carve,
And in the midst of legs of mutton—starve!
But would you to our house in crowds repair,
Ye gen'rous captains, and ye blooming fair,
The fate of Tantalus we should not fear,
Nor pine for a repast that is so near.
Monarchs no more would supperless remain,
Nor pregnant queens for cutlets long in vain.

A PASTORAL

IN THE MANNER OF SPENSER.

From Theocritus. Idyll. XX.

As late I strove Lucilla's lip to kiss,
She with discourtesee reprov'd my will;
Dost thou, she said, affect so pleafant blefs,
A simple shepherd, and a losell-wile?
Not fancy's hand should join my courtly lip
To thine, as I myself were fast asleep.

As thus she spake, full proud and boasting laffe,
And as a peacocke pearke, in dalliance
She bragly turned her ungentle face,
And all disdain'ing ey'd my shape askance:
But I did blush, with grief and shame yblent,
Like morning-rose with hoary dewe besprent.

Tell me, my fellows all, am I not fair?
Has fell enchantress blafed all my charms?
Whilom mine head was sleek with tress'd hayre,
My laughing cyne did shoot out love's alarms:
E'en Kate did deemen me the fairest swain,
When erst I won this girdle on the plain.

My lip with vermil was embellish'd,
My bagpipes notes loud and delicious were,
The milk-white lilly, and the rose so red,
Did on my face depeinten lively cheere,
My voice as foote as mounting lark did shrill,
My look was hlythe as Marg'ret's at the mill.

But she forsooth, more fair than Madge or Kate,
A dainty maid, did deign not shepherd's love;
Nor wist what Thenot told us swains of late;
That Venus sought a shepherd in a grove;
Nor that a heav'nly god who Phœbus hight,
To tend his flock with shepherds did delight.—

Ah! 'tis that Venus with accurst despight,
That all my dolour, and my shame has made!
Nor does remembrance of her own delight,
For me one drop of pity sweet persuade?
Aye hence the glowing rapture may she miss,
Like me be scorn'd, nor ever taste a kiss.

ODE

ON THE APPROACH OF SUMMER.

"Te dea, te fugiunt venti, te nubila cœli,
"Adventumque tuum; tibi suaveis dædala tel-
"lus

"Submittit flores; tibi vident æquora ponti;
"Placatumque nitet diffuso lumine cœlum."

LUCRETIVS.

HENCE, iron-scepter'd Winter, haste
To bleak Siberian waste!

Haste to thy polar solitude;

Mid cataracts of ice, [rude,
Whose torrents dumb are stretch'd in fragments

From many an airy precipice,
Where, ever beat by fleetly show'rs,
Thy gloomy Gothic castle tow'rs;
Amid whose howling aisles and halls,
Where no gay sunbeam paints the walls,
On ebon throne thou lovest to shroud
Thy brows in many a murky cloud.

E'en now, before the vernal heat,
Sullen I see thy train retreat:
Thy ruthless host stern Eurus guides,
That on a ravenous tiger rides,
Dim-figur'd on whose robe are shown
Shipwrecks, and villages o'erthrown:
Grim Auster, drooping all with dew,
In mantle clad of watchet hue:
And cold, like Zemblan savage seen,
Still threatening with his arrows keen;
And next, in furry coat embost
With icicles, his brother Frost.

Winter farewell! thy forests hoar,
Thy frozen floods delight no more;
Farewel the fields, so bare and wild!
But come thou rose-cheek'd cherub mild,
Sweetest Summer! haste thee here,
Once more to crown the gladden'd year.

Thee April blithe, as long of yore,
Ecrnudas' lawns he frolic'd o'er,
With musky neStar-trickling wing,
(In the new world's first dawning spring),

To gather balm of choicest dews,
And patterns fair of various hues,
With which to paint in changeful dye,
The youthful earth's embroidery;
To cull the essence of rich smells
In which to dip his new-born bells;
Thee, as he skim'd with pinions fleet,
He found an infant, smiling sweet;
Where a tall citron's shade embrown'd
The soft lap of the fragrant ground.
There on an amaranthine bed

Thee with rare neStarine fruits he fed;
Till soon beneath his forming care,
You bloom'd a goddesses debonair;
And then he gave the blessed isle
Aye to be sway'd beneath thy smile:
There plac'd thy green and grassy shrine,
With myrtle bower'd and jessamine:
And to thy care the task assign'd
With quickening hand, and nurture kind,
His roseat infant-births to rear,
Till Autumn's mellowing reign appear.

Haste thee, nymph! and hand in hand,
With thee lead a buxom band;
Bring fantastic-footed Joy,
With Sport, that yellow-tress'd boy.
Leisure, that through the balmy sky,
Chafes a crimson butterfly.
Bring Health that loves in early dawn
To meet the milk-maid on the lawn;
Bring Pleasure, rural nymph, and Peace,
Meek, cottage-loving shepherdes!
And that sweet stripling, Zephyr, bring,
Light, and for ever on the wing.
Bring the dear muse, that loves to lean
On river-margins, mossy green.

But who is she, that bears thy train,
Pacing light the velvet plain?
The pale pink binds her auburn hair,
Her tresses flow with pastoral air;
'Tis May, the grace—confest the stands
By branch of hawthorn in her hands:
Lo! near her trip the lightsome dews,
Their wings all-sing'd in Iris-hues;
With whom the pow'rs of Flora play,
And paint with pansies all the way.

Oft when thy season, sweetest queen,
Has dress'd the groves in liv'ry green;
When in each fair and fertile field
Beauty begins her bow'r to build;
While evening, veil'd in shadows brown,
Puts her matron-mantle on,
And mists in spreading steams convey
More fresh the fumes of new-thorn hay;
Then, goddesses guide my pilgrim feet
Contemplation hoar to meet,

As flow he winds in muselful mood,
Near the rush'd marge of Cherwell's flood;
Or o'er old Avon's magic edge,
Where Shakspeare cull'd the spiky sedge,
All playful yet, in years unripe,
To frame a shrill and simple pipe.

There through the dusk but dimly seen,
Sweet ev'ning objects intervene:
His wattled cotes the shepherd plants,
Beneath her elm the milk-maid chants.
The woodman, speeding home, a while
Rests him at a shady stile.

Nor wants there fragrance to dispense
Refreshment o'er my soothed sense;
Nor tangled woodbines balmy bloom,
Nor grafs besprent to breathe perfume:
Nor lurking wild-thyme's spicy sweet
To bathe in dew my roving feet:
Nor wants there note of Philomel,
Nor sound of distant-tinkling bell:
Nor lowings faint of herds remote,
Nor massiff's bark from bosom'd cot;
Rustle the breezes lightly borne
Or deep embattel'd ears of corn:
Round ancient elm, with humming noise,
Full loud the chaffer-swarms rejoice.

Meantime, a thousand dyes invest
The ruby chambers of the West!
That all assant the village tow'r
A mild reflected radiance pour,
While, with the level-streaming rays
Far seen its arched windows blaze:
And the tall grove's green top is dight
In russet tints, and gleams of light:
So that the gay scene by degrees
Bathes my blithe heart in ecstasies;
And fancy to my ravish'd sight
Portrays her kindred visions bright.
At length the parting light subdues
My soften'd soul to calmer views,
And fainter shap'es of pensive joy,
As twilight dawns, my mind employ,
Till from the path I fondly stray
In musings lapt, nor heed the way;
Wandering through the landscape still,
Till melancholy has her fill;
And on each moss-wove border damp,
The glow worm hangs his fairy lamp.

But when the sun, at noon-tide hour,
Sits throned in his highest tow'r;
Me, heart-rejoicing goddess, lead
To the tann'd hay-cock in the mead:
'To mix in rural mood among
'The nymphs and swains, a busy throng;
Or, as the tepid odours breathe,
'The russet piles to lean beneath:
There as my listless limbs are thrown
On couch more soft than palace down;
I listen to the busy sound
Of mirth and toil that hums around;
And see the team shrill-tinkling pass,
Alternate o'er the furrow'd grass.

But ever, after summer-show'r,
When the bright sun's returning pow'r,
With laughing beam has chas'd the storm,
And cheer'd reviving nature's form;
By sweet-brier hedges, bath'd in dew,
Let me my wholesome path pursue;
There issuing forth the frequent snail,
Wears the dank way with slimy trail,
While as I walk, from pearly bush,
The sunny-sparkling drop I brush,
And all the landscape fair I view
Clad in robe of fresher hue;
And so loud the black-bird sings,
That far and near the valley rings.
From shelter deep of shaggy rock
The shepherd drives his joyful flock;
From bowing beech the mower blithe
With new-born vigour grasps the scythe;
While o'er the smooth unbounded meads
His last faint gleam the rainbow spreads.

But ever against restless heat,
Bear me to the rock-arch'd seat,
O'er whose dim mouth an ivy'd oak
Hangs nodding from the lov-bow'd rock;
Haunted by that chaste nymph alone,
Whose waters cleave the smoothed stone;
Which, as they gush upon the ground,
Still scatter misty dews around:
A rustic, wild, grotesque alcove,
Its side with mantling woodbines wove;
Cool is the cave where Cibo dwells,
Whence Helicon's fresh fountain wells;
Or noon-tide grot where sylvan sleeps
In hoar Lycæum's piny sleeps.

Me, goddess, in such cavern lay,
While all without is scorch'd in day;
Sore sighs the weary swain, beneath
His with'ring hawthorn on the heath;
The drooping hedger wishes eve,
In vain, of labour short reprieve!
Meantime, on Afric's glowing sands
Smote with keen heat, the traveller stands:
Low sinks his heart, while round his eye
Measures the scenes that boundless lie,
Ne'er yet by foot of mortal worn,
Where thirst, wan pilgrim, walks forlorn.
How does he wish some cooling wave
To slake his lips, or limbs to lave!
And thinks, in every whisper low,
He hears a bursting fountain flow.

Or bear me to yon antique wood,
Dun temple of sage solitude!
There within a nook most dark,
Where none my musing mood may mark;

VOL. XI.

Let me in many a whisper'd rite
The genius old of Greece invite,
With that fair wreath my brows to bind,
Which for his chosen imps he twi'nd,
Well nurtur'd in Pierian lore,
On clear Ilissus laureate shore—
Till high on waving nest reclin'd,
The raven wakes my tranced mind!
Or to the forest-fringed vale,
Where widow'd turtles love to wail,
Where cowslips clad in mantle meek,
Nod their tall heads to breezes weak:
In the midst, with fedges gray
Crown'd, a scant riv'let winds its way,
And trembling through the weedy wreaths,
Around an oozy freshness breathes,
O'er the solitary green,
Nor cot, nor loitering hind is seen:
Nor aught alarms the mute repose,
Save that by fits an heifer lows:
A scene might tempt me peaceful sage
To rear him a lone hermitage;
Fit place his pensive old might choose
On virtue's holy robe to muse.

Yet still the sultry noon t' appease
Some more romantic scene might please;
Or fairy bank, or magic lawn,
By Spenser's lavish pencil drawn.
Or bow'r in Vallambrosa's shade,
By legendary pens pourtray'd.
Haite let me shroud from painful light,
On that hoar hill's aerial height,
In solemn state, where waving wide,
Thick pines with dark'ning umbrage hide
The rugged vaults, and riven tow'rs
Of that proud cattle's painted bow'rs,
Whence Hardyknute, a baron bold,
In Scotland's martial days of old,
Descended from the stately feast,
Begirt with many a warrior guest,
To quell the pride of Norway's king,
With quiv'ring lance and twanging string.
As through the caverns dim I wind,
Might I that holy legend find,
By fairies spelt in mystic rhymes,
To teach inquiring later times,
What open force, or secret guile,
Dash'd into dust the solemn pile.

But when mild morn in saffron stole
First issues from her eastern goal,
Let not my due feet fail to climb
Some breezy summit's brow sublime,
Whence nature's universal face,
Illumin'd smiles with new-born grace;
The misty streams that wind below,
With silver-sparkling lustre glow;
The groves and castled cliffs appear
Invetted all in radiance clear;
O! every village charm beneath!
The smoke that mounts in azure wreath!
O beauteous rural interchange!
The simple spire, and elmy grange!
Content, indulging blissful hours,
Whistles o'er the fragrant flow'rs,
And cattle rous'd to pasture new,
Shake jocund from their sides the dew.

3 Z

'Tis thou alone, O Summer mild,
 Canst bid me carol wood-notes wild:
 Whene'er I view thy genial scenes,
 Thy waving woods, embroider'd greens,
 What fires within my bosom wake,
 How glows my mind the reed to take!
 What charms like thine the muse can call,
 With whom 'tis youth and laughter all;
 With whom each field's a paradise,
 And all the globe a bow'r of bliss!
 With thee conversing all the day,
 I meditate my lightsome lay.
 These pedant cloisters let me leave,
 To breathe my votive song at eve.
 In valleys where mild whispers use,
 Of shade and stream, to court the muse,
 While wand'ring o'er the brook's dim verge,
 I hear the stock-dove's dying dirge.

But when life's busier scene is o'er,
 And age shall give the tresses hoar,
 I'd fly soft luxury's marble dome,
 And make an humble thatch my home,
 Which sloping hills around enclose,
 Where many a beech and brown oak grows;
 Beneath whose dark and branching bow'rs
 Its tides a far-fam'd river pours:
 By nature's beauties taught to please,
 Sweet Tusculane of rural ease!
 Still grot of peace! in lowly shed
 Who loves to rest her gentle head.
 For not the scenes of Attic art
 Can comfort care, or soothe the heart:
 Nor burning cheek, nor wakeful eye,
 For gold, and Tyrian purple fly.

Thither, kind Heav'n, in pity leat,
 Send me a little, and content;
 The faithful friend, and cheerful night,
 The social scene of dear delight:
 The conscience pure, the temper gay,
 The musing eve, and idle day.
 Give me beneath cool shades to sit,
 Rapt with the charms of classic wit;
 To catch the bold heroic flame,
 That built immortal Græcia's fame.
 Nor let me fail, meantime, to raise
 The solemn song to Britain's praise:
 To spurn the shepherd's simple reeds
 And paint heroic ancient deeds:
 To chaunt fam'd Arthur's magic tale,
 And Edward, stern in sable mail;
 Or wand'ring Brutus' lawless doom,
 Or brave Bonduca, scourge of Rome.

O ever to sweet poetry,
 Let me live true votary!
 She shall lead me by the hand,
 Queen of sweet smiles, and solace bland:
 She from her precious stores shall shed
 Ambrosial flow'rets o'er my head:
 She, from my tender youthful cheek
 Can wipe, with lenient finger meek,
 The secret and unpitied tear,
 Which still I drop in darkness drear.
 She shall be my blooming bride,
 With her, as years successive glide,
 I'll hold divinest dalliance,
 For ever held in holy trance.

ODE FOR MUSIC,

As performed at the Theatre in Oxford, on the 2d of July 1751. Being the Anniversary appointed by the late Lord Crew, Bishop of Durham, for the Commemoration of Benefactors to the University.

" Quique sacerdotis casti, dum vita manebat ;
 " Quique pii vates, et Phœbo digna locuti ;
 " Inventas aut qui vitam excoluere per artes ;
 " Quique sui memores alios fecere merendo ;
 " Omnibus his"—— VIRG.

RECITATIVE ACCOMP.

WHERE shall the muse, that on the sacred shell,
 Of men in arts and arms renown'd,
 The solemn strain delights to swell;
 Oh! where shall Clio choose a race,
 Whom fame with every laurel, every grace,
 Like those of Albion's envied isle, has crown'd?

CHORUS.

Daughter and mistress of the sea,
 All-honour'd Albion hail!
 Where'er thy commerce spreads the swelling sail,
 Ne'er shall she find a land like thee,
 So brave, so learned, and so free;
 All-honour'd Albion, hail!

RECITATIVE.

But in this princely land of all that's good and great,
 Would Clio seek the most distinguish'd seat,
 Most blest, where all is so sublimely blest,
 That with superior grace o'erlooks the rest,
 Like a rich gem in circling gold enshrin'd;

AIR I.

Where Isis' waters wind
 Along the sweetest shore,
 That ever felt fair culture's hands,
 Or Spring's embroider'd mantle wore,
 Lo! where majestic Oxford stands;

CHORUS.

Virtue's awful throne!
 Wisdom's immortal source!

RECITATIVE.

Thee well her best belov'd may boasting Albion
 own,
 Whence each fair purpose of ingenious praise,
 All that in thought or deed divine is deem'd,
 In one unbounded tide, one unremitting course,
 From age to age has still successive stream'd;
 Where learning and where liberty have nurs'd,
 For those that in their ranks have shone the first,
 Their most luxuriant growth of ever-blooming bays.

RECITATIVE ACCOMP.

In ancient days, when she, the queen endu'd
 With more than female fortitude,
 Bonduca led her painted ranks to fight;
 Oft times, in adamantine arms array'd,
 Pallas descended from the realms of light,
 Imperial Britoness! thy kindred aid.
 As once, all-glowing from the well-fought day,
 The goddess' fought a cooling stream,
 By chance, inviting with their glassy gleam,
 Fair Isis waters flow'd not far away.

Eager she view'd the wave,
On the cool bank she bar'd her breast,
To the soft gale her locks ambrosial gave;
And thus the wat'ry nymph address'd:

AIR II.

"Hear, gentle nymph, whoe'er thou art,
"Thy sweet refreshing stores impart:
"A goddess from thy mossy brink
"Asks of thy crystal stream to drink:
"Lo! Pallas asks the friendly gift;
"Thy coral-crowned tresses lift,
"Rife from the wave, propitious pow'r.
"O listen from thy pearly bow'r."

RECITATIVE.

Her accents Isis calm attention caught,
As lonesome in her secret cell,
In ever-varying hues, as mimic fancy taught,
She rang'd the many-tinctur'd shell:
Then from her work arose the Naïs mild;

AIR III.

She rose, and sweetly smil'd
With many a lovely look,
That whisper'd soft consent:

RECITATIVE.

She smil'd, and gave the goddess in her flood
To dip her cask, though dy'd in recent blood;
While Pallas, as the boon she took,
Thus pour'd the grateful sentiment:

AIR IV.

"For this thy flood the fairest name
"Of all Britannia's streams shall glide,
"Best fav'rite of the sons of fame,
"Of ev'ry tuneful breast the pride;
"For on thy borders, bounteous queen,
"Where now the cowl'd paint the green
"With unregarded grace,
"Her wanton herds where nature feeds,
"As lonesome on the breezy reeds
"She bends her silent pace;
"Lo! there, to wisdom's goddess dear,
"A far-fam'd city shall her turrets rear,

RECITATIVE.

"There all her force shall Pallas prove;
"Of classic leaf with every crown,
"Each olive, meed of old renown,
"Each ancient wreath, which Athens wove,
"I'll bid her blooming bow'rs abound;
"And Oxford's sacred seats shall tow'r
"To thee, mild Naïs of the flood,
"The trophy of my gratitude!
"The temple of my pow'r!"

RECITATIVE.

Nor was the pious promise vain;
Soon illustrious Alfred came,
And pitch'd fair wisdom's tent on Isis' plenteous plain.

Alfred, on thee shall all the muses wait,

AIR V. AND CHORUS.

Alfred, majestic name,
Of all our praise the spring!
Thee all thy sons shall sing,
Deck'd with the martial and the civic wreath:
In notes most awful shall the trumpet breath
To thee, great Romulus of learning's richest state.

RECITATIVE.

Nor Alfred's bounteous hand alone,
Oxford, thy rising temples own:
Soon many a sage munificent,
The prince, the prelate, laurel-crowned crowd,
Their ample bounty lent
To build the beauteous monument,
That Pallas vow'd.

RECITATIVE ACCOMP.

And now she lifts her head sublime,
Majestic in the mofs of time;
Nor wants there Grecia's better part;
'Mid the proud piles of ancient art,
Whose fretted spires, with ruder hand,
Wainflet and Wickham bravely plann'd;
Nor decent Doric to dispense
New charms 'mid old magnificence;
And here and there soft Corinth weaves
Her dædal coronet of leaves;

DUET.

[the sky,

While, as with rival pride their tow'rs invade
Radcliffe and Bodley seem to vie,
Which shall deserve the foremost place,
Or Gothic strength, or Attic grace.

RECITATIVE.

O Isis! ever will I chaunt thy praise:
Not that thy sons have struck the golden lyre
With hands most skilful; have their brows en-twind

With every fairest flower of Helicon,
The sweetest swans of all th' harmonious choir;
And bade the musing mind
Of every science pierce the pathless ways,
And from the rest the wreath of wisdom won;

AIR VI.

But that thy sons have dar'd to feel
For freedom's cause a sacred zeal;
With British breast, and patriot pride,
Have still corruption's cup defy'd;
In dangerous days untaught to fear,
Have held the name of honour dear.

RECITATIVE.

But chief on this illustrious day,
The muse her loudest Pæans loves to pay.
Erewhile she strove with accents weak
In vain to build the lofty rhyme;
At length, by better days of bounty cheer'd,
She dares unfold her wing.

AIR VII.

Hail hour of transport most sublime!
In which, the man rever'd,
Immortal Crew commands to sing,
And gives the pipe to breathe, the string to speak.

CHORUS.

Blest prelate, hail!
Most pious patron, most triumphant theme!
From whose auspicious hand
On Isis' tow'rs new beauties beam,
New praise her nursing fathers gain;
Immortal Crew!
Blest prelate, hail!

RECITATIVE.

E'en now fir'd fancy sees thee lead
To fame's high-seated throne
The shouting band!
O'er every hallowed head

Fame's choicest wreaths the fees thee spread:
Alfred! superior smiles the solemn scene to view;

AIR VIII.

And bids the goddess lift
Her loudest trumpet to proclaim,
O Crew, thy consecrated gift,
And echo with his own in social strains thy name.
[Chorus repeated.]

ODE

FOR THE NEW-YEAR, 1786*.

"DEAR to Jove, a genial isle,
"Crowns the broad Atlantic wave;
"The sensuous there in mild assemblage smile,
"And vernal blossoms clothe the fruitful prime:
"There, in many a fragrant cave,
"Dwell the spirits of the brave,
"And braid with amaranth their brows sublime."
So feign'd the Grecian bards of yore;
And veil'd in fable's fancy-woven vest
A visionary shore,
That faintly gleam'd on their prophetic eye
Through the dark volume of futurity:
Nor knew that in the bright attire they dress'd
Albion, the green-hair'd heroine of the west:
Ere yet she claim'd old ocean's high command,
And snatch'd the trident from the tyrant's hand.

Vainly flow'd the mystic rhyme?
Mark the deeds from age to age,
That fill her trophy-pictur'd page:
And see, with all its strength, untam'd by time,
Still glows her valour's veteran rage,
O'er Calpe's cliffs, and steepy towers,
When stream'd the red sulphureous showers,
And death's own hand the dread artillery threw;
While far along the midnight main
Its glaring arch the flaming valley drew:
How triumph'd Elliot's patient train,
Baffling their vain confederate foes!
And met the unwonted fight's terrific form;
And hurling back the burning war, arose
Superior to the fiery storm!

Is there an ocean, that forgets to roll
Beneath the torpid pole;
Nor to the brooding tempest heaves?
Her hardy keel the stubborn billow cleaves,
The rugged Neptune of the winter's brine
In vain his adamant breast-plate wears;
To search coy nature's guarded mine,
She bursts the barriers of th' indignant ice;
O'er sunless bays the beam of science bears:
And rousing far around the polar sleep,
Where Drake's bold ensigns fear'd to sweep,
She sees new nations flock to some fell sacrifice.
She speeds, at George's sage command,
Society from deep to deep,
And zone to zone she binds;
From shore to shore, o'er every land,
The golden chain of commerce winds.

Meantime her patriot cares explore
Her own rich woof's exhaustless store;

* The author being Poet Laureat.

Her native fleece new fervour feels,
And wakens all its whirling wheels,
And mocks the rainbow's radiant dye;
More wide the labours of the loom she spreads,
In firmer bands domestic commerce weaves,
And calls her sister-isle to share the tie:
Nor heeds the violence that broke
From filial realms her old parental yoke!

Her cities, throng'd with many an Attic dome,
Ask not the banner'd bastion, massy proof;
Firm as the castle's feudal roof,
Stands the Briton's social home.—
Hear, Gaul, of England's liberty the lot!
Right, order, law, protect her simplest plain;
Nor scorn to guard the shepherd's nightly fold,
And watch around the forest cot.
With conscious certainty, the swain
Gives to the ground his trusted grain,
With eager hope the reddening harvest eyes;
And claims the reap autumnal gold,
The meed of toil, of industry the prize.
For ours the king, who boasts a parent's praise,
Whose hand the people's sceptre sways;
Ours is the senate, not a specious name,
Whose active plans pervade the civil frame,
Where bold debate its noblest war displays,
And, in the kindling strife, unlocks the tide
Of manliest eloquence, and rolls the torrent wide.

Hence then, each vain complaint, away,
Each captious doubt, and cautious fear!
Nor blast the new-born year,
That anxious waits the Spring's slow-shooting ray:
Nor deem that Albion's honours cease to bloom.
With candid glance th' impartial muse
Invok'd on this auspicious morn,
The present scans, the distant scene pursues,
And breaks opinion's speculative gloom:
Interpreter of ages yet unborn,
Full right she spells the characters of fate,
That Albion still shall keep her wonted state!
Still, in eternal story, shine,
Of victory the sea-beat thrine;
The source of every splendid art,
Of old, of future worlds, the universal mart.

ODE

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1786.

WHEN freedom nurs'd her native fire
In ancient Greece, and rul'd the lyre;
Her bards, disdainful, from the tyrant's brow
The tinsel gifts of flattery tore;
But paid to guiltless power their willing vow:
And to the throne of virtuous kings,
Tempering the tone of their vindictive strings,
From truth's unprostituted shore,
The fragrant wreath of gratulation bore.
'Twas thus Alcous smote the manly chord,
And Pindar on the Persian lord
His notes of indignation hurl'd,
And spurn'd the minstrel slaves of eastern sway,
From trembling Thebes extorting conscious shame;
But o'er the diadem, by freedom's flame
Illum'd, the banner of renown unfurl'd:
Thus to his Hiero decreed,

Mongst the bold chieftains of the Pythian game,
The brightest verdure of Castalia's bay;
And gave an ampler meed
Of Pisan palms, than in the field of fame
Were wont to crown the car's victorious speed:
And hail'd his scepter'd champion's patriot zeal,
Who mix'd the monarch's with the people's weal;
From civil plans who claim'd applause,
And train'd obedient realms to Spartan laws.

And he, sweet master of the Doric oar,
Theocritus forsook awhile
The graces of his pastoral life,
The lowing vale, the bleating cote,
The clusters on the sunny steep,
And Pan's own umbrage, dark and deep,
The caverns hung with ivy-twine,
The cliffs that wav'd with oak and pine,
And Etna's hoar romantic pile:
And caught the bold Homeric note,
In stately sounds exalting high
The reign of bounteous Ptolemy:
Like the plenty teeming tide
Of his own Nile's redundant flood,
O'er the cheer'd nations far and wide,
Diffusing opulence and public good:
While in the richly-warbled lays
Was blended Berenice's name,
Pattern fair of female fame,
Softening with domestic life
Imperial splendour's dazzling rays,
The queen, the mother, and the wife!

To deck with honour due this festal day,
O for a strain from these sublimer bards!
Who free to grant, yet fearless to refuse
Their awful suffrage, with impartial aim
Invok'd the jealous panegyric muse;
Nor, but to genuine worth's severer claim,
Their proud distinction deign'd to pay,
Stern arbiters of glory's bright awards!
For peerless bards like these alone,
The bards of Greece might best adorn,
With feeble song, the monarch's natal morn;
Who, thron'd in the magnificence of peace,
Rivals their richest regal theme;
Who rules a people like their own;
In arms, in polish'd arts supreme;
Who bids his Britain vie with Greece.

ODE

FOR THE NEW-YEAR, 1787.

In rough magnificence array'd,
When ancient chivalry display'd
The pomp of her heroic games;
And crested chiefs and tissued dames,
Assembled at the clarion's call,
In some proud castle's high-arch'd hall
To grace romantic glory's genial rites:
Associate of the gorgeous festival,
The minstrel struck his kindred string,
And told of many a steel-clad king,
Who to the tourney train'd his hardy knights;
Or bore the radiant redcross shield
Mid the bold peers of Salem's field;

Who travers'd pagan climes to quell
The wizard foe's terrific spell;
In rude affrays untaught to fear
The Saracen's gigantic spear.
The listening champions felt the fabling rhyme
With fairy trappings fraught, and shook their plumes sublime.

Such were the themes of regal praise
Dear to the bard of elder days:
The songs, to savage virtue dear,
That won of yore the public ear!
Ere polity, sedate and sage,
Had quench'd the fires of feudal rage.
Had stemm'd the torrent of eternal strife,
And charm'd to rest an unrelenting age.—
No more, formidable state,
The castle shuts its thundering gate;
New colours suit the scenes of soften'd life;
No more, bestriding barbed steeds,
Adventurous valour idly bleeds:
And now the bard in alter'd tones,
A theme of worthier triumph owns:
By social imagery beguil'd,
He moulds his harp to manners mild;
Nor longer weaves the wreath of war alone,
Nor hails the hostile forms that grac'd the Gothic throne.

And now he tunes his plausive lay
To kings, who plant the civic bay;
Who choose the patriot sovereign's part,
Diffusing commerce, peace, and art;
Who spread the virtuous pattern wide,
And triumph in a nation's pride:
Who seek coy science in her cloister'd nook,
Where Thames, yet rural, rolls an artless tide;
Who love to view the vale divine*,
Where revel nature and the nine,
And clustering towers the tufted grove o'erlook;
To kings who rule a filial land,
Who claim a people's vows and pray'rs,
Should treason arm the weakest hand!
To these, his heart-felt praise he bears,
And with new rapture hastes to greet
This festal morn, that longs to meet,
With luckiest auspices, the laughing spring;
And opes her glad career, with blessings on her wing!

ODE

ON HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4, 1787.

The noblest bards of Albion's choir
Have struck of old this festal lyre.
Ere science, struggling oft in vain,
Had dar'd to break her Gothic chain,
Victorious Edward gave the vernal bough
Of Britain's bay to bloom on Chaucer's brow:
Fir'd with the gift, he chang'd to sounds sublime
His Norman minstrelsy's discordant chime;
In tones majestic hence he told
The banquet of Cambuscan bold;
And oft he sung (howe'er the rhyme
Has moulder'd to the touch of time)

* Nuneham, near Oxford.

His martial master's knightly board,
And Arthur's ancient rites restor'd:
The prince in fable steel that sternly frown'd,
And Gallia's captive king, and Cressy's wreath
renown'd.

Won from the shepherd's simple meed,
The whispers wild of Mulla's reed,
Sage Spenser wak'd his lofty lay
To grace. Eliza's golden sway:
O'er the proud theme new lustre to diffuse,
He chose the gorgeous allegoric muse,
And call'd to life old Uther's elfin tale,
And rov'd through many a necromantic vale,
Pourtraying chiefs that knew to tame
The goblin's ire, the dragon's flame,
To pierce the dark enchanted hall,
Where virtue fate in lonely thrall.
From fabling Fancy's inmost store
A rich romantic robe he bore;
A veil with visionary trappings hung,
And o'er his virgin-queen the fairy texture flung.

At length the matchless Dryden came,
To light the muses' clearer flame;
To lofty numbers grace to lend,
And strength with melody to blend;
To triumph in the bold career of song,
And roll th' unwearied energy along,
Does the mean incense of promiscuous praise,
Does servile fear disgrace his regal bays?
I spurn his panegyric strings,
His partial homage, tun'd to kings!
Be mine, to catch his manlier chord,
That paints th' impassion'd Persian lord,
By glory fir'd, to pity fir'd,
Rous'd to revenge, by love subdu'd;
And still, with transport new, the strains to trace
That chaunt the Theban pair, and Tancred's deadly vase.

Had these blest bards been call'd to pay
The vows of this auspicious day,
Each had confess'd a fairer throne,
A mightier sovereign than his own!
Chaucer had bade his hero-monarch yield
The martial fame of Cressy's well-fought field
To peaceful prowess, and the conquests calm,
That braid the sceptre with the patriot's palm;
His chaplets of fantastic bloom,
His colourings, warm from fiction's loom,
Spenser had cast in scorn away,
And deck'd with truth alone the lay:
All real here the bard had seen
The glories of his pictur'd queen!
The tuneful Dryden had not flatter'd here,
His lyre had blameless been, his tribute all sincere!

ODE

FOR THE NEW-YEAR, 1783.

RUDE was the pile, and maffy proof,
That first uprear'd its haughty roof
On Windsor's brow sublime, in warlike state:
The Norman tyrant's jealous hand

The giant fabric proudly plann'd:
With recent victory elate,
"On this majestic steep," he cried,
"A regal fortress, threatening wide,
Shall spread my terrors to the distant hills;
"Its formidable shade shall throw
"Far o'er the broad expanse below,
"Where winds yon mighty flood, and amply
"fills
"With flowery verdure, or with golden grain,
"The fairest fields that deck my new domain!
"And London's towers, that reach the watch-
"man's eye,
"Shall see, with conscious awe, my bulwark
"climb the sky."

Unchang'd, through many a hardy race,
Stood the rough dome on sullen grace;
Still on its angry front defiance frown'd;
Though monarch's kept their state within,
Still murmur'd with the martial din
The gloomy gateways arch profound;
And armed forms, in airy rows,
Bent o'er the battlements their bows,
And blood-stain'd banners crown'd its hostile
head;
And oft its hoary ramparts wore
The rugged scars of conflict tore;
What time, pavilion'd on the neighbouring
mead,
Th' indignant barons rang'd in bright array
Their feudal bands, to curb despotic sway;
And leagu'd a Briton's birth-right to restore,
From John's reluctant grasp the roll of freedom bore.

When lo, the king that wreath'd his shield,
With lilies pluck'd on Cressy's field,
Heav'd from its base the mouldering Norman
frame!—
New glory cloth'd th' exulting steep,
The portals tower'd with ampler sweep;
And valour's soften'd genius came,
Here held his pomp, and trail'd the pall
Of triumph through the trophied hall;
And war was clad a while in gorgeous weeds;
Amid the martial pageantries,
While beauty's glance adjudg'd the prize,
And beam'd sweet influence on heroic deeds.
Nor long, ere Henry's holy zeal, to breathe
A milder charm upon the scenes beneath,
Rear'd in the watery glade his classic shrine,
And call'd his stripling-choir to woo the willing nine.

To this imperial feat to lend
Its pride supreme, and nobly blend
British magnificence with Attic art;
Froud castle, to thy banner'd bowers,
Lo! picture bids her glowing powers
Their bold historic groups impart:
She bids th' illuminated pane,
Along thy lofty-vaulted fane,
Shed the dim blaze of radiance richly clear.—
Still may such arts of peace engage
Their patron's care! But should the rage
Of war to battle rouse the new-born year,

Britain arise, and wake the slumbering fire,
Vindictive dart thy quick rekindling ire!
Or, arm'd to strike, in mercy spare the foe;
And lift thy thundering hand, and then withhold the blow!

ODE

ON HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1788.

WHAT native genius taught the Britons hold
To guard their sea-girt cliffs of old?
'Twas liberty: she taught disdain
Of death, of Rome's imperial chain.
She bade the Druid harp to battle found,
In tones prophetic, through the gloom profound
Of forests hear, with holy foliage hung;
From grove to grove the pealing prelude rung;
Belinus call'd his painted tribes around,
And, rough with many a veteran scar,
Swept the pale legions with the scythed car,
While baffled Cæsar fled, to gain,
An easier triumph on Pharfalia's plain;
And left the stubborn isle to stand elate
Amidst a conquer'd world, in lone majestic state!

A kindred spirit soon to Britain's shore
The sons of Saxon Elva bore;
Fraught with th' unconquerable soul,
Who died to drain the warrior-bowl,
In that bright hall, where Odin's Gothic throne
With the broad blaze of brandish'd falchions
shone;
Where the long roofs rebounded to the din
Of spectre chiefs, who feasted far within:
Yet, not intent on deathful deeds alone,
They felt the fires of social zeal,
The peaceful wisdom of the public weal;
Though nurs'd in arms and hardy strife,
They knew to frame the plans of temper'd life;
The king's, the people's, balanc'd claims to found
On one eternal base, indissolubly bound.

Sudden, to shake the Saxons mild domain,
Rush'd in rude swarms the robber Dane,
From frozen wastes and caverns wild,
To genial England's scenes beguill'd;
And in his clamorous van exulting came
The demons foul of famine and of flame:
Witness the sheep-clad summits, roughly crown'd
With many a frowning fof and airy mound,
Which yet his desultory march proclaim!—
Nor ceas'd the tide of gore to flow,
Till Alfred's laws allur'd th' intestine foe;
And Harold calm'd his headlong rage
To brave achievement and to counsel sage;
For oft in savage breasts the buried seeds
Of brooding virtue live, and freedom's fairest deeds!

But see, triumphant o'er the southern waves,
The Norman sweeps!— Though first he gave
New grace to Britain's naked plain,
With arts and manners in his train;
And many a tane he rear'd, that still sublime
In massy pomp has mock'd the stealth of time;
And castle fair, that, strip of half its towers,
From some broad sleep in shatter'd glory lours:
Yet brought he slavery from a softer clime;

Each eve, the curfew's notes severe
(That now but fooths the musing poet's ear)
At the new tyrant's stern command,
Warn'd to unwelcome rest a wakeful land;
While proud oppression o'er the ravish'd field
High rais'd his armed hand, and shook the feudal shield.

Stoop'd then that freedom to despotic sway,
For which in many a fierce affray,
The Britons bold, the Saxons led,
His Danish javelins Lefwin led
O'er Hastings' plain, to stay the Norman yoke?
She felt but to resist the sudden stroke:
The tyrant-baron grasp'd the patriot-steel,
And taught the tyrant-king its force to feel;
And quick revenge the regal bondage broke.
And still unchang'd and uncontroll'd,
Its rescued rights shall the dread empire hold:
For lo, revering Britain's cause,
A king new lustre lends to native laws!
The sacred sovereign of this festal day
On Albion's old renown reflects a kindred ray!

ODE

ON HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1789.

As when the demon of the Summer-storm
Walks forth the noontide landscape to deform;
Dark grows the vale, and dark the distant grove,
And thick the bolts of angry Jove
Athwart the wat'ry welkin glide,
And streams th' aerial torrent far and wide:
If by short fits the struggling ray
Should dart a momentary day,
Th' illumin'd mountain glows a while,
By faint degrees the radiant glance
Purples th' horizon's pale expanse,
And gilds the gloom with hasty smile:
Ah, fickle smile, too swiftly past!
Again resounds the sweeping blast;
With hoarser din the demon howls,
Again the blackening concave scowls!
Sudden, the shades of the meridian night
Yield to the triumph of rekindling light:
The reddening sun regains his golden sway,
And nature stands reveal'd in all her bright array.

Such was the changeful conflict that possess'd,
With trembling tumult every British breast,
When Albion, towering in the van sublime
Of glory's march, from clime to clime:
Envid, belov'd, rever'd, renew'd,
Her brows with every blissful chaplet bound;
When, in her mid career of state,
She felt her monarch's awful fate!—
Till mercy from th' Almighty throne
Look'd down on man, and waving wide
Her wreath, that in the rainbow dy'd,
With hues of soften'd lustre shone,
And bending from her sapphire cloud,
O'er regal grief benignant bow'd;
To transport turn'd a people's fears,
And stay'd a people's tide of tears:
Bade this blest dawn with beams auspicious spring
With hope serene, with healing in its wing;
And gave a sovereign o'er a grateful land [hand.
Again with vigorous grasp to stretch the scepter'd

O favour'd king, what rapture more refin'd,
 What mightier joy can fill the human mind,
 Than that the monarch's conscious bosom feels,
 At whose dread throne a nation kneels,
 And hails its father, friend, and lord,
 To life's career, to patriot sway restor'd;
 And bids the loud responsive voice
 Of union all around rejoice?
 For thus to thee when Britons bow,
 Warm and spontaneous from the heart,
 As late their tears, their transports start,
 And nature dictates duty's vow;
 To thee, recall'd to sacred health,
 Did the proud city's lavish wealth,
 Did crowded streets alone display
 The long-drawn blaze, the festal ray?
 Meek poverty her scanty cottage grac'd,
 And flung her gleam across the lonely waste!
 Th' exulting isle in one wide triumph strove,
 One social sacrifice of reverential love.

Such pure unprompted praise do kingdoms pay,
 Such willing zeal, to thrones of lawless sway?
 Ah! how unlike the vain the venal lore
 To Latian rulers dealt of yore,
 O'er guilty pomp, and hated power,
 When stream'd the sparkling panegyric shower:
 And slaves to sovereigns unendear'd
 Their pageant trophies coldly rear'd!
 For are the charities that blend
 Monarch to man, to tyrants known?
 The tender ties that to the throne
 A mild domestic glory lend;
 Of wedded love the league sincere,
 The virtuous consort's faithful tear!
 Nor thus the verse that flattery brings,
 Nor here I strike a slyen strings; [muse,
 Here, kindling with her country's warmth, the
 Her country's proud triumphant theme pursues:
 Ev'n needless here the tribute of her lay!—
 Albion the garland gives on this distinguish'd day.

ODE

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, JUNE 4. 1790.

WITHIN what fountain's craggy cell
 Delights the goddess health to dwell?
 Where from the rigid roof distils
 Her richest stream in steely rills?
 What mineral gems entwine her humid locks?
 Lo, sparkling high from potent springs,
 To Britain's fons her cup she brings!
 Romantic matlock! are thy tufted rocks,
 Thy fring'd declivities, the dim retreat
 Where the coy nymph has fix'd her favourite
 seat,
 And hears, reclin'd along the thundering shore,
 Indignant Darwent's desultory tide
 His rugged channel rudely chide?
 Darwent, whose shaggy wreath is stain'd with Danish gore!

Or does she dress her Naiad cave
 With coral spoils from Neptune's wave,
 And hold short revels with the train
 Of nymphs that tread the neighb'ring main?
 And from the cliffs of Avon's cavern'd side,
 Temper the balmy beverage pure,
 That fraught with "drops of precious cure,"
 Brings back to trembling hope the drooping bride;
 That in the virgin's cheek renews the rose,
 And wraps the eye of pain in quick repose!
 While oft she climbs the mountain's shelving
 steep,
 And calls her votaries wan, to catch the gale
 That breathes o'er Ashton's elmy vale,
 And from the Cambrian hills the billowy Severn sweeps.

Or broods the nymph with watchful wing
 O'er ancient Badon's mystic spring?
 And speeds from its sulphureous source
 The steamy torrent's secret course;
 And fans th' eternal sparks of hidden fire,
 In deep unfathom'd beds below
 By Bladud's magic taught to glow,
 Bladud, high theme of fancy's Gothic lyre!
 Or opes the healing power her chosen fount
 In the rich veins of Malvern's ample mount
 From whose tall ridge the noontide wanderer views
 Pomona's purple realm, in April's pride,
 Its blaze of bloom expanding wide,
 And waving groves array'd in Flora's fairest hues.

Haunts she the scene where nature lowers
 O'er Buxton's heath in lingering showers?
 Or loves the more, with sandal fleet,
 In matin dance the nymphs to meet
 That on the flowery marge of Chelder play?
 Who, boastful of the stately train
 That deign'd to grace this simple plain,
 Late, with new pride, along his reedy way,
 Bore to Sabrina wreaths of brighter hue,
 And mark'd his pastoral urn with emblems new—
 Howe'er these streams ambrosial may detain
 Thy steps, O genial health, yet not alone
 Thy gifts the Naiad-sisters own;
 Thine too the briny flood, and ocean's hoar domain.
 And lo! amid the watery roar,
 In Thetis' car she skims the shore;
 Where Portland's brows embattled high
 With rocks, in rugged majesty
 Frown o'er the billows, and the storm restrain
 She beckons Britain's scepter'd pair
 Her treasures of the deep to share!—
 Hail then, on this glad morn the mighty main!
 Which lends the boon divine of lengthen'd days
 To those who wear the noblest regal bays:
 That mighty main, which on its conscious tide,
 Their boundless commerce pours on every clime,
 Their dauntless banner bears sublime;
 Which wafts their pomp of war and spreads their thunder wide!

Et muri disjecti, et propugnacula lapsa;
Infectique Lares, lævisque palatia ducta
Auspiciis. Nequeunt expleri corda tuendo,
Et tacitam permulcet imago plurima mentem.

O felix Puerorum ætas, lucefque beatæ!
Vobis dia quies animis, et tristia vobis
Nondum sollicitæ subierunt tædia vitæ!
En! vobis roseo ore salus, curæque fugaces,
Et lacrymæ, siquando, breves; dulcesque cachinni,
Et faciles, ultrò nati de pectore, risus!
O fortunati nimium! Si talia constant
Gaudia jam pueris, Ichinum propter amænum,
Ah! sedes ambire novas quæ tanta cupido est,
Dotalemque domum, et promissas Idis undas?
Ipsos illa licet secundo flumine lucos
Pieridum fortunatos, et opima vireta,
Irriget, Iliso par, aut Permessidos anni,
Et centum ostendet sinuoso in margine turres.

SACELLUM COLL. SS. TRIN. OXON.
INSTAURATUM,

Suppetias præsertim conferente
RAD. BATHURST, ejusdem Coll. Præf. et Ecclesiæ Wellensis Decano.

Quo cultu renovata dei penetrabilia, tristi
Dudum obducta situ, senioque horrentia longo,

Squallorem exuerint veterem, turpesque tenebras;
Utque novam faciem, mutataque mania ritè
Sumpserit instaurata ædes, specieque refurgens
Cæperit infectâ priscum splendescere sanum,
Aufpice Bathursto, canimus: Tu, Diva, secundum
Da genium, et quales ipsi Romana canenti
Carmina, Nasonis facilem superantia venam,
Bathursto annueras, Latios concede lepores.

Quippe ubi jam Graiis moles innixa columnis
Erigitur nitidæ normam confessa Corinthi,
Vitruviumque refert iustissima fabrica verum;
Quaque, Hospes, vario mirabere culmina fuco
Vivida, et ornatos multo molimine muros,
Olim cernere erat breviori limite clausum
Obscurumque adytum; dubiam cui rara fenestra
Admisit lucem, rubidus suffusa figuris;
Quale pater pietati olim sacrârat avitæ
Popius, et ritè antiquâ decoraverat arte:
At veteres quondam quicunque insigniit aras
Tandem extinctus honos: rerum fortuna subinde
Tot tulerat revoluta vices, et, certior hostis,
Paulatim quassata fatiscere fecerat ætas
Tecta ruens; quæ nunc et Wrenni dædala dextra,
Et pietas Bathursti æquat pulcherrima cælo.

Verùm age, nec faciles, Hospes, piget omnia circum

Ferre oculos. Adsis; qualisque ereptus ab undis
Æneas, Lybicæ postquam successerat urbi,
Constitit artificumque manus, operumque laborem
Miratus, pictoque in pariete nota per orbem
Bella, sub ingenti collustrans singula templo;
Non minus et donis opulentum, et numine plenum
Suspice majori templum, nitidoque receptus
Vestibulo, quanti pateant spectacula torni
Contemplator, et oppositum cælamine Septum
Raro interfusum, quali perluceat arte!

Quæ inflexa modis, quo sit perfusa nitore
Sculptilis, et nimium conspectu lubrica cedrus!

At Cancellorum non enarrabile textum,
Autumni spoliis, et multâ messe gravatum,
Occupat in medio, et binas demittit in alas
Porticus, et plexâ præfixis fronde columnis
Utrinque incubit, penetralique ostia fecit.
Nec sua pro foribus densit, spirantia signa,
Fida satellitia, atque aditum servantia tantum:
Nonne vides fixos in cælum tollere vultus,
Ingentesque Dei monitus haurire, fideli
Et calamo Christum victuris tradere chartis?
Malat opus, Lebanique refert fragrantia oderem.

Perge modò, utque acies amplectier omnia possit,
Te mediis immitte choris, delubraque carpe
Interiora inhians; quæque obvia surgere cernis
Paulisper flexo venerans altaria vultu,
Siste gradum, atque oculos refer ad fastigia summa.
Illic divinos vultus, ardentiaque ora,
Nobilis expressit calamus, cælumque reclusit.

In medio, domitâ jam morte et victor Iesus
Ætherium molitur iter, ubulisque coruscis
Insistens, repetit patrem, internusque sceptrâ.
Agnosco radiis flagrantia tempora densis,
Vulneraque illa (nefas!) quæ ligno maximâ fixus
Victima sustulerat fatali: innubilus æther
Desuper, et puræ vis depluit aurea lucis.
At vario, per inane, dei comitatus, amictu;
Celestes formæ, fulgentque insignibus alis.
Officio credas omnes trepidare fideli:

Pars sequitur longè, veneraturque ora volantis,
Pars aptare hinceros Divo, et subternere nubes

Purpureas, caroque oneri succedere gaudent
Certatim, pariterque juvantægentque triumphum.
Nec totum in tabulâ est culmen: quâ cœrula
claudit

Extrema, atque oras picturæ munit aurum,
Protinus hinc sese species nitidissima rerum
Utrinque explicuit, cæmento ducta sequaci.
Tali opifex facilem massam disponere tracta
Calluit, argillæ fecernens uvida fila
Mobilis, ut nullas non sint induta figuras
In quascunque levis digitus inducere vellet.
Nec confusus honos operi; secretaque rite
Areolam sculpturâ suam sibi vindicat omnis.
Prætexit, sinuans alterna volumina, plexu,
Frondeaque intortos productit fimbria gyros.
Hinc atque hinc patulæ pubescunt vimina palmæ
Vivaces effusa comas, intextaque pomis
Turgidulis, varioque referta umbracula foetu,
Cui plenus invidet subnitens Copia cornu:

Hac procuduntur flores, pulcherrima ferta,
Qualis vere novo peperit cultissimus hortus;
Quæ vix viva magis, meliusvè effingere novit,
Dextera acu pollens, calathisque assueta Minervæ.
Omnes illa licet, quot parturit Enna, colores
Temperet, expediens variis discrimina filis,
Atque auro rigeat dives subtemen et ostro.
At ne aciem descede, tuendi captus amore.

Apficio, ut diam nubes refecare columbam,
Suppositis fecitque opifex ollabier aris?
Hanc circum et Christi fatum referentia, sævæ
Instrumenta artis, magnique insignia Lethi,
Addidit; informes contortâ cuspide clavos,
Sanguineas capitis spinas, crepitania flagra,
Ipsam etiam, quæ membra Dei morientis, et ora
Heu! collapsâ, Crucem mundique piacula gessit.

At quâ marmoreis gradibus se mystica mensa
Subrigit, et dives divini altare cruoris,
En, qualis murum a tergo præcinxit amictus,
Cedrinaque trabes, adversisque æmula Septi
Materies, pariterque potentis conscia torni:
Verum ipsos evade gradus, nec longius abstes,
Quin propiore oculo, cupidique indagine visus,
Angliaci explore divinum opus Alcimedontis:
Ne tenues formæ fugiant, et gratia ligni
Exilis pereantque levis vestigia ferri
Mollia, subtilisque lepos intercaudat omnis.

Quis fabri dabit insidias, inrepnæque fila,
Rimari! Retinent quæ vincula textile buxum,
Et quales cohilient suspensæ toreumata nodi!
Hinc atque hinc crescit foliorum pensilis umbra,
Et partita trahit pronas utrobique corallios,
Maturisque riget bacis, et germina pandit:

Quales et tereti dependunt undique trunco
Undantes hederæ, et densis coma fœta corymbis.
Inter opus pennatarum paria alma cherubum
Ambrosios lucent crines, inpubiæque ora.
In summo veneranda calix, incisaque messis
In spicam induitur, turgentisque uva racemos
Rasilis explicuit, sacra libamina cœnæ.

Tale deus nunquam impressit candenti elephanto,
Non Pario lapidi, non flavo Dædalus auro,
Quale faber buxo, gracilique in sispite luit.

En verò, tumulum ingentem quâ proxima claudit
Testudo, præcæ effigies, et busta propinquis
Non indigna aris! Salve, sanctissime Popi!
Nunc ultro ad cineres ipsius et ossa parentis
Adsumus: O salve! neque enim, pater optime, credo,

Elyſias inter fedes, divoſque repōſus,
 Et cum dilecto ducens diā otia Moro*,
 Negligis ulteriora pii monumenta laboris,
 Alterius monumenta manūs, et non tua dona.
 Alme Parens, ſalveto! Tuum eſt veſtigia vulgi
 Quod fugiam: Tu das inopis crudelia vitæ
 Tædia ſolari, afflictiſis ſpes unica rebus,
 Et ſinis Aoniidum viridantes ire per hortos.
 Te, pater, et fidā tua facta reponere mente,
 Et memor aſſiduus tibi rite reſolvere grates,
 Ora puer dubiā ſignans inſonſa juvena,

 Nec vano augurio ſanctis cunabula Muſis
 Hæc poſuiſti olim, nec ſpes fruſtrata ſefellit
 Magna animo meditantem, et præmia lærga fe-

 Ergo tibi quoties, Popi, ſolennia vota
 Rite rependamus, proprioſque novemus honores,
 Tuque etiam ſocias, Bathurſte, merèbere laudes,
 Divium decus, et lauro cingère ſecundā.—
 Nec te ſola Tuum, licet optima cura, facellum
 Occupat: en! prope plura facis, nec diſpare
 ſumptu,

Atria moliris ritu concinna recenti,
 Summiſſas propter fedes; majoraque mandas
 Ipſius incrementa domūs, reſiciſque penates.
 Sic ubi, non operoſa adeo primordia ſaſtus,
 Romulus exiguam niuro concluſerat urbem,
 Per tennes primò plateas arx rara micare,
 Ipſaque ſtramineo conſtabat regia culmo;
 At poſtquam Auguſtus rerum ſucceſſit habenis,
 Continuo Parii lapidis candentia luce
 Tecta refulſere; et Capitoli immobile ſaxum
 Vertice marmoreo ſtetit, et laquearibus aureis.

LIB. 4. CAP. 33.

TE tristi mihi nuper, Heraclite,
Fato succubuisse nunciatum est;
Quo rumore, misellus, impotentes
Fui in lacrimulas statim coactus:
Recordabar enim, loquelâ ut olim
Dulci consueratus ambo longos
Solos fallere, fabulisque crebris.
Verum, Tu, vetus hospes, O ubinam—
Ah dudum—in cineres redactæ dudum!

SUB IMAGINE PANIS RUDI LAPIDE.

Hic stans verice montium supremo
Pan, glaucei nemoris nitere fructus
Cerno desuper, uberemque sylvam.
Quod si purpureæ, viator, uvæ
Te desiderium capit, roganti
Non totum invidio tibi racemum.
Quin si fraude malâ quid hinc reportes,
Hoc pœnas luito caput bacillo.

HOMERI HYMNUS AD PANAM.

EN! tibi, Pan, summi colles, et maxima parent
Culmina, præcipitesque nivali vertice rupes.
Tu pater, incedens virgulta per avia, mentem
Oblectas lapsu fluviorum lenè cadentium.
Sive errare velis per vasta cacumina, magni
Unde procul patuere greges, atque otia diâ
Pastorum; capreafe agites indagine densâ,
Seu redeas squallens variarum cæde ferarum.
At simul ex alto subluxit vesper Olympo,
Tale melos suavi diffusis arundine, quale
Non, Philomela, facis, quoties frondentibus umbris
Abdita, vere novo, intègras miserabile carmen.
Continuo properant faciles in carmina nymphæ,
Instaurantque choros; saltantibus adsonat Echo.
In medio Deus ipse inflexos orbibus orbis
Insequitur, quatiens maculose tegmine lyncis:
Sub pedibusque croci crescunt, dulcesque hyacin-
thi,

Floribus et variis viridis distinguitur herba.
Interea cecinere Deum primordia prisca:
At primum dixere, ut, Divum nuntius Hermes
Venerit Arcadæ fines, pecorisque fetaces
Formosi campos, et prata recentia rivis.
Quâ nunc illi aræ, quâ stant Cyllenia templa.
Ilic, divino licet ingens esset honore,
Pavit oves, nam jusit amor; votisque potitus
Egregiam Dryopen in vincla jugalia duxit.
Nascitur hinc proles visu miranda, bicornis
Capripes; ipsa novo nutrix exterrita sætu
Kestitit, hirsuticque infantem corporis horrens.
At pater exultans villosâ pelle revinctum
Montani leporis puerum, fulgentibus astris
Intulit, et solium Jovis ad sublime locavit.
Excipiunt plausu Superi; subristit læchus
Purpureo vultu, et puerum Pan nomine dicit.

 CONSERVANDÆ†.

ERGO agite, O nymphæ, integros ostendite fontes;

 Hinc Padus; inde jugis Euphrates Oceano par
 Volvitur umbriferis, orientemque irrigat omnem.
 At secum, sævoque procul resupinus in antro,
 Squallentem Tanais diffudit barbarus urnam.

Ye ductile youths, whose rising fun
Hath many circles still to run;
Who wisely with the pilot's chart,
To steer through life th' unsteady heart;
And all the thoughtful voyage past,
To gain a happy port at last:
Attend a Seer's instructive song,
For moral truths to dreams belong.

THE LIFE OF COTTON.

Of the family, birth-place, and education of NATHANIEL COTTON, there are no written memorials. A collection of his Various Pieces in Prose and Verse, was printed in 1791; but, by an unpardonable neglect in the editor, without any information concerning his life, family connections, or even the times and places of his birth and death. For the sake of posterity, as well as the present times, it is to be wished that those who are acquainted with any particulars concerning him, would communicate them to some repository, where they might be reserved for the use of future biographers.

A few detached dates and notices, collected chiefly from his writings, form the slender memorials of his life.

He was bred to the profession of physic, in which he took the degree of Doctor; but whether he was indebted to either of the English Universities for any part of the literature he possessed, or his academical degree, is uncertain.

He settled as a physician at St. Albans, in Hertfordshire, where he acquired great reputation in his profession, and continued to reside till his death. In the latter part of his life, he kept a house for the reception of lunatics.

He very early exerted his poetical talents, as may be seen by the dates of several of his performances; the Epitaphs on Miss Gee and Mr. Strong, 1736, Epitaph on Colonel Gardiner, 1745, Epitaph on John Duke of Bridgewater, 1747-8, and the verses to the Rev. James Hervey, on his Meditations, by a Physician, 1748.

In 1749, he had the affliction to lose his wife; as appears from his letter to Dr. Doddridge, dated St. Albans, April 29. 1749, published by the Rev. Mr. Stedman among the "Letters to and from Philip Doddridge, D. D." 8vo, 1790.

"I am very much obliged to you for your late tender instances of condescension and friendship. The comfort and advice which you most kindly administer, are extremely acceptable; and I heartily pray to God to give them their due weight. For my own part, I am, and have long been abundantly persuaded, that no system, but that of Christianity, is able to sustain the soul amidst all the difficulties and distresses of life. The consolations of philosophy only are specious trifles at best; all cold and impotent applications to the bleeding heart! But the religion of Jesus, like its gracious and benevolent author, is an inexhaustible source of comfort in this world, and gives us the hopes of everlasting enjoyment in the next.

"I presume humbly to hope that the Supreme Being will support me under my affliction; and I most earnestly entreat that he will sanctify my sorrows to every gracious and good purpose.

"What the mind feels upon such a painful divorce, none can adequately know, but they who have had the bitter experience of this sad solemnity. However, delicate and worthy minds will readily paint out to themselves something unutterably soft and moving upon the separation of two hearts, whose only division was their lodgment in two breasts.

"I am extremely indebted to your lady for her kind sympathy with me in my sorrows; and the only return that I can make, either to herself or her comfort, is my hearty prayer, that the dissolution of their happy union may be at a very distant period."

In 1751, he published his Visions in Verse, for the Entertainment and Instruction of Younger Minds, 8vo, without his name; nor is it prefixed to any of the subsequent editions, in conformity with the modest ambition he professes in the following lines of his Epistle to the Reader.

All my ambition is, I own,
To profit and to please unknown.

This publication was favourably received by the polite and religious world, and probably obtained him the friendship of Young, who resided at Welwyn, in the neighbourhood of St. Albans.

He attended Young in his last illness, April 1765. Among the Extracts from his Letters, is the following account of the last moments of that excellent poet, without superscription or date.

"In my last, I acquainted you that I was called to Welwyn. When I arrived there, I found Dr. Yate waiting for me. It seems he had been sent for three or four days before my assistance was desired. Dr. Young's disorder was attended with some obscurity. But on Tuesday, matters wore a very discouraging aspect; and on Wednesday, Yate and myself gave up the case, as lost. From that period to the present, Dr. Young hath been dying. Whether the scene be closed this evening, I cannot take upon me to say; but this day at noon, the physicians took their leave. Dr. Young, although in his eighty-sixth year, has disputed every inch of ground with death, from the strength of his constitution, never impaired in early life by riot and debauchery. As I sat by his bed side, how earnestly did I wish the vital knot untied! I humbly pray God, that myself and all who are connected with me, either by blood or friendship, may be favoured with an easy transition out of this world into a better.—Your friendship will excuse the melancholy reflections, for the sake of the object which suggested them. I was very fond of Dr. Young's company, and greatly venerated his mental abilities.

"It is past all doubt with me, that Dr. Young's "Night Thoughts" have advanced the interests of religion. For, whatever imperfections there may be in that performance, there are indisputably some of the most serious, most important, and most elevated sentiments (expressed in most nervous, striking, and animated language), which have ever dropped from the pen of man. It is said (and perhaps with truth), that there were oddities in Dr. Young's conduct. But these will moulder away from our remembrance faster than his ashes; while the more excellent part of his character, like the colourings of a fine picture, will brighter by time, and improve every year in their valuation. Infidels and sensualists regard the deceased as an enthusiast or melancholic. But that period is approaching, when wisdom will be justified of her children, and when intrinsic worth shall shine forth as the stars in the firmament.

"I have sometimes thought, when I have heard men of literature speak with indifference of Dr. Young's abilities, that their strictures have proceeded from a secret principle of envy. But when this generation is passed away, I dare say the Doctor's works will be universally held in great esteem.

Virtutem incolumem odimus,
Sublatam ex oculis querimus invidi."

The following Extracts exhibit an advantageous specimen of his temper and disposition, and an interesting picture of the infirmities of age.

"My bed is often strewed with thorns: but I must journey through life upon the same terms that many wiser and better men than myself have done; and must reflect with some degree of comfort, that I am making hasty advances to that sanctuary, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary shall be at rest." Oh! my heart strings, break not yet, out of pity to the worthier part of my family, who cannot lose me without suffering the greatest inconveniencies.

"I have passed almost three winters beyond the usual boundary appropriated to human life: and having thus transcended the longevity of a septuagenarian, I now labour under the inconveniencies and evils of advanced years. I am emaciated to a very great degree, and my trembling limbs are so weak, as to feel insufficient to support my weight. The languors likewise which I suffer are so frequent and severe, as to threaten an entire stop to the circulation, and are sometimes accompanied with that most distressful of all sensations, an anxiety circa præcordia. I sleep so little during the night, that, in general, I can rise up at the voice of the bird, be that period ever so early. Nor are my mental powers less deficient than my bodily strength; for my memory is notoriously impaired; and a subject which requires a little thought, becomes a burden hardly supportable. Are not all the particulars which I have communicated, proofs of their being the concluding page of Shakspeare's "strange eventful history?" Yes, surely, my dear friend, when an inspired author announces the same truth. Nor are you and I to wonder, that in our passage through this world, the weather and the ways grow the worse, the longer we travel, and the nearer we approach to our journey's end. The sacred writer just now mentioned affirms, that when those comfortless days arrive, which are attended with satiety, disgust, and inquietude, we must expect the clouds to be often returning after the rain. Amid these melancholy scenes, it hath lately pleased Divine Providence to bereave me of one of the best of daughters, who never gave me a moment's uneasiness, but at her death, and in that illness which led to it; I mean my daughter Kitty. Quis desiderio sit pudor aut modus tam cari capitis? But no more of this awful occurrence."

He died at St. Albans, in an advanced age, August 2. 1788.

Of his Visions in Verse, the seventh edition, revised and enlarged, was printed in 1767. The subsequent editions are too numerous to be specified. In 1791, his Various Pieces in Prose and Verse, many of which were never before published, were printed in 2 vols, 8vo. The first volume contains his Visions in Verse, Fables, and other poetical pieces. The second, his prose pieces, Mirza to Selim; Mirza to Herbertolla; Musculus's Letters; five Sermons; Health, an Allegory; on Husbandry; on Zeal; Detraction, a Vision; on Marriage; History of an Innkeeper in Normandy; on the XIIth Psalm; on the XLIIth Psalm; Extracts from Letters. They are "inscribed, by permission, to the Dowager Countess Spencer," by Nathaniel Cotton, probably his son, in the following "dedication."

"The author being well known to her Ladyship for many years, this public testimony of approbation of his life and works, given by her whose high station and rank preclude her not from a laudable and pre-eminent zeal in the cause of religion and goodness, is particularly acknowledged by," &c.

The "dedication" is succeeded by the following short "preface," by the editor.

"As the Visions in Verse, and other pieces of the late Dr. Cotton which have made their appearance, have given general satisfaction, the editor flatters himself that the present volumes, some pieces in which have not yet been published, will be agreeable to the public.

"It may not be improper to observe, in regard to the Sermons here offered, that as Mr. Boyle, Mr. Locke, Sir Isaac Newton, and Mr. Addison, were firm believers in Christianity; that being laymen, and having no temporal interests relative to religion, their influence in the support of it has been extensive and effectual: So every fresh instance of firm faith in a mind far removed from all suspicion, will be acceptable to the lovers of Christianity."

His Visions in Verse, and other uncollected and unpublished poems, reprinted from the edition 1791, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

His moral and intellectual character appears to have been, in the highest degree, amiable and respectable. His piety is truly venerable and edifying. His writings are distinguished by the strongest marks of piety, learning, taste, and benevolence. They are the productions of an enlightened mind, fraught with the purest principles of morality and religion. They are characterized by an elegant simplicity, derived from a diligent study of the best classical models.

His Sermons, as the compositions of a layman, merit particular attention. They are plain, rational, and instructive. His Letters of Mirza, and Musculus, Health an Allegory, Detraction a Vision, History of an Innkeeper, discover good sense, observation, and taste, and are very well written.

As a poet, his compositions are distinguished by a refined elegance of sentiment, and a correspondent simplicity of expression. He writes with ease and correctness, frequently with elevation and spirit. His thoughts are always just, and religiously pure, and his lines are commonly smooth and easy; but the rhymes are not always sufficiently correspondent: the words dawn and morn, among others, disappoint the ear. As piety predominated in his mind, it is diffused over his compositions: Under his direction, poetry may be truly said to be subservient to religious and moral instruction.

Every reader will regard with veneration the writer, who condescended to lay aside the scholar and the philosopher, to compose moral apologues, and little poems of devotion, "for the entertainment and instruction of younger minds."

His Visions, the most popular of his productions, are not inferior to the best compositions of that kind in the English language. They are written in the measure of Gay's "Fables," and, like them, each apologue is introduced with solemn reflections which naturally lead to the story; but in forcibleness of moral and poetical spirit, they are unquestionably superior to these popular compositions. With the utility of sentiment, they combine the beauties of personification and allegory, and the elegancies of the higher poetry. The third, seventh, eighth, and ninth visions, have exceeding merit.

His Fables approach nearer to the manner of Gay; but they have less poignancy of satire. They have great merit of the moral kind, and are properly adapted, as well as the Visions, "for the entertainment and instruction of younger minds." The salutary consequences that result from interesting fables and stories, are universally acknowledged. It has been asserted by Horace, that and the lapse of ages has only served to convince mankind of the truth of the assertion. Infancy is soon wearied with the task of encountering difficulties; and it is possible to sow the seeds of lasting disgust even at that tender period. Instruction, therefore, should be conveyed to "younger minds," through the medium of fables or tales, which annex improvement to pleasure, and convey morality, as it were, within the fragrant folds of the rose. No compositions are better adapted to inculcate the practice of some virtue, or to display maxims of practical wisdom, to direct us in the pursuits of life. We love to be instructed while we are amused; and exercise our critical sagacity in applying the characters of the fable to our acquaintance or ourselves, in proportion to our propensity for satire, or our desire of moral information. Rousseau, from an opinion that the former inclination predominates, in his famous critique on the "Fox and Crow," of La Fontaine, objects with his usual love of paradox, and his usual spirit, to this class of compositions; but it cannot be supposed that he expected his arguments would prevail upon mothers to withhold from their children the only writings that can induce them to read.

Of his miscellaneous poems, The Fire Side is the most agreeable. The subject is universally interesting, the sentiments are pleasing and pathetic, and the versification elegant and harmonious. The Verses to Hervey, which are generally known, as they are prefixed to his "Meditations," contain an elegant and merited compliment to that pious and amiable writer. The verses to a Child of five years old are exquisitely beautiful. The Ode on the New Year is pious, animated, and poetical. The Sunday Hymn has exceeding merit, and ranks with the devotional compositions of Addison and Watts. The Night Piece is distinguished by dignity, variety, and originality of sentiment in a superior degree. His Epitaphs are remarkably elegant, characteristic, and pathetic. His lighter pieces are not deficient in ease and sprightliness, and may be read with pleasure; but they require no distinct examination, or particular criticism.

ENTERTAINMENT AND INSTRUCTION OF YOUNGER MINDS.

Virginibus puerisque canto.

Hor.

AN EPISTLE TO THE READER.

AUTHORS, you know, of greatest fame,
Through modesty suppress their name;
And would you wish me to reveal
What these superior wits conceal?
Forego the search, my curious friend,
And husband time to better end.
All my ambition is, I own,
To profit and to please unknown;
Like streams supply'd from springs below,
Which scatter blessing as they flow.

Were you diseas'd, or press'd with pain,
Scrait you'd apply to * Warwick-Lane;
The thoughtful doctor feels your pulse,
(No matter whether Mead or Hulfe)
Writes—Arabic to you and me,—
Then signs his hand, and takes his fee.
Now, should the sage omit his name,
Would not the cure remain the same?
Not but physicians sign their bill,
Or when they cure, or when they kill.

'Tis often known the mental race
Their fond ambitious fires disgrace.
Dar'd I avow a parent's claim,
Critics might sneer, and friends might blame.
This dang'rous secret let me hide,
I'll tell you every thing beside.
Not that it boots the world a tittle,
Whether the author's big or little;
Or whether fair, or black, or brown;
No writer's hue concerns the town.

I pass the silent rural hour,
No slave to wealth, no tool to pow'r,
My mansion's warm and very neat;
You'd say, a pretty snug retreat.
My rooms no costly paintings grace,
The humbler print supplies their place.
Behind the house my garden lies,
And opens to the southern skies:

* College of Physicians.

The distant hills gay prospects yield,
And plenty smiles in ev'ry field.
The faithful mastiff is my guard,
The feather'd tribes adorn my yard;
Alive my joy, my treat when dead,
And their soft plumes improve my bed.
My cow rewards me all she can,
(Brutes leave ingratitude to man);
She, daily thankful to her lord,
Crowns with nectareous sweets my board.
Am I diseas'd?—the cure is known,
Her sweeter juices mend my own.

I love my house, and seldom roam,
Few visits please me more than home.
I pity that unhappy elf
Who loves all company but self,
By idle passions borne away
To op'ra, masquerade, or play;
Fond of those hives where folly reigns,
And Britain's peers receive her chains;
Where the pert virgin flights a name,
And scorns to redden into shame.
But know, my fair (to whom belong
The poet and his artless song)
When female checks refuse to glow,
Farewel to virtue here below.
Our sex is lost to every rule,
Our sole distinction, knave or fool.
'Tis to your innocence we run;
Save us, ye fair, or we're undone;
Maintain your modesty and station,
So women shall preserve the nation.

Mothers, 'tis said, in days of old
Esteem'd their girls more choice than gold;
Too well a daughter's worth they knew,
To make her cheap by public view:
(Few, who their diamonds' value weigh,
Expose those diamonds ev'ry day)
Then, if Sir Flume drew near, and smil'd,
The parent trembled for her child:
The first advance alarm'd her breast;
And fancy pictur'd all the rest.

But now no mother fears a foe,
 No daughter shudders at a beau.
 Pleasure is all the reigning theme,
 Our noonday thought, our midnight dream.
 In folly's chase our youths engage,
 And shameless crowds of tott'ring age.
 The die, the dance, th' intemp'rate bowl
 With various charms engross the soul.
 Are gold, fame, health, the terms of vice?
 The frantic tribes shall pay the price.
 But though to ruin post they run,
 They'll think it hard to be undone.

Do not arraign my want of taste,
 Or fight to ken where joys are plac'd.
 They widely err, who think me blind,
 And I disclaim a stoic's mind.
 Like yours are my sensations quite;
 I only strive to feel aright.
 My joys, like streams, glide gently by,
 Though small their channel, never dry;
 Keep a still, even, fruitful wave,
 And bless the neighb'ring meads they lave,

My fortune (for I'll mention all,
 And more than you dare tell) is small;
 Yet ev'ry friend partakes my store,
 And want goes smiling from my door.
 Will forty shillings warm the breast
 Of worth or industry distress'd?
 This sum I cheerfully impart;
 'Tis fourscore pleasures to my heart.
 And you may make, by means like these,
 Five talents ten, whene'er you please.
 'Tis true, my little purse grows light;
 But then I sleep so sweet at night!
 This grand specific will prevail,
 When all the doctor's opiates fail.

You ask, what party I pursue?
 Perhaps you mean, "Whose fool are you?"
 The names of party I detest,
 Badges of slavery at best!
 I've too much grace to play the knave,
 And to much pride to turn a slave.
 I love my country from my soul,
 And grieve when knaves or fools controul.
 I'm pleas'd when vice and folly smart,
 Or at the gibbet or the cart:
 Yet always pity, where I can,
 Abhor the guilt, but mourn the man.

Now the religion of your poet—
 Does not this little preface show it?
 My visions if you scan with care,
 'Tis ten to one you'll find it there.
 And if my actions suit my song,
 You can't in conscience think me wrong.

SLANDER.

VISION I.

INSCRIBED TO MISS ****.

My lovely girl, I write for you;
 And pray believe my visions true;
 They'll form your mind to every grace;
 They'll add new beauties to your face:
 And when old age impairs your prime,
 You'll triumph o'er the spoils of time.
 Childhood and youth engage my pen,
 'Tis labour lost to talk to men.

Youth may, perhaps, reform, when wrong,
 Age will not listen to my song.
 He who at fifty is a fool,
 Is far too stubborn grown for school.

What is that vice which still prevails,
 When almost every passion fails;
 Which with our very dawn begun,
 Nor ends, but with our setting sun;
 Which like a noxious weed, can spoil
 The fairest flow'rs, and choke the soil?
 'Tis Slander,—and, with shame I own,
 The vice of human kind alone.

Be Slander then my leading dream,
 Though you're a stranger to the theme;
 Thy softer breast, and honest heart,
 Scorn the defamatory art;
 Thy soul affects her native skies,
 Nor asks distraction's wings to rise;
 In foreign spoils let others shine,
 Intrinsic excellence is thine.

The bird, in peacock's plumes who shone,
 Could plead no merit of her own:
 They silly theft betray'd her pride,
 And spoke her poverty beside.

Th' infamous stand'ring thief is worse
 Than the poor rogue who steals your purse.
 Say, he purloins your glittering store;
 Who takes your gold, takes 'traff'—no more;
 Perhaps he pilfers—to be fed—

Ah! guiltless wretch, who steals for bread!
 But the dark villain, who shall aim
 To blast, my fair, thy spotless name,
 He'd steal a precious gem away,
 Steal what both Indies can't repay!
 Here the strong pleas of want are vain,
 Or the more impious pleas of gain.
 No sinking family to save!
 No gold to glut th' insatiate knave!

Improve the hint of Shakspeare's tongue,
 'Twas thus immortal * Shakspeare sung.
 And trust the bard's unerring rule,
 For nature was that poet's school.

As I was nodding in my chair,
 I saw a rueful wild appear:
 No verdure met my aching sight,
 But hemlock, and cold aconite;
 Two very pois'nous plants, 'tis true,
 But not so bad as vice to you.

The dreary prospect spread around!
 Deep snow had whiten'd all the ground!
 A black and barren mountain nigh,
 Expos'd to ev'ry friendless sky!
 Here foul-mouth'd Slander lay reclin'd,
 Her snaky tresses his'd behind:

"† A bloated toad-stool rais'd her head,
 "The plumes of ravens were her bed."
 She fed upon the viper's brood,
 And slak'd her impious thirst with blood.

The rising sun and western ray
 Were witness to her distant sway.
 The tyrant claim'd a mightier host
 Than the proud Persian e'er could boast,
 No conquest grac'd Darius' son †;
 By his own numbers half undone!

* Othello.

† Garth's Dispensary.

† Xerxes, king of Persia, and son of Darius. He invaded Greece with an army consisting of more than a Success attended Slander's pow'r,

She reap'd fresh laurels ev'ry hour.
Her troops a deeper scarlet wore
Than ever armies knew before.

No plea diverts the fury's rage,
The fury spares nor sex nor age.
Ev'n merit, with destructive charms,
Provokes the vengeance of her arms.

Whene'er the tyrant sounds to war,
Her canker'd trumpet is heard afar.
Pride, with a heart unknown to yield,
Commands in chief, and guides the field.
He stalks with vast gigantic stride,
And scatters fear and ruin wide.
So th' impetuous torrents sweep

At once whole nations to the deep.
Revenge, that base *Hesperian, known
A chief support of Slander's throne,
Amidst the bloody crowd is seen,
And treach'ry brooding in his mien;
The monster often chang'd his gait,
But march'd resolv'd and fix'd as fate.
Thus fell the kite, whom hunger stings,
Now slowly moves his outstretch'd wings;
Now swift as lightning bears away,
And darts upon his trembling prey.

Envy commands a secret band,
With sword and poison in her hand.
Around her haggard eye-balls roll;
A thousand fiends possess her soul.
The artful, unsuspected spright
With fatal aim attacks by night.
Her troops advance with silent tread,
And stab the hero in his bed;
Or shoot the wing'd malignant lie,
And female honours pine and die.
So prowling wolves, when darkness reigns,
Intent on murder scour the plains;
Approach the folds, where lambs repose,
Whole guileless breasts suspect no foes;
The savage glut his fierce desires,
And bleating innocence expires.

Slander smil'd horribly, to view
How wide her daily conquests grew:
Around the crowded levees wait,
Like oriental slaves of state:
Of either sex whole armies press'd,
But chiefly of the fair and best.
Is it a breach of friendship's law
To say what female friends I saw?
Slander assumes the idol's part,
And claims the tribute of the heart.
The best, in some unguarded hour,
Have bow'd the knee, and own'd her pow'r.
Then let the poet not reveal
What candour wishes to conceal.

If I beheld some faulty fair,
Much worse delinquents crowded there:
Prelates in sacred lawn I saw,
Grave phycic, and loquacious law;

million of men (some say more than two millions), who, together with their cattle, perished in great measure through the inability of the countries to supply such a vast host with provision.

* Hesperia includes Italy as well as Spain, and the inhabitants of both are remarkable for their revengeful disposition.

Courriers, like summer flies, abound;
And hungry poets swarm around.

But now my partial story ends,
And makes my females full amends.

If Albion's ill such dreams fulfils,
'Tis Albion's ill: which cures these ills;
Fertile of every worth and grace,
Which warm the heart, and gluff the face.

Fancy disclos'd a smiling train
Of British nymphs, that tripp'd the plain:
Good-nature first, a sylvan queen,
Attir'd in robes of cheerful green:
A fair and smiling virgin she!
With ev'ry charm that shines in thee.
Prudence assum'd the chief command,
And bore a mirror in her hand;
Gray was the matron's head by age,
Her mind by long experience sage;
Of every distant ill afraid,
And anxious for the simp'ring maid.
The Graces danc'd before the fair;
And white-rob'd Innocence was there.
The trees with golden fruits were crown'd,
And rising flow'rs adorn'd the ground;
The sun display'd each brighter ray;
And shone in all the pride of day.

When Slander sicken'd at the sight,
And skulk'd away to shun the light.

PLEASURE.

VISION. II.

HEAR, ye fair mothers of our isle,
Nor scorn your poet's homely style.
What though my thoughts be quaint or new,
I'll warrant that my doctrine's true:
Or if my sentiments be old,
Remember, truth is sterling gold.

You judge it of important weight,
To keep your rising offspring straight:
For this such anxious moments feel,
And ask the friendly aids of steel:
For this import the distant cane,
Or slay the monarch of the main.
And shall the soul be warp'd aside
By passion, prejudice, and pride?
Deformity of heart I call
The worst deformity of all.

Your cares to body are confin'd,
Few fear obliquity of mind.
Why not adorn the better part?
This is a nobler theme for art.
For what is form, or what is face,
But the soul's index, or its case?

Now take a simile at hand,
Compare the mental soil to land,
Shall fields be till'd with annual care,
And minds lie fallow ev'ry year?
O since the crop depends on you,
Give them the culture which is due:
Hoe every weed, and dress the soil,
So harvest shall repay your toil.

If human minds resemble trees,
(As every moralist agrees)
Prune all the stragglers of your vine,
Then shall the purple clusters shine.
The gard'ner knows, that fruitful life
Demands his salutary-knife:
For ev'ry wild luxuriant shoot,
Or robs the bloom, or starves the fruit.

A Satirist* in Roman times,
When Rome, like Britain, groan'd with crimes,
Asserts it for a sacred truth,
That pleasures are the bane of youth:
That forrows such pursuits attend,
Or such pursuits in forrows end:
That all the wild advent'ring gains
Are perils, penitence, and pains.

Approve, ye fair, the Roman page,
And hid your sons revere the sage;
In study spend their midnight oil,
And string their nerves by manly toil.
Thus shall they grow like Temple wife,
Thus future Lockes and Newtons rise;
Or hardy chiefs to wield the lance,
And save us from the chains of France.
Yes, bid your sons betimes forego
Those treach'rous paths were pleasures grow;
Where the young mind is folly's slave,
Where every virtue finds a grave.

Let each bright character be nam'd,
For wisdom or for valour sam'd:
Are the dear youths to science prone?
Tell, how th' immortal Bacon shone!
Who, leaving meaner joys to kings,
Soar'd high on contemplation's wings;
Rang'd the fair fields of nature o'er,
Where never mortal trod before:
Bacon! whose vast capacious plan
Bespoke him angel, more than man!

Does love of martial fame inspire?
Cherish, ye fair, the gen'rous fire;
Teach them to spurn inglorious rest,
And rouse the hero in their breast;
Paint Cressy's vanquish'd field anew,
Their souls shall kindle at the view;
Resolv'd to conquer or to fall,
When liberty and Britain call.
Thus shall they rule the crimson plain,
Or hurl their thunders through the main;
Gain with their blood, nor grudge the cost,
What their degen'rate fires have lost:
The laurel thus shall grace their brow,
As Churchill's once, or Warren's now.

One Summer's evening as I stray'd
Along the silent moon-light glade,
With these reflections in my breast,
Beneath an oak I sunk to rest;
A gentle slumber intervenes,
And fancy dress'd instructive scenes.

Methought a spacious road I spy'd,
And stately trees adorn'd its side;
Frequented by a giddy crowd
Of thoughtless mortals, vain and loud;
Who tripp'd with jocund heel along,
And bade me join their smiling throng.

I straight obey'd—persuasion hung
Like honey on the speaker's tongue.
A cloudless sun improv'd the day,
And pinks and roses strew'd our way.

Now as our journey we pursue,
A beauteous fabric rose to view,
A stately dome, and sweetly grac'd
With ev'ry ornament of taste.
This structure was a female's claim,
And Pleasure was the monarch's name.

Perfus.*

Perfus.*

The hall we enter'd uncontrou'd,
And saw the queen enthron'd on gold;
Arabian sweets perfum'd the ground,
And laughing Cupids flutter'd round;
A flowing vest adorn'd the fair,
And flow'ry chaplets wreath'd her hair:
Fraud taught the queen a thousand wiles,
A thousand soft insidious smiles;
Love taught her slipping tongue to speak,
And form'd the dimple in her cheek;
The lily and the damask rose,
The tincture of her face compose;
Nor did the god of wit disdain
To mingle with the shining train.

Her vor'ries flock from various parts,
And chiefly youth resign'd their hearts;
The old in sparing numbers pres'd,
But awkward devotees at best.
Now let us range at large, we cry'd,
Through all the garden's boasted pride.
Here jasmynes spread the silver flow'r,
To deck the wall, or weave the bow'r;
The woodbines mix in am'rous play,
And breathe their fragrant lives away.
Here rising myrtles form a shade,
There roses blush, and scent the glade,
The orange, with a vernal face,
Wears ev'ry rich autumnal grace;
While the young blossoms here unfold,
There shines the fruit like pendent gold.
Citrons their balmy sweets exhale,
And triumph in the distant gale.
Now fountains, murr'ring to the song,
Roll their translucent streams along.
Through all the aromatic groves,
The faithful turtles cool their loves.
The lark ascending pours his notes,
And linnets swell their rapt'rous throats.

Pleasure, imperial fair! how gay
Thy empire, and how wide thy sway!
Enchanting queen! how soft thy reign!
How man, fond man! implores thy chain!
Yet thine each meretricious art,
That weakens, and corrupts the heart.
The childish toys and wanton page
Which sink and prostitute the stage!
The masquerade, that just offence
To virtue, and reproach to sense!
The midnight dance, the mantling bowl,
And all that dissipate the soul;
All that to ruin man combine,
Yes, specious harlot, all are thine!

Whence sprung th' accursed lust of play,
Which beggars thousands in a day?
Speak, for'tels, speak (for thou canst tell)
Who call'd the treach'rous card from hell?
Now man profanes his reas'ning pow'rs,
Profanes sweet friendship's sacred hours;
Abandon'd to inglorious ends,
And faithless to himself and friends;
A dupe to ev'ry artful knave,
To ev'ry abject with a slave;
But who against himself combines,
Abets his enemy's designs.
When Rapine meditates a blow,
He shares the guilt who aids the foe.
Is man a thief who steals my self?
How great his theft, who robs himself!

HEALTH.

VISION III.

ATTEND my visions, thoughtless youths,
Ere long you'll think them weighty truths;
Prudent it were to think so now;
Ere age has silver'd o'er your brow:
For he, who at his early years
Has sown in vice, shall reap in tears.
If folly has possess'd his prime,
Disease shall gather strength in time;
Poison shall rage in ev'ry vein,—
Nor penitence dilute the stain:
And when each hour shall urge his fate,
Thought, like the doctor, comes too late.

The subject of my song is Health,
A good superior far to wealth.
Can the young mind distrust its worth?
Consult the monarchs of the earth:
Imperial czars, and sultans own
No gem so bright that decks their throne:
Each for this pearl his crown would quit,
And turn a rustic or a cit.

Mark, though the blessing's lost with care,
'Tis not recover'd when you please.
Say not that gruels shall avail,
For salutary gruels fail.
Say not, Apollo's sons succeed,
Apollo's son is Egypt's * reed.
How fruitless the physician's skill,
How vain the penitential pill,
The marble monuments proclaim,
The humbler turf confirms the same!
Prevention is the better cure,
So says the proverb, and 'tis sure.

Would you extend your narrow span,
And make the most of life you can;
Would you, when med'cines cannot save,
Descend with ease into the grave;
Calmly retire, like evening light,
And cheerful bid the world good-night?
Let temp'rance constantly preside,
Our best physician, friend, and guide!
Would you to wisdom make pretence,
Proud to be thought a man of sense?
Let temp'rance (always friend to fame)
With steady hand direct your aim;
Or, like an archer in the dark,
Your random shaft will miss the mark:
For they who slight her golden rules,
In wisdom's volume stand for fools.

But morals, unadorn'd by art,
Are seldom known to reach the heart.
I'll therefore strive to raise my theme
With all the scenery of dream.

Soft were my slumbers, sweet my rest,
Such as the infant's on the breast;
When fancy, ever on the wing,
And fruitful as the genial spring,
Presented, in a blaze of light,
A new creation to my sight.

A rural landscape I deserv'd,
Drest in the robes of Summer pride;
The herds adorn'd the sloping hills,
That glitter'd with their tinkling rills;
Below the fleecy mothers stray'd,
And round their sportive lambkins play'd.

* In allusion to 2 Kings xviii. 21.

Is man, who gulls his friend, a cheat?
How heinous then is self-deceit!
Is murder justly deem'd a crime?
How black his guilt, who murders time!
Should custom plead, as custom will,
Grand precedents to palliate ill,
Shall modes and forms avail with me,
When reason disfavours the plea?
Who games, is felon of his wealth,
His time, his liberty, his health.
Virtue forsakes his fordid mind,
And Honour scorns to stay behind.
From man when these bright cherubs part,
Ah! what's the poor deserted heart?
A savage wild that shocks the sight,
Or chaos, and impervious night!
Each gen'rous principle destroy'd,
And demons crowd the frightful void!
Shall Siam's elephant supple
The baneful desolating die?
Against the honest sylvan's will,
You taught his iv'ry tusk to kill.
Heav'n, fond its favours to dispense,
Gave him that weapon for defence.
That weapon, for his guard design'd,
You render'd fatal to mankind.
He plann'd no death for thoughtless youth,
You gave the venom to his tooth.
Blush, tyrant, blush, for oh! 'tis true
That no fell serpent bites like you.
The guests were order'd to depart,
Reluctance sat on ev'ry heart:
A porter show'd a different door,
Not the fair portal known before!
The gates, methought, were open'd wide,
The crowds descended in a tide.
But oh! ye heav'ns, what vast surprise
Struck the advent'urers' frighted eyes!
A barren heath before us lay,
And gath'ring clouds obscur'd the day;
The darkness rose in smoky spires;
The lightnings flash'd their livid fires:
Loud peals of thunder rent the air,
While vengeance chill'd our hearts with fear.
Five ruffless tyrants sway'd the plain,
And triumph'd o'er the mangled slain.
Here sat Disaste, with sickly mien,
And more than half-devour'd with spleen:
There stood Remorse, with thought oppress'd,
And vipers feeding on his breast:
Then Want, dejected, pale, and thin,
With bones just starting through his skin;
A ghastly fiend!—and close behind
Disease, his aching head reclin'd!
His everlasting thirst confess'd
The fires, which rag'd within his breast:
Death clos'd the train! the hideous form
Smil'd unrelenting in the storm:
When strait a doleful shriek was heard;
I woke—The vision disappear'd.
Let not the unexperienc'd boy
Deny that pleasures will destroy;
Or say that dreams are vain and wild,
Like fairy tales, to please a child.
Important hints the wife may reap
From fallies of the soul in sleep.
And, since there's meaning in my dream,
The moral merits your esteem.

Nigh to a murmuring brook I saw
 An humble cottage thatch'd with straw ;
 Behind, a garden that supply'd
 All things for use, and none for pride :
 Beauty prevail'd through ev'ry part,
 But more of nature than of art.

Hail thou sweet, calm, unenvied feat !
 I said, and bless'd the fair retreat :
 Here would I pass my remnant days,
 Unknown to censure or to praise ;
 Forget the world, and be forgot,
 As Pope describes his vestal's lot.

While thus I mus'd, a beauteous maid
 Step from a thicket's neighb'ring shade ;
 Not Hampton's gallery can boast,
 Nor Hudson paint so fair a toaft :
 She claim'd the cottage for her own,
 'To Health a cottage is a throne.

The annals say (to prove her worth)
 The graces solemniz'd her birth.
 Garlands of various flow'rs they wrought,
 The orchard's blushing pride they brought :
 Hence in her face the lily speaks,
 And hence the rose which paints her cheeks ;
 The cherry gave her lips to glow,
 Her eyes were debtors to the floe ;
 And, to complete the lovely fair,
 'Tis said, the chestnut stain'd her hair.

The virgin was averse to courts,
 But often seen in rural sports :
 When in her rosy vest the morn
 Walks o'er the dew-bespangled lawn,
 The nymph is first to form the race,
 Or wind the horn, and lead the chace.

Sudden I heard a shouting train,
 Glad acclamations fill'd the plain :
 Unbounded joy improv'd the scene,
 For Health was loud proclaim'd a queen.

Two smiling cherubs grac'd her throne,
 (To modern courts I fear unknown ;)
 One was the nymph that loves the light,
 Fair Innocence, array'd in white ;
 With sister Peace in close embrace,
 And heav'n all opening in her face.

The reign was long, the empire great,
 And Virtue minister of state.

In other kingdoms, ev'ry hour,
 You hear of vice prefer'd to pow'r :
 Vice was a perfect stranger here :
 No knaves engross'd the royal ear :
 No fools obtain'd this monarch's grace ;
 Virtue dispos'd of ev'ry place.

What sickly appetites are ours,
 Still varying with the varying hours !
 And though from good to bad we range,
 " No matter," says the fool, " 'tis change."

Her subjects now express'd apace
 Dissatisfaction in their face :
 Some view the state with envy's eye,
 Some were displeas'd, they knew not why :
 When Faction, ever bold and vain,
 With rigour tax'd their monarch's reign.
 Thus, should an angel from above,
 Fraught with benevolence and love,
 Descend to earth, and here impart
 Important truths to mend the heart ;
 Would not th' instructive guest dispense
 With passion, appetite, and sense,

We should his heav'nly lore despise,
 And send him to his former skies.

A dang'rous hostile power arose
 To Health, whose household were her foes :
 A harlot's loose attire she wore,
 And Luxury the name she bore.
 This princefs of unbounded sway,
 Whom Asia's softer sons obey,
 Made war against the queen of Health,
 Assisted by the troops of Wealth.

The queen was first to take the field,
 Arm'd with her helmet and her shield ;
 Temper'd with such superior art,
 'T hat both were proof to ev'ry dart.
 Two warlike chiefs approach'd the green,
 And wondrous fav'rites with the queen :
 Both were of Amazonian race,
 Both high in merit, and in place.
 Here Resolution march'd, whose soul
 No fear could shake, no pow'r controul ;
 The heroine wore a Roman vest,
 A lion's heart inform'd her breast.
 There Prudence shone, whose bosom wrought
 With all the various plans of thought ;
 'Twas hers to bid the troops engage,
 And teach the battle where to rage.

And now the Siren's armies press,
 Their van was headed by Excess :
 The mighty wings that form'd the side,
 Commanded by that giant Pride :
 While Sickness, and her sisters Pain
 And Poverty the centre gain :
 Repentance, with a brow severe,
 And Death, were station'd in the rear.

Health rang'd her troops with matchless art,
 And acted the defensive part :
 Her army posted on a hill,
 Plainly bespoke superior skill :
 Hence were discover'd through the plain,
 The motions of the hostile train :
 While Prudence, to prevent surprize,
 Oft sally'd with her trusty spies ;
 Explor'd each ambuscade below,
 And reconnoitred well the foe.

Afar when Luxury deserv'd
 Inferior force by art supply'd,
 The Siren spake—Let Fraud prevail,
 Since all my numerous hosts must fail ;
 Henceforth hostilities shall cease,
 I'll send to Health, and offer peace.
 Strait she dispatch'd, with pow'rs complete,
 Pleasure, her minister, to treat.
 This wicked trumpet topp'd her part,
 And sow'd sedition in the heart !
 Through ev'ry troop the poison ran,
 All were infected to a man.
 The wary generals were won
 By Pleasure's wiles, and both undone.

Jove held the troops in high disgrace,
 And bade diseases blast their race ;
 Look'd on the queen with melting eyes,
 And snatch'd his darling to the skies :
 Who still regards those wiser few,
 That dare her dictates to pursue.
 For where her stricter law prevails,
 Though Passion prompts, or Vice assails ;
 Long shall the cloudless skies behold,
 And their calm sun-set beam with gold.

VISION IV.

MAN is deceiv'd by outward show—
 'Tis a plain homespun truth, I know,
 The fraud prevails at ev'ry age,
 So says the school-boy and the sage;
 Yet still we hug the dear deceit,
 And still exclaim against the cheat.
 But whence this inconsistent part?
 Say, moralists, who know the heart:
 If you'll this labyrinth pursue,
 I'll go before, and find the clue.

I dreamt ('twas on a birth-day night)
 A sumptuous palace rose to sight;
 The builder had, through ev'ry part,
 Observ'd the chafest rules of art;
 Raphael and Titian had display'd
 All the full force of light and shade:
 Around the livery'd servants wait;
 An aged porter kept the gate.

As I was traversing the hall,
 Where Brussels' looms adorn'd the wall,
 (Whose tap'stry shows, without my aid,
 A nun is no such usefess maid),
 A graceful person came in view,
 (His form, it seems, is known to few);
 His dress was unadorn'd with lace,
 But charms! a thousand in his face.

This, sir, your property? I cry'd—
 Master and mansion coincide:
 Where all, indeed, is truly great,
 And proves that blifs may dwell with state.
 Pray, sir, indulge a stranger's claim,
 And grant the favour of your name.

"Content," the lovely form reply'd;

But think not here that I reside:
 Here lives a courtier, base and fly;
 An open, honest rustic, I.

Our taste and manners disagree,
 His levee boasts no charms for me:
 For titles and the smiles of kings,
 To me are cheap unheeded things.

'Tis virtue can alone impart
 The patent of a dual heart:
 Unless this herald speaks him great,
 What shall avail the glare of state?
 Those secret charms are my delight,
 Which shine remote from public sight:
 Passions subdu'd, desires at rest—
 And hence his chaplain shares my breast.

There was a time (his grace can tell)
 I knew the duke exceeding well;
 Knew ev'ry secret of his heart;
 In truth, we never were apart:
 But when the court became his end,
 He turn'd his back upon his friend.

One day I call'd upon his grace,
 Just as the duke had got a place:
 I thought (but thought amiss, 'tis clear),
 I shou'd be welcome to the peer,
 Yes, welcome to a man in pow'r;
 And so I was—for half an hour.
 But he grew weary of his guest,
 And soon discarded me his breast;
 Upbraided me with want of merit,
 But most for poverty of spirit.

You relish not the great man's lot?
 Come hasten to my humbler cot.
 Think me not partial to the great,
 I'm a sworn foe to pride and state;
 No monarchs share my kind embrace,
 There's scarce a monarch knows my face:
 Content shuns courts, and oft'ner dwells
 With modest worth in rural cells;
 There's no complaint, though brown the bread,
 Or the rude turf sustain the head;
 Though hard the couch, and coarse the meat,
 Still the brown loaf and sleep are sweet.

Far from the city I reside,
 And a thatch'd cottage all my pride.
 True to my heart, I seldom roam,
 Because I find my joys at home.
 For foreign visits then begin,
 When the man feels a void within.

But though from towns and crowds I fly,
 No humorist nor cynic, I,
 Amidst sequester'd shades I prize
 The friendships of the good and wise.
 Bid Virtue and her sons attend,
 Virtue will tell thee I'm her friend:
 Tell thee I'm faithful, constant, kind,
 And meek and lowly; and resign'd;
 Will say, there's no distinction known
 Betwixt her household and my own.

Author.

If these the friendships you pursue,
 Your friends, I fear, are very few.
 So little company, you say,
 Yet fond of home from day to day?
 How do you shun detraction's rod?
 I doubt your neighbours think you odd!

Content.

I commune with myself at night,
 And ask my heart if all be right:
 If, "right," replies my faithful breast,
 I smile, and close my eyes to rest.

Author.

You seem regardless of the town:
 Pray, sir, how stand you with the gown?

Content.

The clergy say they love me well,
 Whether they do, they best can tell:
 They paint me modest, friendly, wise,
 And always praise me to the skies;
 But if conviction's at the heart,
 Why not a correspondent part?
 For shall the learned tongue prevail,
 If actions preach a different tale?
 Who'll seek my door or grace my walls,
 When neither dean nor prelate calls?

With those my friendships most obtain,
 Who prize their duty more than gain;
 Soft flow the hours whene'er we meet,
 And conscious virtue is our treat:
 Our harmless breast no envy know,
 And hence we fear no secret foe;
 Our walks ambition ne'er attends,
 And hence we ask no powerful friends;
 We wish the best to church and state,
 But leave the steerage to the great;
 Careless, who rises, or who falls,
 And never dream of vacant stalls;
 Much less, by pride or int'rest drawn,
 Sigh for the mitre, and the lawn.

Observe the secrets of my art,
I'll fundamental truth's impart:
If you'll my kind advice pursue,
I'll quit my hut, and dwell with you.

The passions are a num'rous crowd,
Imperious, positive, and loud:
Curb these licentious sons of strife;
Hence chiefly rise the storms of life:
If they grow mutinous, and rave,
They are thy masters, thou their slave.

Regard the world with cautious eye,
Nor raise your expectation high.
See that the balance'd scales be such,
You neither fear nor hope too much.
For disappointment's not the thing,
'Tis pride and passion point the sting.
Life is a sea where storms must rise,
'Tis folly talks of cloudless skies:
He who contracts his swelling sail,
Eludes the fury of the gale.

Be still, nor anxious thoughts employ,
Distrust embitters present joy:
On God for all events depend;
You cannot want when God's your friend.
Weigh well your part, and do your best;
Leave to your Maker all the rest.
The hand which form'd thee in the womb,
Guides from the cradle to the tomb.
Can the fond mother slight her boy;
Can she forget her prattling joy?
Say then, shall sov'reign love desert
The humble, and the honest heart?
Heav'n may not grant thee all thy mind;
Yet say not thou that Heav'n's unkind.
God is alike, both good and wise,
In what he grants, and what denies:
Perhaps, what goodness gives to-day,
To-morrow goodness takes away.

You say, that troubles intervene,
That sorrows darken half the scene.
True—and this consequence you see,
The world was ne'er design'd for thee:
You're like a passenger below,
That stays perhaps a night or so;
But still his native country lies
Beyond the bound'ries of the skies.

Of Heav'n ask virtue, wisdom, health,
But never let thy pray'r be wealth.
If food be thine (though little gold),
And raiment to repel the cold;
Such as may nature's want suffice,
Not what from pride and folly rise;
If soft the motions of thy soul,
And a calm conscience crowns the whole;
Add but a friend to all this store,
You can't in reason wish for more:
And if kind Heav'n thus comfort brings,
'Tis more than Heav'n bestows on kings.

He spake—the airy spectre flies,
And strait the sweet illusion dies.
The vision, at the early dawn,
Consign'd me to the thoughtful morn;
To all the cares of waking day,
And inconsistent dreams of day.

HAPPINESS.

VISION V.

Ye ductile youths, whose rising sun
Hath many circles still to run;

Who wisely with the pilot's chart,
To steer through life th' unsteady heart;
And all the thoughtful voyage past,
To gain a happy port at last:
Attend a Seer's instructive song,
For moral truths to dreams belong.

I saw this wondrous vision soon,
Long ere my sun had reach'd its noon;
Just when the rising beard began
To grace my chin, and call me man.

One night, when balmy slumbers stred
Their peaceful poppies o'er my head,
My fancy led me to explore

A thousand scenes unknown before.
I saw a plain extended wide,
And crowds pour'd in from ev'ry side:
All seem'd to start a diff'rent game,
Yet all declar'd their views the same:
The chase was Happiness, I found,
But all, alas! enchanted ground.

Indeed I judg'd it wondrous strange,
To see the giddy numbers range
Through roads, which promis'd nought, at best,
But sorrow to the human breast.
Methought, if bliss was all their view,
Why did they diff'rent paths pursue?
The waking world has long agreed,
That Bagshot's not the road to Tweed:
And he who Berwick seeks through Staines,
Shall have his labour for his pains.

As Parnel* says, my bosom wrought
With travail of uncertain thought:
And, as an angel help'd the dean,
My angel chose to intervene;
The dress of each was much the same,
And Virtue was my seraph's name.
When thus the angel silence broke,
(Her voice was music as the spoke)

Attend, O man, nor leave my side,
And safety shall thy footsteps guide;
Such truths I'll teach, such secrets show,
As none but favour'd mortals know.

She said—and strait we march'd along
To join Ambition's active throng:
Crowds urg'd on crowds with eager pace,
And happy he who led the race.

Axes and daggers lay unseen
In ambuscade along the green;
While vapours shed delusive light,
And bubbles mock'd the distant sight.

We saw a shining mountain rise,
Whose tow'ring summit reach'd the skies:
The slopes were steep, and form'd of glass,
Painful and hazardous to pass:
Courtiers and statesmen led the way,
The faithless paths their steps betray;
This moment seen aloft to soar,
The next to fall, and rise no more.

'Twas here Ambition kept her court,
A phantom of gigantic port;
The fav'rite that sustain'd her throne,
Was Falshood, by her vizard known;
Next stood Mistrust, with frequent sigh,
Disorder'd look, and squinting eye;
While meagre Envy claim'd a place,
And Jealousy, with jaundic'd face.

* The Hermit.

But where is Happiness? I cry'd.
My guardian turn'd, and thus reply'd:

Mortal, by folly still beguil'd,
Thou hast not yet outstripp'd the child;
Thou, who hast twenty winters seen,
(I hardly think thee past fifteen)
To ask if Happiness can dwell
With every dirty imp of hell!
Go to the school-boy, he shall preach,
What twenty winters cannot teach;
He'll tell thee, from his weekly theme,
That thy pursuit is all a dream:
That Bliss ambitious views disowns,
And self-dependent, laughs at thrones;
Prefers the shades and lowly seats,
Whither fair Innocence retreats:
So the coy lily of the vale,
Shuns eminence, and loves the dale.

I blush'd; and now we cross'd the plain,
To find the money-getting train;
Those silent, snug, commercial bands,
With busy looks, and dirty hands.
Amidst these thoughtful crowds the old
Plac'd all their Happiness in gold.
And surely, if there's bliss below,
These hoary heads the secret know.

We journey'd with the plodding crew,
When soon a temple rose to view:
A Gothic pile, with moss o'ergrown;
Strong were the walls, and built with stone.
Without a thousand masons wait:
A thousand bolts secure the gate.
We sought admission long in vain:
For here all favours fell for gain:
The greedy porter yields to gold,
His fee receiv'd, the gates unfold.
Assembled nations here we found,
And view'd the cringing herds around,
Who daily sacrific'd to Wealth,
Their honour, conscience, peace, and health.
I saw no charms that could engage;
The god appear'd like sordid age,
With hooked nose, and famish'd jaws,
But serpents' eyes, and harpies' claws:
Behind stood Fear, that restless spright,
Which haunts the watches of the night;
And Viper-Care, that stings so deep,
Whose deadly venom murders sleep.

We hasten now to Pleasure's bow'rs;
Where the gay tribes sit crown'd with flow'rs;
Here Beauty every charm display'd,
And Love inflam'd the yielding maid:
Delicious wine our taste employs,
His crimson bowl exalts our joys:
I felt its gen'rous pow'r, and thought
The pearl was found, that long I sought.
Determin'd here to fix my home,
I blest'd the change, nor wish'd to roam:
The Seraph disapprov'd my stay,
Spread her fair plumes, and wing'd away.

Alas! when'er we talk of bliss,
How prone is man to judge amiss!
See, a long train of ills conspires
To scourge our uncontroll'd desires.
Like Summer swarms Diseases crowd,
Each bears a crutch, or each a shroud:
Fever! that thirsty fury, came,
With inextinguishable flame;

Consumption, sworn ally of Death!
Crept slowly on with panting breath;
Gout roar'd, and show'd his throbbing feet;
And Dropsy took the drunkard's seat:
Stone brought his tort'ring racks; and near
Sat Palsy shaking in her chair!

A mangled youth, beneath a shade,
A melancholy scene display'd:
His noseless face, and loathsome stains,
Proclaim'd the poison in his veins;
He rais'd his eyes, he smote his breast,
He wept aloud, and thus address'd:

Forbear the harlot's false embrace,
Though Lewdness wear an angel's face.
Be wise, by my experience taught,
I die, alas! for want of thought.

As he who travels Lybia's plains,
Where the fierce Lion lawless reigns,
Is seiz'd with fear and wild dismay,
When the grim foe obstructs his way:
My soul was pierc'd with equal fright,
My tott'ring limbs oppos'd my flight;
I call'd on Virtue, but in vain,
Her absence quicken'd every pain:
At length the slighted angel heard,
The dear resplendent form appear'd.

Presumptuous youth! she said, and frown'd;
(My heart-strings flutter'd at the sound)
Who turns to me reluctant ears,
Shall shed repeated floods of tears.
These rivers shall for ever last,
There's no retracting what is past:
Nor think avenging ills to shun;
Play a false card, and you're undone.

Of Pleasure's gilded baits beware,
Nor tempt the Syren's fatal snare:
Forego this curs'd, detested place,
Abhor the strumpet and her race:
Had you those softer paths pursu'd,
Perdition, stripling, had ensu'd:
Yes, fly—you stand upon its brink;
To-morrow is too late to think.

Indeed, unwelcome truths I tell,
But mark my sacred lesson well:
With me whoever lives at strife,
Loses his better friend for life;
With me who lives in friendship's ties,
Finds all that's sought for by the wife.
Folly exclaims, and well she may,
Because I take her mask away;
If once I bring her to the sun,
The painted harlot is undone.
But prize, my child, oh! prize my rules,
And leave deception to her fools.

Ambition deals in tinsel toys,
Her traffic gewgaws, fleeting joys!
An arrant juggler in disguise,
Who holds false optics to your eyes.
But ah! how quick the shadows pass;
Though the bright visions through her glass
Charm at a distance; yet, when near,
The baseless fabrics disappear.

Nor Riches boast intrinsic worth,
Their charms at best, superior are:
These oft the heav'n-born mind enslave,
And make an honest man a knave.
"Wealth cures my wants," the Miser cries,
Be not deceiv'd—the Miser lies:

One want he has, with all his store,
That worst of wants! the want of more.
Take Pleasure, Wealth, and Pomp away,
And where is Happiness? you say
'Tis here—and may be yours—for, know
I'm all that's Happiness below.
To Vice I leave tumultuous joys,
Mine is the still and softer voice;
That whispers peace, when storms invade,
And music through the midnight shade.

Come then, be mine in ev'ry part,
Nor give me less, than all your heart;
When troubles discompose your breast,
I'll enter there a cheerful guest:
My converse shall your cares beguile,
The little world within shall smile;
And then it scarce imports a jot,
Whether the great world frowns or not.
And when the closing scenes prevail,
When wealth, state, pleasure, all shall fail;
All that a foolish world admires,
Or passion craves, or pride inspires;
At that important hour of need,
Virtue shall prove a friend indeed!
My hands shall smooth thy dying bed,
My arms sustain thy drooping head:
And when the painful struggle's o'er,
And that vain thing, the World, no more;
I'll bear my fav'rite son away
To rapture, and eternal day.

FRIENDSHIP.

VISION VI.

FRIENDSHIP! thou soft, propitious pow'r!
Sweet regent of the social hour!
Sublime thy joys, nor understood,
But by the virtuous and the good!
Cabal and Riot take thy name,
But 'tis a false affected claim.
In heav'n if Love and Friendship dwell,
Can they associate e'er with hell!
Though art the same through change of times,
Through frozen zones, and burning climes:
From the equator to the pole,
The same kind angel through the whole.
And, since thy choice is always free,
I bless thee for thy smiles on me.
When sorrows swell the tempest high,
Thou, a kind port, art always nigh;
For aching hearts a sov'reign cure,
Not soft Nepenthe* half so sure!
And when returning comforts rise,
Thou the bright sun that gilds our skies.
While these ideas warm'd my breast,
My weary eye-lids stole to rest;
When fancy re-assum'd the theme,
And furnish'd this instructive dream.
I sail'd upon a stormy sea,
(Thousands embark'd alike with me)
My skiff was small, and weak beside,
Not built, methought, to stem the tide.

* Nepenthe is an herb, which being infused in wine, dispels grief. It is unknown to the moderns; but some believe it a kind of opium, and others take it for a species of bugloss. Plin. 21. 211. & 25: 2.

The winds along the surges sweep,
The wrecks lie scatter'd through the deep;
Aloud the foaming billows roar,
Unfriendly rocks forbid the shore.

While all our various course pursue,
A spacious isle salutes our view.
Two queens, with tempers diff'ring wide,
This new discover'd world divide.
A river parts their proper claim,
And Truth its celebrated name.

One side a beauteous tract of ground
Presents, with living verdure crown'd.
The seasons temp'rate, soft, and mild,
And a kind sun that always smil'd.

Few storms molest the natives here;
Cold is the only ill they fear.

This happy clime, and grateful soil,
With plenty crowns the lab'rer's toil.

Here Friendship's happy kingdom grew,
Her realms were small, her subjects few.
A thousand charms the palace grace,
A rock of adamant its base.

Though thunders roll, and lightnings fly,
This structure braves the inclement sky.
Ev'n Time, which other piles devours,
And mocks the pride of human pow'rs,
Partial to Friendship's pile alone,
Cements the joints, and binds the stone;
Ripens the beauties of the place;
And calls to life each latent grace.

Around the throne in order stand
Four Amazons, a trusty band;
Friends ever faithful to advise,
Or to defend when dangers rise.
Here Fortitude in coat of mail!

There Justice lifts her golden scale!
Two hardy chiefs! who persevere,
With form erect, and brow severe;
Who smile at perils, pains, and death,
And triumph with their latest breath.

Temp'rance, that comely matron's near,
Guardian of all the Virtues here;
Adorn'd with ev'ry blooming grace,
Without one wrinkle in her face.

But Prudence most attracts the sight,
And shines pre-eminently bright.
To view her various thoughts that rise,
She holds a mirror to her eyes;
The mirror; faithful to its charge,
Reflects the virgin's soul in large.

A virtue with a softer air,
Was handmaid to the regal fair.
This nymph, indulgent, constant, kind,
Derives from Heav'n her spotless mind:
When actions wear a dubious face,
Puts the best meaning on the case;
She spreads her arms, and bares her breast,
Takes in the naked and distress'd;
Prefers the hungry orphan's cries,
And from her queen obtains supplies.
The maid who acts this lovely part,
Grasp'd in her hand a bleeding heart.
Fair Charity! be thou my guest,
And be thy constant couch my breast.

But Virtues of inferior name,
Crowd round the throne with equal claim;
In loyalty by none surpass'd,
They hold allegiance to the last:

Not ancient records e'er can show
That one deserted to the foe.

The river's other side display'd
Alternate plots of flow'rs and shade,
Where poppies shone with various hue,
Where yielding willows plenteous grew;
And Humble* plants, by travellers thought
With flow but certain poison fraught.
Beyond these scenes, the eye desir'd
A pow'ful realm extended wide,
Whose bound'ries from north-east begun,
And stretch'd to meet the south-west sun.
Here Flatt'ry boasts despotic sway,
And basks in all the warmth of day.

Long practis'd in Deception's school,
The tyrant knew the arts to rule;
Flated with the imperial robe,
She plans the conquest of the globe;
And aided by her servile trains,
Leads kings, and sons of kings, in chains.
Her darling minister is Pride,
(Who ne'er was known to change his side)
A friend to all her interests just,
And active to discharge his trust;
Carefs'd alike by high and low,
The idol of the belle and beau:
In ev'ry shape he shows his skill,
And forms her subjects to his will;
Enters their houses and their hearts,
And gains his point before he parts.
Sure never minister was known
So zealous for his sov'reign's throne!

Three sisters, similar in mien,
Were maids of honour to the queen:
Who farther favours shar'd beside,
As daughters of her statesman Pride.
The first, Conceit, with tow'ring crest,
Who look'd with scorn upon the rest;
Fond of herself, nor less, I deem,
Than duchess in her own esteem.

Next Affectation, fair and young,
With half-form'd accents on her tongue,
Whose antic shapes, and various face,
Distorted every native grace.

Then Vanity, a wanton maid,
Flaunting in Brussels and brocade;
Fantastic, frolicksome, and wild,
With all the trinkets of a child

The people, loyal to the queen,
Wore their attachment in their mien:
With cheerful heart they homage paid,
And happiest he who most obey'd.
While they who sought their own applause,
Promoted most their sov'reign's cause.
The minds of all were fraught with guile,
Their manners dissolute and vile;
And every tribe, like Pagans, run
To kneel before the rising sun.

But now some clam'rous sounds arise,
And all the pleasing vision flies.

Once more I clos'd my eyes to sleep,
And gain'd th' imaginary deep;
Fancy presided at the helm,
And steer'd me back to Friendship's realm.

* The humble plant bends down before the touch, as the sensitive plant springs from the touch, and is said by some to be the slow poison of the Indians.

But oh! with horror I relate
The revolutions of her state.
The Trojan chief cou'd hardly more
His Asiatic tow'rs deplore.

For Flatt'ry view'd those fairer plains,
With longing eyes, where Friendship reigns,
With envy heard her neighbour's fame,
And often sigh'd to gain the same.
At length, by pride and int'rest fir'd,
To Friendship's kingdom she aspir'd.

And now commencing open foe,
She plans in thought some mighty blow;
Draws out her forces on the green,
And marches to invade the queen.

The river Truth the hosts withstood,
And roll'd her formidable flood.
Her current strong, and deep and clear,
No fords were found, no ferries near:
But as the troops approach'd the waves,
Their fears suggest a thousand graves;
They all retir'd with haste extreme,
And shudder'd at the dang'rous stream.

Hypocriſy the gulf explores;
She forms a bridge, and joins the shores.
Thus often art or fraud prevails,
When military prowess fails.
The troops an easy passage find,
And Vict'ry follows close behind.

Friendship with ardour charg'd her foes,
And now the fight promiscuous grows;
But Flatt'ry threw a poison'd dart,
And pierc'd the Empreſs to the heart.

The Virtues all around were ſeen
To fall in heaps about the queen.
The tyrant ſtrip'd the mangled ſair,
She wore her ſpoils, aſſum'd her air;
And mounting next the ſuff'rer's throne,
Claim'd the queen's titles as her own.

Ah! injur'd maid, aloud I cry'd,
Ah! injur'd maid, the rocks reply'd:
But judge my griefs, and ſhare them too,
For the ſad tale pertains to you;
Judge, reader, how ſevere the wound,
When Friendſhip's foes were mine, I found;
When the ſad ſcene of pride and guile
Was Britain's poor degen'rate iſle.

The Amazons, who propp'd the ſtate,
Haply ſurviv'd the gen'ral fate.
Juſtice to Powis-Houſe is fled,
And Yorke ſuſtains her radiant head.
The virtue Fortitude appears
In open day at Ligonier's;
Illuſtrious heroine of the ſky,
Who leads to vanquiſh or to die!
'Twas ſhe our vet'rans breſts inſpir'd,
When Belgia's faithleſs ſons retir'd:
For Tournay's treach'rous tow'rs can tell
Britannia's children greatly ſell.

No partial virtue of the plain!
She rous'd the lions of the main:
Hence * Vernon's little fleet ſucceeds,
And hence the gen'rous † Cornwall bleeds!
Hence ‡ Greenville glorious!—for ſhe ſmil'd
On the young hero from a child.

* At Porto Bello.

† Against the combined fleets of France and Spain.

‡ Died in a later engagement with the French fleet.

Though in high life such virtues dwell,
 They'll suit plebeian breasts as well.
 Say, that the mighty and the great
 Blaze like meridian suns of state;
 Effulgent excellence display,
 Like Halifax, in floods of day;
 Our lesser orbs may pour their light,
 Like the mild crescent of the night.
 Though pale our beams, and small our sphere,
 Still we may shine serene and clear.

Give to the judge the scarlet gown,
 To martial souls the civic crown:
 What then? is merit theirs alone?
 Have we no worth to call our own?
 Shall we not vindicate our part,
 In the firm breast, and upright heart?
 Reader, these virtues may be thine,
 Though in superior light they shine.
 I can't discharge great Hardwick's trust—
 True—but my soul may still be just.
 And though I can't the state defend,
 I'll draw the sword to serve my friend.

Two golden Virtues are behind,
 Of equal import to the mind;
 Prudence, to point out Wisdom's way,
 Or to reclaim us when we stray;
 Temperance, to guard the youthful heart,
 When Vice and Folly throw the dart;
 Each Virtue, let the world agree,
 Daily resides with you and me.
 And when our souls in friendship join,
 We'll deem the social bond divine;
 Through ev'ry scene maintain our trust,
 Nor e'er be timid or unjust.
 That breast where Honour builds his throne,
 That breast which Virtue calls her own,
 Nor int'rest warps, nor fear appalls,
 When danger frowns, or lucre calls.
 No! the true friend collected stands,
 Fearless his heart, and pure his hands.
 Let int'rest plead, let storms arise,
 He dares be honest, though he dies.

MARRIAGE.

VISION VII.

*Inscribed to Miss ****.*

FAIREST, this vision is thy due,
 I form'd th' instructive plan for you.
 Slight not the rules of thoughtful age,
 Your welfare aduates every page;
 But ponder well my sacred theme,
 And tremble, while you read my dream.

Those awful words, "Till death do part,"
 May well alarm the youthful heart:
 No after-thought when once a wife;
 The die is cast, and cast for life;
 Yet thousands venture ev'ry day,
 As some base passion leads the way.
 Pert Silvia talks of wedlock-scenes,
 Though hardly enter'd on her teens;
 Smiles on her whining spark, and hears
 The fugar'd speech with raptur'd ears;
 Impatient of a parent's rule,
 She leaves her fire, and weds a fool.
 Want enters at the guardless door,
 And love is fled, to come no more.

Some few there are of fordid mould,
 Who barter youth and bloom for gold;
 Careless with what, or whom they mate,
 Their ruling passion's all for state.
 But Hymen, gen'rous, just, and kind,
 Abhors the mercenary mind:
 Such rebels groan beneath his rod,
 For Hymen's a vindictive god;
 Be joyless ev'ry night, he said,
 And barren be their nuptial bed.

Attend, my fair, to Wisdom's voice,
 A better fate shall crown thy choice.
 A married life, to speak the best,
 Is all a lottery contest:
 Yet if my fair one will be wife,
 I will insure my girl a prize;
 Though not a prize to match thy worth,
 Perhaps thy equal's not on earth.

'Tis an important point to know,
 There's no perfection here below.
 Man's an odd compound, after all,
 And ever has been since the fall.
 Say, that he loves you from his soul,
 Still man is proud, nor brooks controul.
 And though a slave in Love's soft school,
 In wedlock claims his right to rule.
 The best, in short, has faults about him,
 If few those faults, you must not flout him.
 With some, indeed, you can't dispense,
 As want of temper, and of sense.
 For when the sun deserts the skies,
 And the dull evening winters rise,
 Then for a husband's social pow'r,
 To form the calm, converseive hour;
 The treasures of thy breast explore,
 From that rich mine to draw the oar;
 Fondly each gen'rous thought refine,
 And give thy native gold to shine;
 Show thee, as really thou art,
 Though fair, yet fairer still at heart.

Say, when life's purple blossoms fade,
 As soon they must, thou charming maid;
 When in thy cheeks the roses die,
 And sickness clouds that brilliant eye;
 Say, when or age or pains invade,
 And those dear limbs shall call for aid;
 If thou art fetter'd to a fool,
 Shall not his transient passion cool?
 And when thy health and beauty end,
 Shall thy weak mate persist a friend?
 But to a man of sense, my dear,
 Ev'n then thou lovely shalt appear;
 He'll share the griefs that wound thy heart,
 And weeping claim the larger part;
 Though age impairs that beautiful face,
 He'll prize the pearl beyond its case.

In wedlock when the sexes meet,
 Friendship is only then complete.
 "Blest state! where souls each other draw,
 "Where love is liberty and law!"
 The choicest blessing found below,
 That man can wish, or Heaven bestow!
 Trust me, these raptures are divine,
 For lovely Chloe once was mine!
 Nor fear the varnish of my style,
 Though poet, I'm estrang'd to guile.
 Ah me! my faithful lips impart
 The genuine language of my heart!

When bards extol their patrons high,
Perhaps 'tis gold extorts the lie;
Perhaps the poor reward of bread—
But who burns incense to the dead?
He, whom a fond affection draws,
Careless of censure or applause;
Whose soul is upright and sincere,
With nought to wish, and nought to fear.

Now to my visionary scheme
Attend, and profit by my dream.
Amidst the slumbers of the night,
A stately temple 'rose to sight;
And ancient as the human race,
If nature's purposes you trace;
This fane, by all the wise rever'd,
To wedlock's pow'rful god was rear'd.
Hard by I saw a graceful sage,
His locks were frosted o'er by age;
His garb was plain, his mind serene,
And wisdom dignified his mien.
With curious search his name I sought,
And found 'twas Hymen's fav'rite—Thought.

Apace the giddy crowds advance,
And a lewd satyr led the dance:
I griev'd to see whole thousands run,
For oh! what thousands were undone!
'The sage, when these mad troops he spy'd,
In pity flew to join their side:
The disconcerted pairs began
To rail against him, to a man;
Vow'd they were strangers to his name,
Nor knew from whence the dotard came.

But mark the sequel—for this truth
Highly concerns impetuous youth:
Long ere the honey-moon could wane,
Perdition seiz'd on ev'ry twain;
At ev'ry house, and all day long,
Repentance ply'd her scorpion thong;
Disgust was there with frowning mien,
And every wayward child of Spleen.

Hymen approach'd his awful fane,
Attended by a num'rous train:
Love with each soft and nameless grace,
Was first in favour, and in place:
Then came the god with solemn gait,
Whose ev'ry word was big with fate;
His hand a flaming taper bore,
That sacred symbol, fam'd of yore:
Virtue, adorn'd with ev'ry charm,
Sustain'd the god's incumbent arm;
Beauty improv'd the glowing scene
With all the roses of eighteen:
Youth led the gaily-smiling fair,
His purple pinions wav'd in air:
Wealth, a close hunk, walk'd hobbling nigh,
With vulture-claw, and eagle-eye,
Who threescore years had seen or more,
('Tis said his coat had seen a score;)
Proud was the wretch, though clad in rags,
Presuming much upon his bags.

A female next her arts display'd,
Poets alone can paint the maid:
Trust me, Hogarth, (though great thy fame)
'Twould pose thy skill to draw the same;
And yet thy mimic pow'r is more
Than ever painter's was before:
Now she was fair as cygnet's down,
Now as Mat Prior's Emma, brown;

VOL. XI.

And, changing as the changing flow'r,
Her dress the vary'd ev'ry hour:
'Twas Fancy, child!—You know the fair,
Who pins your gown, and sets your hair.

Lo! the god mounts his throne of state,
And sits the arbiter of fate:
His head with radiant glories dress'd,
Gently reclin'd on Virtue's breast:
Love took his station on the right,
His quiver beam'd with golden light.
Beauty usurp'd the second place,
Ambitious of distinguish'd grace;
She claim'd this ceremonial joy,
Because related to the boy;
(Said it was her's to point his dart,
And speed its passage to the heart);
While on the god's inferior hand
Fancy and Wealth obtain'd their stand.

And now the hallow'd rites proceed,
And now a thousand heart-strings bleed.
I saw a blooming trembling bride,
A toothless lover join'd her side;
Averse the turn'd her weeping face,
And shudder'd at the cold embrace.

But various baits their force impart:
Thus titles lie at Celia's heart:
A passion much too foul to name,
Costs supercilious prudes their fame:
Prudes wed to publicans and sinners;
The hungry poet weds for dinners.

The god with frown indignant view'd
The rabble covetous or lewd;
By ev'ry vice his altars stain'd,
By ev'ry fool his rites profan'd:
When Love complain'd of Wealth aloud,
Affirming Wealth debauch'd the crowd;
Drew up in form his heavy charge,
Desiring to be heard at large.

The god consents, the throng divide,
The young espous'd the plaintive's side:
The old declar'd for the defendant,
For Age is Money's sworn attendant.

Love said, that wedlock was design'd
By gracious Heav'n to match the mind;
To pair the tender and the just,
And his the delegated trust:
That Wealth had play'd a knavish part,
And taught the tongue to wrong the heart;
But what avails the faithless voice?
The injur'd heart disdain the choice.—

Wealth strait reply'd, that Love was blind
And talk'd at random of the mind:
That killing eyes, and bleeding hearts,
And all th' artillery of darts,
Were long ago exploded fancies,
And laugh'd at even in romances.
Poets indeed style Love a treat,
Perhaps for want of better meat:
And Love might be delicious fare,
Cou'd we, like poets, live on air.
But grant that angels feast on Love,
(Though purer essences above)
Yet Albion's sons, he understood;
Prefer'd a more substantial food.
Thus while with gibes he dress'd his cause,
His gray admirers hemm'd applause.

With seeming conquest pert and proud,
Wealth shook his sides, and chuckled loud;

When Fortune, to restrain his pride,
And fond to favour Love beside,
Op'ning the miser's tape-ty'd vest,
Disclos'd the Cares which stung his breast:
Wealth stood abash'd at his disgrace,
And a deep crimson flush'd his face.

Love sweetly simper'd at the sight,
His gay adherents laugh'd outright.
'The god, though grave his temper, smil'd,
For Hymen dearly priz'd the child.
But he who triumphs o'er his brother,
In turn is laugh'd at by another.
Such cruel scores we often find
Repaid the criminal in kind.

For Poverty, that famish'd friend!
Ambitious of a wealthy friend,
Advanc'd into the Miser's place,
And star'd the stripling in the face;
Whose lips grew pale, and cold as clay;
I thought the chit would swoon away.

The god was studious to employ
His cares to aid the vanquish'd boy;
And therefore issu'd his decree,
That the two parties straight agree.
When both obey'd the god's commands,
And Love and Riches join'd their hands.

What wond'rous change in each was wrought,
Believe me, fair, surpasses thought.
If Love had many charms before,
He now had charms, ten thousand more.
If Wealth had serpents in his breast,
They now were dead, or lull'd to rest.

Beauty, that vain affected thing,
Who join'd the hymeneal ring,
Approach'd with round unthinking face,
And thus the trifler states her case.

She said, that Love's complaints, 'twas known
Exactly tally'd with her own;
That wealth had learn'd the felon's arts,
And robb'd her of a thousand hearts;
Desiring judgment against Wealth,
For falsehood, perjury, and stealth:
All which she could on oath depose,
And hop'd the court would slit his nose.

But Hymen, when he heard her name,
Call'd her an interloping dame;
Look'd through the crowd with angry state,
And blam'd the porter at the gate,
For giving entrance to the fair,
When she was no essential there.

To sink this haughty tyrant's pride,
He order'd Fancy to prelude.
Hence, when debates on beauty rise,
And each bright fair disputes the prize,
To Fancy's court we strait apply,
And wait the sentence of her eye;
In Beauty's realms she holds the seals,
And her awards preclude appeals.

LIFE.

VISION VIII.

LET not the young my precepts shun;
Who slight good counsels, are undone.
Your poet sung of Love's delights,
Of halcyon days and joyous nights;
To the gay fancy lovely themes;
And said I'd hope they're more than dreams.

But, if you please, before we part,
I'd speak a language to your heart.
We'll talk of Life, though much, I fear,
Th' ungrateful tale will wound your ear.
You raise your sanguine thoughts too high,
And hardly know the reason why:
But say Life's tree bears golden fruit,
Some canker shall corrode the root;
Some unexpected storm shall rise;
Or scorching suns, or chilling skies;
And (if experienc'd truths avail)
All your autumnal hopes shall fail.

"But, Poet, whence such wide extremes?"

"Well may you style your labours Dreams.

"A fon of sorrow thou, I ween,

"Whose visions are the brats of Spleen.

"Is blis a vague unmeaning name—

"Speak then the passions' use or aim;

"Why rage desires without controul,

"And rouseth such whirlwinds in the soul;

"Why Hope erects her tow'ring crest,

"And laughs, and riots in the breast?

"Think not, my weaker brain turns round,

"Think not, I tread on fairy ground.

"Think not, your pulse alone beats true—

"Mine makes as healthful music too.

"Our joys, when life's soft spring we trace,

"Put forth their early buds apace.

"See the bloom loads the tender shoot,

"The bloom conceals the future fruit.

"Yes, manhood's warm meridian sun

"Shall ripen what in spring begun.

"Thus infant roses, ere they blow,

"In germinating clusters grow;

"And only wait the summer's ray,

"To burst and blossom to the day."

What said the gay unthinking boy?—

Methought Hilario talk'd of joy!

Tell, if thou canst, whence joys arise,

Or what those mighty joys you prize,

You'll find (and trust superior years)

The vale of life a vale of tears.

Could Wisdom teach, where joys abound,

Or riches purchase them, when found,

Would scepter'd Solomon complain,

That all was fleeting, false, and vain?

Yet scepter'd Solomon could say,

Returning clouds obscur'd his day.

These maxims, which the preacher drew,

The royal sage experienc'd true.

He knew the various ills that wait

Our infant and meridian state;

That toys our earliest thoughts engage,

And diff'rent toys maturer age;

That grief at ev'ry stage appears,

But diff'rent griefs at diff'rent years;

That vanity is seen, in part,

Inscrib'd on ev'ry human heart;

In the child's breast the spark began,

Grows with his growth, and glares in man.

But when in life we journey late,

If follies die, do griefs abate?

Ah! what is Life at fourscore years?— [tears!]

One dark, rough road of sighs, groans, pains, and

Perhaps you'll think I act the same,

As a sly sharper plays his game:

You triumph ev'ry deal that's past,

He's sure to triumph at the last;

Who often wins some thousands more
Than twice the sum you won before.
But I'm a loser with the rest,
For Life is all a deal at best;
Where not the prize of wealth or fame,
Repays the trouble of the game;
(A truth no winner e'er deny'd,
An hour before that winner dy'd).
Not that with me these prizes shine,
For neither fame nor wealth are mine.
My cards!—a weak plebeian band,
With scarce an honour in my hand,
And, since my trumps are very few,
What have I more to boast than you!
Nor am I gainer by your fall!
That harlot Fortune bubbles all.

'Tis truth (receive it ill or well)
'Tis melancholy truth I tell.
Why should the preacher take your pence,
And smother truth to flatter sense?
I'm sure, physicians have no merit,
Who kill, through lenity of spirit.

That Life's a game, divines confess,
This says at cards, and that at chess:
But if our views be center'd here,
'Tis all a losing game, I fear.

Sailors, you know, when wars obtain,
And hostile vessels crowd the main,
If they discover from afar
A bark, as distant as a star,
Hold the perspective to their eyes,
To learn its colours, strength, and size;
And when this secret once they know,
Make ready to receive the foe.
Let you and I from sailors learn
Important truths of like concern:

I clos'd the day, as custom led,
With reading, till the time of bed;
Where Fancy, at the midnight hour,
Again display'd her magic pow'r,
(For know, that Fancy like a spright,
Prefers the silent scenes of night.)
She lodg'd me in a neighb'ring wood,
No matter where the thicket stood;
The genius of the place was nigh,
And held two pictures to my eye.
The curious painter had pourtray'd
Life in each just and genuine shade.
They, who have only known its dawn,
May think these lines too deeply drawn;
But riper years, I fear, will shew,
The wiser artist paints too true:

One piece presents a rüful wild,
Where not a summer's sun had smil'd:
The road with thorns is cover'd wide,
And Grief sits weeping by the side;
Her tears with constant tenor flow,
And form a mournful lake below;
Whose silent waters, dark and deep,
Through all the gloomy valley creep.

Passions that flatter, or that slay,
Are beasts that fawn, or birds that prey.
Here Vice assumes the serpent's shape;
There Folly personates the ape;
Here Av'rice gripes with harpies' claws;
There Malice grins with tygers' jaws;
While sons of mischief, Art and Guile,
Are alligators of the Nile.

Ev'n Pleasure acts a treach'rous part,
She charms the sense, but stings the heart;
And when she gulls us of our wealth,
Or that superior pearl, our health,
Restores us nought but pains and woe,
And drowns us in the lake below.

There a convinc'd angel stand,
With desolation in his hands!
He sends the all-devouring flame,
And cities hardly boast a name:
Or wings the pestilential blast,
And lo! ten thousands breathe their last:
He speaks—obedient tempests roar,
And guilty nations are no more:
He speaks—the fury Discord raves,
And sweeps whole armies to their graves:
Or Famine lifts her mildew'd hand,
And Hunger howls through all the land.

Oh! what a wretch is man, I cry'd,
Expos'd to death on ev'ry side!
And sure as born, to be undone
By evils which he cannot shun!
Besides a thousand baits to sin,
A thousand traitors lodg'd within!
For soon as Vice assaults the heart,
The rebels take the demon's part.

I sigh, my aching bosom bleeds;
When strait the milder plan succeeds.
The lake of tears, the dreary shore,
The same as in the piece before.
But gleams of light are here display'd,
To cheer the eye and gild the shade.
Affliction speaks a softer style,
And Disappointment wears a smile.
A group of Virtues blossom near,
Their roots improve by ev'ry year.

Here Patience, gentle maid! is nigh,
To calm the storm, and wipe the eye;
Hope acts the kind physician's part,
And warms the solitary heart;
Religion nobler comfort brings,
Disarms our griefs, or blunts their stings;
Points out the balance on the whole,
And Heav'n rewards the struggling soul:

But while these raptures I pursue,
The genius suddenly withdrew.

DEATH:

VISION IX.

'Tis thought my Visions are too grave*;
A proof I'm no designing knave.
Perhaps if Int'rest held the scales,
I had devis'd quite different tales;
Had join'd the laughing low buffoon,
And scribbled satire and lampoon;
Or stir'd each source of soft desire,
And fann'd the coals of wanton fire;
Then had my paltry Visions sold,
Yes, all my dreams had turn'd to gold;
Had prov'd the darlings of the town,
And I—a poet of renown!

Let not my awful theme surprise,
Let no unnially fears arise.

* See the Monthly Review of New Books, for February 1751.

I wear no melancholy hue,
 No wreaths of cypress or of yew.
 The shroud, the coffin, pall, or herse,
 Shall ne'er deform my softer verse:
 Let me consign the fun'ral plume,
 The herald's paint, the sculptur'd tomb,
 And all the solemn farce of graves,
 To undertakers and their slaves.

You know, that moral writers say
 The world's a stage, and life a play;
 That in this drama to succeed,
 Requires much thought, and toil indeed!
 There still remains one labour more,
 Perhaps a greater than before.

Indulge the search, and you shall find
 The harder task is still behind;
 That harder task, to quit the stage
 In early youth, or riper age;
 To leave the company and place,
 With firmness, dignity, and grace.

Come, then, the closing scenes survey,
 'Tis the last act which crowns the play,
 Do well this grand decisive part,
 And gain the plaudit of your heart.
 Few greatly live in Wisdom's eye—
 But oh! how few who greatly die!
 Who, when their days approach an end,
 Can meet the foe, as friend meets friend.

Instructive heroes! tell us whence
 Your noble scorn of flesh and sense!
 You part from all we prize so dear,
 Nor drop one soft reluctant tear:
 Part from those tender joys of life,
 The friend, the parent, child, and wife.
 Death's black and stormy gulf you brave,
 And ride exulting on the wave;
 Deem thrones but trifles all!—no more—
 Nor send one wishful look to shore.

For foreign ports and lands unknown,
 Thus the firm sailor leaves his own;
 Obedient to the rising gale,
 Unmoors his bark, and spreads his sail;
 Defies the ocean, and the wind,
 Nor mourns the joys he leaves behind.

Is Death a pow'rful monarch? True—
 Perhaps you dread the tyrant too!
 Fear, like a fog, precludes the light,
 Or swells the object to the sight.
 Attend my visionary page,
 And I'll disarm the tyrant's rage.
 Come, let this ghastly form appear,
 He's not so terrible when near.
 Distance deludes th' unwary eye,
 So clouds seem monsters in the sky:
 Hold frequent converse with him now,
 He'll daily wear a milder brow.
 Why is my theme with terror fraught?
 Because you shun the frequent thought.
 Say, when the captive pard is nigh,
 Whence thy pale cheek and frighted eye?
 Say, why disinay'd thy manly breast,
 When the grim lion shakes his crest?
 Because these savage fights are new—
 No keeper shudders at the view.
 Keepers, accusom'd to the scene,
 Approach the dens with look serene,
 Fearless their grisly charge explore,
 And smile to hear the tyrants roar.

“Ay—but to die! to bid adieu!
 “An everlasting farewell too!
 “Farewel to ev'ry joy around!
 “Oh! the heart sickens at the sound!”
 Stay, stripling—thou art poorly taught—
 Joy didst thou say?—discard the thought.
 Joys are a rich celestial fruit,
 And scorn a subluxary root.

What wears the face of joy below,
 Is often found but splendid woe.
 Joys here, like unsubstantial fame,
 Are nothings with a pompous name;
 Or else, like comets in the sphere,
 Shine with destruction in their rear.

Passions, like clouds, obscure the light,
 Hence mortals seldom judge aright.
 The world's a harsh unfruitful soil,
 Yet still we hope, and still we toil:
 Deceive ourselves with wond'rous art,
 And disappointment wrings the heart.

Thus when a mist collects around,
 And hovers o'er a barren ground,
 The poor deluded trav'ler spies
 Imagin'd trees and structures rise;
 But when the shrouded sun is clear,
 The desert and the rocks appear.

“Ah—but when youthful blood runs high,

“Sure 'tis a dreadful thing to die!

“To die! and what exalts the gloom,

“I'm told that man survives the tomb!

“O! can the learned prelate find

“What future scenes await the mind?

“Where wings the soul, dislodg'd from clay?

“Some courteous angel point the way!

“That unknown somewhere in the skies!

“Say, where that unknown somewhere lies;

“And kindly prove, when life is o'er,

“That pains and sorrows are no more.

“For doubtless dying is a curse,

“If present ills be chang'd for worse.”

Hush, my young friend, forego the theme,
 And listen to your poet's dream.

Ere-while I took an evening walk,
 Honorio join'd in social talk.

Along the lawns the zephyrs sweep,
 Each ruder wind was lull'd asleep.

The sky, all beauteous to behold,
 Was streak'd with azure, green, and gold;

But, though serenely soft and fair,
 Fever hung brooding in the air;

Then settled on Honorio's breast,
 Which shudder'd at the fatal guest.

No drugs the kindly will fulfil,
 Disease eludes the doctor's skill.

The poison spreads through all the frame,
 Ferments, and kindles into flame.

From side to side Honorio turns,
 And now with thirst insatiate burns.

His eyes resign their wonted grace,
 Those friendly lamps expire apace!

The brain's an useless organ grown,
 And Reason tumbled from his throne.—

But while the purple surges glow,
 The currents thicken as they flow;

The blood in ev'ry distant part
 Stagnates and disappoints the heart;

Defrauded of its crimson store,
 The vital engine plays no more.

Honorio dead, the fun'ral bell
Call'd ev'ry friend to bid farewell.
I join'd the melancholy bier,
And dropp'd the unavailing tear.

The clock struck twelve—when nature fought
Repose from all the pangs of thought;
And while my limbs were sunk to rest,
A vision sooth'd my troubled breast.

I dream'd the spectre Death appear'd,
I dream'd his hollow voice I heard!
Methought th' imperial tyrant wore
A state no prince assum'd before.

All nature fetch'd a gen'ral groan,
And lay expiring round his throne.
I gaz'd—when strait arose to fight
The most detested fiend of night.
He shuffled with unequal pace,
And conscious shame deform'd his face.

With jealous leer he fainted round,
Or fix'd his eyes upon the ground.
From hell this frightful monster came,
Sin was his fire, and Guilt his name.
This fury, with officious care,
Waited around the sov'reign's chair;
In robes of terrors dress'd the king,
And arm'd him with a baneful sting;

Gave fierceness to the tyrant's eye,
And hung the sword upon his thigh.
Diseases next, a hideous crowd!
Proclaim'd their master's empire loud;
And, all obedient to his will,
Flew in commission'd troops to kill.
A rising whirlwind shakes the poles,
And lightning glares, and thunder rolls.

The monarch and his train prepare
To range the foul tempestuous air.
Strait to his shoulders he applies
Two pinions of enormous size!
Methought I saw the ghastly form
Stretch his black wings, and mount the storm.
When Fancy's airy horse I strode,
And join'd the army on the road,
As the grim conqueror urg'd his way,
He scatter'd terror and dismay.
Thousands a pensive aspect wore,
Thousands who sneer'd at Death before.
Life's records rise on ev'ry side,
And Conscience spreads those volumes wide;

Which faithful registers were brought
By pale-ey'd Fear and busy Thought.
Those faults which artful men conceal,
Stand here engrav'd with pen of steel,
By Conscience, that impartial scribe!
Whose honest palm disdains a bribe.
Their actions all like critics view,
And all like faithful critics too.
As guilt had stain'd life's various stage,
What tears of blood bedew'd the page!
All shudder'd at the black account,
And scarce believ'd the vast amount!
All vow'd a sudden change of heart;
Would Death relent, and sheath his dart.
But, when the awful foe withdrew,
All to their follies fled anew.

So when a wolf, who scours at large,
Springs on the shepherd's fleecy charge,
The flock in wild disorder fly,
And cast behind a frequent eye;

But, when the victim's borne away,
They rush to pasture and to play.

Indulge my dream, and let my pen
Paint those unmeaning creatures, men.

Carus, with pains and sickness worn,
Chides the slow night, and sighs for morn;
Soon as he views the eastern ray,
He mourns the quick return of day;
Hourly laments protracted breath,
And courts the healing hand of Death.

Verres, oppress'd with guilt and shame,
Shipwreck'd in fortune, health, and fame,
Pines for his dark sepulchral bed,
To mingle with th' unheeded dead.

With fourscore years gray Natho bends,
A burden to himself and friends,
And with impatience seems to wait
The friendly hand of ling'ring fate.
So hirelings wish their labour done,
And often eye the western sun.

The monarch bears their various grief,
Descends, and brings the wish'd relief,
On Death with wild surprize they star'd;
All seem'd averse! All unprepar'd!

As torrents sweep with rapid force,
The grave's pale chief pursu'd his course.
No human pow'r can or withstand,
Or shun the conquests of his hand.

Oh! could the prince of upright mind,
And, as a guardian angel, kind,
With ev'ry heart-felt worth beside,
Turn the keen shaft of Death aside,
When would the brave Augustus join
The ashes of his sacred line?

But Death maintains no partial war,
He mocks a sultan or a czar.
He lays his iron hand on all—
Yes, kings, and sons of kings must fall!
A truth Britannia lately felt,
And trembled to her centre *!—

Could ablest statesmen ward the blow,
Would Granville own this common foe?
For greater talents ne'er were known
To grace the fav'rite of a throne.

Could genius save—wit, learning, fire—
Tell me, would Chesterfield expire?
Say, would his glorious sun decline,
And set like your pale star or mine?

Could ev'ry virtue of the sky—
Would Herring†, Butler‡, Secker§ die?
Why this address to peerage all—
Untitled Allen's virtues call!

If Allen's worth demands a place,
Lords, with your leave, 'tis no disgrace.
Though high your ranks in heralds' rolls,
Know Virtue too ennobles souls.
By her that private man's renown'd,
Who pours a thousand blessings round.
While Allen takes Affliction's part,
And draws out all his gen'rous heart;
Anxious to seize the fleeting day,
Lest unimprov'd it steal away;

* Referring to the death of his late Royal Highness
Frederic Prince of Wales.

† Archbishop of Canterbury.

‡ Late Bishop of Durham.

§ Bishop of Oxford.

While thus he walks with jealous strife
Through goodness, as he walks through life,
Shall not I mark his radiant path?—
Rife, muse, and sing the Man of Bath!
Publish abroad, could goodness save,
Allen would disappoint the grave;
'Translated to the heav'nly shore,
Like Enoch, when his walk was o'er.

Not Beauty's pow'ful pleas restrain—
Her pleas are trifling, weak, and vain;
For women pierce with shrieks the air,
Smite their bare breasts, and rend their hair.
All have a doleful tale to tell,
How friends, sons, daughters, husbands fell!

Alas! is life our fav'rite theme!
'Tis all a vain, or painful dream.
A dream which fools or cowards prize,
But slighted by the brave or wise.
Who lives, for others' ills must groan,
Or bleed for sorrows of his own;
Must journey on with weeping eye,
Then pant, sink, agonize, and die.

And shall a man arraign the skies,
Because man lives, and mourns, and dies?
Impatient reptile! Reason cry'd;
Arraign thy passion and thy pride.
Retire, and commune with thy heart,
Ask, whence thou cam'st, and what thou art.
Explore thy body and thy mind,
Thy station too, why here assign'd.
The search shall teach thee life to prize,
And make thee grateful, good, and wise.
Why do you roam to foreign climes,
To study nations, modes, and times;
A science often dearly bought,
And often what avails you nought?
Go, man, and act a wiser part,
Study the science of your heart.

This home philosophy, you know,
Was priz'd some thousand years ago*.
Then why abroad a frequent guest?
Why such a stranger to your breast?
Why turn for many volumes o'er,
Till Doddsley can supply no more?
Not all the volumes on thy shelf,
Are worth that single volume, Self.
For who this sacred book declines,
Howe'er in other arts he shines;
Though smit with Pindar's noble rage,
Or yers'd in Tully's manly page;
Though deeply read in Plato's school;
With all his knowledge is a fool.

Proclaim the truth—say, what is man?
His body from the dust began;
And when a few short years are o'er,
The crumbling fabric is no more.

But whence the soul? From heav'n it came!
Oh! prize this intellectual flame.
This nobler Self with rapture scan,
'Tis mind alone which makes the man.
Trust me, there's not a joy on earth,
But from the soul derives its birth.
Ask the young rake (he'll answer right)
Who treats by day, and drinks by night,
What makes his entertainments shine,
What gives the relish to his wine;

* KNOW THYSELF—a celebrated saying of Crito, one of the seven wise men of Greece.

He'll tell thee (if he scorns the beast),
That social pleasures form the feast.
The charms of beauty too shall cloy,
Unless the soul exalts the joy.
The mind must animate the face,
Or cold and tasteless ev'ry grace.

What! must the soul her pow'rs dispense
To raise and swell the joys of sense?—
Know too, the joys of sense controul,
And clog the motions of the soul;
Forbid her pinions to aspire,
Damp and impair her native fire:
And sure as Sense (that tyrant)! reigns,
She holds the empress, Soul, in chains,
Inglorious bondage to the mind,
Heaven-born, sublime, and unconfin'd!
She's independent, fair, and great,
And justly claims a large estate;
She asks no borrow'd aids to shine,
She boasts within a golden mine;
But, like the treasures of Peru,
Her wealth lies deep and far from view.
Say, shall the man who knows her worth,
Debase her dignity and birth;
Or e'er repine at Heaven's decree,
Who kindly gave her leave to be;
Call'd her from nothing into day,
And built her tenement of clay?
Hear and accept me for your guide,
(Reason shall ne'er desert your side).
Who listens to my wifer voice,
Can't but applaud his Maker's choice;
Pleas'd with that First and Sovereign Cause,
Pleas'd with unerring Wisdom's laws;
Secure, since Sovereign Goodness reigns,
Secure, since Sovereign Pow'er obtains.

With curious eyes review thy frame,
This science shall direct thy claim.
Dost thou indulge a double view,
A long, long life, and happy too?
Perhaps a farther boon you crave—
To lie down easy in the grave!
Know then my dictates must prevail,
Or surely each fond wish shall fail—

Come then, is happiness thy aim?
Let mental joys be all thy game.

Repeat the search, and mend your pace,
The capture shall reward the chase.
Let ev'ry minute, as it springs,
Convey fresh knowledge on its wings;
Let ev'ry minute, as it flies,
Record thee good as well as wise.
While such pursuits your thoughts engage,
In a few years you'll live an age.
Who measures life by rolling years?
Fools measure by revolving spheres.
Go thou, and fetch th' unerring rule
From Virtue's, and from Wisdom's school.
Who well improves life's shortest day,
Will scarce regret its setting ray;
Contented with his share of light,
Nor fear nor wish th' approach of night.
And when disease assaults the heart,
When Sickness triumphs over art,
Reflections on a life well past,
Shall prove a cordial to the last;
This medicine shall the soul sustain,
And soften or suspend her pain;

Shall break Death's fell tyrannic pow'r,
 And calm the troubled dying hour,
 Blest rules of cool prudential age!
 I listen'd, and rever'd the sage.
 When lo! a form divinely bright
 Descends and bursts upon my sight,
 A seraph of illustrious birth:
 (Religion was her name on earth)
 Supremely sweet her radiant face,
 And blooming with celestial grace!
 Three shining cherubs form'd her train,
 Wav'd their light wings, and reach'd the plain;
 Faith, with sublime and piercing eye,
 And pinions fluttering for the sky;
 Here Hope, that smiling angel stands,
 And golden anchors grace her hands:
 There Charity, in robes of white,
 Fairest and fav'rite maid of light!

The seraph spake—'tis Reason's part,
 To govern and to guard the heart;
 To lull the wayward soul to rest,
 When hopes and fears distract the breast.
 Reason may calm this doubtful strife,
 And steer thy bark through various life:
 But when the storms of death are nigh,
 And midnight darkness veils the sky,
 Shall Reason then direct thy sail,
 Disperse the clouds, or sink the gale?
 Stranger, this skill alone is mine,
 Skill! that transcends his scanty line.

That hoary sage has counsell'd right—
 Be wise, nor scorn his friendly light.
 Revere thyself—thou'rt near ally'd
 To angels on thy better side.
 How various e'er their ranks or kinds,
 Angels are but unbodied minds;
 When the partition walls decay.
 Men emerge angels from their clay.
 Yes, when the frailer body dies,
 The soul asserts her kindred skies.
 But minds, though sprung from heav'nly race,
 Must first be tutor'd for the place.
 (The joys above are understood,
 And relish'd only by the good),
 Who shall assume this guardian care?
 Who shall secure their birthright there?
 Souls are my charge—to me 'tis giv'n
 To train them for their native heav'n.

Know then—Who bow the early knee,
 And give the willing heart to me;
 Who wifely, when temptation waits,
 Elude her frauds, and spurn her baits;
 Who dare to own my injur'd cause,
 (Though fools deride my sacred laws);
 Or scorn to deviate to the wrong,
 Though persecution lifts her throng;
 Though all the sons of hell conspire
 To raise the stake, and light the fire;
 Know, that for such superior souls,
 There lies a bliss beyond the poles;
 Where spirits shine with purer ray,
 And brighten to meridian day;
 Where love, where boundless friendship rules,
 (No friends that change, no love that cools)!

Where rising floods of knowledge roll,
 And pour and pour upon the soul!
 But where's the passage to the skies?—
 The road through Death's black valley lies.
 Nay, do not shudder at my tale—
 Though dark the shades, yet safe the vale.
 This path the best of men have trod;
 And who'd decline the road to God?
 Oh! 'tis a glorious boon to die!

This favour can't be priz'd too high,
 While thus she spake, my looks express'd
 The raptures kindling in my breast:
 My soul a fix'd attention gave;
 When the stern monarch of the grave
 With haughty strides approach'd—Amaz'd
 I stood, and trembled as I gaz'd.
 The seraph calm'd each anxious fear,
 And kindly wip'd the falling tear;
 Then hasted with expanded wing
 To meet the pale terrific king.
 But now what milder scenes arise?
 The tyrant drops his hostile guise.
 He seems a youth divinely fair,
 In graceful ringlets waves his hair.
 His wings their whitening plumes display,
 His burnish'd plumes reflect the day.
 Light flows his shining azure vest,
 And all the angel stands confest.

I view'd the change with sweet surprise,
 And oh! I panted for the skies;
 Thank'd Heav'n that e'er I drew my breath,
 And triumph'd in the thoughts of death.

FABLES.

The Advantages of Application and Diligence in our earlier Years, and the destructive Consequences of Pride and Cruelty.

FABLE I.

THE BEE, THE ANT, AND THE SPARROW.

My dears, 'tis said in days of old,
 That beasts could talk, and birds could scold,

But now it seems the human race
 Alone engross the speaker's place.
 Yet lately, if report be true,
 (And much the tale relates to you)
 There met a sparrow, ant, and bee,
 Which reason'd and convers'd as we.
 Who reads my page will doubtless grant,
 That Phe's the wile industrious ant.
 And all with half an eye may see,
 That Kitty is the busy bee.

Here then are two—But where's the third?
Go search your school, you'll find the bird.
Your school! I ask your pardon, fair,
I'm sure you'll find no sparrow there.

Now to my tale.—One Summer's morn
A bee rang'd o'er the verdant lawn;
Studious to husband every hour,
And make the most of ev'ry flow'r.
Nimble from stalk to stalk she flies,
And loads with yellow wax her thighs;
With which the artists builds her comb,
And keeps all tight and warm at home;
Or from the cowslip's golden bells
Sucks honey to enrich her cells;
Or every tempting rose pursues,
Or sips the lily's fragrant dews,
Yet never robs the shining bloom,
Or of its beauty or perfume.
Thus she discharg'd in every way,
The various duties of the day.

It chanc'd a frugal ant was near,
Whose brow was furrow'd o'er by care:
A great economist was she,
Nor less industrious than the bee:
By pensive parents often taught
What ills arise from want of thought;
That poverty on sloth depends,
On poverty the loss of friends.
Hence every day the ant is found
With anxious step to tread the ground:
With curious search to trace the grain,
And drag the heavy load with pain.

The active bee with pleasure saw
The ant fulfil her parents law.
Ah! sister-labourer, says she,
How very fortunate are we!
Who taught in infancy to know,
The comforts which from labour flow,
Are independent of the great,
Nor know the wants of pride and state.
Why is our food so very sweet?
Because we earn before we eat.
Why are our wants so very few?
Because we nature's calls pursue,
Whence our complacency of mind?
Because we act our parts assign'd.
Have we incessant tasks to do?
Is not all nature busy too?
Doth not the sun with constant pace
Persist to run his annual race?
Do not the stars which shine so bright,
Renew their courses every night?
Doth not the ox obedient bow
His patient neck, and draw the plough?
Or when did e'er the generous steed
Withhold his labour or his speed?
If you all nature's system scan,
The only idle thing is man.

A wanton sparrow long'd to hear
This sage discourse, and strait drew near.
The bird was talkative and loud,
And very pert, and very proud;
As worthless and as vain a thing
Perhaps as ever wore a wing.
She found, as on a spray the fat,
The little friends were deep in chat;
That virtue was their favourite theme,
And toil and probity their scheme;

Such talk was hateful to her breast,
She thought them arrant prudes at best.
When to display her naughty mind,
Hunger with cruelty combin'd;
She view'd the ant with savage eyes,
And hopt and hopt to snatch her prize.
The bee, who watch'd her opening bill,
And guess'd her fell design to kill;
Ask'd her from what her anger rose,
And why she treated ants as foes?

The sparrow her reply began,
And thus the conversation ran:
Whene'er I am dispos'd to dine,
I think the whole creation mine;
That I'm a bird of high degree,
And every insect made for me.
Hence oft I search the emmet brood,
For emmets are delicious food.
And oft in wantonness and play,
I slay ten thousand in a day:
For truth it is, without disguise,
That I love mischief as my eyes.

Oh! fie, the honest bee reply'd,
I fear you make base man your guide.
Of every creature sure the worst,
Though in creation's scale the first!
Ungrateful man! 'tis strange he thrives,
Who burns the bees to rob their hives!
I hate his vile administration,
And so do all the emmet nation.
What fatal foes to birds are men,
Quite from the eagle to the wren!
Oh! do not mens example take,
Who mischief do for mischief's sake;
But spare the ant—her worth demands
Esteem and friendship at your hands.
A mind with every virtue blest,
Must raise compassion in your breast.

Virtue! rejoind' the sneering bird,
Where did you learn that Gothic word?
Since I was hatch'd I never heard
That virtue was at all rever'd,
But say it was the ancients' claim,
Yet moderns disavow the name.
Unless, my dear, you read romances,
I cannot reconcile your fancies.
Virtue in fairy tales is seen
To play the goddess or the queen;
But what's a queen without the pow'r,
Or beauty, child, without a dow'r?
Yet this is all that virtue brags;
At best 'tis only worth in rags.
Such whims my very heart derides,
Indeed you make me burst my sides.
Trust me, Mill's Bee—to speak the truth,
I've copied man from earliest youth;
The same our taste, the same our school,
Passion and appetite our rule:
And call me bird, or call me finner,
I'll ne'er forego my sport or dinner.
A prowling cat the miscreant spies,
And wide expands her amber eyes.
Near and more near Grimalkin draws,
She wags her tail, pretends her paws;
Then springing on her thoughtless prey,
She bore the vicious bird away.
Thus in her cruelty and pride,
The wicked, wanton sparrow dy'd.

That true Virtue consists in Action, and not in Speculation.

FABLE II.

THE SCHOLAR AND THE CAT.

LABOUR entitles man to eat,
The idle have no claim to meat.
This rule must every station fit,
Because 'tis drawn from sacred writ.
And yet to feed on such condition,
Almost amounts to prohibition.
Rome's priesthood would be doom'd, I fear,
To eat soup maigre all the year.
And would not Oxford's cloister'd son
By this hard statute be undone?
In truth, your poet, were he fed
No oft'ner than he earns his bread,
The vengeance of this law would feel,
And often go without a meal.
It seem'd a scholar and his cat
Together join'd in social chat.
When thus the letter'd sage began—
Of what vast consequence is man!
Lords of this nether globe we shine,
Our tenure's held by right divine.
Here independence waves its plea,
All creatures bow the vassal knee.
Nor earth alone can bound our reign,
Ours is the empire of the main.

True—man's a sovereign prince—but say,
What art sustains the monarch's sway,
Say from what source we fetch supplies,
'Tis here the grand inquiry lies.
Strength is not man's—for strength must suit
Best with the structure of a brute.
Nor craft nor cunning can suffice,
A fox might then dispute the prize.
To godlike reason 'tis we owe
Our ball and sceptre here below.

Now your associate next explains
To whom precedence appertains.
And sure 'tis easy to divine
The leaders of this royal line.
Note that all tradesmen I attend
But petty princes at the best.
Superior excellence you'll find
In those who cultivate the mind.
Hence heads of colleges, you'll own,
Transcends th' assessors of a throne.
Say, Evans, have you any doubt?
You can't offend by speaking out.

With visage placid and sedate,
Puffs thus address'd her learned mate:
We're told that none in nature's plan
Disputes preeminence with man.
But this is still a dubious case
To me, and all our purring race.
We grant indeed to partial eyes
Men may appear supremely wise.
But our sagacious rabbies hold,
That all which glitters is not gold.
Pray, if your haughty claims be true,
Why are our manners ap'd by you?
Whene'er you think, all cats agree,
You shut your optics just as we.

Pray, why like cats so rapt in thought,
If you by cats were never taught?
But know our tabby schools maintain
Worth is not center'd in the brain.
Nor that our sages thought despise—
No—but in action virtue lies.
We find it by experience fact,
That thought must ripen into act;
Or cat no real fame acquires,
But virtue in the bud expires.
This point your orchard can decide—
Observe its gay autumnal pride.
For trees are held in high repute,
Not for their blossoms, but their fruit.
If so, then Millar's page decrees
Mere scholars to be barren trees.
But if these various reasons fail,
Let my example once prevail.

When to your chamber you repair,
Your property employs my care.
And while you sink in sweet repose,
My faithful eyelids never close.
When hunger prompts the mouse to steal,
Then I display my honest zeal;
True to my charge, these talons seize
The wretch, who dares purloin your cheese.
Or should the thief assault your bread,
I strike the audacious felon dead.

Nor say I spring at smaller game—
My prowess slaughter'd rats proclaim.
I'm told your generals often fly,
When danger, and when death is nigh.
Nay, when nor death nor danger's near,
As your court-martials make appear.
When in your service we engage,
We brave the pilfering villain's rage;
Ne'er take advantage of the night,
To meditate inglorious flight;
But stand resolv'd, when foes defy,
To conquer, or to bravely die.

Hence, bookworm, learn our duty here
Is active life in every sphere.
Know too, there's scarce a brute but can Instruct vain supercilious man.

That our Fortitude and Perseverance should be proportionate to the Degree and Duration of our Sufferings.

FABLE III.

NEPTUNE AND THE MARINERS.

WHEN sore calamities we feel,
And sorrow treads on sorrow's heel,
Our courage and our strength, we say,
Are insufficient for the day.
Thus man's a poor dejected elf,
Who fain would run away from self.
Yet turn to Germany, you'll find
An Atlas of a human mind!
But here I deviate from my plan,
For Prussia's king is more than man!
Inferior beings suit my rhyme,
My scheme, my genius, and my time;
Men, birds, and beasts, with now and then
A pagan god to grace my pen.

A vessel bound for India's coast,
The merchants confidence and boast,
Puts forth to sea—the gentle deep
Bespeaks its boisterous god asleep.
Three cheerful shouts the sailors gave,
And zephyrs curl the shining wave.
A halcyon sky prevails a while,
The tritons and the nereids smile.
These omens fairest hopes impress,
And half ensure the George success.

What casual ills these hopes destroy !
To change how subject every joy !
When dangers most remote appear,
Experience proves those dangers near.
Thus, boast of health when'er you please,
Health is next neighbour to disease.
'Tis prudence to suspect a foe,
And fortitude to meet the blow.
In wisdom's rank he stands the first,
Who stands prepar'd to meet the worst.

For lo! unnumber'd clouds arise,
The fable legions spread the skies.
The storm around the vessel raves,
The deep displays a thousand graves.
With active hands and fearless hearts
The sailors play their various parts ;
They ply the pumps, they furl the sails,
Yet nought their diligence avails.
The tempest thickens every hour,
And mocks the feats of human pow'r.

The sailors now their fate deplore,
Estrang'd to every fear before.
With wild surprise their eye-balls glare,
Their honest breasts admit despair.
All further efforts they decline,
At once all future hopes resign ;
And thus abandoning their skill,
They give the ship to drive at will.

Strait enter'd with majestic grace,
A form of more than human race,
The god an azure mantle wore,
His hand a forked sceptre bore ;
When thus the monarch of the main—

How dare you deem your labours vain ?
Shall man exert himself the less,
Because superior dangers press ?
How can I think your hearts sincere,
Unless you bravely persevere ?

Know, mortals, that when perils rise,
Perils enhance the glorious prize.
But, who deserts himself, shall be
Deserted by the gods and me.
Hence to your charge, and do your best,
My trident shall do all the rest.

The mariners their task renew,
All to their destin'd province flew.
The winds are hush'd—the sea subsides,
The gallant George in safety rides.

The Folly of passing a hasty and derogatory Judgment upon the noxious Animals of the Creation.

FABLE IV.

THE BEAU AND THE VIPER.

ALL wise philosophers maintain
Nature created nought in vain.

Yet some with supercilious brow,
Deny the truth asserted now.
What if I show that only man,
Appears defective in the plan !
Say, will the sceptic lay aside
His sneers, his arrogance, and pride ?

A beau imported fresh from France,
Whose study was to dress and dance ;
Who had betimes, in Gallia's school,
Grafted the coxcomb on the fool ;
Approach'd a wood one Summer's day,
To screen him from the scorching ray.
And as he travers'd through the grove,
Schening of gallantry and love,
A viper's spiry folds were seen,
Sparkling with azure, gold and green ;
The beau indignant, weak, and proud,
With transport thus exclaim'd aloud—
Avaunt, detested fiend of night !

Thou torture to the human sight !
To every reptile a disgrace,
And fatal to our godlike race.
Why were such creatures form'd as you,
Unless to prove my doctrine true ;
That when we view this nether sphere,
Nor wisdom nor design appear ?

The serpent rais'd his angry crest,
An honest zeal inflam'd his breast.
His hissings struck the fopling's ear,
And shook his very soul with fear.
Inglorious wretch ! the viper cries,
How dare you broach infernal lies ?
Is there, in all creation's chain,
A link so worthless and so vain ?
Grant that your dress were truly thine,
How can your gold compare with mine ?
Your vestments are of garter hue,
Mine boast a far superior blue.

You style me reptile in contempt,
You are that very reptile meant ;
A two-legg'd thing which crawls on earth,
Void of utility and worth.

You call me fatal to your race—
Was ever charge so false and base ?
You can't in all your annals find,
That unprovok'd we hurt mankind.
Uninjur'd men in mischief deal,
We only bite the hostile heel.

Do we not yield our lives to feed,
And save your vile distemper'd breed ?
When leprosy pollutes your veins,
Do not we purge the loathsome stains ?
When riot and excess prevail,
And health, and strength, and spirits fail ;
Doctors from us their aid derive,
Hence penitential rakes revive.
We bleed to make the catiffs dine *
Or down to medicate their wine.

You ask, my poison to what end ?
Minute philosopher, attend.
Nature, munificent and wise,
To all our wants adapts supplies.
Our frames are fitted to our need,
Hence greyhounds are endu'd with speed.

* Upon some occasion vipers are dressed, and served to table as eels.

Lions by force their prey subdue,
 By force maintain their empire too:
 But power, although the lion's fame,
 Was never known the viper's claim.
 Observe, when I unroll my length—
 Say, is my structure form'd for strength?
 Doth not celerity imply
 Or legs to run, or wings to fly?
 My jaws are constituted weak,
 Hence poison lurks behind my cheek.
 As lightning quick my fangs convey
 This liquid to my wounded prey.
 The venom thus ensures my bite,
 For wounds preclude the victim's flight.
 But why this deadly juice, you cry,
 To make the wretched captive die?
 Why not possess'd of stronger jaws,
 Or arm'd like savage brutes with claws?

Can such weak arguments persuade?
 Ask rather, why were vipers made?
 To me my poison's more than wealth,
 And to ungrateful mortals health.
 In this benevolent design
 My various organs all combine.
 Strike out the poison from my frame,
 My system were no more the same.
 I then should want my comforts due,
 Nay, lose my very being too:
 And you'd, as doctors all agree,
 A sovereign medicine lose in me.

Now learn, 'tis arrogance in man,
 To censure what he cannot scan.
 Nor dare to charge God's works with ill,
 Since vipers kind designs fulfil:
 But give injurious scruples o'er,
 Be still, be humble, and adore.

*That Happiness is much more equally distributed,
 than the generality of Mankind are apprised of.*

FABLE V.

THE SNAIL AND THE GARDENER.

WHEN sons of fortune ride on high,
 How do we point the admiring eye!
 With foolish face of wonder gaze,
 And often cover what we praise.
 How do we partial nature chide,
 As deaf to every son beside!
 Or censure the mistaken dame,
 As if her optics were to blame!
 Thus we deem nature most unkind,
 Or what's as bad, we deem her blind.
 But when inferior ranks we see,
 Who move in humbler spheres than we;
 Men by comparisons are taught,
 Nature is not so much in fault.
 Yet mark my tale—the poet's pen
 Shall vindicate her ways to men.

Within a garden, far from town,
 There dwelt a snail of high renown;
 Who by tradition, as appears,
 Had been a tenant several years.
 She spent her youth in wisdom's page—
 Hence honour'd and rever'd in age.
 Do snails at any time contend,
 Insult a neighbour or a friend;

Dispute their property, and share,
 Or in a cherry or a pear?
 No lord chief justice, all agree,
 So able, and so just as she!
 Whichever way their causes went,
 All parties came away content.
 At length she found herself decay,
 Death sent mementos every day.
 Her drooping strength sustains no more
 The shell, which on her back she bore.
 The eye had lost its visual art,
 The heavy ear refus'd its part;
 The teeth perform'd their office ill,
 And every member fail'd her will.
 But no defects in mind appear,
 Her intellects are strong and clear.
 Thus when his glorious course is run,
 How brightly shines the setting sun!

The news through all the garden spread,
 The neighbours throng'd about her bed;
 Cheerful she rais'd her voice aloud,
 And thus address'd the weeping crowd:
 My friends, I'm hast'ning to the grave,
 And know, nor plum, nor peach can save.
 Yes, to those manions go I must,
 Where our good fathers sleep in dust.
 Nor am I backward to explore
 That gloomy vale they trod before.
 'Gainst fate's decree what can I say?
 Like other snails I've had my day.
 Full many Summer sun's I've seen,
 And now die grateful and serene.

If men the higher pow'rs arraign,
 Shall we adopt the plaintive strain?
 Nature, profuse to us and ours,
 Hath kindly built these stately tow'rs;
 Where, when the skies in night are dress'd,
 Secure from ev'ry ill we rest,
 Survey our curious structure well—
 How firm, and yet how light our shell!
 Our refuge, when cold storms invade,
 And in the dog-days heat our shade.

Thus when we see a fleeter race,
 We'll not lament our languid pace.
 Do dangers rise, or foes withstand?
 Are not our castles close at hand?
 For let a snail at distance roam,
 The happy snail is still at home.
 Survey our gardens blest retreats—
 Oh! what a paradise of sweets!
 With what variety is't stor'd!
 Unnumber'd dainties spread our board.
 The plums assume their glossy blue,
 And cheeks of nectarines glow for you;
 Peaches their lovely blush betray,
 And apricots their gold display;
 While for your beverage, when you dine,
 There streams the nectar of the vine.

Be not my dying words forgot,
 Depart, contented with your lot;
 Repress complaints when they begin,
 Ingratitude's a crying sin.
 And hold it for a truth, that we
 Are quite as blest as snails should be.

The gardener hears with great surprise
 This sage discourse, and thus he cries—
 Oh! what a thankless wretch am I,
 Who pass ten thousand favours by!

I blame, when'er the linnet sings,
My want of song, or want of wings.
The piercing hawk, with towering flight,
Reminds me of deficient of fight.
And when the generous steed I view,
Is not his strength my envy too?
I thus at birds and beasts repine;
And with their various talents mine.
Fool as I am, who cannot see
Reason is more than all to me.

My landlord boasts a large estate,
Rides in his coach, and eats in plate.
What! shall these lures bewitch my eye?
Shall they extort the murmuring sigh?
Say, he enjoys superior wealth—
Is not my better portion, health?
Before the sun has gilt the skies,
Returning labour bids me rise;
Obedient to the hunter's horn,
He quits his couch at early morn.
By want compell'd, I dig the soil,
His is a voluntary toil.
For truth it is, since Adam's fall,
His sons must labour one and all.
No man's exempted by his purse,
Kings are included in the curse.
Would monarchs relish what they eat?
'Tis toil that makes the manchet sweet;
Nature enacts, before they're fed,
That prince and peasant earn their bread.

Hence wisdom and experience show,
That bliss in equal currents flow;
That happiness is still the same,
Howe'er ingredients change their name.
Nor doth this theme our search defy,
'Tis level to the human eye.
Distinctions introduc'd by men,
Bewilder and obscure our ken.
I'll store these lessons in my heart,
And cheerful act my proper part.
If sorrows rise, as sorrows will,
I'll stand resign'd to every ill;
Convinc'd, that wisely every pack
Is suited to the bearer's back.

That the Complaints of Mankind, against their several Stations and Provinces in Life, are often frivolous, and always unwarrantable.

FABLE VI.

THE FARMER AND THE HORSE.

"'Tis a vain world, and all things show it,
"I thought so once, but now I know it."
Ah! Gay! is thy poetic page
The child of disappointed age?
Talk not of threescore years and ten,
For what avails our knowledge then?
But grant, that this experienc'd truth
Were ascertain'd in early youth;
Reader, what benefit would flow?
I vow, I'm at a loss to know.
The world alarms the human breast,
Because in savage colours dress.

* Gay's Epitaph.

'Tis treated with invective style,
And stands impeach'd of fraud and guile.
All in this heavy charge agree—
But who's in fault—the world or we?
The question's serious, short, and clear,
The answer claims our patient ear.
Yet if this office you decline—
With all my heart—the task be mine.
I'm certain if I do my best,
Your candour will excuse the rest.

A farmer, with a pensive brow,
One morn accompany'd his plough.
The larks their cheerful matins sung,
The woods with answering music rung;
The sun display'd his golden ray,
And nature hail'd the rising day.
But still the peasant all the while
Refus'd to join the general smile.
He, like his fathers long before,
Resembled much the Jews of yore;
Whose murmurs impious, weak, and vain,
Nor quails nor manna could refrain.

Did accidental dearth prevail?
How prone to tell his piteous tale!
Pregnant with joys did plenty rise?
How prone to blame indulgent skies!
Thus ever ready to complain,
For plenty sinks the price of grain.
At length he spake—Ye powers divine,
Was ever lot so hard as mine?
From infant life an arrant slave,
Close to the confines of the grave,
Have not I follow'd my employ
Near threescore winters, man and boy!
But since I call'd this farm my own,
What scenes of sorrow have I known!
Alas! if all the truth were told,
Hath not the rot impair'd my fold?
Hath not the measles seiz'd my swine?
Hath not the murrain slain my kine?
Or say that horses be my theme,
Hath not the staggers thinn'd my team?
Have not a thousand ills befide
Depriv'd my stable of its pride?

When I survey my lands around,
What thorns and thistles spread my ground!
Doth not the grain my hopes beguile,
And mildews mock the thresher's toil?
However poor the harvests past!
What so deficient as the last!
But though nor blasts, nor mildews rise,
My turnips are destroy'd by flies;
My sheep are pin'd to such degree,
That not a butcher comes to me.

Seasons are chang'd from what they were,
And hence too foul, or hence too fair.
Now scorching heat and drought annoy,
And now returning showers destroy.
Thus have I pass'd my better years
'Midst disappointments, cares, and tears.
And now, when I compute my gains,
What have I reap'd for all my pains?

Oh! had I known in manhood's prime
These slow convictions wrought by time;
Would I have brav'd the various woes
Of Summer suns, and Winter snows?
Would I have tempted every sky,
So wet, so windy, or so dry?

With all the elements at strife ?

Ah ! no—I then had plann'd a life,
Where wealth attends the middle stage,
And rest and comfort wait on age,
Where rot and murrain ne'er commence,
Nor pastures burn at my expence ;
Nor injur'd cows their wants bewail,
Nor dairies mourn the milkless pail ;
Nor barns lament the blasted grain,
Nor cattle curse the barren plain.

Dun hobbled by his master's side,
And thus the sober brute reply'd :

Look through your team, and where's the steed
Who dares dispute with me his breed ?
Few horses trace their lineage higher,
Godolphin's Arab was my sire ;
My dam was sprung from Panton's stud,
My grandam boasted Childers' blood.
But ah ! it now avails me not
By what illustrious chief begot !
Spavins pay no regard to birth,
And failing vision links my worth.
The 'quire, when he disgusted grew,
Transferr'd his property to you.
And since poor Dun " became your own,
" What scenes of sorrow have I known !"
Hath it not been my constant toil
To drag the plough and turn the soil ?
Are not my bleeding shoulders wrung
By large and weighty loads of dung ?
When the storn meadows claim your care,
And fragrant cocks perfume the air ;
When Ceres' ripen'd fruits abound,
And plenty waves her sheaves around ;
True to my collar, home I bear
The treasures of the fruitful year.
And though this drudgery be mine,
You never heard me once repine.

Yet what rewards have crown'd my days ?
I'm grudg'd the poor reward of praise.
For oats small gratitude I owe,
Beans were untasted joys, you know.
And now I'm hast'ning to my end,
Past services can find no friend.
Infirmities, disease, and age,
Provoke my surly driver's rage.
Look to my wounded flanks, you'll see
No horse was ever us'd like me.

But now I eat my meals with pain,
Averse to masticate the grain.
Hence you direct, at night and morn,
That chaff accompany my corn ;
For hulks, although my teeth be few,
Force my reluctant jaws to chew.
What then ? of life shall I complain,
And call it fleeting, false, and vain ?
Against the world shall I inveigh,
Because my grinders now decay ?

You think it were the wiser plan,
Had I consorted ne'er with man ;
Had I my liberty maintain'd,
Or liberty by flight regain'd,
And rang'd o'er distant hills and dales
With the wild foresters of Wales.

Grant I succeeded to my mind—
Is happiness to hills confin'd !
Don't famine oft erect her throne
Upon the rugged mountain's stone ?

And don't the lower pastures fail,
When snows descending choke the vale !
Or who fo hardy to declare
Disease and death ne'er enter there ?

Do pains or sickness here invade ?
Man tenders me his cheerful aid.
For who beholds his hungry beast,
But grants him some supply at least ?
Int'rest shall prompt him to pursue
What inclination would not do.

Say, had I been the desert's foal,
Through life estrang'd to man's controul ;
What service had I done on earth,
Or who could profit by my birth ?
My back had ne'er sustain'd thy weight,
My chest ne'er known thy waggon's freight
But now my several powers combine
To answer nature's ends and thine.
I'm useful thus in every view—
Oh ! could I say the same of you !

Superior evils had ensu'd,
With prescience had I been endu'd,
Ills, though at distance scen, destroy,
Or sicken every present joy.
We relish every new delight,
When future griefs elude our sight.
To blindness then what thanks are due ?
It makes each single comfort too.
The colt, unknown to pain and toil,
Anticipates to-morrow's smile.
Yon lamb enjoys the present hour,
As stranger to the butcher's power.

Your's is a wild Utopian scheme,
A boy would blush to own your dream.
Be your profession what it will,
No province is exempt from ill.
Quite from the cottage to the throne,
Stations have sorrows of their own.
Why should a peasant then explore
What longer heads ne'er found before ?
Go, preach my doctrine to your son,
By your's, the lad would be undone.
But whether he regards or not,
Your lecture would be soon forgot.
The hopes which gull'd the parent's breast,
Ere long will make his son their jest.
Though now these cowed cheats you spurn,
Yet every man's a dupe in turn,
And wisely fo ordain'd, indeed,
(Whate'er philosophers may plead.)
Else life would stagnate at its source,
And Man and Horse decline the course.

Then bid young Ralpho never mind it,
But take the world as he shall find it.

FABLE VII.

It seems, an Owl, in days of yore,
Had turn'd a thousand volumes o'er.
His fame for literature extends,
And strikes the ears of partial friends.
They weigh'd the learning of the fowl,
And thought him a prodigious Owl !
From such applause what could betide ?
It only cocker'd him in pride.

Extoll'd for sciences and arts,
His bosom burn'd to show his parts ;
(No wonder that an Owl of spirit,
Mistook his vanity for merit).

He shows insatiate thirst of praise,
Ambitious of the poet's bays.
Perch'd on Parnassus all night long,
He hoots a sonnet or a song;
And while the village hear his note,
They curse the screaming whore-son's throat.

Amidst the darkness of the night,
Our feather'd poet wings his flight,
And, as capricious fate ordains,
A chimney's treach'rous summit gains;
Which much impair'd by wind and weather,
Down fall the bricks and bird together.

The Owl expands his azure eyes,
And sees a Non-con's study rife;
The walls were deck'd with hallow'd bands
Of worthies, by th' engraver's hands;
All champions for the good old cause!
Whose conscience interfer'd with laws;
But yet no foes to king or people,
Though mortal foes to church and steeple.
Baxter, with apostolic grace,
Display'd his metzotinto face;
While here and there some luckier saint
Attain'd to dignity of paint.

Rang'd in proportion to their size,
The books by due gradations rife.
Here the good Fathers lodg'd their trust;
There zealous Calvin slept in dust.
Here Pool his learned treasures keeps;
There Fox o'er dying martyrs weeps;
While reams on reams insatiate drink
Whole deluges of Henry's ink.

Columns of sermons pil'd on high,
Attract the bird's admiring eye.
Those works a good old age acquir'd,
Which had in manuscript expir'd;
For manuscripts, of fleeting date,
Seldom survive their infant state.
The healthiest live not half their days,
But die a thousand various ways;
Sometimes ingloriously apply'd
To purposes the Muse shall hide.
Or, should they meet no fate below,
How oft tobacco proves their foe!
Or else some cook purloins a leaf
To singe her fowl, or save her beef;
But sermons 'scape both fate and fire,
By congregational desire.

Display'd at large upon the table
Was Bunyan's much-admir'd fable;
And as his Pilgrim sprawling lay,
It chanc'd the Owl advanc'd that way.

The bird explores the pious dream,
And plays a visionary scheme;
Determin'd, as he read the sage,
To copy from the tinker's page.

The thief now quits his learn'd abode,
And scales aloft the sooty road;
Flies to Parnassus' top once more,
Resolv'd to dream as well as snore;
And what he dreamt by day, the wight
In writing o'er, consumes the night.

Plum'd with conceit, he calls aloud,
And thus bespeaks the purblind crowd:
Say not, that man alone's a poet,
Poets are Owls—my verse shall show it.
And while he read his labour'd lays,
His blue-ey'd brothers hooted praise.
But now his female mate by turns
With pity and with choler burns;

When thus her comfort she address'd,
And all her various thoughts express'd:

Why, prithee, husband, rant no more,
'Tis time to give these follies o'er.
Be wise, and follow my advice—
Go—catch your family some mice.

'Twere better to resume your trade,
And spend your nights in ambushade.
What! if you fatten by your schemes,
And fare luxuriously in dreams!
While you ideal mice are carving,
I and my family are starving.
Reflect upon our nuptial hours,
Where will you find a brood like our's?
Our offspring might become a queen,
For finer Owlets ne'er were seen!

'Ods—blue! the surly hob reply'd,
I'll amply for my heirs provide.
Why, Madge! when Colley Cibber dies,
Thou'lt see thy mate a Laur'ate rise;
For never poets held this place,
Except descendants of our race.

But soft—the female sage rejoind'd—
Say you abjur'd the purring kind;
And nobly left inglorious rats
To vulgar owls, or ffordid cats.
Say, you the healing art essay'd,
And piddled in the doctor's trade;
At least you'd earn as good provisions,
And better this than scribbling visions.
A due regard to me, or self,
Wou'd always make you dream of pelf;
And when you dreamt your nights away,
You'd realize your dreams by day.
Hence far superior gains wou'd rise,
And I be fat, and you be wise.

But, Madge, though I applaud your scheme,
You'd wish my patients still to dream!
Waking, they'd laugh at my vocation,
Or disapprove my education;
And they detest your solemn hob,
Or take me for professor L——.

Equipt with powder and with pill,
He takes his licence out to kill.
Practis'd in all a doctor's airs,
To Batson's senate he repairs,
Dress'd in his flowing wig of knowledge,
To greet his brethren of the college;
Takes up the papers of the day,
Perhaps for want of what to say;
Through ev'ry column he pursues,
Alike advertisements and news;
O'er lists of cures with rapture runs,
Wrought by Apollo's natural sons;
Admires the rich Hibernian stock
Of doctors, Henry, Ward, and Rock.
He dwells on each illustrious name,
And sighs at once for fees and fame.
Now, like the doctors of to-day,
Retains his puffers too in pay.
Around his reputation flew,
His practice with his credit grew.
At length the court receives the sage,
And lordlings in his cause engage.
He dupes, beside plebeian fowls,
The whole Nobility of Owls.
Thus ev'ry where he gains renown,
And fills his purse, and thins the town,

T A L E S.

THE LAMB AND THE PIG.

CONSULT the moralist, you'll find
That education forms the mind.
But education ne'er supply'd
What ruling nature hath deny'd.
If you'll the following page pursue,
My tale shall prove this doctrine true.
Since to the muse all brutes belong,
The Lamb shall usher in my song;
Whose snowy fleece adorn'd her skin,
Emblem of native white within.
Meekness and love possess'd her soul,
And innocence had crown'd the whole.

It chanc'd, in some unguarded hour,
(Ah! purity, precarious flower!
Let maidens of the present age
Tremble, when they peruse my page.)
It chanc'd upon a luckless day,
The little wanton, full of play,
Rejoic'd a thymy bank to gain,
But short the triumphs of her reign!
The treacherous slopes her fate foretel,
And soon the pretty trifer fell.
Beneath, a dirty ditch impress'd
Its mire upon her spotless vest.
What greater ill cou'd lamb betide,
The butcher's barbarous knife beside?

The shepherd, wounded with her cries,
Strait to the bleating sufferer flies.
The lambkin in his arms he took,
And bore her to a neighbouring brook.
The silver streams her wool refin'd,
Her fleece in virgin whiteness shin'd.

Cleans'd from pollution's every stain,
She join'd her fellows on the plain;
And saw afar the stinking shore,
But ne'er approach'd those dangers more.
The shepherd blest'd the kind event,
And view'd his flock with sweet content.

To market next he shap'd his way,
And bought provisions for the day.
But made, for winter's rich supply,
A purchase from a farmer's sty.
The children round their parent crowd,
And testify their mirth aloud.
They saw the stranger with surprize,
And all admir'd his little eyes.
Familiar grown, he shar'd their joys,
Shar'd too the porridge with the boys.
The females o'er his dress preside,
They wash his face, and scour his hide.
But daily more a Swine he grew,
For all these housewives e'er could do.

Hence let my youthful reader know,
That once a hog, and always so.

DEATH AND THE RAKE.

A DUTCH TALE.

WHEN pleasures court the human heart,
Oh! 'tis reluctant work to part.
Are we with griefs and pains oppress'd?
Woe says that Death's a welcome guest?
Though sure to cure our evils all,
He's the last doctor we wou'd call.
We think, if he arrives at morn,
'Tis hard to die, as soon as born.

Or if the conqueror invade,
When life projects the evening shade,
Do we not meditate delay,
And still request a longer stay?
We shift our homes, we change the air,
And double, like the hunted hare.
Thus be it morn, or night, or noon,
Come when he will, he comes too soon!

You wish my subject I wou'd wave,
The preface is so very grave.
Come then, my friend, I'll change my style,
And couch instruction with a smile.
But promise, ere I tell my tale,
The serious moral shall prevail.

Vanbruin dy'd—his son, we're told,
Succeeded to his father's gold.
Flush'd with his wealth, the thoughtless blade
Despis'd frugality and trade;
Left Amsterdam with eager haste,
Dress'd and the Hague engross'd his taste.

Ere long his passion chang'd its shape,
He grew enamour'd with the grape.
Frequented much a house of cheer,
Just like our fools of fortune here;
With sots and harlots fond to join,
And revel o'er his midnight wine.

Once on a time the bowls had flow'd,
Quite till the morning cock had crow'd.
When Death, at every hour awake,
Enter'd the room, and claim'd the rake.
The youth's complexion spoke his fears,
Soft stole adown his cheek the tears.
At length the anguish of his breast
With fault'ring tongue he thus express'd:

Thou king of terrors, hear my prayer,
And condescend for once to spare.
Let me thy clemency engage,
New to the world, and green in age.
When life no pleasures can dispense,
Or pleasures pall upon the sense;
When the eye feels departing sight,
And rolls its orb in vain for light;
When music's joys no longer cheer
The sick'ning heart, or heavy car;

Or when my aching limbs forbear,
In sprightly balls to join the fair;
I'll not repeat my suit to Death,
But cheerfully resign my breath.

Done, says the monarch—be it so;
Observe—you promise then to go!

What favour such protracted date
From the stern minister of fate!
Your wonder will be greater soon,
To hear the wretch perverts the boon.
Who, during years beyond a score,
Ne'er thought upon his promise more!

But were these terms by Death forgot?
Ah! no—again he seeks the lot.

The wretch was in the tavern found,
With a few gouty friends around.
Dropfy had seiz'd his legs and thighs,
Palfy his hands, and rheum his eyes.
When thus the king—Intemperate elf,
Thus, by debauch, to dupe yourself.
What! are my terrors spurn'd by thee!
Thou fool! to trifle thus with me!
You ask'd before for length of days,
Only to riot various ways.

What were thy pleas but then a sneer?
I'll now retort with jest severe.

Read this small print, the monarch cries—

You mock me, sir, the man replies.
I scarce could read when in my prime,
And now my sight's impair'd by time.
Sure you consider not my age—
I can't discern a single page.
And when my friends the bottle pass,
I scarce can see to fill my glafs.

Here, take this nut, observe it well—
'Tis my command you crack the shell.

How can such orders be obey'd?
My grinders, sir, are quite decay'd.
My teeth can scarce divide my bread,
And not a sound one in my head!

But Death, who more farcastic grew,
Disclos'd a violin to view;
Then loud he call'd, Old Boy, advance,
Stretch out your legs, and lead the dance.

The man rejoin'd—When age furrounds,
How can the ear distinguish sounds?

Are not my limbs unwieldy grown?
Are not my feet as cold as stone?
Dear sir, take pity on my state—
My legs can scarce support my weight!

Death drops the quaint, insulting joke,
And meditates the fatal stroke.

Affuming all his terrors now,
He speaks with anger on his brow.

Is thus my lenity abus'd,
And dare you hope to stand excus'd?
You've spent your time, that pearl of price!
'To the detested ends of vice.

Purchas'd your short-liv'd pleasures dear,
And seal'd your own destruction here.
Inflam'd your reckoning too above,
By midnight bowls, and lawless love.

Warning, you know, I gave betimes—
Now go, and answer for your crimes.

Oh! my good lord, repress the blow—
I am not yet prepar'd to go.

And let it, sir, be further told,
That not a neighbour thinks me old.

My hairs are now but turning gray,
I am not sixty, sir, till May.
Grant me the common date of men,
I ask but threescore years and ten.

Dar'st thou, prevaricating knave,
Insult the monarch of the grave?
I claim thy solemn contract past—
Wherefore this moment is thy last.

Thus having said, he speeds his heart,
And cleaves the hoary dotard's heart.

THE SECOND ODE OF THE SECOND BOOK OF HORACE.

INSCRIBED TO T. V. ESQ.

DEAR youth, to hoarded wealth a foe,
Riches with faded lustre glow;
Yes, dim the treasures of the mine,
Unless with temperate use they shine.
This stamps a value on the gold,
So Procleius thought of old.

Soon as this generous Roman saw
His father's sons proscrit'd by law,
The knight discharg'd a parent's part,
They shar'd his fortune and his heart.
Hence stands consign'd a brother's name,
To immortality and fame.

Would you true empire ascertain?
Curb all immoderate lust of gain.
This is the best ambition known,
A greater conquest than a throne.
For know, should avarice controul,
Farewel the triumphs of the soul.

This is a dropfy of the mind,
Resembling the corporeal kind;
For who with this disease are curst,
The more they drink, the more they thirst.
Indulgence feeds their bloated veins,
And pale-ey'd, fighting languor reigns.

Virtue, who differs from the crowd,
Rejects the covetous and proud;
Disdains the wild ambitious breast,
And scorns to call a monarch blest;
Labours to rescue truth and sense
From specious sounds, and vain pretence.

Virtue to that distinguish'd few,
Gives royalty and conquest too;
That wife minority, who own,
And pay their tribute to her throne;
Who view with undesiring eyes,
And spurn that wealth which misers prize.

THE TENTH ODE OF THE SECOND BOOK.

Wou'd you, my friend, true bliss obtain?
Nor press the coast, nor tempt the main.
In open seas loud tempests roar,
And treacherous rocks begirt the shore.

Hatred to all extremes is seen,
In those who love the golden mean.
They nor in palaces rejoice,
Nor is the fordid cot their choice.

The middle state of life is best,
Exalted stations find no rest;
Storms shake th' aspiring pine and tower,
And mountains feel the thunder's power.

The mind prepar'd for each event,
In every state maintains content.
She hopes the best, when storms prevail,
Nor trusts too far the prosp'rous gale.

Shou'd time returning winters bring,
Returning winter yields to spring.

Shou'd darkness shroud the present skies,
Hereafter brighter suns shall rise.

When Paen shoots his fiery darts,
Disease and death transfix our hearts;
But oft the god withholds his bow,
In pity to the race below.

When clouds the angry heavens deform,
Be strong and brave the swelling storm;
Amidst prosperity's full gales
Be humble, and contract your sails.

EPITAPHS.

READER, approach my urn—thou need'st not fear
Th' extorted promise of one plaintive tear,
To mourn thy unknown friend—From me thou'lt learn

More than a Plato taught—the grand concern
Of mortals!—Wrapt in pensive thought, survey
This little freehold of unthinking clay,
And know thy end!
Though young, though gay, this scene of death explore,
Alas! the young, the gay is now no more!

ON ROBERT CLAVERING, M. B.

Oh! come, who know the childless parent's sigh,
The bleeding bosom, and the streaming eye;
Who feel the wounds a dying friend imparts,
When the last pang divides two social hearts.
This weeping marble claims the generous tear,
Here lies the friend, the son, and all that's dear.

He fell full-blossom'd in the pride of youth,
The nobler pride of science, worth, and truth.
Calm and serene he view'd his mouldering clay,
Nor fear'd to go, nor fondly wish'd to stay.
And when the king of terrors he descri'd,
Kiss'd the stern mandate, bow'd his head, and dy'd.

ON COLONEL GARDINER.

Who was slain in the Battle at Prestonpans, 1745.

WHILE fainter merit asks the powers of verse,
Our faithful line shall Gardiner's worth rehearse.
The bleeding hero, and the martyr'd faint,
Transcends the poet's pen, the herald's paint.
His the best path to fame that e'er was trod,
And surely his a glorious road to God.

ON MR. SIBLEY, OF STUDHAM.

HERE lies an honest man! without pretence
To more than prudence, and to common sense;
Who knew no vanity, disguise, nor art,
Who scorn'd all language foreign to the heart.
Diffusive as the light his bounty spread,
Cloth'd were the naked, and the hungry fed.
"These be his honours!" honours that disclaim
The blazon'd scutcheon, and the herald's fame!

VOL. XI.

Honours! which boast defiance to the grave,
Where, spite of Anstis, rots the garter'd knave.

ON A LADY,

WHO HAD LABOURED UNDER A CANCER.

STRANGER, these dear remains contain'd a mind
As infants guileless, and as angels kind.
Ripening for heav'n, by pains and sufferings try'd,
To pain superior, and unknown to pride.
Calm and serene beneath affliction's rod,
Because she gave her willing heart to God.
Because she trusted in her Saviour's pow'r,
Hence firm and fearless in the dying hour!
No vernal muse this faithful picture draws,
Blest faint! desert like yours extorts applause.
Oh! let a weeping friend discharge his due,
His debt to worth, to excellence, and you!

ON MISS GEE,

WHO DIED OCTOBER 25. 1736. ÆTAT. 28.

BEAUTEOUS, nor known to pride, to friends sincere,
Mild to thy neighbour, to thyself severe;
Unstain'd thy honour—and thy wit was such,
Knew no extremes, nor little, nor too much.
Few were thy years, and painful through the whole,
Yet calm thy passage, and serene thy soul.

Reader, amidst these sacred crowds that sleep*,
View this once lovely form, nor grudge to weep—
O death, all terrible! how sure thy hour!
How wide thy conquests! and how fell thy power!
When youth, wit, virtue, plead for longer reign,
When youth, when wit, when virtue plead in vain;
Stranger, then weep afresh—for know this clay
Was once the good, the wise, the beautiful, the gay.

ON MR. THOMAS STRONG.

WHO DIED DECEMBER 26. 1736.

IN action prudent, and in word sincere,
In friendship faithful, and in honour clear;

* The author is supposed to be inscribing the character of the deceased upon her tomb, and therefore "crowds that sleep," mean the dead.

Through life's vain scenes the same in every part,
A steady judgment, and an honest heart.
Thou vaunt'st no honours—all thy boast a mind
As infants guileless, and as angels kind.

When ask'd to whom these lovely truths belong,
Thy friends shall answer, weeping, "Here lies
"STRONG."

ON JOHN DUKE OF BRIDGWATER,

WHO DIED IN THE 21ST. YEAR OF HIS AGE,
1747-8.

INTENT to hear, and bounteous to bestow,
A mind that melted at another's woe;

Studious to act the self-approving part,
That midnight-music of the honest heart!
Those silent joys th' illustrious youth possess'd,
Those cloudless sunshines of the spotless breast
From pride of peerage, and from foily free,
Life's early morn, fair virtue! gave to thee;
Forbade the tear to steal from sorrow's eye,
Bade anxious poverty forget to sigh;
Like Titus, knew the value of a day,
And want went smiling from his gates away.
The rest were honours borrow'd from the throne;
These honours, ECERTON, were all thy own!

MISCELLANIES.

AN INVOCATION OF HAPPINESS,

AFTER THE ORIENTAL MANNER OF SPEECH.

- I. TELL me, O thou fairest among virgins, where dost thou lay thy meek contented head?
2. Dost thou dwell upon the mountains; dost thou make thy couch in the vallies?
3. In the still watches of the night have I thought upon my fair one; yea, in the visions of the night have I pursued thee.
4. When I awoke, my meditation was upon thee, and the day was spent in search after thy embraces.
5. Why dost thou flee from me, as the tender hind, or the young roe upon the hills?
6. Without thy presence, in vain blushes the rose, in vain glows the ruby, the cinnamon breatheth its fragrance in vain.
7. Shall I make thee a house of the rich cedars of Lebanon? Shall I perfume it with all the spices of Arabia? Wilt thou be tempted with Sabean odours, with myrrh, frankincense, and aloes?
8. Doth my fair one delight in palaces—doth she gladden the hearts of kings? The palaces are not a meet residence for my beloved—The princes of the earth are not favoured with the smiles of her countenance.
9. My fair one is meek and humble, she dwelleth among the cottages, she tendeth the sheep upon the mountains, and lieth down amidst the flocks. The lilies of the field are her couch, and the heavens her canopy.
10. Her words are smoother than oil, more powerful than wine; her voice is as the voice of the turtle-dove.
11. Thou crownest the innocence of the husbandman, and the reward of virtue is with thee.

"Time and Chance be-speneth to them all."

Ecclesiast. ch. ix. ver. II.

READER, if fond of wonder and surprize,
Behold in me ten thousand wonders rise.

Should I appear quite partial to my cause,
Shout my own praise, and vindicate applause;
Do not arraign my modesty or sense,
Nor deem my character a vain pretence.
Know then I boast an origin, and date
Coeval with the sun—without a mate
An offspring I beget in number more
Than all the crowded sands which form the shore.
That instant they are born, my precious breed
Ah me! expire—yet my departed seed
Enter like spectres, with commission'd power,
The secret chamber at the midnight hour;
Pervade alike the palace and the shed,
The statesman's closet, and the rustic's bed;
Serene and sweet, like envoys from the skies,
To all the good, the virtuous, and the wise;
But to the vicious breast remorse they bring,
And bite like serpents, or like scorpions sting.

Being and birth to sciences I give,
By me they rise through infancy and live:
By me meridian excellence display,
And, like autumnal fruits, by me decay.
When poets, and when painters are no more,
And all the fends of rival wits are o'er;
'Tis mine to fix their merit and their claim,
I judge their works to darkness or to fame.
I am a monarch, whose victorious hands
No craft eludes, no regal power withstands.
My annals prove such mighty conquests won,
As shame the puny feats of Philip's son.
But though a king, I seldom sway alone,
The goddess Fortune often shares my throne.
The human eye detects our blended rule,
Here we exalt a knave, and there a fool.
Ask you what powers our sovereign laws obey?
Creation is our empire—we convey
Sceptres, and crowns at will—as we ordain,
Kings abdicate their thrones, and peasants reign.

Lovers to us address the fervent prayer;
'Tis ours to soften or subdue the fair:
We now like angels smile, and now destroy,
Now bring, or blast, the long-expected joy.
At our fair shrine ambitious churchmen bow,
And crave the mitre to adorn the brow,

Go to the inns of court—the learned drudge
Implores our friendship to commence a judge.
Go, and consult the senns of Warwick Lane;
They own our favours, and adore our reign.
Theirs is the gold, 'tis true—but all men see
Our claim is better founded to the fee.

Reader, thus sublunary worlds we guide,
Thus o'er your natal planets we preside.
Kingdoms and kings are ours—to us they fall,
We carve their fortunes and dispose of all.
Nor think that kings alone engross our choice;
The cobbler sits attentive to our voice.

But since my colleague is a fickle she,
Abjure my colleague, and depend on me!
Either she sees not, or with partial eyes,
Either she grants amiss, or she denies.
But I, who pity those that wear her chain,
Scorn the capricious measures of her reign;
In every gift, and every grace excel,
And seldom fail their hopes, who use me well.
Yet though in me unnumber'd treasures shine,
Superior to the rich Peruvian mine!

Though men to my indulgence hourly owe
The choicest of their comforts here below:
(For mens best tenure, as the world agree,
Is all a perquisite deriv'd from me)
Still man's my foe! ungrateful man, I say,
Who meditates my murder every day.

What various scenes of death do men prepare!
And what assassinations plot the fair!
But know assur'dly, who treat me ill,
Who mean to rob me, or who mean to kill;
Who view me with a cold regardless eye,
And let my favours pass unheeded by;
They shall lament their folly when too late;
So mourns the prodigal his lost estate!

While they who with superior forethought biew,
Store all my lessons in their faithful breast;
(For where's the prelate, who can preach like me,
With equal reasoning, and persuasive plea,
Who know that I am always on my wings,
And never stay in compliment to kings;
Who therefore watch me with an eagle's sight,
Arrest my pinions, or attend my flight;
Or if perchance they loiter'd in the race,
Chide their slow footsteps, and improve their pace;
Yes, these are wisdom's sons, and when they die,
Their virtues shall exalt them to the sky.

AN ENIGMA, INSCRIBED TO MISS P.

CLOE, I boast celestial date,
Ere time began to roll;
So wide my power, my sceptre spurns
The limits of the pole.

When from the mystic womb of night,
The Almighty call'd the earth;
I smil'd upon the infant world,
And grac'd the wondrous birth.

Through the vast realms of boundless space,
I traverse uncontroll'd;
And starry orbs of proudest blaze
Inscribe my name in gold.

There's not a monarch in the north
But bends the suppliant knee;
The haughty sultan waves his power,
And owns superior me.

Both by the savage and the faint
My empire stands confess'd;
I thaw the ice on Greenland's coast,
And fire the Scythian's breast.

To me the gay aërial tribes
Their glittering plumage owe;
With all the variegated pride
That decks the feather'd beau.

The meanest reptiles of the land
My bounty too partake;
I paint the insect's trembling wing,
And gild the crested snake.

Survay the nations of the deep,
You'll there my power behold;
My pencil drew the pearly scale,
And fin bedropt with gold.

I give the virgin's lip to glow,
I claim the crimson dye;
Mine is the rose which spreads the cheek,
And mine the brilliant eye.

Then speak, my fair; for surely thou
My name canst best descry;
Who gave to thee with lavish hands
What thousands I deny.

THE FIRESIDE.

DEAR Cloe, while the busy crowd,
The vain, the wealthy, and the proud,
In folly's maze advance;
Though singularity and pride
Be call'd our choice, we'll step aside,
Nor join the giddy dance.

From the gay world we'll oft retire
To our own family and fire,
Where love our hours employs;
No noisy neighbour enters here,
No intermeddling stranger near,
To spoil our heartfelt joys.

If solid happiness we prize,
Within our breast this jewel lies,
And they are fools who roam;
The world hath nothing to bestow,
From our own selves our bliss must flow,
And that dear hut our home.

Of rest was Noah's dove bereft,
When with impatient wing she left
That safe retreat, the ark;
Giving her vain excursions o'er,
The disappointed bird once more
Explor'd the sacred bark.

Though fools spurn Hymen's gentle powers,
We, who improve his golden hours,
By sweet experience know,
That marriage, rightly understood,
Gives to the tender and the good,
A paradise below.

Our babes shall richest comforts bring;
If tutor'd right they'll prove a spring
Whence pleasures ever rise:
We'll form their minds with studious care,
To all that's manly, good, and fair,
And train them for the skies.

While they our wisest hours engage,
They'll joy our youth, support our age,
And crown our hoary hairs;
They'll grow in virtue every day,
And they our fondest loves repay,
And recompense our cares.

No borrow'd joys! they're all our own,
While to the world we live unknown,
Or by the world forgot:
Monarchs! we envy not your state,
We look with pity on the great,
And bless our humble lot.

Our portion is not large, indeed,
But then how little do we need,
For nature's calls are few!
In this the art of living lies,
To want no more than may suffice,
And make that little do.

We'll therefore ridish with content,
Whate'er kind Providence has sent,
Nor aim beyond our power;
For, if our stock be very small,
'Tis prudence to enjoy it all,
Nor lose the present hour.

To be resign'd when ills betide,
Patient when favours are deny'd,
And pleas'd with favours given;
Dear Cloe, this is wisdom's part,
This is that incense of the heart,
Whose fragrance smells to heaven.

We'll ask no long-protracted treat,
Since winter-life is seldom sweet;
But, when our feast is o'er,
Grateful from table we'll arise,
Nor grudge our sons, with envious eyes,
The relics of our store.

Thus hand in hand through life we'll go;
Its checker'd paths of joy and woe
With cautious steps we'll tread;
Quit its vain scenes without a tear,
Without a trouble, or a fear,
And mingle with the dead.

While conscience, like a faithful friend,
Shall through the gloomy vale attend,
And cheer our dying breath;
Shall, when all other comforts cease,
Like a kind angel whisper peace,
And smooth the bed of death.

TO SOME CHILDREN LISTENING TO A LARK.

SEE the Lark prunes his active wings,
Rises to heaven, and soars, and sings.
His morning hymns, his mid-day lays,
Are one continued song of praise.
He speaks his Maker all he can,
And shames the silent tongue of man.
When the declining orb of light
Reminds him of approaching night,
His warbling vespers swell his breast,
And as he sings he sinks to rest.
Shall birds instructive lessons teach,
And we be deaf to what they preach?

No, ye dear nestlings of my heart,
Go, act the wiser songster's part.
Spurn your warm couch at early dawn,
And with your God begin the morn.
To Him your grateful tribute pay
Through every period of the day.
To Him your evening songs direct;
His eye shall watch, his arm protect.
Though darkness reigns, He's with you still,
Then sleep, my babes, and fear no ill.

TO A CHILD OF FIVE YEARS OLD.

FAIREST flower, all flowers excelling,
Which in Milton's page we see;
Flowers of Eve's embower'd dwelling*
Are, my fair one, types of thee.

Mark, my Polly, how the roses
Emulate thy damask cheek;
How the bud its sweets discloses—
Buds thy opening bloom bespeak.

Lilies are by plain direction
Emblems of a double kind;
Emblems of thy fair complexion,
Emblems of thy fairer mind.

But, dear girl, both flowers and beauty
Blossom, fade, and die away;
Then pursue good sense and duty,
Evergreens! which ne'er decay.

ON LORD COBHAM'S GARDEN.

IT puzzles much the sages' brains,
Where Eden stood of yore:
Some place it in Arabia's plains,
Some say it is no more.

But Cobham can these tales confute,
As all the curious know;
For he hath prov'd, beyond dispute,
That Paradise is Stow.

TO-MORROW.

"Percont et imputantur."

TO-MORROW, didst thou say!
Methought I heard Horatio say, To-morrow.
Go to—I will not hear of it—To-morrow!
'Tis a sharper, who stakes his penury
Against thy plenty—who takes thy ready cash,
And pays thee nought but wishes, hopes, and promises,

The currency of idiots. Injurious bankrupt,
That gulls the easy creditor!—To-morrow!
It is a period nowhere to be found
In all the hoary registers of time,
Unless perchance in the fool's calendar.
Wisdom disclaims the word, nor holds society
With those who own it. No, my Horatio,
'Tis Fancy's child, and Folly is its father;
Wrought of such stuff as dreams are; and baseless
As the fantastic visions of the evening.

* Alluding to Milton's description of Eve's bower.

But soft, my friend—arrest the present moments;

For be assur'd, they all are arrant tell-tales;
And though their flight be silent, and their path trackless

As the wing'd couriers of the air,
They post to heaven, and there record thy folly.
Because, though station'd on the important watch,
Thou, like a sleeping, faithless sentinel,
Didst let them pass unnotic'd, unimprov'd.
And know, for that thou slumber'dst on the guard,
Thou shalt be made to answer at the bar
For every fugitive: and when thou thus
Shalt stand impleaded at the high tribunal
Of hood-wink'd justice, who shall tell thy audit?

Then slay the present instant, dear Horatio;
Imprint the marks of wisdom on its wings.
'Tis of more worth than kingdoms! far more precious

Than all the crimson treasures of life's fountain!—
Oh! let it not clude thy grasp, but, like
The good old patriarch upon record,
Hold the fleet angel fast until he bless thee.

AN ALLUSION TO HORACE, ODE XVI.
BOOK II.

INSCRIBED TO H. W. ESQ.

"Otium divos rogat in patenti

"Prensus Egæo, simul atra nubes

"Condidit lunam, neque certa fulgent
"Sidera nautis," &c.

SAY, heavenly Quiet, propitious nymph of light,
Why art thou thus conceal'd from human sight?
Tir'd of life's follies, fain I'd gain thy arms,
Oh! take me panting to thy peaceful charms;
Sooth my wild soul, in thy soft fetters caught,
And calm the surges of tumultuous thought.

Thee, goddess, thee all states of life implore,
The merchant seeks thee on the foreign shore:
Through frozen zones and burning isles he flies,
And tempts the various horrors of the skies.
Nor frozen zones, nor burning isles controul
That thirst of gain, that fever of the soul.
But mark the change—impending storms affright,
Array'd in all the majesty of night—
The raging winds, discharg'd their mystic caves,
Roar the dire signal to th' insulting waves.

The foaming legions charge the ribs of oak,
And the pale fiend presents at every stroke.
To thee the unhappy wretch in pale despair
Bends the weak knee, and lifts the hand in prayer;
Views the sad cheat, and swears he'll ne'er again
Range the hot clime, or trust the faithless main,
Or own so mean a thought, that thou art brib'd
by gain.

To thee the harness'd chief devotes his breath,
And braves the thousand avenues of death;
Now red with fury seeks th' embattled plain,
Wades floods of gore, and scales the hills of slain;
Now on the fort with winged vengeance falls,
And tempts the sevenfold thunders of the walls.
Mistaken man! the nymph of peace disdains
The roar of cannons, and the smoke of plains:
With milder incense let thy altars blaze,
And in a softer note attempt her praise.
What various herds attend the virgin's gate,
Abject in wealth, and impotent in state!

A crowd of offerings on the altar lie,
And idly strive to tempt her from the sky:
But here the rich magnificence of kings
Are specious trifles all, and all unheeded things.
No outward show celestial bosoms warms,
The gaudy purple boasts inglorious charms;
The gold here, conscious of its abject birth,
Only presumes to be superior earth.
In vain the gem its sparkling tribute pays,
And meanly tremulates in borrow'd rays.
On these the nymph with scornful smiles looks down,

Nor e'er elects the favourite of a crown.
Supremely great, she views us from afar,
Nor deigns to own a sultan or a czar.
Did real happiness attend on state,
How would I pant and labour to be great!
To court I'd hasten with impetuous speed;
But to be great's to be a wretch indeed.

I speak of sacred truths; believe me, Hugh,
The real wants of nature are but few.
Poor are the charms of gold—a generous heart
Would blush to own a bliss, that these impart.
'Tis he alone the muse dares happy call,
Who with superior thought enjoys his little all.
Within his breast no frantic passions roll,
Soft are the motions of the virtuous soul.
The night in silken slumbers glides away,
And a sweet calm leads in the smiling day,

What antic notions form the human mind!
Perverfly mad, and obstinately blind.
Life in its large extent is scarce a span,
Yet, wondrous frenzy! great designs we plan,
And shoot our thoughts beyond the date of man.
Man, that vain creature's but a wretched elf,
And lives at constant enmity with self;
Swears to a southern climate he'll repair,
But who can change the mind by changing air?
Italia's plains may purify the blood,
And with a nobler purple paint the flood;
But can soft zephyrs aid th' ill-shapen thigh,
Or form to beauty, the distorted eye?
Can they with life inform the thoughtless clay?
Then a kind gale might waft my cares away.
Where roves the muse?—'tis all a dream, my friend,

All a wild thought—for Care, that ghastly fiend,
That mighty prince of the infernal powers,
Haunts the still watches of the midnight hours.
In vain the man the night's protection sought,
Care stings like pois'nous asps to fury wrought,
And wakes the mind to all the pangs of thought.
Not the wing'd ship, that sweeps the level main,
Not the young roe that bounds along the plain,
Arc swift as Care—that monster leaves behind
The aerial courser and the fleeter wind;
Through every clime performs a constant part,
And sheathes its painful daggers in the heart.

Ah! why should man an idle game pursue,
To future May-be's stretch the distant view?
May more exalted thoughts our hours employ,
And wisely strive to taste the present joy.
Life's an inconstant sea—the prudent ply
With every oar to improve th' auspicious sky:
But if black clouds the angry heav'n's deform,
A cheerful mind will sweeten every storm.

Though fools expect their joys to flow sincere,
Yet none can boast eternal sunshine here.

The youthful chief, that like a summer flower
Shines a whole life in one precarious hour,
Impatient of restraint demands the fight,
While painted triumphs swim before his sight.
Forbear, brave youth, thy bold designs give o'er,
Ere the next morn shall dawn, thou'lt be no more;
Invidious death shall blast thy opening bloom,
Scarce blown, thou fad'st, scarce born, thou meet'st
a tomb.

What though, my friend, the young are swept away,

Untimely cropt in the proud blaze of day;
Yet when life's spring on purple wings is flown,
And the brisk flood a noisome puddle grown;
When the dark eye shall roll its orb for light,
And the roll'd orb confess impervious night;
When once untun'd the ear's contorted cell,
The silver cords unbrace the sounding shell;
Thy sick'ning soul no more a joy shall find,
Music no more shall stay thy lab'ring mind.
The breathing canvas glows in vain for thee,
In vain it blooms a gay eternity.

With thee the statue's boasts of life are o'er,
And Cæsar animates the brafs no more.
The flaming ruby, and the rich brocade,
The sprightly ball, the mimic masquerade
Now charm in vain—in vain the jovial god
With blushing goblets plies the dormant clod.

Then why thus fond to draw superfluous breath,
When every gasp protracts a painful death?
Age is a ghastly scene, cares, doubts and fears,
One dull rough road of sighs, groans, pains and tears.

Let not ambitious views usurp thy soul,
Ambition, friend, ambition grasps the pole.
The lustful eye on wealth's bright strand you fix,
And sigh for grandeur and a coach and six;
With golden stars you long to blend your fate,
And with the garter'd lordling slide in state.
An humbler theme my penfive hours employs,
(Hear ye sweet heavens, and speed the distant joys!
Of these possess'd I'd scorn to court renown,
Or bless the happy coxcombs of the town.)
To me, ye gods, these only gifts impart,
An easy fortune, and a cheerful heart;
A little muse, and innocently gay,
In sportive song to trifle cares away.
Two wishes gain'd, love forms the last and best,
And heaven's bright master-piece shall crown the rest.

REBUS.

THAT awful name which oft inspires
Impatient hopes, and fond desires,
Can to another pain impart,
And thrill with fear the shudd'ring heart.
This mystic word is often read
O'er the still chambers of the dead.
Say, what contains the breathless clay;
When the fleet soul is wing'd away?—
Those marble monuments proclaim
My little wily wanton's name.

TOMES.

ANOTHER.

THE golden stem, with generous aid,
Supports and feeds the fruitful blade.
The queen, who roll'd a thankless idle,
And gladden'd thousands with her smile
(When the well-manag'd pound of gold
Did more, than now the sum twice told);
This stem of Ceres, and the fair
Of Stuart's house, a name declare,
Where goodness is with beauty join'd,
Where queen and goddess both combin'd
To form an emblem of the mind.

ANOTHER.

THE light-footed female that bounds o'er the hills,
That feeds among lilies, and drinks of the rills,
And is fam'd for being tender and true;
Which Solomon deemed a simile rare,
To liken the two pretty breasts of his fair,
Is the name of the nymph I pursue.

ROE.

ANOTHER.

TELL me the fair, if such a fair there be,
Said Venus to her son, that rivals me.
Mark the tall tree, cried Cupid to the Dame,
That from its silver bark derives its name;
The studious insect, that, with wondrous pow'rs,
Extracts mysterious sweets from fragrant flow'rs;
Proclaim the nymph to whom all hearts submit,
Whose sweetness softens majesty and wit.

ASHBY.

ANOTHER.

THE name of the monarch that abandon'd his
throne,
Is the name of the fair, I prefer to his crown.

JAMES.

SOME HASTY RHYMES ON SLEEP.

MYSTERIOUS deity, impart
From whence thou com'st, and what thou art.
I feel thy pow'r, thy reign I bless,
But what I feel, I can't express.
Thou bind'st my limbs, but canst't restrain
The busy workings of the brain.
All nations of the air and land
Ask the soft blessing at thy hand.
The reptiles of the frozen zone
Are close attendants on thy throne;
Where painted basilisks enfold
Their azure scales in rolls of gold.

The slave, that's destin'd to the oar,
In one kind vision swims to shore;
The lover meets the willing fair,
And fondly grasps impassive air.
Last night the happy miser told
Twice twenty thousand pounds in gold.

The purple tenant of the crown
Implores thy aid on beds of down:
While Lubbin, and his healthy bride,
Obtain what monarchs are denied.

The garter'd statesman thou wouldst own,
But rebel conscience spurns thy throne;

Braves all the poppies of the fields,
 And the fam'd gum * that Turkey yields.
 While the good man, oppress'd with pain,
 Shall court thy smiles, nor sue in vain.
 Propitious thou'lt his prayer attend,
 And prove his guardian and his friend.
 Thy faithful hands shall make his bed,
 And thy soft arm support his head.

A SONG.

TELL me, my Cælia, why so coy,
 Of men so much afraid;
 Cælia, 'tis better for to die
 A mother than a maid.

The rose, when past its damask hue,
 Is always out of favour;
 And when the plum hath lost its blue,
 It loses too its flavour.

To vernal flow'rs the rolling years
 Returning beauty bring;
 But faded once, thou'lt bloom no more,
 Nor know a second spring.

A SUNDAY HYMN,

IN IMITATION OF DR. WATT'S.

THIS is the day the Lord of life
 Ascended to the skies;
 My thoughts, pursue the lofty theme,
 And to the heav'n arise.

Let no vain cares divert my mind
 From this celestial road;
 Nor all the honours of the earth
 Detain my soul from God.

Think of the splendors of that place,
 The joys that are on high;
 Nor meanly rest contented here,
 With worlds beneath the sky.

Heav'n is the birth-place of the saints,
 To heav'n their souls ascend;
 Th' Almighty owns his favourite race,
 As father and as friend.

Oh! may these lovely titles prove
 My comfort and defence,
 When the sick couch shall be my lot,
 And death shall call me hence.

AN ODE ON THE MESSIAH.

WHEN man had disobey'd his Lord,
 Vindictive Justice drew the sword;
 "The rebel and his race shall die."
 He spake, and thunders burst the sky.

Lo! Jesus pard'ning grace displays;
 Nor thunders roll, nor lightnings blazé.
 Jesus, the Saviour stands confest,
 In rays of mildest glories drest.

As round Him press th' angelic crowd,
 Mercy and truth he calls aloud;

* Or rather inspissated juice, Opium.

The smiling cherubs wing'd to view,
 Their pinions founded as they flew.

"Ye favourites of the throne, arise,
 Bear the strange tidings through the skies;
 Say, man, th' apostate rebel, lives;
 Say, Jesus bleeds, and Heav'n forgives."

In pity to the fallen race,
 I'll take their nature and their place;
 I'll bleed, their pardon to procure,
 I'll die, to make that pardon sure.

Now Jesus leaves his blest abode,
 A virgin's womb receives the God.
 When the tenth moon had wan'd on earth,
 A virgin's womb disclos'd the birth.

New praise employs th' æthereal throng,
 Their golden harps repeat the song;
 And angels waft th' immortal strains
 To humble Beth'lem's happy plains.

While there the guardians of the sleep
 By night their faithful vigils keep,
 Celestial notes their ears delight,
 And floods of glory drown their sight.

When Gabriel thus, "Exult, ye swains,
 Jesus, your own Messiah, reigns.
 Arise, the Royal Babe behold,
 Jesus, by ancient bards foretold.

"To David's town direct your way,
 And thout, Salvation's born to-day;
 There, in a manger's mean disguise,
 You'll find the Sovereign of the skies."

What joy Salvation's sound imparts,
 You best can tell, ye guileless hearts;
 Whom no vain science led astray,
 Nor taught to scorn Salvation's way.

Though regal purple spurns these truths,
 Maintain your ground ye chosen youths;
 Brave the stern tyrant's lifted rod,
 Nor blush to own a dying God.

What! though the sages of the earth
 Proudly dispute this wondrous birth;
 Though learning mocks Salvation's voice,
 Know, Heav'n applauds your wiser choice.

Oh! be this wiser choice my own!
 Bear me, some seraph to his throne,
 Where the rapt soul dissolves away
 In visions of eternal day.

AN ODE ON THE NEW YEAR.

LORD of my life, inspire my song,
 To thee my noblest powers belong;
 Grant me thy favourite seraph's flame,
 To sing the glories of thy name.

My birth, my fortune, friends, and health,
 My knowledge too, superior wealth!
 Lord of my life, to thee I owe;
 Teach me to practise what I know.

Ten thousand favours claim my song,
 And each demands an angel's tongue;

Mercy sits smiling on the wings,
Of every moment as it springs.

But oh! with infinite surprize
I see returning years arise;
When unimprov'd the former score,
Lord, wilt thou trust me still with more!

Thousands this period hop'd to see;
Deny'd to thousands, granted me;
Thousands! that weep, and wish, and pray
For those rich hours I throw away.

The tribute of my heart receive,
'Tis the poor all I have to give;
Should it prove faithless, Lord, I'd wrest
The bleeding traitor from my breast.

ADDRESSED TO A YOUNG LADY,

Whose favourite Bird was almost killed by a fall from her Finger.

As Tiney, in a wanton mood,
Upon his Lucy's finger stood,
Ambitious to be free;
With breast elate, he eager tries,
By flight to reach the distant skies,
And gain his liberty.

Ah! luckless bird, what though caref's'd,
And fondled in the fair one's breast,
Taught e'en by her to sing;
Know that to check thy temper wild,
And make thy manners soft and mild,
Thy mistresses cut thy wing.

The feather'd tribe, who cleave the air,
Their weights by equal plumage bear,
And quick escape our pow'r;
Not so with Tiney, dear delight,
His shorten'd wing repress'd his flight,
And threw him on the floor.

Stunn'd with the fall, he seem'd to die,
For quickly clos'd his sparkling eye,
Scarce heav'd his pretty breast;
Alarmed for her favourite care,
Lucy assumes a pensive air,
And is at heart distress'd.

The stoic soul, in gravest strain,
May call these feelings light and vain,
Which thus from fondness flow:
Yet, if the bard arightly deems,
'Tis nature's fount which feeds the streams
That purest joys bestow.

So, shou'd it be fair Lucy's fate,
Whene'er she wills a change of state,
To boast a mother's name;
These feelings then, thou charming maid,
In brightest lines shall be display'd,
And praise uncurf'd claim.

RIDDLE.

From the dark caverns of the earth
Our family derive their birth;
By nature we appear to view
A rugged and a stubborn crew.

But Vulcan's brawny sons, by art,
Soften the hardness of our heart;
Give to a slender shape its grace,
And a bright polish to our face.
Thus education makes us mild,
Pliant and ductile as a child.

Survey the attire of man, you'll trace
Our friendship for the human race.
We love mankind, indeed we do,
Our actions prove our speeches true.
But what is wondrous strange to name,
The aged female is our flame.
When strength decays, and optics fail,
And cold and penury prevail,
Our labours spare the matron's sight,
We ask but faint supplies of light.
Kindly our ancient girls regale,
With food, with fuel, and with ale.
We, as associates to mankind,
All act our various parts assign'd.
No useless hands obstruct our schemes,
We suit our numbers to our themes;
Hence only two of us apply,
To form a bandage for the thigh;
But when the gray industrious Peg
Demands a vestment for the leg,
'Tis then in little crowds we join,
To aid the matron's wise design.
Thus four or five of us you'll see,
And each as busy as a bee;
Besides a kind assistant near,
Which Peg had stuck athwart her ear.

Now lazes, if our name you'll tell,
And vow you'll always use us well,
We'll grant your wish to change your life,
And make each fair a happy wife.

KNITTING NEEDLE.

ANOTHER.

To you, fair maidens, I address,
Sent to adorn your life;
And she who first my name can guess,
Shall first be made a wife.

From the dark womb of mother earth,
To mortals' aid I come;
But ere I can receive my birth,
I many shapes assume.

Passive by nature, yet I'm made
As active as the roe;
And oftentimes, with equal speed,
Through flowery lawns I go.

When wicked men their wealth consume,
And leave their children poor,
To me their daughters often come,
And I increase their store.

The women of the wiser kind,
Did never once refuse me;
But yet I never once could find
That maids of honour use me.

The lily hand and brilliant eye,
May charm without my aid;
Beauty may strike the lover's eye
And love inspire the maid.

But let the enchanting nymph be told,
Unless I grace her life,
She must have wondrous store of gold,
Or make a wretched wife.

Although I never hope to rest,
With Christians I go forth;
And while they worship to the east,
I prostrate to the north.

If you suspect hypocrisy,
Or think me insincere,
Produce the zealot, who, like me,
Can tremble and adhere.

NEEDLE.

ANOTHER.

I AM by nature soft as silk,
By nature too as white as milk;
I am a constant friend to man,
And serve him every way I can.
When dipt in wax, or plung'd in oil,
I make his winter evenings smile:
By India taught I spread his bed,
Or deck his favourite Celia's head;
Her gayest garbs I oft compose,
And ah! sometimes, I wipe her nose.

COTTON.

ANOTHER.

I AM a small volume, and frequently bound
In silk, fatten, silver, or gold;
My worth and my praises the females refund,
By females my science is told.

My leaves are all scarlet, my letters are steel,
Each letter contains a great treasure;
To the poor they spell lodging, fuel, and meal,
To the rich entertainment and pleasure.

The sempstress explores me by day and by night,
Not a page but she turns o'er and o'er;
Though sometimes I injure the milliner's sight,
Still I add to her credit and store.

'Tis true I am seldom regarded by men,
Yet what would the males do without me?
Let them boast of their head, or boast of their pen,
Still vain is their boast, if they flout me.

NEEDLE BOOK.

PSALM XIII.

OFFENDED Majesty! how long
Wilt thou conceal thy face?
How long refuse my fainting soul
The succours of thy grace?

While sorrow wrings my bleeding heart,
And black despondence reigns,
Satan exults at my complaints,
And triumphs o'er my pains.

Let thy returning spirit, Lord,
Dispel the shades of night;
Smile on my poor deserted soul,
My God, thy smiles are light.

While scoffers at thy sacred word
Deride the pangs I feel,

Deem my religion insincere,
Or call it useless zeal.

Yet will I ne'er repent my choice,
I'll ne'er withdraw my trust;
I know thee, Lord; a pow'ful friend,
And kind, and wife, and just.

To doubt thy goodness wou'd be base
Ingratitude in me;
Past favours shall renew my hopes,
And fix my faith in thee.

Indulgent God! my willing tongue
Thy praises shall prolong;
For oh! thy bounty fires my breast,
And rapture swells my song.

PSALM XLII.

WITH fierce desire the hunted hart
Explores the cooling stream;
Mine is a passion stronger far,
And mine a nobler theme.

Yes, with superior fervours, Lord,
I thirst to see thy face;
My languid soul would fain approach
The fountains of thy grace.

Oh! the great plenty of thy house,
The rich refreshments there!
To live an exile from thy courts,
O'erwhelms me with despair.

In worship when I join'd thy saints,
How sweetly pass'd my days!
Prayer my divine employment then,
And all my pleasure praise.

But now I'm lost to every joy,
Because detain'd from thee;
Those golden periods ne'er return,
Or ne'er return to me.

Yet, O my soul, why thus deprest,
And whence this anxious fear?
Let former favours fix thy trust,
And check the rising tear.

When darkness and when sorrows rose,
And press'd on every side,
Did not the Lord sustain thy steps,
And was not God thy guide?

Affliction is a stormy deep,
Where wave refounds to wave;
Though o'er my head the billows roll,
I know the Lord can save.

Perhaps, before the morning dawns,
He'll reinstate my peace;
For he, who bade the tempest roar,
Can bid the tempest cease.

In the dark watches of the night
I'll count his mercies o'er;
I'll praise him for ten thousand past
And humbly sue for more.

Then, O my soul, why thus deprest,
And whence this anxious fear?
Let former favours fix thy trust,
And check the rising tear.

Here will I rest, and build my hopes,
Nor murmur at his rod;
He's more than all the world to me,
My health, my life, my God!

THE NIGHT PIECE.

HARK! the prophetic raven brings
My summons on his boding wings;
The birds of night my fate foretel,
The prescient death-watch sounds my knell.

A solemn darkness spreads the tomb,
But terrors haunt the midnight gloom;
Methinks a browner horror falls,
And silent spectres sweep the walls.

Tell me, my soul, oh tell me why
The faltering tongue, the broken sigh?
Thy manly cheeks bedew'd with tears,
Tell me, my soul, from whence these fears?

When conscious guilt arrests the mind,
Avenging furies stalk behind,
And sickly fancy intervenes,
'To dress the visionary scenes.

Jesus, to thee I'll fly for aid,
Propitious Sun, dispel the shade;
All the pale family of fear
Would vanish, were my Saviour here.

No more imagin'd spectres walk,
No more the doubtful echoes talk;
Soft zephyrs fan the neighbouring trees,
And meditation mounts the breeze.

How sweet these sacred hours of rest,
Fair portraits of the virtuous breast,
Where lawless lust, and passions rude,
And folly never dare intrude!

Be others' choice the sparkling bowl,
And mirth, the poison of the soul;
Or midnight dance, and public shows,
Parents of sickness, pains, and woes.

A nobler joy my thoughts design;
Instructive solitude be mine;
Be mine that silent calm repast,
A cheerful conscience to the last.

That tree which bears immortal fruit,
Without a canker at the root;
That friend which never fails the just,
When other friends desert their trust.

Come then, my soul, be this thy guest,
And leave to knaves and fools the rest.
With this thou ever shalt be gay,
And night shall brighten into day.

With this companion in the shade,
Surely thou couldst not be dismay'd:
But if thy Saviour here were found,
All Paradise would bloom around.

"Had I a firm and lasting faith,"
To credit what the Almighty saith,
I could defy the midnight gloom,
And the pale monarch of the tomb.

Though tempests drive me from the shore,
And floods descend, and billows roar;

Though death appears in every form,
My little bark should brave the storm.

Then if my God requir'd the life
Of brother, parent, child, or wife,
Lord, I should bless the stern decree,
And give my dearest friend to thee.

Amidst the various scenes of ills,
Each stroke some kind design fulfils;
And shall I murmur at my God,
When sovereign love directs the rod?

Peace, rebel-thoughts—I'll not complain,
My Father's smiles suspend my pain;
Smiles—that a thousand joys impart,
And pour the balm that heals the smart.

Though Heaven afflicts, I'll not repine,
Each heart-felt comfort still is mine;
Comforts that shall o'er death prevail,
And journey with me through the vale.

Dear Jesus, smooth that rugged way,
And lead me to the realms of day,
To milder skies, and brighter plains,
Where everlasting sunshine reigns.

TO THE REV. JAMES HERVEY,

ON HIS MEDITATIONS.

To form the taste, and raise the nobler part,
To mend the morals, and to warn the heart;
To trace the genial source we nature call,
And prove the God of nature, friend of all;
Hervey for this his mental landscape drew,
And sketch'd the whole creation out to view.

Th' enamell'd bloom, and variegated flow'r,
Whose crimson changes with the changing hour;
The humble shrub, whose fragrance scents the
morn,

With buds disclosing to the early dawn;
The oaks that grace Britannia's mountains' side,
And spicy Lebanon's superior * pride;
All loudly sov'reign excellence proclaim,
And animated worlds confess the same.

The azure fields that form th' extended sky,
The planetary globes that roll on high,
And solar orbs, of proudest blaze, combine
To act subservient to the great design.
Men, angels, seraphs, join the gen'ral voice,
And in the Lord of nature all rejoice.

His the gray winter's venerable guise,
Its shrouded glories, and instructive skies †; [blade;
His the snow's plumes, that brood the sick'ning
His the bright pendant that impels the glade;
The waving forest, or the whisp'ring brake;
The surging billow, or the sleeping lake.
The same who pours the beauties of the spring,
Or mounts the whirlwind's desolating wing:
The same who smiles in Nature's peaceful form,
Frowns in the tempest, and directs the storm.

'Tis thine, bright teacher, to improve the age;
'Tis thine, whose life's a comment on thy page;
Thy happy page! whose periods sweetly flow,
Whose figures charm us, and whose colours glow:

* The Cedar.

† Referring to the Winter-Piece.

Where artless piety pervades the whole,
 Refines the genius, and exalts the soul.
 For let the witing argue all he can,
 It is religion still that makes the man.
 'Tis this, my friend, that streaks our morning
 bright;
 'Tis this that gilds the horrors of the night.
 When wealth forsakes us, and when friends are few;
 When friends are faithless, or when foes pursue;
 'Tis this that wards the blow, or stills the smart,
 Disarms affliction, or repels its dart;
 Within the breast bids purest rapture rise;
 Bids smiling conscience spread her cloudless skies.
 When the storm thickens, and the thunder rolls,
 When the earth trembles to the affrighted poles,
 The virtuous mind nor doubts nor fears assail;
 For storms are zephyrs, or a gentler gale.
 And when disease obstructs the lab'ring breath;
 When the heart sickens, and each pulse is death;
 E'en then religion shall sustain the just,
 Grace their last moments, nor desert their dust.

UNDER A SUN-DIAL IN THE CHURCH-YARD AT THORNEY.

MARK well my shade, and seriously attend
 The silent lesson of a common friend—
 Since time and life speed hastily away,
 And neither can recal the former day,
 Improve each fleeting hour before 'tis past,
 And know, each fleeting hour may be thy last.

TO THE MEMORY
 OF THE REV. MR. SAMUEL CLARK,
 WHO DIED DECEMBER THE 26TH, AGED 42*.

In all the intercourses of humanity
 He was upright, prudent, and courteous,
 Compassionate, kind, and beneficent.
 In opinion
 Candid, diffident, and judicious.
 In argument
 Calm, strong, and persuasive.
 Under difficulties and sorrows
 Collected, firm, and resign'd.
 In friendship
 Faithful, entertaining, and instructive.
 In his ministerial capacity
 He possessed every valuable and happy talent
 To rectify the judgment, and improve the heart.
 He was learned without pride,
 And pious without ostentation;
 Zealous and indefatigable to advance the interest
 Of true religion,
 And the everlasting welfare of those who were intrusted
 To his pastoral care.

What! though such various worth is seldom known,
 No adulation rears this sacred stone,
 No partial love this genuine picture draws,
 No venal pencil prostitutes applause:
 Justice and truth in artless colours paint
 The Man, the Friend, the Preacher, and the Saint.

Nature, when scarce fair light he knew,
Snatch'd heav'n, earth, beauty from his view,
And darkness round him reigns:
The muse with pity view'd his doom,
And darting through th' eternal gloom
An intellectual ray,
Bade him with music's voice inspire
The plaintive flute, the sprightly lyre,
And tune th' impassion'd lay.

THE

THE LIFE OF BLACKLOCK.

THE Life of BLACKLOCK has a claim to notice beyond that of most of the poets of our nation, with whom he is now associated. He who reads his poems with that interest which their intrinsic merit deserves, will feel that interest very much increased, when he shall be told the various difficulties which their author overcame in their production, the obstacles which nature and fortune had placed in his way, to the possession of those ideas which his mind acquired, to the communication of those which his poetry unfolds.

A short "Account of the Life and Writings" of this extraordinary man, was prefixed to the second edition of his Poems, printed at Edinburgh, in 1754, by his friend Mr. Gilbert Gordon of Dumfries, author of "Taste, an Epistle to a Lady," in Donaldson's "Collection of Poems," 1760. A more elaborate "Account of his Life, Character, and Poems," was given to the world by Mr. Spence, the amiable and elegant author of the "Essay on Pope's Odyssey," "Polymetis," &c. in an 8vo pamphlet, published at London in the same year, and afterwards prefixed to the 4to edition of his Poems, which came out by subscription at London in 1756. These accounts having been written at a period so early as to include only the opening events of his life, a more full, accurate and interesting "Account of his Life and Writings," was prefixed to the 4to edition of his Poems, printed at Edinburgh in 1793, by Henry Mackenzie, Esq. author of "The Prince of Tunis," "The Man of Feeling," and other ingenious and elegant performances.

The facts stated in the present account, are chiefly taken from Mr. Mackenzie's narrative, which is written with such copiousness of intelligence, as leaves little to be supplied, and such felicity of performance, as precludes the most distant hope of improvement. Among the few additional particulars detailed here, the present writer has endeavoured to give a complete account of his writings, the want of which is the principal defect in Mr. Mackenzie's narrative.

Thomas Blacklock was born at Annan, in the county of Dumfries, Nov. 10. 1721. His parents were natives of the county of Cumberland. His father was by trade a bricklayer, his mother the daughter of a considerable dealer in cattle; both respectable in their characters, and it would appear possessed of considerable knowledge and urbanity, which, in a country where education was cheap, and property a good deal subdivided, was often the case with persons of their station.

Before he was six months old, he was totally deprived of his eye-sight by the small-pox, and reduced to that forlorn situation so feelingly described by himself in his Soliloquy. This rendered him incapable of any of those mechanical trades to which his father might naturally have been inclined to breed him, and his circumstances prevented his aspiring to the higher professions. The good man, therefore, kept his son in his house, and, with the assistance of some of his friends, fostered that inclination which he early showed for books, by reading, to amuse him; first the simple sort of publications which are commonly put into the hands of children, and then several passages out of some of our poets. His companions, whom his early gentleness, and kindness of disposition, as well as their compassion for his misfortune, strongly attached to him, were very assiduous in their good offices, in reading, to instruct and amuse him. By their assistance, he acquired some knowledge of the Latin tongue; but he never was at a grammar school till at a more advanced period of life. Poetry was even then his favourite reading, and he found an enthusiastic delight in the works of Milton, Spenser, Prior, Pope and Addison, and in those of his countryman, Ramsay.

From loving and admiring them so much, he soon was led to endeavour to imitate them; and when scarce twelve years of age, he began to write verses. Among these early essays of his genius, there was one addressed To a little girl whom he had offended, written at twelve years of age, which is preserved in his works, and is not perhaps inferior to any of the premature compositions of boys, assisted by the best education, which are only recalled into notice by the future fame of their authors.

He had attained the age of nineteen, when his father was killed by the accidental fall of a malt-kiln belonging to his son-in-law. This loss, heavy to any one at that early age, would have been, however, to a young man possessing the ordinary advantages of education comparatively light; but to him, thus suddenly deprived of that support on which his youth had leaned, destitute almost of any resource which industry affords to those who have the blessings of sight, with a body feeble and delicate from nature, and a mind congenially susceptible, it was not surprising that this blow was doubly severe, and threw on his spirits that despondent gloom to which he then gave way, and which sometimes overclouded them in the subsequent period of his life.

Though dependent, however, he was not destitute of friends, and heaven rewarded the pious confidence which he expressed in its care, by providing for him protectors and patrons, by whose assistance he obtained advantages, which, had his father lived, might perhaps never have opened to him.

He lived with his mother about a year after his father's death, and began to be distinguished as a young man of uncommon parts and genius. These were at that time unassisted by learning; the circumstances of his family affording him no better education than the smattering of Latin which his companions had taught him, and the perusal and recollection of the few English authors, which they, or his father, in the intervals of his professional labours, had read to him.

Poetry, however, though it attains its highest perfection in a cultivated soil, grows perhaps as luxuriantly in a wild one. To poetry he was devoted from his earliest days, and about this time several of his poetical productions began to be handed about, which considerably enlarged the circle of his friends and acquaintance.

Some of his compositions being shown to Dr. Stevenson, an eminent physician in Edinburgh, who was accidentally at Dumfries, on a professional visit, he formed the benevolent design of carrying him to the metropolis, and giving to his natural endowments the assistance of a classical education.

He came to Edinburgh in 1741, and "was enrolled," says Mr. Mackenzie, "a student of divinity in the university there, though at that time without any particular view of entering into the church." But this account may be reasonably doubted; for, in the university of Edinburgh, no student is admitted into the theological class, till he has completed a course of languages and philosophy. Besides, it appears by the following letter from the Rev. Richard Batty of Kirk Andrews, whose wife was Blacklock's cousin, to Sir James Johnston, Bart. of Westerhall, dated January 21. 1744-5, printed in the "Scottish Register" 1794, that he continued at the grammar school in Edinburgh, till the beginning of 1745.

"I had a letter sometime ago from Mr. Hoggan at Comlongan, signifying that Lady Annandale had spoke to you about a burfary for one Thomas Blacklock, a blind boy, who is now at the grammar school in Edinburgh. He is endued with the most surprising genius, and has been the author of a great many excellent poems. He has been hitherto supported by the bounty of Dr. Stevenson, a gentleman in Edinburgh. I understand that there will be a burfary vacant against Candlemas; if, therefore, you would please to favour him with your interest, it will be a great charity done to a poor lad, who may do a great deal of good in his generation."

The effect of this application is not known; but he seems to have continued his studies under the patronage of Dr. Stevenson till the year 1745. Of the kindness of Dr. Stevenson, he always spoke with the greatest warmth of gratitude and affection, and addressed to him his Imitation of the first Ode of Horace.

After he had followed his studies at Edinburgh, for four years, on the breaking out of the Rebellion in 1745, he returned to Dumfries, where he resided with Mr. M'Murdo, his brother-in-law, in whose house he was treated with kindness and affection, and had an opportunity from the society which it afforded, of considerably increasing the store of his ideas.

In 1746, he published a small collection of his Poems, in octavo, at Glasgow.

After the close of the Rebellion, and complete restoration of the peace of the country, he returned to Edinburgh, and pursued his studies there for six years longer.

In 1754, he published at Edinburgh a second edition of his Poems, very much improved and enlarged, in octavo, to which was prefixed, "An Account of his Life," in a "letter to the publisher," from Mr. Gordon of Dumfries. On the title page he is designed Student of Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh; so that he was not then, as Mr. Mackenzie supposes, "enrolled a student of divinity."

This publication attracted the attention of Mr. Spence, the patron of Doddsley, Duck, and Richardson, and other persons of indigent and uncultivated genius, who conceived a great regard for Blacklock, and formed the benevolent design of recommending him to the patronage of persons "in affluence or power," by writing a very elaborate and ingenious "Account of his Life, Character, and Poems," which he published at London, in 8vo, 1754.

During his last residence in Edinburgh, among other literary acquaintance, he obtained that of the celebrated David Hume, who, with that humanity and benevolence for which he was distinguished, attached himself warmly to Blacklock's interests. He wrote a "letter to Doddsley," March 12. 1754, containing a very favourable representation of the "goodness of his disposition, and the beauty of his genius," which contributed to promote the subscription for an edition of his Poems in 4to, which was published at London in 1756, under the superintendance of Mr. Spence, with his "Account of the Life, Character, and Poems of Mr. Blacklock," which had been printed separately in 1754. He testified his obligations to Mr. Spence, to whom he was personally unknown, in an Epistle, written at Dumfries, 1759.

In the course of his education at Edinburgh, he acquired a proficiency in the learned languages, and became more a master of the French tongue than was common there, from the social intercourse to which he had the good fortune to be admitted in the house of Provost Alexander, who had married a native of France.

At the university, he obtained a knowledge of the various branches of philosophy and theology, to which his course of study naturally led, and acquired at the same time a considerable fund of learning and information in those departments of Science and Belles Lettres, from which his want of sight did not absolutely preclude him.

In 1756, he published at Edinburgh, An Essay towards Universal Etymology, or the Analysis of a Sentence, 8vo. In this pamphlet, the general principles of grammar, and the definitions of the several parts of speech are given in verse; and illustrations, in the form of notes, constituting the greatest part of it, are added in prose. The notes and illustrations are concise, but judicious; the verses are not remarkable for learning or poetical embellishment, the subject did not allow it; the concluding lines, however, on the Advantages of Grammar, are in a style more worthy of Blacklock.

In 1757, he began a course of study, with a view to give lectures on Oratory, to young gentlemen intended for the bar or the pulpit. On this occasion, he wrote to Mr. Hume, informed him of his plan, and requested his assistance in the prosecution of it. But Mr. Hume doubting the probability of its success, he abandoned the project, and then adopted the decided intention of going into the church.

After applying closely for a considerable time to the study of theology, he passed the usual trials in the presbytery of Dumfries, and was by that presbytery licenced a Preacher of the Gospel in 1759.

As a preacher, he obtained high reputation, and was fond of composing sermons. In 1760, when the nation was alarmed by a threatened invasion from the French, he published "The Right Improvement of Time, a Sermon," 8vo. He seems to have imbibed pretty deeply the apprehensions of his countrymen. The sentiments it contains are just and solid, and the advices are calculated to be useful at all times, particularly in the prospect of national danger or distress.

The same year he contributed several poetical pieces to the first volume of Donaldson's "Collection of Original Poems by Scotch Gentlemen," 12mo. Mrs. Blacklock ascribes the "Epistle on Taste," printed in this volume, as Mr. Gordon's, to Blacklock, excepting the lines relating to himself.

In 1761, he published, "Faith, Hope, and Charity, compared, a Sermon," 8vo. Though this cannot be called a first rate performance, it abounds with just and elegant remarks, and his favourite topic of charity is agreeably and forcibly illustrated.

In 1762, he married Miss Sarah Johnston, daughter of Mr. Joseph Johnston, surgeon in Dumfries, a man of eminence in his profession, and of a character highly respected; a connexion which formed the great solace and blessing of his future life, and gave him with all the tenderness of a wife, all the zealous care of a guide and a friend. This event took place a few days before his being ordained minister of Kirkcudbright, in consequence of a presentation from the Crown, obtained for him by the Earl of Selkirk, a benevolent nobleman, whom Blacklock's situation and genius had interested in his behalf. But the inhabitants of the parish, whether from an aversion to patronage, so prevalent among the lower ranks in North Britain, from some political disputes which at that time subsisted between them and Lord Selkirk, or from those prejudices which some of them might naturally entertain against a person deprived of sight, or perhaps from all those causes united, were so extremely disinclined to receive him as their minister, that, after a legal dispute of nearly two years, it was thought expedient by his friends, as it had always been wished by himself, to compromise the matter, by resigning his right to the living, and accepting a moderate annuity in its stead.

The following anecdote of Blacklock, mentioned in Dr. Cleghorn's Thesis, De Somno, happened, at the inn in Kirkcudbright, on the day of his ordination, and is authenticated by the testimony of Mrs. Blacklock, who was present, with Mr. Gordon and a numerous company of his friends who dined with him on the occasion. It merits notice both as a curious fact, relative to the state of the mind in sleep, and on account of the just and elegant compliment with which it concludes.

"Dr. Blacklock, one day, harassed by the censures of the populace, whereby not only his reputation, but his very subsistence was endangered, and fatigued with mental exertion, fell asleep after dinner. Some hours after, he was called upon by a friend, answered his salutation, rose and went with him into the dining room, where some of his companions were met. He joined with two of them in a concert, singing as usual, with taste and elegance, without missing a note, or forgetting a word; he then went to supper, and drank a glass or two of wine. His friends, however, observed him to be a little absent and inattentive; by and by he began to speak to himself, but in so slow and confused a manner, as to be unintelligible. At last being pretty forcibly roused, he awoke with a sudden start, unconscious of all that had happened, as till then he had continued fast asleep." Dr. Cleghorn adds, with great truth, after relating this fact. "No one will suspect either the judgment or the veracity of Dr. Blacklock. All who knew him bear testimony to his judgment; his fame rests on a better foundation than fictitious narratives; no man delights in, or more strictly adheres, on all points, to the truth."

With this slender provision, he removed, in 1764, to Edinburgh; and to make up by his industry, a more comfortable and decent subsistence, he adopted the plan of receiving a certain number of young gentlemen as boarders, into his house, whose studies in languages and philosophy, he might, if necessary, assist. In this situation he continued till 1787, when he found his time of life and state of health required a degree of repose, which induced him to discontinue the receiving of boarders.

In the occupation which he thus exercised for so many years of his life, no teacher were, perhaps, ever more agreeable to his pupils, nor master of a family to its inmates, than Blacklock. The gentleness of his manners, the benignity of his disposition, and that warm interest in the happiness of others, which led him so constantly to promote it, were qualities that could not fail to procure him the love and regard of the young gentlemen committed to his charge; while the society which esteem and respect for his character and his genius, often assembled at his house, afforded them an advantage rarely to be found in establishments of a similar kind. In the circle of his friends, he appeared entirely to forget the privation of sight, and the melancholy which at other times it might produce. He entered, with the cheerful playfulness of a young man, into all the sprightly narrative, the sportful fancy, the humourous jest that rose around him. It was a sight highly gratifying to philanthropy, to see how much a mind endowed with knowledge, kindled by genius, and above all lighted up with innocence and piety, like Blacklock's, could overcome the weight of its own calamity, and enjoy the content, the happiness, and the gaiety of others. Several of those inmates of his house, were students of physic, from England, Ireland, and America, who retained in future life, all the warmth of that impression, which his friendship at this early period had made upon them; and in various quarters of the world, he had friends and correspondents, from whom no length of time, nor distance of place, had ever estranged him. Among his favourite correspondents may be reckoned Dr. Tucker, author of "The Bermudian," a poem, and "The Anchorite," and Dr. Downman, author of "Infancy," a poem, and other ingenious performances.

In 1766, upon the unsolicited recommendation of his friend Dr. Beattie, the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred on him by the University and Marischal College of Aberdeen.

In 1767, he published Paraclesis; or, Consolations deduced from Natural and Revealed Religion; in two Dissertations. The first supposed to have been composed by Cicero, now rendered into English; the last originally written by Thomas Blacklock, D. D. 8vo. His motive, he tells, in a letter to a friend, prefixed to this work, for translating the first, and writing the last treatise on Consolation, was to alleviate the pressure of repeated disappointments, to sooth his anguish for the loss of departed friends, to elude the rage of implacable and unprovoked enemies, and to support his own mind, which, for a number of years, besides its literary difficulties, and its natural disadvantages, had maintained an incessant struggle with fortune. Of the Dissertation ascribed to Cicero, he endeavours to prove the authenticity; but his arguments are by no means satisfactory. The generality of critics have questioned its authenticity. Dr. Middleton, in his "Life of Cicero," says, it is "undoubtedly spurious." The translation is well executed; it is both faithful and elegant. The second Dissertation is mostly taken up with a clear and succinct view of the evidences of Christianity, the professed subject of it; the consolation derived from revealed religion, is touched upon towards the conclusion, though at no great length.

In 1768, he published, without his name, Two Discourses on the Spirit and Evidences of Christianity. The former preached at the Hague the 8th of September 1762, the latter delivered in the French Church at Hanau, on the occasion of the late Peace, to a Congregation composed of Catholics and Protestants, translated from the original French of the Rev. Mr. James Armand, Minister of the Waloon Church in Hanau, and dedicated by the translator the Rev. Moderator of the General Assembly, 8vo. The dedication, which is a long one, is chiefly intended for the perusal of the clergy of the Church of Scotland, but deserves the attentive consideration of all who are intended for, or engaged in, the work of the ministry. The observations it contains are judicious and pertinent; the style is sprightly and animated; and the spirit it breathes, though sometimes remote from that charity, which on other occasions he so eloquently enforced, and so generally practised, is the spirit of benevolence and love to mankind. The Discourses themselves are lively and animated; and the style of the translations clear, nervous, and spirited.

In 1773, he published, at Edinburgh, a poem, intituled, A Panegyric on Great Britain, 8vo; this poem, which is a kind of satire on the age, exhibits shrewdness of observation, and a sarcastic vein, which might have fitted him for satirical composition, had he chosen to employ his pen more frequently on that branch of poetry.

In music, both as a judge and a performer, his skill was considerable; nor was he unacquainted with its principles as a science. Whether he composed much is uncertain, but there is published in "The Edinburgh Magazine and Review" for 1774, Absence, a Pastoral, set to Music, by Dr. Blacklock; and those who have heard him sing, will, upon perusal of this little piece, have the idea of his manner and taste strikingly recalled to their recollection.

The same year he published the Graham, an Heroic Ballad, in Four Cantos, 4to. "It was begun," he tells us, in the advertisement prefixed to it, "and pursued by its author to divert wakeful and melancholy hours, which the recollection of past misfortunes, and the sense of present inconveniencies, would otherwise have severely embittered." The professed intention of his Graham, is to cherish and encourage a mutual harmony between the inhabitants of South and North Britain. To this end he has exhibited, in strong colours, some parts of those miseries which their ancient animosities had occasioned. His Graham is an affecting story, in which love and jealousy have a principal share. The narration is animated and agreeable; the fable is beautifully fancied, and sufficiently perspicuous; the characters are boldly marked; the manners he paints suit the times to which he refers, and the moral is momentous; and we perceive scattered through the whole piece, those secret graces, and those bewitching beauties which the critic would in vain attempt to describe. But it is perhaps too far spun out, and the stanza in which it is written is not the best chosen, nor the most agreeable to the ear.

This was the last publication which he gave to the world with his name. From this time, the state of his health, which had always been infirm and delicate, began visibly to decline. He frequently complained of a lowness of spirits, and was occasionally subject to deafness, which, though he seldom felt in any great degree, was sufficient in his situation, to whom the sense of hearing was almost the only channel of communication with the external world, to cause very lively uneasiness. Amidst these indispositions of body, however, and disquietudes of mind, the gentleness of his temper never forsook him, and he felt all that resignation and confidence in the Supreme Being, which his earliest and latest life equally acknowledged. In Summer 1791, he was seized with a feverish disorder, which at first seemed of a slight, and never rose to a very violent kind; but a frame so little robust as his was not able to resist; and after about a week's illness, it carried him off, on the 7th of July 1791, in the 70th year of his age. He was interred in the burying-ground of the Chapel of Ease, in the parish of St. Cuthbert's, where, on a tomb-stone erected to his memory by his wife, is the following inscription, written by Dr. Beattie:

Τὸν κίρι μῦθ' ἐφίλησε, δίδου δ' ἀγαθὸν τε, κακὸν τε,
Ὀφθαλμῶν μὲν ἄμεγεσι, δίδου δ' ἠδῶσαν αἰσῆσι.

In 1793, a new edition of his Poems, reprinted from the 4to edition 1756, with several additional pieces never before printed, together with an Essay on the Education of the Blind, translated from the French of M. Hauy, and "A New Account of the Life and Writings of the Author," written by Mr. Mackenzie, was published at Edinburgh in one volume 4to. In this edition, the following acknowledged poetical productions of Blacklock are not inserted; Prologue to Sir Harry Gayleve; Absence, a Pastoral; Panegyric on Great Britain; and The Graham, published separately; and An Epistle to Two Sisters on their Wedding day; Estimate of Human Greatness; to the Dutchess of Hamilton, on her recovery from Child-bed, after the birth of the Marquis of Clydesdale; Ode on a favourite Lap-dog; Ode to a Successful Rival; Cato Uticensis to his Wife at Rome; The Chronicle of a Heart's Song Inscribed to a Friend, in imitation of Shenstone, originally printed in the first volume of Donaldson's "Collection of Poems, by the Rev. Mr. Blacklock, and other Scotch Gentlemen," 12mo, 1760. It may be observed, that the verses "To a Lady, with Hammond's Elegies," inserted in this edition, are not printed as Blacklock's, in Donaldson's "Collection." The present writer has not ventured, upon the authority of Mrs. Blacklock, to deprive Mr. Gordon of the "Epistle on Taste," to which he has put his name. His Poems, reprinted from the edition 1793, together with the several pieces omitted in that edition, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

Besides these publications, which are known to be Blacklock's, and to some of which he put his name, he was the author of several pieces, not so generally known to have come from him. Among these, there are some articles in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," 1783. The interesting article of Blind (first published in the "Edinburgh Magazine and Review" for 1774), is mentioned with just approbation by Mr. Mackenzie. The article of Poetry in the "Encyclopædia," as well as some others on various subjects of the Belles Lettres, were likewise, it is believed, the productions of Blacklock; and it is said that he had drawn up for the same work an Essay on Predelination, though it is not known whether the manuscript be preserved. He is known also to have written a Tragedy; the manuscript of which was put into the hands of the late Andrew Croftie, Esq. an eminent advocate at the Scottish bar, but has not been recovered. Some Memoirs of his Life, written by himself, are now in the possession of Dr. Beattie. He has left some volumes of Sermons in manuscript, as also a Treatise on Morals, both of which it is in contemplation with his friends to publish. It is probable that the most important of his other pieces may be collected and republished on that occasion.

His character, private habits, domestic manners, and most observable peculiarities, have been delineated with so much accuracy of discrimination, and strength of colouring, by the happy pencil of Mr. Mackenzie, as to render any additional strokes from a casual hand unnecessary.

"The tenor of his occupations," says Mr. Mackenzie, "as well as the bent of his mind, during the early period of his life, will appear in the following plain and unstudied account, contained in a letter from his most intimate and constant companion, the Rev. Mr. Jameson, formerly minister of the Episcopal Chapel at Dumfries, afterwards of the English Congregation at Dantzic, and who now resides at Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

"His manner of life was so uniform, that the history of it during one day, or one week, is the history of it during the seven years that our personal intercourse lasted. Reading, music, walking, conversing, and disputing on various topics, in theology, ethics, &c. employed almost every hour of our time. It was pleasant to hear him engaged in a dispute, for no man could keep his temper better than he always did on such occasions. I have known him frequently very warmly engaged for hours together, but never could observe one angry word to fall from him. Whatever his antagonist might say, he always kept his temper. "Semper paratus et refellere sine pertinaciâ, et refelli sine iracundiâ." He was, however, extremely sensible to what he thought ill usage, and equally so whether it regarded himself or his friends. But his resentment was always confined to a few satirical verses, which were generally burnt soon after. The late Mr. Spence frequently urged him to write a tragedy; and assured him that he had interest enough with Mr. Garrick to get it acted. Various subjects were proposed to him, several of which he approved of, yet he never could be prevailed on to begin any thing of that kind. It may seem remarkable, but as far as I know, it was invariably the case, that he never could think or write on any subject proposed to him by another. I have frequently admired with what readiness and rapidity he could sometimes make verses. I have known him dictate from thirty to forty verses, and by no means bad ones, as fast as I could write them; but the moment he was at a loss for a rhyme or a verse to his liking, he stopt altogether, and could very seldom be induced to finish what he had begun with so much ardour."

"This account," Mr. Mackenzie observes, "sufficiently marks that eager sensibility, chastened at the same time with uncommon gentleness of temper, which characterized Blacklock, and which indeed it was impossible to be at all in his company without perceiving. In the science of mind, this is that division of it which perhaps one would peculiarly appropriate to poetry, at least to all those lighter species which rather depend on quickness of feeling, and the ready conception of pleasing images, than on the happy arrangement of parts, or the skilful construction of a whole, which are essential to the higher departments of the poetical art. The first kind of talent is like those warm and light soils which produce their annual crops in such abundance; the last, like that deeper and firmer mould on which the roots of eternal forests are fixed. Of the first we have seen many happy instances in that sex which is supposed less capable of study or thought; from the last is drawn that masculine sublimity of genius which could build an Iliad or a Paradise Lost.

“ All those who ever acted as his amanuenses, agree in this rapidity and ardour of composition which Mr. Jameson ascribes to him. He never could dictate till he stood up; and as his blindness made walking about without assistance inconvenient or dangerous to him, he fell insensibly into a vibratory sort of motion of his body, which increased as he warmed with his subject, and was pleased with the conceptions of his mind. This motion at last became habitual to him, and though he could sometimes restrain it when on ceremony, or in any public appearance, such as preaching, he felt a certain uneasiness from the effort, and always returned to it when he could indulge it without impropriety. This is the appearance which he describes in the ludicrous picture he has drawn of himself (in the Author's Picture.) Of this portrait the outlines are true, though the general effect is overcharged. His features were hurt by the disease which deprived him of sight; yet even with those disadvantages, there was a certain placid expression in his physiognomy which marked the benevolence of his mind, and was extremely calculated to procure him attachment and regard.

“ Music, which to the feeling and to the pensive, in whatever situation, is a source of extreme delight, but which to the blind must be creative, as it were, of idea and of sentiment, he enjoyed highly, and was himself a tolerable performer on several instruments, particularly on the flute. He generally carried in his pocket a small flageolet, on which he played his favourite tunes; and was not displeas'd when asked in company to play or to sing them; a natural feeling for a blind man, who thus adds a scene to the drama of his society.

“ Of the happiness of others, however, we are incompetent judges. Companionship and sympathy bring forth those gay colours of mirth and cheerfulness which they put on for a while, to cover perhaps that sadness which we have no opportunity of witnessing. Of a blind man's condition we are particularly liable to form a mistaken estimate; we give him credit for all those gleams of delight which society affords him, without placing to their full account those dreary moments of darksome solitude to which the suspension of that society condemns him. Blacklock had from nature a constitution delicate and nervous, and his mind, as is almost always the case, was in a great degree subject to the indisposition of his body. He frequently complained of a lowness and depression of spirits, which neither the attentions of his friends, nor the unceasing care of a most affectionate wife, were able entirely to remove. The imagination we are so apt to envy and admire serves but to irritate this disorder of the mind; and that fancy in whose creation we so much delight, can draw, from sources unknown to common men, subjects of disgust, disquietude, and affliction. Some of his later poems, now first published, express a chagrin, though not of an ungente sort, at the supposed failure of his imaginative powers, or at the fastidiousness of modern times, which he despaired to please.

Such were his efforts, such his cold reward,
Whom once thy partial tongue pronounc'd a bard;
Excursive, on the gentle gales of spring,
He rov'd, while favour imp'd his timid wing;
Exhausted genius now no more inspires,
But mourns abortive hopes, and faded fires;
The short-liv'd wreath, which once his temples grac'd,
Fades at the sickly breath of squeamish taste;
Whilst darker days his fainting flames immerse
In cheerless gloom, and winter premature.

Epistle to Dr. Ogilvie.

“ These lines are, however, no proof of “ exhausted genius,” or “ faded fires.” “ Abortive hopes,” indeed, must be the lot of all who reach that period of life at which they were written. An early youth the heart of every one is a poet; it creates a scene of imagined happiness and delusive hopes; it clothes the world in the bright colours of its own fancy; it refines what is coarse, it exalts what is mean; it sees nothing but disinterestedness in friendship, it promises eternal fidelity in love. Even on the distresses of its situation it can throw a certain romantic shade of melancholy, that leaves a man sad, but does not make him unhappy. But at a more advanced age, "the fairy visions fade," and he suffers most deeply who has indulged them the most."

As an author, under disadvantages which seem unsurmountable to nature, Blacklock has eminently distinguished himself. Though blind from his infancy, the impulse of curiosity, and the vigorous exertion of his talents, conducted him to uncommon knowledge. He acquired tongues and arts by the ear, in many of which he excelled. There is no science with which he was not acquainted; he was familiar with the learned languages, and he knew with accuracy those of modern Europe that are the most cultivated. Among philosophers, he has obtained a conspicuous rank by his Paralefsis. His little treatise on the Education of the Blind, in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," is valuable, not only on account of its peculiarity, as being the production of a blind man, but of its intrinsic merit. It contains chiefly reflections on the distresses and disadvantages of blindness, and the best means of alleviating them; directions for the education of the blind, and a description of various inventions for enabling them to attain to, and to practise several arts and sciences. The sympathy and active benevolence of Blacklock, prompted him to this composition, as well as to the translation of M. Haüy's account of the charitable institution for the blind at Paris, which is annexed to the last edition of his poems.

As a poet, though not of the highest class, he is entitled to a rank not inferior to Addison, Parnell, and Shenstone, with respect to proper imagery, correct style, or creative genius. His compositions exhibit ample proofs of ready invention, lively fancy, ardent feeling, correct taste, and a copious command of poetical language. They are the productions of a mind not deficient in fire or poetical enthusiasm; but they are more recommended by simplicity, tenderness, animation, and harmony, than by sublimity, variety, comprehension, or originality; they bear evident marks of poetical genius and classical taste, though we do not find in them the traces of that patient industry which fixes the stamp of faultless accuracy upon every line. Pope seems to have been his model for versification, and it must be allowed that he has copied his pauses, cadence, and cast of diction, with considerable success; many passages are written with an elegance, correctness, spirit and harmony, which rival the best productions of that celebrated poet; but he does not uniformly maintain his easy elegance, nor breathe his free and unwearied spirit.

His Elegies, Hymns, Odes and Epistles, are chiefly distinguished by seriousness of subject, sublimity of thought, opulence of imagery, tenderness of sentiment, and strength and elegance of composition. Of his Pastorals, the principal merit consists in the harmony of the versification. The images are seldom new, and the sentiments and descriptions are generally trite and common. His Songs are commonly tender, delicate and sprightly. The Braes of Ballendyne ranks with the most popular compositions of the kind in the English language. His Occasional Poems, and pieces of humour and pleasantry, have their brighter passages, and may be read with pleasure; but they require no distinct examination or particular criticism.

Mr. Spence's estimate of his poetical character is candid and judicious, and does equal honour to the taste and benevolence of that amiable and elegant critic.

"There is a great perspicuity, neatness, and even elegance of style, to be observed in several of his pieces; particularly, in his Wiß (which has so many other beauties), in his Imitation of one of the Psalms (139th); his Form on the Refinements in Metaphysical Philosophy (in which he owns he had plunged too deep, formerly, himself), in his new dressing the Old Scotch Song, and his Ode to a Coquet. The last mentioned of these is written with something of a gayer air, than is usual in his poems; though he is far from wanting a talent for vivacity and satire, if he would give himself leave to indulge it; but he is so good-natured, that he has scarce given us any direct specimen of it against any one, except himself. This is in the piece called the Author's Picture; from which, and his earliest piece of all (that has some glances of the same kind), it may fairly enough be conjectured, that he had a natural bent this way; and it might probably have appeared much more frequently, and more strongly in his writings, had it not been for his superior goodness of heart, and his being struck (as soon as he came to a reasoning age) so much more strongly, with the charms of morality and philosophy. His Pastoral Song, and his Ode to a Friend that was going Abroad, are very well written, each in their way; and have beside, several good pathetic strokes in them. His Pastoral, inscribed to Euanthé, is poetical as well pathetic, to a great degree; and his Soliloquy is both, in a very high one. His Elegy on Constantia flows on, all in one stream of distress and passion; and rises about the middle of the piece, to very high poetry. This, with the soliloquy just mentioned, and two of his hymns, one to the Supreme Being, and the other to Fortitude, are the parts of his poems which would be the most proper of any to prove that he is not incapable of himself to rise to a true sublimity, both of thinking and writing. His Hymn to Benevolence is an amiable piece, for its enlarged notions; and both that and his Ode to a Lady, on the loss of her Child, abound as much in good morals, as they do in good sense and poetry. His translation of Buchanan's Desiderium Lutetia, and his own Plaintive Shepherd, give the best proofs of his ease and fluency in the pastoral sort of verification; and in the latter of these, there is a strong instance of his varying his notes according to the occasion. I mean, where he speaks of his own distress in slow solemn numbers; and of his rival's happiness in a more enlivened and joyous run of verse. Much the same thing may be observed in his two odes, printed together; one writ in the time of sickness, and the other in health. These sorts of miscellaneous poems have not generally much of planning in them. The best planned among Mr. Blacklock's seems to be his Wish Satisfied, and the Monody; the latter of which, beside this merit, is very pathetic, and very poetical. The most distinguishing character of poetry, is to be descriptive; and it is this which gives the very near relation that there is between poetry and painting. Mr. Blacklock is very descriptive in many parts of his poems; but it is very easy to be observed, that where his descriptions are of any length, they are generally not descriptions of things, but of passions. To which one may add, that they turn much more on the melancholy passions, than the joyous or pleasing ones. Both of which are perhaps to be accounted for, from his unfortunate loss of sight in his infancy.

"The Gentleman, who has given the account of our author prefixed to his works, says, that it has been observed by others, "That it must be matter of amusement to the curious reader, to remark how well the poet describes objects which he never saw, and expresses so as to be understood by others, those ideas which he himself could never conceive." It is remarkable enough, that some of the greatest poets that ever were in the world, have been blind; and it is very probable, that the loss of their sight may have added to the force of their imagination, as far as it went; in the same manner, and for the same reasons, that we think the more intensely of any one thing, when we shut out all the other objects that are round about us. But a poet born blind, or (which is much the same thing) one who has been blind from his early infancy, is still a novelty, and a thing much to be wondered at. Our great Milton did not lose his sight till he was about fifty years old; and Homer, for ought we know, might have enjoyed his till after he had finished his two most celebrated poems. Our author lost his sight entirely, before he was a year old; and consequently whatever ideas he may have in relation to visible objects, must have been acquired only from the characters he has learnt of them from books and conversation; and some supposed analogies between those characters, and any of the ideas in the stock he has laid in, either from his other senses, or his own reflections upon them. Notwithstanding which, he speaks very frequently of the objects and ideas belonging to sight, with great familiarity and boldness, and generally without impropriety. After putting many passages together relating to visible objects, from our author's works, I am less surpris'd than I was in the first reading of them, at his speaking so frequently, as if he actually enjoyed his eye-sight. The stock of ideas which he has stored up in his mind, and substituted in the room of our ideas of things visible, and with like names affixed to them, are so familiar to him, and are used by him in so uncommon and unaccountable a manner, that they seem to serve him as a subsidiary sort of sight, and put one in mind of his own expressions of intellectual rays, internal day, and the mental eye; as well as of that passage cited from the Psalmist, in the title page,

Κυρίου ποσει ευφλας, or as our translators (by joining the sense of the original, to their own) might have rendered it, "The Lord giveth [internal] sight to the blind."

Mr. Mackenzie's observations on his poetical writings and character are no less just than elegant. The theory of his imaginative and descriptive powers is ingenious, and, though long, is too valuable to be withheld.

"In this collection of poems, the reader will find those qualities of fancy, tenderness, and sometimes sublimity in the thoughts, of elegance, and often force in the language, which characterize the genuine productions of the poetical talent. One other praise, which the good will value, belongs to those poems in a high degree; they breathe the purest spirit of piety, virtue, and benevolence. These indeed are the muses of Blacklock; they inspire his poetry, as they animated his life; and he never approaches the sacred ground on which they dwell, without an expansion of mind, and an elevation of language.

"The additional poems, now first published in this volume, will, I think be found to possess equal merit with those which their author formerly gave to the world. There is perhaps a certain degree of languor diffused over some of them, written during the latter period of his life, for which the circumstances I have mentioned above may account; but the delicacy and the feeling remain undiminished: One of those later poems, the Ode to Aurora, on Meliffa's Birth-Day, is a compliment and tribute of affection to the tender assiduity of an excellent wife, which I have not any where seen more happily conceived or more elegantly expressed.

"His peculiar situation I do not mean to plead as an apology for defects in his compositions. I am sufficiently aware of a truth which authors or their apologists are apt to forget, that the public expects entertainment, and listens but ill to excuses for the want of it. But the circumstance of the writer's blindness will certainly create an interest in his productions beyond what those of one possessed of sight could have excited, especially in such passages of his works as are descriptive of visible objects. Mr. Spence has treated this descriptive power, which the poetry of Blacklock seemed to evince in its author, as a sort of problem which he has illustrated by a very great number of quotations from the poems themselves, by hypothetical conjectures of his own, drawn from those passages, and from the nature of a blind man's sensations and ideas.

"Without detracting from the ingenuity of Mr. Spence's deductions, I am apt, in the case of Blacklock, to ascribe much to the effect of a retentive and ready memory of that poetical language in which, from his earliest infancy, he delighted; and that apt appropriation of it which an habitual acquaintance with the best poets had taught him.

"This I am sensible by no means affords a complete solution of the difficulty; for though it may account for the use which he makes of poetical language, it throws no light on his early passion for reading poetry, and poetry of a kind, too, which lies very much within the province of sight; nor does it clearly trace the source of that pleasure which such reading evidently conveyed to his mind.

"It is observed, and I think very justly, by Dr. Reid, that there is very little of the knowledge acquired by those who see, that may not be communicated to a man born blind; and he illustrates his remark by the example of the celebrated Sanderfon. Another writer (Mr. Burke), seems disposed to extend a similar observation to some of those pleasures of which the sense of sight is commonly understood to be the only channel; and he appeals, in proof of his doctrine, to the poetry of Blacklock: "Here (says he) is a poet doubtless as much affected by his own descriptions as any that reads them can be; and yet he is affected with this strong enthusiasm, by things of which he neither has, nor can possibly have any idea, further than that of a bare sound." The same author mentions, as a confirmation of his doctrine, the scientific aquirements of Sanderfon, which he seems to think explicable on the same principles with Blacklock's poetry.

"But, in truth, there appears to be very little analogy between the two cases; nor does the genius of Sanderfon furnish by any means so curious a subject of philosophical disquisition as that of Blacklock. The ideas of extension and figure, about which the speculations of the geometer are employed, may be conveyed to the mind by the sense of touch as well as by that of sight: and (if we except the phenomena of colour) the case is the same with all the subjects of our reasoning in natural philosophy. But of the pleasures which poetry excites, so great a proportion arises from allusions to visible objects, and from descriptions of the beauty and sublimity of nature; so much truth is there in the maxim, "ut pictura poësis," that the word imagination, which in its primary sense has a direct reference to the eye, is employed to express that power of the mind, which is considered as peculiarly characteristic of poetical genius; and therefore, whatever be the degree of pleasure which the blind poet receives from the exercise of his art, the pleasure must, in general, be perfectly different in kind from that which he imparts to his readers.

"Sanderfon, we are told, though blind, could lecture on the prismatic spectrum, and on the theory of the rainbow; but to his mind the names of the different colours were merely significant of the relative arrangement of the spaces which they occupied, and produced as little effect on his imagination as the letters of the alphabet, which he employed in his geometrical diagrams. By means of a retentive memory, it might have been possible for him to acquire a knowledge of the common poetical epithets, appropriated to the different colours: it is even conceivable, that by long habits of poetical reading, he might have become capable of producing such a description of their order in the spectrum, as is contained in the following lines of Thomson:

First the flaming red
Sprung vivid forth; the tawney orange next,
And next delicious yellow; by whose side
Fell the kind beams of all-refreshing green:
Then the pure blue, that swells autumnal skies,
Ethereal play'd; and then of sadder hue
Emerg'd the deepen'd indico, as when
The heavy-skirted evening droops with frost;
While the last gleamings of refracted light
Dy'd in the fainting violet away.

"But supposing all this possible, how different must have been the effect of the description on his mind from what it produced on that of Thomson? or what idea could he form of the rapture which the poet felt in recalling to his imagination the innumerable appearances in the earth and heavens, of which the philosophic principles he referred to afford the explanation?

Did ever poet image aught so fair,
Dreaming in whispering groves, by the hoarse brook;
Or prophet to whose rapture heav'n descends!
Even now the setting sun and shifting clouds
Seen, Greenwich, from thy lovely heights, declare,
How just, howauteous, the refractive law.

"Yet, though it be evidently impossible that a description of this sort, relating entirely to the peculiar perceptions of sight, should convey to a blind man the same kind of pleasure which we receive from it, it may be easily imagined, that the same words, which in their ordinary acceptation, express visible objects, may, by means of early associations, become to such a person the vehicle of many other agreeable or disagreeable emotions. These associations will probably vary greatly in the case of different individuals, according to the circumstances of their education, and the peculiar bent of their genius. Blacklock's associations in regard to colours, were (according to his own account) chiefly of the moral kind—But into this inquiry, which opens a wide field of speculation to the metaphysician, I do not mean to enter. I shall content myself with remarking, that in other arts, as well as those which address themselves to sight, the same distinction is to be found. What may be termed the arithmetic and mathematics of music and of the scale, depend not on a musical ear, any more than the theory of vision depends on sight. In both cases, pleasure and feeling are easily distinguishable from knowledge and science; the first require, and cannot exist without an eye for colour, and an ear for sound; the last are independent of either.

"It is indeed the boast of genius to do much on scanty materials, to create and "body forth the forms of things," to give character to what it has not known, and picture to what it has not seen. The genius of Shakspeare has entered into the cabinets of statesmen, and the palaces of kings, and made them speak like statesmen and like kings. It has given manners as well as language to imaginary beings, which, though we cannot criticise like the other, every one intuitively owns true. It has kindled the wizards fire, and trimmed "the fairy's glow-worm lamp;" has moulded a Caliban's savage form, and spun the light down of an Ariel's wing. But this imaginative power, how extensive and wonderful soever its range, had still some elements from which it could raise this world of fancy, some analogies from which its ideas could be drawn. To the blind no degree of genius can supply the want of these with regard to visible objects, nor teach them that entirely distinct species of perception which belongs to sight. "Objects of sight and touch (says Berkeley very justly) constitute two worlds, which, though nearly connected, bear no resemblance to one another."

"If we do not assign to Blacklock any extraordinary, or what might be termed preternatural conception of visible objects, yet we may fairly claim for him a singular felicity of combination in his use of the expressions by which those objects are distinguished.

"Whatever idea or impression those objects of sight produced in his mind, how imperfect soever that idea, or how different soever from the true, still the impression would be felt by a mind susceptible and warm like Blacklock's, that could not have been so felt by one of a coarser and more sluggish mold. Even the memory that could treasure up the poetical attributes and expressions of such objects, must have been assisted and prompted by poetical feeling; and the very catalogue of words which was thus ready at command, was an indication of that ardour of soul, which, from his infancy, led him

Where the muses haunt
Smit with the love of sacred song;

as the unmeaning syllables which compose a name give to the lover or the friend, emotions which others in it were impossible they should excite."

The following unbiassed decision of an ingenious foreigner in his favour, on considering his poems, relatively to his situation, merits particular attention, as it is not liable to the suspicion of partiality.

"Blacklock," says Professor Denina, in his "Essay on the Revolutions of Literature," to posterity will seem a fable, as to the present age he is a prodigy. It will be thought a fiction, that a man blind from his infancy, besides having acquired a surprising knowledge of Greek, Latin, Italian, and French, should, at the same time, be a great poet; and, without having almost ever seen the light, should, notwithstanding, be singularly happy in his descriptions."

THE WORKS OF BLACKLOCK.

HORACE, ODE I. IMITATED.

INSCRIBED TO
DR. JOHN STEVENSON, PHYSICIAN IN EDINBURGH.

O THOU, whose goodness unconfin'd
Extends its wish to human kind;
By whose indulgence I aspire
To strike the sweet Horatian lyre:

There are who, on th' Olympic plain,
Delight the chariot's speed to rein;
Involv'd in glorious dust to roll;
To turn with glowing wheel the goal;
Who by repeated trophies rise,
And share with gods their pomp and skies.
This man, if changeful crowds admire,
Fermented ev'n to mad desire,
Their fool or villain to elate
To all the honours of the state;
That, if his granary secures
Whate'er th' autumnal sun matures,
Pleas'd his paternal field to plow,
Remote from each ambitious view;
Vast India's wealth would bribe in vain,
To launch the bark, and cut the main.

The merchant, while the western breeze
Ferments to rage th' Icarian seas,
Urg'd by th' impending hand of fate,
Extols to heav'n his country-feat:
Its sweet retirement, fearless ease,
The fields, the air, the streams, the trees;
Yet fits the shatter'd bark again,
Resolv'd to brave the tumid main,
Resolv'd all hazards to endure,
Nor shun a plague, but to be poor.

One with the free, the gen'rous bowl,
Absorbs his cares, and warms his soul:
Now wrapt in ease, supinely laid
Beneath the myrtle's am'rous shade;
Now where some sacred fountain flows,
Whose cadence soft invites repose;
While half the sultry summer's day
On silent pinions steals away.

Some bosoms boast a nobler flame,
In fields of death to toil for fame,
In war's grim front to tempt their fate;
Curst war! which brides and mothers hate;
As in each kindling hero's fight
Already glows the promis'd fight;
Their hearts with more than transport bound,
While drums and trumpets mix their sound.

Unmindful of his tender wife,
And ev'ry home-felt bliss of life,
The huntsman in th' unshelter'd plains,
Heav'n's whole inclemency sustains;
Now scales the steepy mountain's side,
Now tempts the torrent's headlong tide;
Whether his faithful hounds in view,
With speed some timid prey pursue!
Or some fell monster of the wood
At once his hopes and snares elude.

Good to bestow, like Heav'n, is thine,
Concurring in one great design;
To cool the fever's burning rage,
To knit the feeble nerves of age;
To bid young health, with pleasure crown'd,
In rosy lustre smile around.

My humbler function shall I name;
My sole delight, my highest aim?
Inspir'd through breezy shades to stray,
Where choral nymphs and graces play;
Above th' unthinking herd to soar,
Who sink forgot, and are no more;
To snatch from fate an honest fame,
Is all I hope, and all I claim.
If to my vows Euterpe deign
The Doric reed's mellifluous strain,
Nor Polyhymnia, darling muse!
To tune the Lesbian harp refuse.
But, if you rank me with the choir,
Who touch, with happy hand, the lyre;
Exulting to the starry frame,
Sustain'd by all the wings of fame,
With bays adorn'd I then shall soar,
Obscure, depress'd, and scorn'd no more;
While envy, vainly merit's foe,
With fable wings shall flap below;

And, doom'd to breathe a grosser air,
To reach my glorious height, despair.

PSALM I. IMITATED.

How blest the man, how more than blest !
Whose heart no guilty thoughts employ ;
God's endless sunshine fills his breast,
And smiling conscience whispers peace and joy.

Fair rectitude's unerring way
His heav'n-conducted steps pursue ;
While crowds in guilt and error stray,
Unfain'd his soul, and undeceiv'd his view.

While, with unmeaning laughter gay,
Scorn on her throne erected high,
Emits a false delusive ray,
'To catch th' astonish'd gaze of folly's eye ;

Deep in herself his soul retir'd,
Unmov'd, beholds the meteor blaze,
And, with all-perfect beauty fir'd,
Nature, and nature's God, intent surveys.

Him from high heav'n, her native seat,
Eternal wisdom's self inspires ;
While he, with purpose fix'd as fate,
Pursues her dictates, and her charms admires.

In sunshine mild, and temp'ratur'd air,
Where some refreshing fountain flows,
So nurs'd by nature's tenderest care,
A lofty tree with autumn's treasure glows.

Around its boughs the summer gale
With pleasure waves the genial wing ;
There no unfriendly colds prevail,
To chill the vigour of its endless spring.

Amid its hospitable shade
Heav'n's sweetest warblers tune the lay ;
Nor shall its honours ever fade,
Nor immature its plenteous fruit decay.

By God's almighty arm sustain'd,
Thus virtue soon or late shall rise ;
Enjoy her conquest, nobly gain'd,
And share immortal triumph in the skies.

But fools, to sacred wisdom blind,
Who vice's tempting call obey,
A diff'rent fate shall quickly find,
To every roaring storm an easy prey.

Thus when the warring winds arise,
With all their lawless fury driv'n,
Light chaff or dust incessant flies,
Whirl'd in swift eddies through the vault of heav'n.

When in tremendous pomp array'd,
Descending from the opening sky,
With full omnipotence display'd,
Her God shall call on nature to reply :

Then vice, with shame and grief depress'd,
Tranfix'd with horror and despair,
Shall feel hell kindling in her breast,
Nor to her judge prefer her trembling pray'r :

For with a father's fond regard,
To bliss he views fair virtue tend ;
While vice obtains her just reward,
And all her paths in deep perdition end.

AN HYMN TO THE SUPREME BEING,

IN IMITATION OF THE CIV. PSALM.

Quid prius dicam solitis parentis
Laudibus ? qui res hominum ac deorum,
Qui mare et terrâs, variisque mundum
Temperat horis ? HOR.

ARISE, my soul, on wings seraphic rise,
And praise th' Almighty Sov'reign of the skies ;
In whom alone essential glory shines,
Which not the heav'n of heav'ns, nor boundless space confines.

When darkness rul'd with universal sway,
He spoke, and kindled up the blaze of day ;
First, fairest offspring of the omnific word !
Which, like a garment, cloth'd its sovereign Lord.
On liquid air he bade the columns rise,
That prop the starry concave of the skies ;
Diffus'd the blue expanse from pole to pole,
And spread circumfluent ether round the whole.

Soon as he bids impetuous tempests fly,
To wing his sounding chariot through the sky ;
Impetuous tempests the command obey,
Sustain his flight, and sweep the aerial way.
Fraught with his mandates, from the realms on
high,

Unnumber'd hosts of radiant heralds fly
From orb to orb, with progress unconfin'd,
As lightning swift, resistless as the wind.

In ambient air this pond'rous ball he hung,
And bade its centre rest forever strong ;
Heav'n, air, and sea, with all their storms, in
vain

Affault the basis of the firm machine.

At thy almighty voice old ocean raves,
Wakes all his force, and gathers all his waves ;
Nature lies mantled in a wat'ry robe,
And shoreless billows revel round the globe ;
O'er highest hills the higher surges rise,
Mix with the clouds, and meet the fluid skies.
But when in thunder the rebuke was giv'n,
That shook th' eternal firmament of heav'n ;
The grand rebuke th' affrighted waves obey,
And in confusion scour their uncouth way ;
And posting rapid to the place decreed,
Wind down the hills, and sweep the humble
mead.

Reluctant in their bounds the waves subside ;
The bounds, impervious to the lashing tide,
Restrain its rage ; whilst, with incessant roar,
It shakes the caverns, and assaults the shore.

By him, from mountains cloth'd in lucid snow,
Through fertile vales the mazy rivers flow.

Here the wild horse, unconscious of the rein,
That revels boundless o'er the wide campaign,
Imbibes the silyer surge, with heat oppress'd,
To cool the fever of his glowing breast.

Here rising boughs, adorn'd with summer's
pride,

Project their waving umbrage o'er the tide ;
While, gently perching on the leafy spray,
Each feather'd warbler tunes his various lay :
And, while thy praise they symphonize around,
Creation echoes to the grateful sound.
Wide o'er the heav'n's the various bow he bends,
Its tinctures brightens, and its arch extends :
At the glad sign the airy conduits flow,
Softens the hills, and cheer the meads below :
By genial fervour and prolific rain,
Swift vegetation clothes the smiling plain :
Nature, profusely good, with bliss o'erflows,
And still is pregnant, though she still bestows.

Here verdant pastures wide extended lie,
And yield the grazing herd exuberant supply.
Luxuriant waving in the wanton air,
Here golden grain rewards the peasant's care :
Here vines mature with fresh carnation glow,
And heav'n above diffuses heav'n below.
Erect and tall here mountain cedars rise,
Wave in the starry vault, and emulate the skies.
Here the wing'd crowd, that skim the yielding
air,
With artful toil their little domes prepare ;
Here hatch their tender young, and nurse their rising care.
Up the steep hill ascends the nimble doe,
While timid conies scour the plains below,
Or in the pendant rock elude the scenting foe.

He bade the silver majesty of night
Revolve her circles, and increase her light ;
Assign'd a province to each rolling sphere,
And taught the sun to regulate the year.
At his command, wide hov'ring o'er the plain,
Primæval night resumes her gloomy reign :
Then from their dens, impatient of delay,
The savage monsters bend their speedy way,
Howl through the spacious waite, and chase their frighted prey.

Here stalks the sluggish monarch of the wood,
Taught from thy providence to ask his food :
To thee, O Father, to thy bounteous skies,
He hears his mane, and rolls his glaring eyes ;
He roars ; the desert trembles wide around,
And repercussive hills repeat the sound.

Now orient gems the eastern skies adorn,
And joyful nature hails the op'ning morn ;
The rovers, conscious of approaching day,
Fly to their shelters, and forget their prey.
Laborious man, with mod'rate slumber blest,
Springs cheerful to his toil from downy rest ;
Till grateful evening, with her argent train,
Bid labour cease, and ease the weary swain.

" Hail ! sov'reign goodness, all-productive mind !
" On all thy works thyself inscrib'd we find :
" How various all, how variously endow'd,
" How great their number, and each part how
" good !
" How perfect then must the great Parent shine, }
" Who, with one act of energy divine, }
" Laid the vast plan, and finish'd the design ! " }

Wher-e'er the pleasing search my thoughts pursue,

Unbounded goodness rises to my view ;
Nor does our world alone its influence share ;
Exhaustless bounty, and unwearied care
Extends through all th' infinitude of space,
And circles Nature with a kind embrace.

The azure kingdoms of the deep below,
Thy pow'r, thy wisdom, and thy goodness show :
Here multitudes of various beings stray,
Crowd the profound, or on the surface play :
Tall navies here their doubtful way explore,
And ev'ry product waft from ev'ry shore ;
Hence meagre want expell'd, and sanguine strife,
For the mild charms of cultivated life ;
Hence social union spreads from soul to soul,
And India joins in friendship with the pole.
Here the huge potent of the sealsy train
Enormous sails incumbent o'er the main,
An animated isle ; and in his way,
Dashes to heav'n's blue arch the foamy sea :
When skies and ocean mingle storm and flame,
Portending instant wreck to nature's frame,
Pleas'd in the scene, he mocks, with conscious
pride,

The volley'd light'ning, and the surging tide ;
And, while the wrathful elements engage,
Foments with horrid sport the tempest's rage.
All these thy watchful providence supplies,
To thee alone they turn their waiting eyes ;
For them thou open'st thy exhaustless store,
Till the capacious wish can grasp no more.

But, if one moment thou thy face should'st hide,
Thy glory clouded, or thy smiles heav'n'd,
Then widow'd nature veils her mournful eyes,
And vents her grief in universal cries :
Then gloomy death with all his meagre train,
Wide o'er the nations spreads his dismal reign ;
Sea, earth, and air, the boundless ravage mourn,
And all their hosts to native dust return.

But when again thy glory is display'd,
Reviv'd creation lifts her cheerful head ;
New rising forms thy potent smiles obey,
And life rekindles at the genial ray :
United thanks replenish'd nature pays,
And heav'n and earth resound their maker's praise.

When time shall in eternity be lost,
And hoary nature languish into dust ;
For ever young thy glory shall remain,
Vast as thy being, endless as thy reign.
Thou, from the regions of eternal day,
View'st all thy works at one immense survey :
Pleas'd, thou behold'st the whole propensely tend
To perfect happiness, its glorious end.

If thou to earth but turn thy wrathful eyes,
Her basis trembles, and her offspring dies.
Thou smit'st the hills, and, at th' Almighty blow,
Their summits kindle, and their inwards glow.

While this immortal spark of heav'nly flame
Disends my breast, and animates my frame ;
To thee my ardent praises shall be borne
On the first breeze that wakes the blushing morn :
The latest star shall hear the pleasing sound,
And nature in full choir shall join around.
When full of thee my soul excurive flies
Through air, earth, ocean, or thy regal skies ;
From world to world, new wonders still I find,
And all the Godhead flashes on my mind.

When, wing'd with whirlwinds, Vice shall take its flight
 To the deep bosom of eternal night,
 To thee my soul shall endless praises pay:
 Join, men and angels, join th' exalted lay!

PSALM CXXXIX. IMITATED.

ME; O my God! thy piercing eye,
 In motion, or at rest, surveys;
 If to the lonely couch I fly,
 Or travel through frequented ways;
 Where'er I move, thy boundless reign,
 Thy mighty presence, circles all the scene.

Where shall my thoughts from thee retire,
 Whose view pervades my inmost heart!
 The latent, kindling, young desire,
 'The word, ere from my lips it part,
 'To thee their various forms display,
 And shine reveal'd in thy unclouded day.

Behind me if I turn my eyes,
 Or forward bend my wand'ring sight,
 Whatever objects round me rise
 Through the wide fields of air and light;
 With thee impress'd, each various frame
 The forming, moving, present God proclaim.

Father of all, omniscient mind,
 Thy wisdom who can comprehend?
 Its highest point what eye can find,
 Or to its lowest depths descend?
 That wisdom, which, ere things began,
 Saw full express th' all-comprehending plan!

What cavern deep, what hill sublime,
 Beyond thy reach, shall I pursue?
 What dark recess, what distant clime,
 Shall hide me from thy distant view?
 Where from thy spirit shall I fly,
 Diffusive, vital, felt through earth and sky?

If up to heav'n's ethereal height,
 Thy prospect to elude, I rise;
 In splendour there, severely bright,
 Thy presence shall my sight surprize:
 There, beaming from their source divine,
 In full meridian, light and beauty shine.

Beneath the pendant globe if laid,
 If plung'd in hell's abyss profound,
 I call on night's impervious shade
 To spread essential blackness round;
 Conspicuous to thy wide survey,
 Ev'n hell's grim horrors kindle into day.

Thee, mighty God! my wond'ring soul,
 Thee, all her conscious powers adore;
 Whose being circumscribes the whole,
 Whose eyes its utmost bounds explore:
 Alike illum'd by native light,
 Amid the sun's full blaze, or gloom of night.

If through the fields of ether borne,
 The living winds my flight sustain;
 If on the rosy wings of morn,
 I seek the distant western main;
 There, O my God! thou still art found,
 Thy pow'r upholds me, and thy arms surround.

Thy essence fills this breathing frame,
 It glows in ev'ry conscious part;
 Lights up my soul with livelier flame,
 And feeds with life my beating heart:
 Unfelt along my veins it glides,
 And through their mazes rolls the purple tides.

While in the silent womb enclos'd,
 A growing embryo yet I lay,
 Thy hand my various parts dispos'd,
 Thy breath infus'd life's genial ray;
 Till, finish'd by thy wond'rous plan,
 I rose the dread, majestic form of man.

To thee, from whom my being came,
 Whose smile is all the heav'n I know,
 Replete with all my wond'rous theme,
 To thee my votive strains shall flow:
 Great Archetype! who first design'd,
 Expressive of thy glory, humankind.

Who can the stars of heav'n explore,
 The flow'rs that deck the verdant plain,
 Th' unnumber'd sands that form the shore,
 The drops that swell the spacious main?
 Let him thy wonders publish round,
 Till earth and heav'n's eternal throne resound.

As subterranean flames confin'd,
 From earth's dark womb impetuous rise,
 The conflagration, fann'd by wind,
 Wraps realms, and blazes to the skies:
 In lightning's flash, and thunder's roar,
 Thus vice shall feel the tempest of thy pow'r.

Fly then, as far as pole from pole,
 Ye sons of slaughter, quick retire;
 At whose approach my kindling soul
 Awakes to unextinguish'd ire:
 Fly; nor provoke the thunder's aim,
 You, who in scorn pronounce th' Almighty's name.

The wretch who dares thy pow'r defy,
 And on thy vengeance loudly call,
 On him not pity's melting eye,
 Nor partial favour, e'er shall fall:
 Still shall thy foes be mine, still share
 Unpity'd torture, and unmix'd despair.

Behold, O God! behold me stand,
 And to thy strict regard disclose
 Whatever was acted by my hand,
 Whatever my inmost thoughts propose:
 If Vice indulg'd their candour stain,
 Be all my portion bitterness and pain.

But, O! if nature, weak and frail,
 To strong temptations oft give way;
 If doubt, or passion, oft prevail
 O'er wand'ring reason's feeble ray;
 Let not thy frowns my fault reprove,
 But guide thy creature with a father's love.

AN HYMN TO DIVINE LOVE.

IN IMITATION OF SPENSER.

No more of lower flames, whose pleasing rage
 With sighs and soft complaints I weakly fed;
 At whose unworthy shrine, my budding age,
 And willing muse, their first devotion paid.
 Fly, nurse of madness, to eternal shade:

Far from my soul abjur'd and banish'd fly,
And yield to nobler fires, that lift the soul more
high.

O love! coeval with thy parent God,
To thee I kneel, thy present aid implore;
At whose celestial voice and pow'ful nod
Old discord fled, and chaos ceas'd to roar,
Light smil'd, and order rose, unseen before,
But in the plan of the eternal mind,
When God design'd the work, and lov'd the work design'd.

Thou fill'dst the waste of ocean, earth, and air,
With multitudes that swim, or walk, or fly:
From rolling worlds descends thy generous care,
To infect crowds that 'scape the nicest eye:
For each a sphere was circumscrib'd by thee,
To bless, and to be bless'd, their noblest end;
To which, with speedy course, they all unerring
tend.

Conscious of thee, with nobler pow'rs endu'd,
Next man, thy darling, into being rose,
Immortal, form'd for high beatitude,
Which neither end nor interruption knows,
Till evil, couch'd in fraud, began his woes:
Then to thy aid was boundless wisdom join'd,
And for apostate man redemption thus design'd.

By thee, his glories veil'd in mortal shroud,
God's darling offspring left his seat on high;
And heav'n and earth, amaz'd and trembling, view'd
Their wounded Sov'reign groan, and bleed, and die.
By thee, in triumph to his native sky,
On angels wings, the victor God aspir'd,
Relenting justice smil'd, and frowning wrath
retir'd.

To thee, munific, ever-flaming love!
One endless hymn united nature sings:
To thee the bright inhabitants above
Tune the glad voice, and sweep the warbling strings.

From pole to pole, on ever-waving wings,
Winds waft thy praise, by rolling planets tun'd;
Aid then, O Love! my voice to emulate the
found.

It comes! It comes! I feel internal day;
Transfusive warmth through all my bosom glows;
My soul expanding gives the torrent way;
Through all my veins it kindles as it flows.
Thus, ravish'd from the scene of night and woes,
Oh! snatch me, bear me to thy happy reign;
There teach my tongue thy praise in more exalted strain.

AN HYMN TO BENEVOLENCE.

HAIL! source of transport ever new;
Whilst thy kind dictates I pursue,
I taste a joy sincere;
Too vast for little minds to know,
Who on themselves alone bestow
Their wishes and their care.

Daughter of God! delight of man!
From thee felicity began;
Which still thy hand sustains:

Vol. XI.

By thee sweet Peace her empire spread,
Fair Science rais'd her laurel'd head,
And Discord gnash'd in chains.

Far as the pointed sunbeam flies,
Through peopled earth and starry skies,
All nature owns thy nod:
We see thy energy prevail
Through being's ever-rising scale,
From nothing ev'n to God.

Envy, that tortures her own heart
With plagues and ever-burning smart,
Thy charms divine expel:
Aghast she shuts her livid eyes,
And, wing'd with tenfold fury, flies
To native night and hell.

By thee inspir'd, the gen'rous breast,
In blessing others only blest,
With goodness large and free,
Delights the widow's tears to stay,
To teach the blind their smoothest way,
And aid the feeble knee.

O come! and o'er my bosom reign,
Expand my heart, inflame each vein,
Through ev'ry action shine;
Each low, each selfish, wish controul,
With all thy essence warm my soul,
And make me wholly thine.

Nor let fair Virtue's mortal bare,
The soul-contrasting thirst of gain,
My faintest wishes sway;
By her possess'd, ere hearts refine,
In hell's dark depth shall mercy shine,
And kindle endless day.

If from thy sacred paths I turn,
Nor feel their griefs, while others mourn,
Nor with their pleasures glow:
Banish'd from God, from bliss, and thee,
My own tormentor let me be,
And groan in hopeless woe:

AN HYMN TO FORTITUDE.

NIGHT, brooding o'er her mute domain,
In awful silence wraps her reign;
Clouds press on clouds, and, as they rise,
Condense to solid gloom the skies.

Portentous, through the foggy air,
To wake the daemon of despair,
The raven hoarse, and boding owl,
To Hecate curst antheus howl.

Intent, with execrable art,
To burn the veins, and tear the heart,
The witch, unballow'd bones to raise,
Through fun'ral vaults and charnel strays;
Calls the damn'd shade from ev'ry cell,
And adds new labours to their hell.

And, shield me Heav'n! what hollow sound,
Like fate's dread knell, runs echoing round?
The bell strikes one, that magic hour,
When rising fiends exert their pow'r.
And now, sure now, some cause unbless'd
Breathes more than horror through my breast:
How deep the breeze! how dim the light!
What spectres swim before my sight!

My frozen limbs pale terror chains,
 And in wild eddies wheels my brains:
 My icy blood forgets to roll,
 And death ev'n seems to seize my soul.
 What sacred pow'r, what healing art,
 Shall bid my soul herself assert;
 Shall rouse th' immortal active flame,
 And teach her whence her being came?
 O Fortitude! divinely bright,
 O Virtue's child, and man's delight!
 Descend, an amicable guest,
 And with thy firmness steel my breast:
 Descend propitious to my lays,
 And, while my lyre resounds thy praise,
 With energy divinely strong,
 Exalt my soul, and warm my song.

When raving in eternal pains,
 And loaded with ten thousand chains.
 Vice, deep in Phlegeton, yet lay,
 Nor with her visage blasted day;
 No fear to guiltless man was known,
 For God and Virtue reign'd alone.
 But, when from native flames and night,
 The cursed monster wing'd her flight,
 Pale Fear, among her hideous train,
 Chas'd sweet Contentment from her reign;
 Plac'd death and hell before each eye,
 And wrapt in mist the golden sky;
 Banish'd from day each dear delight,
 And shook with confusions starts the night.

When from the imperial seats on high,
 The Lord of nature turn'd his eye
 To view the state of things below;
 Still blest to make his creatures so:
 From earth he saw Astræa fly,
 And seek her mansions in the sky;
 Peace, crown'd with olives, left her throne.
 And white rob'd Innocence was gone:
 While Vice, reveal'd in open day,
 Sole tyrant, rul'd with iron sway;
 And Virtue veil'd her weeping charms,
 And fled for refuge to his arms,
 Her altars scorn'd, her shrines defac'd—
 Whom thus th' essential Good address'd:
 "Thou, whom my soul adores alone,
 Effulgent sharer of my throne,
 Fair empress of eternity!
 Who uncreated reign'st like me;
 Whom I, who sole and boundless sway,
 With pleasure infinite obey:
 To yon diurnal scenes below,
 Who feel their folly in their woe,
 Again propitious turn thy flight,
 Again oppose yon tyrant's might;
 To earth thy cloudless charms disclose,
 Revive thy friends, and blast thy foes:
 Thy triumphs man shall raptur'd see,
 Act, suffer, live, and die for thee.
 But since all crimes their hell contain,
 Since all must feel, who merit pain,
 Let Fortitude thy steps attend,
 And be, like thee, to man a friend;
 To urge him on the arduous road,
 That leads to virtue, bliss, and God;
 To blunt the sting of ev'ry grief,
 And be to all a near relief."

He said; and she, with smiles divine,
 Which made all heav'n more brightly shine,

To earth return'd with all her train,
 And brought the golden age again.
 Since erring mortals, unconstrain'd,
 The God, that warms their breast, profan'd,
 She, guardian of their joys no more,
 Could only leave them, and deplore:
 They, now the easy prey of pain,
 Curs'd in their wish, their choice obtain;
 Till arm'd with heav'n and fate, she came
 Her destin'd honours to reclaim.
 Vice and her slaves beheld her flight,
 And fled, like birds obscene, from light,
 Back to th' abode of plagues return,
 To sin and smart, blaspheme and burn.

Thou, goddess! since, with sacred aid,
 Hast ev'ry grief and pain allay'd,
 To joy converted ev'ry smart,
 And plac'd a heav'n in ev'ry heart:
 By thee we act, by thee sustain,
 Thou sacred antidote of pain!
 At thy great nod the * Alps subside,
 Reluctant rivers turns their tide;
 With all thy force Alcides warn'd,
 His hand against oppression arm'd:
 By thee his mighty nerves were strung,
 By thee his strength for ever young;
 And whilst on brutal force he press'd,
 His vigour, with his foes, increas'd.
 By thee, like Jove's almighty hand,
 Ambition's havock to withstand,
 † Timoleon rose, the scourge of fate,
 And hurl'd a tyrant from his state;
 The brother in his soul subdu'd,
 And warn'd the poniard in his blood;
 A soul by so much virtue fir'd,
 Not Greece alone, but heav'n admir'd.

But in these dregs of human kind,
 These days to guilt and fear resign'd,
 How rare such views the heart elate!
 To brave the last extremes of fate;
 Like Heav'n's almighty pow'r serene,
 With fix'd regard to view the scene,
 When nature quakes beneath the storm,
 And horror wears its direst form.
 Though future worlds are now descry'd,
 Though Paul has writ, and Jesus dy'd,
 Dispell'd the dark infernal shade,
 And all the heav'n of heav'ns display'd;
 Curs'd with unnumber'd groundless fears,
 How pale yon shiv'ring wretch appears!
 For him the day-light shines in vain,
 For him the fields no joys contain;
 Nature's whole charms to him are lost,
 No more the woods their music boast;
 No more the meads their vernal bloom,
 No more the gales their rich perfume:
 Impending mists deform the sky,
 And beauty withers in his eye.
 In hopes his terror to elude,
 By day he mingles with the crowd;
 Yet finds his soul to fears a prey,
 In busy crowds, and open day.

* Alluding to the History of Hannibal.

† Timoleon, having long in vain importuned his brother to resign the despotism of Corinth, at last restored the liberty of the people, by slaying him.—Vide Pæt

If night his lonely walk surprife,
 What horrid visions round him rife!
 That blasted oak, which meets his way,
 Shown by the meteor's sudden ray,
 The midnight murder's known retreat,
 Felt heav'n's avengeful bolt of late;
 The clashing chain, the groan profound,
 Loud from yon ruin'd tower refound;
 And now the spot he seems to tread,
 Where some self-slaughter'd corse was laid:
 He feels fixt earth beneath him bend,
 Deep murmurs from her caves ascend;
 Till all his soul, by fancy'd sway'd,
 Sees lurid phantoms crowd the shade;
 While shrouded manes palely stare,
 And beck'ning wish to breathe their care:
 Thus real woes from false he bears,
 And feels the death, the hell, he fears.

O thou! whose spirit warms my song,
 With energy divinely strong,
 Ere& his soul, confirm his breast,
 And let him know the sweets of rest;
 Till ev'ry human pain and care,
 All that may be, and all that are,
 But false imagin'd ills appear
 Beneath our hope, or grief, or fear.
 And, if I right invoke thy aid,
 By thee be all my woes allay'd;
 With scorn instruct me to defy
 Imposing fear, and lawless joy;
 To struggle through this scene of strife,
 The pains of death, the pangs of life,
 With constant brow to meet my fate,
 And meet still more, Euanthe's hate.
 And, when some swain her charms shall claim,
 Who feels not half my gen'rous flame,
 Whose cares her angel-voice beguiles,
 On whom she bends her heav'nly smiles;
 For whom she weeps, for whom she glows,
 On whom her treasure'd soul bestows;
 When perfect mutual joy they share,
 Ah! joy enhanc'd by my despair!
 Mix beings in each flaming kiss,
 And blest, still rise to higher bliss:
 Then, then, exert thy utmost pow'r,
 And teach me being to endure;
 Lest reason from the helm should start,
 And lawless fury rule my heart;
 Lest madness all my soul subdue,
 To ask her Maker, what dost thou?
 Yet, could'st thou in that dreadful hour,
 On my rack'd soul all Lethe pour,
 Or fan me with the gelid breeze,
 That chains in ice th' indignant seas;
 Or wrap my heart in rnsfold steel,
 I still am man, and still must feel.

THE WISH SATISFIED.

AN IRREGULAR ODE.

Too long, my soul! thou'rt tost below,
 From hope to hope, from fear to fear:
 How great, how lasting ev'ry woe!
 Each joy how short, how insincere!

Turn around thy searching eyes
 Through all the bright varieties;
 And, with exactest care,

Select from all the shining crowd,
 Some lasting joy, some sov'reign good,
 And fix thy wishes there.

With toil amass a mighty store
 Of glowing stones, or yellow ore;
 Plant the fields with golden grain,
 Crowd with lowing herds the plain,
 Bid the marble domes ascend,
 Bid the pleafant view extend,
 Streams and groves, and woods appear,
 And spring and autumn fill the year:
 Sure, these are joys, full, permanent, sincere;
 Sure, now each boundless wish can ask no more.

On roses now reclin'd,
 I languish into rest;
 No vacuum in my mind,
 No craving wish unblest:
 But ah! in vain,
 Some absent joy still gives me pain,
 By toys elated, or by toys deprest.

What melting joy can sooth my grief?
 What balmy pleasure yield my soul relief?
 'Tis found; the bliss already warms,
 Sunk in love's persuasive arms,
 Enjoying and enjoy'd:
 To taste variety of charms
 Be ev'ry happy hour employ'd.

As the speedy moments roll,
 Let some new joy conspire;
 Hebe, fill the rosy bowl;
 Orpheus, tune the lyre;
 To new-born rapture wake the soul,
 And kindle young desire:
 While, a beauteous choir around,
 Tuneful virgins join the sound,
 Panting bosoms, speaking eyes,
 Yielding smiles, and trembling sighs:
 Through melting error let their voices rove,
 And trace the enchanting maze of harmony and love.

Still, still insatiate of delight
 My wishes open, as my joys increase:
 What now shall stop their restless flight,
 And yield them kind redress?
 For something still unknown I sigh,
 Beyond what strikes the touch, the ear, or eye:
 Whence shall I seek, or how pursue
 The phantom, that eludes my view,
 And cheats my fond embrace.

Thus, while her wanton toils fond pleasure spread,
 By sense and passion blindly led,
 I chas'd the Syren through the slow'ry maze,
 And courted death ten thousand ways:
 Kind Heav'n beheld, with plying eyes,
 My restless toil, my fruitless sighs;
 And, from the realms of endless day,
 A bright immortal wing'd his way;
 Swift as a sun-beam down he flew,
 And stood disclos'd, efulgent to my view.

"Fond man, he cry'd, thy fruitless search for-
 "bear;
 "Nor vainly hope, within this narrow sphere,
 "A certain happiness to find,
 "Unbounded as thy wish, eternal as thy mind:

" In God, in perfect good alone,
 " The anxious soul can find repose;
 " Nor to a bliss beneath his throne,
 " One hour of full enjoyment owes:
 " He, only he, can fill each wide desire,
 " Who to each with its being gave;
 " Not all the charms which mortal wishes fire,
 " Not all which angels in the skies admire,
 " But God's paternal smile, can bid it cease to
 " crave.
 " Him then pursue, without delay;
 " He is thy prize, and virtue is thy way."
 Then to the winds his radiant plumes he spread,
 And from my wondering eyes, more swift than lightning fled.

TO HAPPINESS.

AN ODE.

The morning dawns, the evening shades
 Fair nature's various face disguise;
 No scene to rest my heart persuades,
 No moment frees from tears my eyes:
 Whate'er once charm'd the laughing hour,
 Now boasts no more its pleasing pow'r;
 Each former object of delight,
 Beyond redemption, wings its flight;
 And, where it smil'd, the darling of my sight,
 Prospects of woe and horrid phantoms rise.

O Happiness! immortal fair,
 Where does thy subtle essence dwell?
 Dost thou relax the hermit's care,
 Companion in the lonely cell?
 Or, dost thou on the sunny plain
 Inspire the reed, and cheer the swain?
 Or, scornful of each low retreat,
 On fortune's favour dost thou wait;
 And, in the gilded chambers of the great,
 Protract the revel, and the pleasure swell!

Ah me! the hermit's cell explore;
 Thy absence he, like me, complains;
 While murmur'ing streams along the shore,
 Echo the love-sick shepherd's strains:
 Nor, where the gilded domes aspire,
 Deign'd thou, O goddess! to retire:
 Though there the loves and graces play,
 Though wine and music court thy stay;
 Thou fly'st, alas! and who can trace thy way,
 Or say what place thy heav'nly form contains?

If to mankind I turn my view,
 Flatter'd with hopes of social joy;
 Rapine and blood* mankind pursue,
 As God had form'd them to destroy.
 Discord, at whose tremendous view
 Hell quakes with horror ever new,
 No more by endless night deprest,
 Fours all her venom through each breast;
 And, while deep groans and carnage are increas'd,
 Smiles grim, the rising mischief to enjoy.

Hence, hence, indignant turn thine eyes,
 To my dejected soul I said;
 See, to the shade Euanthe lies,
 Go, find Euanthe in the shade:
 Her angel-form thy sight shall charm,
 Thy heart her angel-goodness warm;

* This Ode was written in the year 1745.

There shall no wants thy steps pursue,
 No wakeful care contract thy brow;
 Music each sound, and beauty ev'ry view,
 Shall ev'ry sense with full delight invade.

Exulting in the charming thought,
 Thither with hasty steps I press;
 And while th' enchanting maid I sought,
 Thank'd heav'n for all my past distress:
 Increasing hopes my journey cheer'd,
 And now in reach the bliss appear'd;
 Grant this sole boon, O fate! I cry'd;
 Be all thy other gifts deny'd,
 In this shall all my wishes be supply'd;
 And sure a love like mine deserves no less.

In vain, alas! in vain my pray'r;
 Fate mix'd the accents with the wind;
 Th' illusive form dissolv'd in air,
 And left my soul to grief resign'd:
 As far from all my hopes she flies,
 As deepest seas from loftiest skies:
 Yet, still, on fancy deep impress'd,
 The sad, the dear ideas rest;
 Yet still the recent sorrows heave my breast,
 Hang black o'er life, and prey upon my mind.

Ah! goddess, scarce to mortals known,
 Who with thy shadow madly fly,
 At length from Heav'n, thy sacred throne,
 Dart through my soul one cheerful ray:
 Ah! with some sacred lenient art,
 Allay the anguish of my heart;
 Ah! teach me, patient to sustain
 Life's various stores of grief and pain;
 Or, if I thus prefer my pray'r in vain,
 Soon let me find thee in eternal day.

ON EUANTHE'S ABSCENCE.

AN ODE.

Blest Heav'n! and thou fair world below!
 Is there no cure to sooth my smart?
 No balm to heal a lover's woe,
 That bids his eyes for ever flow,
 Consumes his soul, and pines his heart?
 And will no friendly arm above
 Relieve my tortur'd soul from love?

As swift descending show'rs of rain,
 Deform with mud the clearest streams;
 As rising mists heav'n's azure stain,
 Tint'd with Aurora's blush in vain,
 As fades the flow'r in mid-day beams,
 On life thus tender sorrows prey,
 And wrap in gloom its promis'd day.

Ye plains, where dear Euanthe strays,
 Ye various objects of her view,
 Bedeck'd in beauty's brightest blaze;
 Let all its forms, and all its rays,

Where-e'er she turns, her eyes pursue
 All fair as she let nature shine:
 Ah! then how lovely! how divine!

Where-e'er the thymy vales descend,
 And breathe ambrosial fragrance round,
 Proportion just, thy line extend,
 And teach the prospect where to end:
 While woods or mountains mark the bound,

That each fair scene which strikes her eye,
May charm with sweet variety.

Ye streams that in perpetual flow,
Still warble on your mazy way,
Murmur Euanthe, as you go;
Murmur a love-sick poet's woe:
Ye feather'd warblers, join the lay;
Sing how I suffer, how complain;
Yet name not him who feels the pain.

And thou, eternal ruling Pow'r!
If spotless virtue claims thy care,
Around unheard-of blessings show'r;
Let some new pleasure crown each hour,
And make her blest, as good and fair:
Of all thy works, to mortals known,
The best and fairest she alone.

TO A YOUNG GENTLEMAN BOUND FOR GUINEA.

AN ODE.

ATTEND the muse, whose numbers flow
Faithful to sacred friendship's woe;
And let the Scotian-lyre
Obtain thy pity and thy care:
While thy lov'd walks and native air
The solemn sounds inspire.

That native air, these walks no more
Blest with their fav'rite, now deplore,
And join the plaintive strain:
While, urg'd by winds and waves, he flies,
Where unknown stars, through unknown skies,
Their trackless course maintain.

Yet think: by ev'ry keener smart,
That thrills a friend or brother's heart;
By all the griefs that rise,
And with dumb anguish leave thy breast,
When absence robs thy soul of rest,
And swells with tears the eyes:

By all our sorrows ever new,
Think whom you fly, and what pursue;
And judge by your's our pain:
From friendship's dear tenacious arms,
You fly perhaps to war's alarms,
To angry skies and main.

The smiling plain, the solemn shade,
With all the various charms display'd,
That summer's face adorn;
Summer, with all that's gay or sweet,
With transport longs thy sense to meet,
And courts thy dear return.

The gentle sun, the fanning gale,
The vocal wood, the fragrant vale,
Thy presence all implore:
Can then a waste of sea and sky,
That knows no limits, charm thine eye,
Thine ear the tempest's roar?

But why such weak attractions name,
While ev'ry warmer social claim
Demands the mournful lay?
Ah! hear a brother's moving sighs,
Through tears, behold a sister's eyes
Emit a faded ray.

Thy young allies, by nature taught
To feel the tender pang of thought,
Which friends in absence claim;
To thee, with sorrow all-sincere,
Oft pay the tributary tear,
Oft list with joy thy name.

Nor these thy absence mourn alone,
O dearly lov'd! though faintly known;
One yet unsung remains:
Nature, when scarce fair light he knew,
Snatch'd heav'n, earth, beauty from his view,
And darkness round him reigns.

The muse with pity view'd his doom;
And darting through th' eternal gloom
An intellectual ray,
Bade him with music's voice inspire
The plaintive flute, the sprightly lyre,
And tune th' impassion'd lay.

Thus, though despairing of relief,
With ev'ry mark of heart-felt grief,
Thy absence we complain:
While now perhaps th' auspicious gale
Invites to spread the flying sail,
And all our tears are vain.

Protect him Heav'n: but hence each fear;
Since endless goodness, endless care
This mighty fabric guides;
Commands the tempest where to stray,
Directs the lightning's flanting way,
And rules the reflux tides.

See, from th' effulgence of his reign,
With pleas'd survey, Omniscience deign
Thy wondrous worth to view:
See, from the realms of endless day,
Immortal guardians wing their way,
And all thy steps pursue.

If sable clouds, whose wombs contain
The murr'ring bolt, or dashing rain,
The blue serene deform;
Myriads from heav'n's ethereal height,
Shall clear the gloom, restore the light,
And chase th' impending storm.

AN IRREGULAR ODE.

SENT TO A LADY ON HER MARRIAGE-DAY.

With all your wings ye moments fly,
And drive the tardy sun along;
Till that glad morn shall paint the sky,
Which wakes the muse, and claims the rav-
tur'd song.

See nature with our wishes join,
To aid the dear, the blest design;
See time precipitate his way,
To bring th' expected happy day;
See, the wish'd-for dawn appears,
A more than wonted glow she wears:
Hark! hymeneals sound;
Each muse awakes her softest lyre;
Each airy warbler swells the choir;
'Tis music all around.

Awake ye nymphs the blushing bride,
T' eclipse Aurora's rosy pride;

While virgin shame retards her way,
And Love, half-angry, chides her stay;
While hopes and fears alternate reign,
Intermingling blifs and pain;
O'er all her charms diffuse peculiar grace,
Pant in her shiv'ring heart, and vary in her face.

At length consent, reluctant fair,
To blefs thy long-expecting lover's eyes!
Too long his sighs are lost in air,
At length resign the blifs for which he dies:
The muses, precient of your future joys,
Dilate my soul, and prompt the cheerful lay;
Whie' they, through coming times, with glad surprise,

The long suceessive brightning scenes survey.

Lo! to your sight a blooming offspring rise,
And add new ardour to the nuptial ties;
While in each form you both united shine;
Fresh honours wait your temples to adorn:
For you glad Ceres fills the flowing horn,
And Heav'n and fate to blefs your days combine.

While life gives pleasure, life shall still remain,
Till death, with gentle hand, shall shut the pleasing scene:

Safe sable guide to that celestial shore,
Where pleasure knows no end, and change is fear'd
no more!

TO A COQUETTE.

AN ODE.

At length vain, airy flutt'ring fly;
Nor vex the public ear and eye
With all this noise and glare:
Thy wifer kindred gnats behold,
All shrouded in their parent mould,
Forfakè the chilling air.

Of conquest there they safely dream;
Nor gentle breeze, nor transient gleam,
Allures them forth to play:
But thou, alike in frost and flame,
Infatiate of the cruel game,
Still on mankind would'st prey.

Thy conscious charms, thy practis'd arts,
Those adventitious beams that round thee shine
Reserve for unexperienc'd hearts:
Superior spells despair to conquer mine.

Go, bid the sunshine of thine eyes
Melt rigid winter, warm the skies,
And set the rivers free;
O'er fields immers'd in frost and snow,
Bid flow'rs with smiling verdure grow;
Then hope to soften me.

No, Heav'n and freedom witness bear,
This heart no second frown shall fear,
No second yoke sustain:
Enough of female scorn I know;
Scarce fate could break my chain.

Ye hours, consum'd in hopeless pain,
Ye trees, inscrib'd with many a flaming vow,
Ye echoes, oft involk'd in vain,
Ye moon-light walks, ye tinkling rills, adieu!

Your paint that idle hearts controuls;
Your fairy nets for feeble souls,
By partial fancy wrought;
Your Syren voice, your tempting air,
Your borrow'd visage falsely fair,
With me avail you nought.

Let ev'ry charm that wakes desire,
Let each ensnaring art conspire;
Not all can hurt my rest:
Touch'd by * Ithuriel's potent spear,
At once unmask'd the fiends appear,
In native blackness drest.

The speaking glance, the heaving breast,
The cheek with lilies ting'd and rosy dye;
False joys, which ruin all who taste,
How swift they fade in reason's piercing eye!

Seest thou yon taper's vivid ray,
Which emulates the blaze of day,
Diffusing far its light?
Though it from blasts shall stand secure,
Time urges on the destin'd hour,
And lo! it sinks in night.

Such is thy glory, such its date,
Wav'd by the sportive hand of fate,
A while to catch our view:
Now bright to heav'n the blaze aspires,
Then sudden from our gaze retires,
And yields to wonders new.

Like this poor torch, thy haughty airs.
Thy short-liv'd splendor on a puff depends;
And soon as fate the stroke prepares,
The flash in dust and nauseous vapours ends.

ON THE REFINEMENTS IN METAPHY- SICAL PHILOSOPHY.

AN ODE.

FALSE wisdom, fly with all thy owls;
The dust and cobwebs of the schools
For me have charms no more;
The gross Minerva of our days,
In mighty bulk my learn'd † essays
Reads joyful o'er and o'er.

Led by her hand a length of time,
Through sense and nonsense, prose and rhyme,
I beat my painful way;
Long, long revolv'd the mystic page
Of many a Dutch and German sage,
And hop'd at last for day.

But as the mole, hid under ground,
Still works more dark, as more profound,
So all my toils were vain:
For truth and sense indignant fly,
As far as ocean from the sky,
From all the formal train.

* See Paradise Lost, Book IV, verse 810.

† Formerly the bird of Minerva, but by the moderns
ascribed to Dullness.

‡ The author, like others of greater name, had formerly attempted to demonstrate matters of fact à priori.

The * Stagyrite, whose fruitful quill
O'er free-born nature lords it still,
Sustain'd by form and phrase
Of dire portent and solemn sound,
Where meaning seldom can be found,
From me shall gain no praise.

But you who would be truly wise,
To nature's light unveil your eyes,
Her gentle call obey:
She leads by no false wand'ring glare,
No voice ambiguous strikes your ear,
To bid you vainly stray.

Not in the gloomy cell reclusè,
For noble deeds or gen'rous views,
She bids us watch the night;
Fair virtue shines, to all display'd.
Nor asks the tardy schoolman's aid,
To teach us what is right.

Pleasure and pain she sets in view,
And which to shun, and which pursue,
Instructs her pupil's heart:
Then letter'd pride, say what they gain,
To mask with so much fruitless pain,
Thy ignorance with art?

Thy stiff grimace, and awful tone,
An idiot's wonder move alone;
And, spite of all thy rules,
The wife in ev'ry age conclude
Thy fairest prospects, rightly view'd,
The paradise of fools.

The gamester's hope, when doom'd to lose,
The joys of wine, the wanton's vows,
The faithless calm at sea,
The courtier's word, the crowd's applause,
The Jesuit's faith, the sense of laws,
Are not more false than thee.

Blest he! who sees, without surprise,
The various systems fall and rise,
As shifts the sickle gale;
While all their utmost force exert,
To wound the foe's unguarded part,
And all alike prevail.

Thus (sacred † bards of yore have sung),
High Heav'n with martial clamours rung,
And deeds of mortal wrath;
When cranes and pigmies glory fought,
And in the fields of ether fought,
With mutual wounds and death.

Let Logic's sons mechanic throng,
Their syllogistic war prolong,
And reason's empire boast:
Enshrin'd in deep congenial gloom.
Eternal wrangling be their doom,
To truth and nature lost!

Amus'd by fancy's fleeting fire,
Let ‡ Malebranche still for truth inquire,
And rack his aching sight:

* Aristotle, inventor of syllogisms, as such only mentioned here.

† See Homer.

‡ He thought the medium by which sensible perceptions were conveyed to us, was God; in whose essence truth was seen, as in a mirror.

While the coy goddess wings her way,
To scenes of uncreated day,
Absorb'd in dazzling light.

With firmer step and graver guise,
Whilst * Locke in conscious triumph tries
Her dwelling to explore;
Swift she eludes his ardent chase;
A shadow courts his fond embrace,
Which † Hobbes careles'd before.

Let ‡ Dodwell with the fathers join,
To strip of energy divine
The heav'n-descended soul;
The test of sense let || Berkeley scorn,
And both on borrow'd pinions borne,
Annihilate the whole.

In academic vales retir'd,
With Plato's love and beauty fir'd,
My steps let candour guide;
By tenets vain unpreposited,
Those lawless tyrants of the breast,
Offspring of zeal and pride!

Or while through nature's walks I stray,
Would truth's bright source emit one ray,
And all my soul inflame;
Creation and her bounteous laws,
Her order fix'd, her glorious cause,
Should be my fav'rite theme.

TO MRS. R

ON THE DEATH OF A PROMISING INFANT.

AN ODE.

WHILE, touch'd with all thy tender pain,
The muses breathe a mournful strain,
O! lift thy languid eye!
O! deign a calm auspicious ear;
The muse shall yield thee tear for tear,
And mingle sigh with sigh.

Not for the Thracian bard, whose lyre
Could rocks and woods with soul inspire,
By jealous fury slain,
While murmur'ing on his trembling tongue,
Eurydice imperfect hung,
The nine could more complain.

Ah! say harmonious sisters, say:
When swift to pierce the lovely prey,
Fate took its cruel aim;
When languish'd ev'ry tender grace,
Each op'ning bloom that ting'd his face,
And pangs convuls'd his frame:

Say, could no song of melting woe,
Revoke the keen determin'd blow,
That clos'd his sparkling eye?

* His account of virtue differs not much from that of the Leviathan

† The author of the last mention'd piece; who denia the distinction between vice and virtue, and affirm'd power and right to be the same.

‡ He attempted to prove the natural mortality of the soul, and quoted the fathers in favour of his opinion.

|| Author of dialogues on the non-existence of matter

Thus roses oft, by early doom,
Robb'd of their blush and sweet perfume,
Grow pale, recline, and die.

Pale, pale and cold the beauteous frame!
Nor salient pulse, nor vital flame,
A mother's hopes restore:
In vain keen anguish tears her breast,
By ev'ry tender mark express'd,
He lives, he smiles no more!

Such is the fate of human kind;
The fairest form, the brightest mind,
Can no exemption know:
The mighty mandate of the sky,
"That man when born begins to die,"
Extends to all below.

In vain a mother's pray'rs ascend,
Should nature to her sorrows lend
The native voice of smart:
In vain would plaints their force essay
To hold precarious life one day,
Or fate's dread hand avert.

Fix'd as the rock that braves the main,
Fix'd as the poles that all sustain,
Its purpose stands secure:
The humble hynd who toils for bread,
The scepter'd hand, the laurel'd head,
Alike confess its pow'r.

Since time began, the stream of woes
Along its rapid current flows;
Still swells the groan profound:
While age, re-echoing still to age,
Transmits the annals of its rage,
And points the recent wound.

When human hopes sublimest pow'r,
Then, wanton in th' excess of pow'r,
The tyrant throws them down;
The orphan early robb'd of aid,
The widow'd wife, the plighted maid,
His sable triumph crown.

At length to life and joy return;
Man was not destin'd still to mourn,
A prey to endless pain:
Heav'n's various hand, the heart to form,
With bliss and anguish, calm and storm,
Diversifies the scene:

But hides with care from human eyes,
What bliss beyond this prospect lies;
Lest we, with life oppress'd,
Should grieve its burden to endure,
And, with excursion premature,
Pursue eternal rest.

From disappointment, grief, and care,
From every pang of sharp despair,
Thy charmer wings his way;
And, while new scenes his bosom fire,
He learns to strike the golden lyre,
And Heav'n resounds his lay.

Lo! where his sacred relics lie,
Immortal guardians from the sky
Their silver wings display;
Till, bright emerging from the tomb,
They rise to heav'n, their destin'd home,
And hail eternal day,

AN ODE.

WRITTEN WHEN SICK.

O PRIME of life! O taste of joy!
Whither so early do you fly?
Scarce half your transient sweetness known,
Why are you vanish'd ere full-blown?

The beauteous progeny of spring,
That tinge the zephyr's fragrant wing,
Each tender bloom, each short-liv'd flow'r,
Still flourish till their destin'd hour,
Your winter too, too soon will come,
And chill in death your vernal bloom.

On my wan cheek the colour dies,
Suffus'd and languid roll mine eyes;
Cold horrors thrill each sick'ning vein;
Deep broken sighs my bosom strain;
The salient pulse of health gives o'er,
And life and pleasure are no more.

TO HEALTH.

AN ODE.

MOTHER of all human joys,
Rosy cheeks, and sparkling eyes;
In whose train, for ever gay,
Smiling loves and graces play:
If complaints thy soul can move,
Or music charm the voice of love!
Hither, goddess, ere too late,
Turn, and stop impending fate.

Over earth, and sea, and sky,
Bid thy airy heralds fly;
With each balm which nature yields,
From the gardens, groves, and fields,
From each flow'r of varied hue,
From each herb that sips the dew,
From each tree of fragrant bloom,
Bid the gales their wings perfume;
And around fair Celia's head,
All the mingled incense shed:
Till each living sweetness rise,
Paint her cheeks, and arm her eyes,
Mild as ev'ning's humid ray,
Yet awful as the blaze of day.

Celia if the fates restore,
Love and beauty weep no more:
But if they snatch the lovely prize,
All that's fair in Celia dies.

TO A LITTLE GIRL WHOM I HAD OFFENDED.

AN ODE.

WRITTEN AT TWELVE YEARS OF AGE.

How long shall I attempt in vain
Thy smiles, my angel, to regain?
I'll kiss your hand, I'll weep, I'll kneel;
Will nought, fair tyrant, reconcile?

That goldfinch, with her painted wings,
Which gaily looks, and sweetly sings;
That, and if aught I have more fine,
All, all my charmer, shall be thine.

When next mamma shall prove severe,
I'll interpose, and save my dear.
Softens, my fair, those angry eyes,
Nor tear thy heart with broken sighs:
Think, while that tender breast they strain,
For thee what anguish I sustain.

Should but thy fair companions view,
How ill that frown becomes thy brow;
With fear and grief in ev'ry eye,
Each would to each, astonish'd, cry,
Heav'n! where is all her sweetness flown!
How strange a figure now she's grown!
Run, Nancy, let us run, lest we Grow pettish, awkward things, as she.

'Tis done, 'tis done; my cherub smiles,
My griefs suspend, my fears beguile:
How the quick pleasure heaves my breast!
Ah! still be kind, and I'll be blest!

TO LESBIA. f. p. 287.

TRANSLATED FROM CATULLUS. Car. 5.

THOUGH four, loquacious age reprove,
Let us, my Lesbia, live for love:
For, when the short-liv'd suns decline,
They but retire more bright to shine:
But we, when fleeting life is o'er,
And light and love can bless no more;
Are ravish'd from each dear delight,
'To sleep one long eternal night.
Give me of kisses balmy store,
Ten thousand, and ten thousand more;
Still add ten thousand, doubly sweet;
The dear, dear number still repeat:
And, when the sun so high shall swell,
Scarce thought can reach, or tongue can tell;
Let us on kisses kisses crowd,
Till number sink in multitude;
Lest our full bliss should limits know,
And others, numb'ring envious grow.

A TRANSLATION OF AN OLD SCOTTISH
SONG.

SINCE robb'd of all that charm'd my view,
Of all my soul e'er fancied fair,
Ye smiling native scenes, adieu!
With each delightful object there.
Ye vales, which to the raptur'd eye
Disclos'd the flow'ry pride of May;
Ye circling hills, whose summits high
Blush'd with the morning's earliest ray:
Where, heedless oft how far I stray'd,
And pleas'd my ruin to pursue;
I sung my dear, my cruel maid:
Adieu for ever! ah! adieu!
Ye dear associates of my breast,
Whose hearts with speechless sorrow swell;
And thou, with hoary age oppress'd,
Dear author of my life, farewell!
For me, alas! thy fruitless tears,
Far, far remote from friends and home,
Shall blast thy venerable years,
And bend thee pining to the tomb,

Sharp are the pangs by nature felt,
From dear relations torn away,
Yet sharper pangs my vitals melt,
To hopeless love a destin'd pray:
While she, as angry heav'n and main
Deaf to the helpless sailor's pray'r,
Enjoys my soul-consuming pain,
And wantons with my deep despair.
From cursed gold what ills arise!
What horrors life's fair prospect stain!
Friends blast their friends with angry eyes,
And brothers bleed, by brothers slain.
From cursed gold I trace my woe;
Could I this splendid mischief boast,
Nor would my tears unpitied flow.
Nor would my sighs in air be lost.
Ah! when a mother's cruel care
Nurs'd me an infant on the breast,
Had early fate surpris'd me there,
And wrapt me in eternal rest:

Then had this breast ne'er learn'd to beat,
And tremble with unpitied pain;
Nor had a maid's relentless hate,
Been, ev'n in death, deplor'd in vain,
Oft in the pleasing toils of love,
With ev'ry winning art I try'd
To catch the coyly flatt'ring dove,
With killing eyes and plummy pride:
But, far on nimble pinions borne
From love's warm gales and flow'ry plains,
She sought the northern climes of scorn,
Where ever-freezing winter reigns.
Ah me! had heav'n and the prov'd kind,
Then full of age, and free from care,
How blest had I my life resign'd,
Where first I breath'd this vital air!
But since no flatt'ring hope remains,
Let me my wretched lot pursue:
Adieu, dear friends, and native scenes,
To all, but grief and love, adieu!

SONG.

TO THE TUNE OF THE BRAES OF BALLANDYNE,
BENEATH a green shade, a lovely young swain,
One ev'ning reclin'd, to discover his pain:
So sad, yet so sweetly, he warbled his woe,
The winds ceas'd to breathe, and the fountains to flow: [plain;
Rude winds, with compassion, could hear him com-
Yet Cloe, less gentle, was deaf to his strain.
How happy, he cry'd, my moments once flew!
Ere Chloe's bright charms first flash'd in my view:
These eyes then with pleasure the dawn could survey; [they;
Nor smil'd the fair morning more cheerful than
New scenes of distress please only my sight;
I'm tortur'd in pleasure, and languish in light,
Through changes in vain relief I pursue;
All, all but conspire my griefs to renew:
From sunshine to zephyrs and shades we repair;
To sunshine we fly from too piercing an air;

But love's ardent fever burns always the same;
 No winter can cool it, no summer inasane.
 But see! the pale moon all clouded retires;
 The breezes grow cool, not Strephon's desires:
 I fly from the dangers of tempest and wind,
 Yet nourish the madness that preys on my mind.
 Ah wretch! how can life thus merit thy care,
 Since length'ning its moments, but lengthens despair?

THE RAVISH'D SHEPHERD.

A SONG.

AZURE dawn, whose cheerful ray
 Bids all nature's beauties rise,
 Were thy glories doubly gay,
 What art thou to Chloe's eyes?
 Boast no more thy rosy light,
 If Chloe smile thee into night.
 Gentle spring, whose kind return
 Spreads diffusive pleasure round,
 Bids each breast enamour'd burn,
 And each flame with bliss be crown'd;
 Should my Chloe leave the plain,
 Fell winter soon would blast thy reign.
 Ev'ry charm, whose high delight
 Sense enjoys, or soul admires;
 All that ardour can excite,
 All excited love requires,
 All that heav'n or earth call fair,
 View, Chloe's face, and read it there.

A PASTORAL SONG.

SANDY, the gay, the blooming swain,
 Had lang frae love been free;
 Lang made ilk heart that fill'd the plain
 Dance quick with harmless glee.
 As blythsome lambs that scour the green,
 His mind was unconstrain'd;
 Nae face could ever fix his een,
 Nae fang his ear detain'd.
 Ah! luckless youth! a short-liv'd joy
 Thy cruel fates decree;
 Fell tods shall on thy lambkins prey,
 And love mair fell on thee.
 'Twas e'er the sun exhal'd the dew,
 Ae morn of cheerful May,
 Forth Girzy walk'd, the flow'rs to view,
 A flow'r mair sweet than they!
 Like sunbeams sheen her waving locks;
 Her een like stars were bright;
 The rose lent blushes to her cheek;
 The lily purest white.
 Jimp was her waist, like some tall pine
 That keeps the woods in awe;
 Her limbs like iv'ry columns turn'd,
 Her breasts like hills of snaw.
 Her robe around her loosely thrown,
 Gave to the shepherd's een
 What fearless innocence would show;
 The rest was all unseen.

He fix'd his look, he sigh'd, he quak'd,
 His colour went and came;
 Dark grew his een, his ears resound,
 His breast was all on flame.

Nae mair yon glen repeats his fang,
 He jokes and smiles nae mair;
 Unplaited now his cravat hung,
 Undrest his cheftun hair.

To him how lang the shortest night!
 How dark the brightest day!
 Till, with the flow consuming fire,
 His life was worn away.

Far, far frae shepherds and their flocks,
 Opprest with care, he lean'd;
 And, in a mirky, beachen shade,
 To hills and dales thus pleas'd:

" At length, my wayward heart, return,
 'Too far, alas! afloat:
 Say, whence you caught that bitter smart,
 Which works me such decay.

Ay me! 'twas Love, 'twas Girzy's charms,
 That first began my woes;
 Could he see fast, or she see fair,
 Prove such relentless foes?

Fierce winter nips the sweetest flower;
 Keen lightning rives the tree;
 Bleak mildew taints the fairest crop,
 And love has blasted me.

Sagacious hounds the foxes chase;
 The tender lambkins they;
 Lambs follow close their mother ewes,
 And ewes the blooms of May.

Sith a' that live, with a' their might,
 Some dear delight pursue;
 Cease, ruthless maid! to scorn the heart
 That only pants for you.

Alas! for griefs, to her unken'd,
 What pity can I gain?
 And should she ken, yet love refuse,
 Could that redress my pain?

Come, death, my wan, my frozen bride,
 Ah! close those wearied eyes:
 But death the happy still pursues,
 Still from the wretched flies.

Could wealth avail; what wealth is mine
 Her high-born mind to bend?
 Her's are those wide delightful plains,
 And her's the flocks I tend.

What though, when'er I tun'd my pipe,
 Glad fairies heard the sound,
 And, clad in freshest April green,
 Aft tript the circle round:

Break, landward clown, thy dingsome reed,
 And brag thy skill nae mair:
 Can aught that gies na Girzy joy,
 Be worth thy lightest care?

Adieu! ye harmless, sportive flocks!
 Who now your lives shall guard?
 Adieu! my faithful dog, who oft
 The pleasing vigil thar'd:

Adieu! ye plains, and light, and sweet,
 Now painful to my view:
 Adieu to life; and thou, mair dear,
 Who caus'd my death; adieu!"

ON THE DEATH OF STELLA:

A PASTORAL.

INSCRIBED TO HER SISTER.

"See on those ruby lips the trembling breath,
 "Those cheeks now faded at the blast of death;
 "Cold is that breast which warm'd the world
 "before;
 "And those love-darting eyes shall roll no more."

POPE.

Now purple ev'ning ting'd the blue serene,
 And milder breezes fann'd the verdant plain;
 Beneath a blasted oak's portentous shade,
 To speak his grief, a pensive swain was laid:
 Birds ceas'd to warble at the mournful sound;
 The laughing landscape sadden'd all around:
 For Stella's fate he breath'd his tuneful moan,
 Love, beauty, virtue, mourn your darling gone!

"O thou! by stronger ties than blood ally'd,
 Who dy'd to please, when * a sister dy'd;
 Thou living image of those charms we lost,
 Charms which exulting nature once might boast!
 Indulge the plaintive muse, whose simple strain
 Repeats the herat-felt anguish of the swain:
 For Stella's fate thus flow'd his tuneful moan,
 Love, beauty, virtue, mourn your darling gone!

Are happiness and joy for ever fled,
 Nor haunt the twilight grove nor sunny glade?
 Ah! fled for ever from my longing eye;
 With Stella born, with Stella too they die:
 Die, or with me your brightest image moan;
 Love, beauty, virtue, mourn your darling gone!

Sweet to the thirsty tongue the crystal-stream,
 To nightly wand'ers sweet the morning beam;
 Sweet to the wither'd grass the gentle show'r;
 To the fond lover sweet the nuptial hour;
 Sweet fragrant gardens to the lab'ring bee,
 And lovely Stella once was heav'n to me:
 That heav'n is faded, and those joys are flown,
 Love, beauty, virtue, mourn your darling gone!

Ah! where is now that form which charm'd my sight?

Ah! where that wisdom, sparkling heav'nly bright?
 Ah! where that sweetness like the lays of spring,
 When breathe its show'rs, and all its warblers sing?
 Now fade, ye show'rs, ye warblers, join my moan;
 Love, beauty, virtue, mourn your darling done?

Ah me! though winter desolate the field,
 Again shall show'rs their blended odours yield;
 Again shall birds the vernal season hail,
 And beauty paint, and music charm the vale:
 But she no more to bless me shall appear;
 No more her angel voice enchant my ear;
 No more her angel smile relieve my moan:
 Love, beauty, virtue, mourn your darling gone!

* Mrs. M'Culloch, a Lady distinguished for every personal grace and qualification of mind, which could adorn her sex and nature.

He ceas'd; for mighty grief his voice suppress'd,
 Chill'd all his veins, and struggl'd in his breast;
 From his wan cheek the rosy tincture flies;
 The lustre languish'd in his closing eyes:
 Too soon shall life return, unhappy swain!
 If, with returning sense, returns thy pain.
 Hills, woods, and streams, resound the shepherd's moan;

Love, beauty, virtue, mourn your darling gone!

A PASTORAL.

INSCRIBED TO EUANTHE.

WHITST I rehearse unhappy Damon's lays,
 At which his fleecy charge forgot to graze,
 With drooping heads and griev'd attention, stood,
 Nor frisk'd the green, nor fought the neigh'ring
 flood;

Essential sweetness! deign with me to stray,
 Where yon close shades exclude the heat of day;
 Or where yon fountain murmurs soft along;
 Mix with his tears, and vocal to his song;
 I here hear the sad relation of his fate,
 And pity all the pains thy charms create.

Clofe in th' adjacent shade, conceal'd from view,
 I staid, and heard him thus his griefs pursue:

"Awake, my muse! the soft Sicilian strain;
 Mild gleams the purple ev'ning o'er the plain;
 Mild fan the breezes, mild the waters flow,
 And heav'n and earth an equal quiet know;
 With ease the shepherds and their flocks are blest,
 And ev'ry grief, but mine, consents to rest.

Awake, my muse, the soft Sicilian strain;
 Sicilian numbers may delude my pain:
 The thirsty field, which scorching heat devours,
 Is e'er supply'd, though heav'n descend in show'rs:
 From flow'r to flow'r the bee still plies her wing,
 Of sweets insatiate, though the drain the spring:
 Still from those eyes love calls their liquid store,
 And, when their currents fail, still thirsts for more.

Awake, my muse! the soft Sicilian strain:
 Yet why to ruthless forms should I complain?
 Deaf storms and death itself complaints may move,
 But groans are music to the tyrant love.

O love! thy genius and thy force I know,
 Thy burning torch, and pestilential bow:
 From some fermented tempest of the main,
 At once commenc'd thy being, and thy reign;
 Nurs'd by fell harpies in some howling wood,
 Inur'd to slaughter, and regal'd with blood:
 Relentless mischief! at whose dire command,
 A mother stain'd with filial blood her hand:
 Curst boy! curst mother! which most impious, say,
 She who could wound, or he who could betray!

Awake, my muse! the soft Sicilian strain:
 From love those sighs I breathe, those plagues sustain.
 Why did I first Euanthe's charms admire,
 Bless the soft smart, and fan the growing fire?
 Why, happy still my danger to conceal,
 Could I no ruin, fear, till sure to feel?
 So seeks the swain by night his doubtful way,
 Led by th' insidious meteor's fleeting ray;
 Still on, attracted by th' illusive beam,
 He tempts the faithless marsh, or fatal stream:
 Away with scorn the laughing demon flies,
 While shades eternal seal the wretch's eyes.

Awake, my muse! the soft Sicilian strain
 Ah! can no last, no darling hope remain,

Round which my soul with all her strength may twine,

And, though but flatter'd, call the treasure mine?
Wretch! to the carmer's sphere canst thou ascend,
Or dar'st thou fancy she to thee will bend?
Say, shall the chirping grasshopper assume
The varied accent, and the soaring plume;
Or shall that oak, the tallest of his race,
Stoop to his root, and meet yon shrub's embrace?

Awake, my muse! the soft Sicilian strain:
Those pallid cheeks how long shall sorrow stain?
Well I remember, O my soul! too well,
When in the snare of fate I thoughtless fell:
Languid and sick, the sought the distant shade,
Where, led by love or destiny, I stray'd:
There, from the nymphs retir'd deprest'd she lay,

To unrenmitting pain a smiling prey:
Ev'n then I saw her, as an angel, bright:
I saw, I lov'd, I perish'd at the sight;
I sigh'd, I blush'd, I gaz'd with fix'd surprisè,
And all my soul hung raptur'd in my eyes.
Forbear, my muse! the soft Sicilian strain;
Which heav'n bestows, and art refines, in vain:
What though the heav'n-born muse my temples
shade.

With wreaths of fame, and bays that never fade?
What though the Sylvan pow'rs, while I com-
plain,

Attend my flocks, and patronize my strain?
On me my stars, nor gifts, but ills bestow,
And all the change I feel, is change of woe.

But see yon rock projected o'er the main,
Whose giddy prospect turns the gazer's brain:
Object is lost beneath its vast profound,
And deep and hoarse below the surges sound:
Oft, while th' unthinking world is lost in sleep,
My fable genius tempts me to the steep;
In fancy's view bids endless horrors move,
A barren fortune, and a hopeless love,
Life has no charms for me; why longer stay?

I hear the gloomy mandate, and obey.
What! fall the victim of a mean despair,
And crown the triumph of the cruel fair?
No, let me once some conscious merit show,
And tell the world, I can survive my woe.

Forbear my muse! the soft Sicilian strain:
Fool! wretched fool! what frenzy fires thy brain?

See, chok'd with weeds, thy languid flow'rs re-
cline,

Thy sheep unguarded, and unprop'd thy vine.
At length recall'd, to toil thy hands inure,
Or weave the basket, or the fold secure.

What though her cheeks a living blush display,
Pure as the dawn of heav'n's unclouded day;
Though love from ev'ry glance an arrow wings,
And all the muses warble, when she sings?

Forbear, my muse! the soft Sicilian strain;
Some nymph, as fair, a sprightlier note may
gain:

There are who know to prize more genuine charms,
Which genius brightens, and which virtue warms:
Forbear, my muse! the soft Sicilian strain;
Some nymph, as fair, may smile, though she disdain.

THE PLAINITIVE SHEPHERD.

A PASTORAL ELEGY.

"Eheu! quid volui misero mihi? floribus austrum
"Perditus, et liquidis immisi fontibus apros."
VIRG.

COLIN, whose lays the shepherds all admire,
For Phœbe long consum'd with hopeless fire;
Nor durst his tongue the hidden smart convey,
Nor tears the torment of his soul betray:
But to the wildness of the woods he flies,
And vents his grief in unregarded sighs:
Ye conscious woods, who still the sound retain,
Repeat the tuneful sorrows of the swain.

"And must I perish then, ah cruel maid!
To early fate, by love of thee betray'd?
And can no tender art thy soul subdue;
Me, dying me, with milder eyes to view?
The flow'r that withers in its op'ning bloom,
Robb'd of its charming dyes, and sweet perfume;
The tender lamb that prematurely pines,
And life's untasted joys at once resigns;
For these thy tears in copious tributaries flow,
For these thy bosom heaves with tender woe?
And canst thou then with tears thy fate survey,
While, blasted by thy coldness, I decay?"

"And now the swains each to their cots are fled,
And not a warble echoes through the mead;
Now to their folds the panting flocks retreat,
Scorch'd with the summer noon's relentless heat:
From summer's heat the shades a refuge prove;
But what can shield my heart from fiercer love?
All bounteous nature taught the fertile field,
For all our other ills a balm to yield;
But love, the sharpest pang the soul sustains,
Still cruel love incurable remains.

"Yet, dear destroyer! yet my suff'rings hear!
By love's kind look, and pity's sacred tear,
By the strong griefs that in my bosom roll,
By all the native goodness of thy soul,
Regard my bloom declining to the grave,
And, like eternal Mercy, smile and save.

"What though no sounding names my race adorn;
Sustain'd by labour, and obscurely born;
With fairest flow'rs the humble vales are spread,
While endless tempests beat the mountain's head,
What though by fate no riches are my share;
Riches are parents of eternal care;
While, in the lowly hut and silent grove,
Content plays smiling with her sister Love.
What though no native charms my person grace,
Nor beauty moulds my form, nor paints my face;
The sweetest fruit may often pall the taste,
While sloes and brambles yield a safe repast."

Ah! prompt to hope, forbear thy fruitless strain;
Thy hopes are frantic, and thy lays are vain.
Say, can thy song appease the stormy deep,
Or lull the impetuous hurricane asleep?
Thy numbers then her steadfast soul may move,
And change the purpose of determin'd love.

Die, Colin, die, nor groan with grief opprest;
Another image triumphs in her breast;
Another soon shall call the fair his own,
And heav'n and fate seem pleas'd their vows to crown.

Arise, Menaica, with the dawn arise;
For thee thy Phoebe looks with longing eyes;
For thee the shepherds, a delighted throng,
Wake the soft reed, and hymeneal song;
For thee the hasty virgins rob the spring,
And, wrought with care, the nuptial garland bring.
Arise, Menalcaas, with the dawn arise;
Ev'n time for thee with double swiftness flies:
Hours urging hours, with all their speed retire,
To give thy soul whate'er it can desire.

Yet, when the priest prepares the rites divine,
And when her trembling hand is clapp'd in thine,
Let not thy heart too soon indulge its joys;
But think on him whom thy delight destroys!
Thee too he lov'd; to thee his simple heart,
With easy faith and fondness breath'd its smart:
So fools their flocks to sanguine wolves resign,
So trust the cunning fox to prune the vine.
Think thou behold 't him from some gaping wound
Effuse his soul, and stain with blood the ground:
Think, while to earth his pale remains they bear,
His friends with shrieking sorrow pierce thine ear:
Or, to some torrent's headlong rage a prey,
Think thou behold 't him floating to the sea.

But now the sun declines his radiant head,
And rising hills project a length'ning shade:
Again to browse the green the flocks return,
Again the swains to sport, and I to mourn:
I homeward too must bend my painful way,
Left old Damocetas sternly chide my stay.

DESIDERIUM LUTETIÆ;

FROM EUCHANAN, AN ALLEGORICAL PASTORAL,
IN WHICH HE REGRETS HIS ABSENCE FROM PARIS, IMITATED.

WHILE far remote, thy swain, dear Chloe! sighs,
Depriv'd the vital sunshine of thine eyes;
Seven summer heats already warm the plains;
In storms and snow the sev'nth bleak winter
reigns:

Yet not seven years revolving sad and slow,
Nor summer's heats, nor winter's storms and snow,
Can to my soul the smallest ease procure,
Or free from love and care one tedious hour.

Thee, when from heav'n descend the dews of
morn,

To crop the verdant mead when flocks return;
Thee, when the sun has compass'd half his way,
And darts around unufferable day;
Thee, when the ev'ning o'er the world display'd,
From rising hills projects a length'ning shade;
Thee still I sing, unwear'd of my theme,
Source of my song, and object of my flame!
Ev'n night, in whose dark bosom nature laid,
Appears one blank, one undistinguish'd shade,
Ev'n night in vain, with all her horrors tries
To blot thy lovely form from fancy's eyes.

When short-liv'd slumbers, long invok'd, descend,

To sooth each care, and ev'ry sense suspend,
Full to my sight once more thy charms appear;
Once more my ardent vows salute thine ear;
Once more my anxious soul, awake to bliss,
Feels, hears, detains thee in her close embrace:

In flutt'ring, thrilling, glowing transport lost,
Till sense itself in keen delight is lost.

From sleep I wake; but, oh! how chang'd the scene!

The charms illusive, and the pleasure vain!
The day returns; but ah! returning day,
When ev'ry grief but mine admits alloy,
On these sad eyes its glory darts in vain;
Its light restor'd, restores my soul to pain.

The house I fly, impell'd by wild despair,
As if my griefs could only find me there.
Lost to the world, through lonely fields I rove;
Vain wish! to fly from destiny and love!
By wayward frenzy's restless impulse led,
Through devious wilds, with heedless course, I
tread:

The cave remote, the dusky wood explore,
Where human step was ne'er impress'd before:
And, with the native accents of despair,
Fatigue the conscious rocks, and desert air.
Kind echo, faithful to my plaints alone,
Sigh all my sighs, and groans to ev'ry groan.
The streams, familiar to the voice of woe,
Each mournful sound remurmur as they flow.

Oft on some rock distracted I complain,
Which hangs project'd o'er the ruff'd main:
Oft view the azure surges as they roll,
And to deaf storms effuse my frantic soul.

"Attend my sorrows, O cerulean tide!

"Ye blue-ey'd nymphs that through the billows glide,

"Oh! wait me gently o'er your rough domain;

"Let me at length my darling coast attain:

"Or, if my wishes thus too much implore,
Shipwreck'd and gasping let me reach the shore,

"While wash'd along the floods I hold my way,

"To ev'ry wind and ev'ry wave a prey,

"Dear hope and love shall bear my struggling
frame,

"And unextinguish'd keep the vital flame."

Oft to the hail'ning zephyrs have I said:

"You, happy gales! shall fan my lovely maid.

"So may no pointed rocks your wings deform;

"So may your speedy journey meet no storm.

"As oft you whisper round my heav'nly fair;

"Play on her breast, or wanton with her hair;

"Faithful to love, the tender message bear,

"And breathe my endless sorrows in her ear."

How oft rough Eurus have I ask'd in vain!

As with swift wings he brush'd the foamy main:

"Blest wind! who late my distant charmer
view'd,

"Say, has her soul no other wish pursu'd!

"With mutual fire, say, does her bosom glow;

"Feels she my wound, and pities she my woe?"

Heedless of all my tears, and all I say,
The winds, with blust'ring fury, wing their way.

A freezing horror, and a chilling pain,
Shoots through my heart, and stagnates ev'ry vein.

No rural pleasures yield my soul relief;

No melting shepherd's pipe consoles my grief;

The choral nymphs, that dancing cheer the plain,
And fauns, though sweet their song, yet sing in
vain.

Deaf to the voice of joy, my tortur'd mind
Can only room for love and anguish find.

By these my soul and all its wishes caught,
Can to no other object yield a thought.

Lycisca, skilful with her lyre to move
Each tender wish, and melt the soul to love :
Melanis too, with ev'ry sweetness crown'd,
By nature form'd with ev'ry glance to wound :
With emulation both my love pursue,
And both, with winning arts, my passion woo.
The freshest bloom of youth their cheeks display ;
Their eyes are arm'd with beauty's keenest ray ;
Av'rice itself might count their fleecy store,
(A prize beyond its wish) and pant no more.

Me oft their dow'rs each gen'rous fire has told,

An hundred playful younglings from the fold,
Each with his dam : their mothers promise more,
And oft, and long, with secret gifts, implore.
Me nor an hundred playful younglings move,
Each with its dam ; nor wealth can bribe my love .

Nor all the griefs th' imploring mothers flow ;
Nor all the secret gifts they would bestow ;
Nor all the tender things the nymphs can say ;
Nor all the soft desires the nymphs betray .

As winter to the spring in beauty yields,
Langor to health, and rocks to verdant fields ;
As the fair virgin's cheek, with rosy dye
Blushing delight, with lightning arm'd her eye,
Beyond her mother's faded form appears,
Mark'd with the wrinkles and the snow of years ;
As beautiful Tweed, and wealth-importing Thames

Flow each the envy of their country's streams :
So, lovliest of her sex, my heav'nly maid
Appears, and all their fainter glories fade .

Melanis, whom love's soft enchantments arm,
Replete with charms, and conscious of each charm,
Oft on the glassy stream, with raptur'd eyes,
Surveys her form in mimic sweetness rise ;
Oft, as the waters pleas'd reflect her face,
Adjusts her locks, and heightens ev'ry grace :
Oft thus she tries, with all her tuneful art,
To reach the soft access of my heart .

" Unhappy swain, whose wishes fondly stray,
" To slow-consuming fruitless fires a prey !
" Say, will those sighs and tears forever flow
" In hopeless torment, and determin'd woe ?
" Our fields, by nature's bounty blest, as thine,
" The mellow apple yield, and purple vine ;
" Those too thou lov'st ; their free enjoyment
" share,

" Nor plant vain tedious hopes, and reap despair."
Me oft Lycisca, in the festive train,
Views as the lightly bounds along the plain :
Straight, with dissembled scorn, away she flies :
Yet still on me obliquely turns her eyes :
While, to the music of her trembling strings,
Amidst the dance sweet warbling, thus she sings :
" No tears the just revenge of Heav'n can move ;
" Heav'n's just revenge will punish slighted love .
" I've seen a huntsman, active as the morn,
" Salute her earliest blush with sounding horn ;
" Pursue the bounding stag with op'ning cries,
" And slight the timid hare, his easy prize ;
" Then, with the setting sun, his hounds restrain ;
" Nor bounding stag, nor timid hare obtain .

" I've seen the sportsman latent nets display,
" To catch the feather'd warblers of the spray ;
" Despise the finch that flutter'd round in air,
" And court the sweeter linnets to his snare :
" Yet weary, cold, successless, leave the plain ;
" Nor painted finch, nor sweeter linnets, gain .
" I've seen a youth the polish'd pipe admire,
" And scorn the simple reed the swains inspire :
" The simple reed yet cheers each tuneful swain ;
" While still unblest the scorned pines in vain .
" Thus righteous Heav'n chastises wanton pride,
" And bids intemp'rar's insolence subside,"
Thus breathe the am'rous nymphs their fruitless
pain,

In ears impervious to the softest strain,
But first with trembling lambs the wolf shall graze ;
First hawks with linnets join in social lays ;
First shall the tiger's sanguine thirst expire,
And tim'rous fawns the lion fierce admire ;
Ere, with her lute Lycisca taught to charm,
This destin'd heart ere soft Melanis warm .
First shall the finny nation leave the flood,
Shadows the hills, and birds the vocal wood ;
The winds shall cease to breathe, the streams to
flow ;
Ere my desires another object know .
This infant bosom, yet in love untaught :
From Chloe first the pleasing ardour caught :
Chloe shall still its faithful empire claim,
Its first ambition, and its latest aim !
Till ev'ry wish and ev'ry hope be o'er,
And life and love inspire my frame no more .

PHILANTHES :

A MONODY.

INSCRIBED TO MISS D—Y H—Y.

*Occasioned by a series of interesting events which happened at Dumfries on Friday, June 12. 1752.
—particularly that of her father's death.*

" Quis desiderio sit pudor, aut modus
" Tam chari capitis? Præcipe lugubres
" Cantus Melpomene, cui liquidam pater
" Vocem cum cithara dedit." HOR.

ARGUMENT.

The subject propos'd.—Address to Miss H—y.
—General reflections inspired by the subject, and previous to it.—The scene opens with a prospect of Mrs. M—n's funeral solemnity :
and changes to the untimely fate of a beautiful youth, son to Mr. J—s H—ll, whose early genius, quick progress in learning, and gentle dispositions, inspired his friends with the highest expectations of his riper attainments—
Transition to the death of Dr. J—s H—y physician : his character as such : the general sorrow occasioned by his fate : his character, as a friend, as particularly qualified to soothe distress ; as a gentleman ; as a husband . as a father : his loss considered in all these relations, particularly as sustained by Miss H—y : her tender care of him during his sickness described.—The piece concludes with an apotheosis,
in imitation of Virgil's Daphnis.

A SWAIN, whose soul the tuneful nine inflame,
As to his western goal the sun declin'd,
Sung to the list'ning shades no common theme ;
While the hoarse breathings of the hollow wind,
And deep resounding surge in concert join'd.

Deep was the surge, and deep the plaintive song,
While all the solemn scene in mute attention
hung.

Nor thou, fair victim of so just a woe !
Though still the pangs of nature swell thy heart,
Disdain the faithful muse ; whose numbers flow
Sacred, alas ! to sympathetic smart :
For in thy griefs the muses claim a part ;
'Tis all they can, in social tears to mourn,
And deck with cypress wreaths thy dear paternal urn.

The swain began, while conscious echoes round
Protract to sadder length his doleful lay.
Roll on, ye streams, in cadence more profound :
Ye humid vapours, veil the face of day :

O'er all the mournful plain
Let night and sorrow reign :
For * Pan indignant from his fields retires,
Once haunts of gay delight ;
Now every sense they fright,
Resound with shrieks of woe, and blaze with fun'ral fires.

What though the radiant sun and clement sky
Alternate warmth and show'rs dispense below ;
Though spring prefaces to the careful eye,
That autumn copious with her fruits shall glow ?
For us in vain her choicest blessings flow :
To ease the bleeding heart, alas ! in vain
Rich swells the purple grape, or waves the golden grain.

What summer-breeze, on swiftest pinions borne,
From fate's relentless hand its prey can save ?
What fun in death's dark regions wait the morn,
Or warm the cold recesses of the grave ? [heave
Ah wretched man : whose breast scarce learns to
With kindling life : when, ere thy bud is blown,
Eternal winter breathes, and all its sweets are gone.

Thou all-enlivening flame, intensely bright !
Whose sacred beams illumine each wand'ring sphere,
That through high heav'n reflects thy trembling
light,

Conducting round this globe the varied year ;
As thou pursu'st thy way,
Let this revolving day,
Deep-ting'd with conscious gloom, roll slow along :
In sable pomp array'd,
Let night diffuse her shade,

Nor sport the cheerless hind, nor chant the vocal throng.

Scarce, from the ardour of the mid-day gleam,
Had languid nature in the cool respir'd ;
Scarce, by the margin of the silver stream,
Faint sung the birds in verdant shades retir'd ;
Scarce, o'er the thirity field with sun-shine fir'd,
Had ev'ning gales the sportive wing essay'd,
When sounds of hopeless woe the silent scene invade.

* God of Arcadia, who peculiarly presides over rural life.

Sophonria, long for ev'ry virtue dear
That grac'd the wife, the mother, or the friend,
Depriv'd of life, now press'd the mournful bier,
In sad procession to the tomb sustain'd.
Ah me ! in vain to heav'n and earth complain'd
With tender cries her num'rous orphan train ;
The tears of wedded love profuse were shed in
vain.

For her, was grief on ev'ry face impress'd ;
For her, each bosom heav'd with tender sighs :
An husband late with all her virtues blest'd,
And weeping race in sad ideas rise :
For her depress'd and pale,
Your charms, ye Graces, veil.

Whom to adorn was once your chief delight :
Ye virtues all deplore
Your image, now no more,
And * Hymen quench thy torch in tears and endless night.

Nor yet these dismal prospects disappear,
When o'er the weeping plain new horrors rise,
And louder accents pierce each frighted ear,
Accents of grief embitter'd by surpris'd !
Frantic with woe, at once the tumult flies,
To snatch Adonis wash'd along the stream,
And all th' extended bank re-echoes to his name.

Rang'd on the brink the weeping matrons stand,
The lovely wreck of fortune to survey,
While o'er the flood he wav'd his beauteous hand,
Or in convulsive anguish struggling lay.
By slow degrees they view'd his force decay,
In fruitless efforts to regain the shore :
They view'd and mourn'd his fate : O Heav'n !
they could no more.

Ye † Naiads, guardians of the fatal flood,
Was beauty, sweetness, youth, no more your care ?
For beauty, sweetness, youth, your pity woo'd,
Pow'rful to charm, if fate could learn to spare.

Stretch'd on cold earth he lies ;
While, in his closing eyes,
No more the heav'n-illum'd lustre shines ;
His cheek, once nature's pride,
With blooming roses dy'd,
To unrelenting fate its op'ning blush resigns.

Dear hapless youth ! what felt thy mother's heart,
When in her view thy lifeless form was laid ?
Such anguish when the soul and body part,
Such agonizing pangs the frame invade,
Was there no hand, the cry'd, my child to aid ?
Could heav'n and earth unmov'd his fall survey,
Nor from th' insatiate waves redeem their lovely prey ?

Did I for this my tend'rest cares employ,
To nourish and improve thy early bloom ?
Are all my rising hopes, my promis'd joy,
Extinguish'd in death's inexorable gloom ?
No more shall life those faded charms relume,
Dear rip'ning sweetness ! sunk no more to rise !
Thee nature mourns, like me, with fond maternal eyes.

Fortune and life, your gifts how insecure !
How fair you promise ! but how ill perform !

* God of marriage.
† River Goddesses.

Like tender fruit, they perish premature,
Scorch'd by the beam, or whelm'd beneath the storm.

For thee a fate more kind,
Thy mother's hopes assign'd,

Than thus to sink in early youth deplor'd:
But late thou fled'st my sight,
Thy parent's dear delight!

And art thou to my arms, ah! art thou thus restor'd?

Severe these ills; yet heavier still impend,
That wound with livelier grief the smiting soul:
As, ere the long-collected storm descend,
Red lightnings flash, and thunder shakes the pole;
Portentous, solemn, loud its murmurs roll:
While from the subject field the trembling hind
Views infant ruin threat the labours of mankind.

For scarce the bitter sigh and deep'ning groan
In fainter cadence died away in air,
When, lo! by fate a deadlier shaft was thrown,
Which open'd ev'ry source of deep despair:
As yet our souls those recent sorrows share,
Swift from th' adjacent field Menalca flies,
While grief impels his steps, and tears bedew
his eyes.

Weep on, he cry'd, let tears no measure know:
Hence from those fields let pleasure wing her
way:

Ye shades, be hallow'd from this hour to woe:
No more with summer's pride, ye meads be gay.
Ah! why, with sweetness crown'd,
Should summer smile around?

Philanthes now is number'd with the dead:
Young health, all drown'd in tears,
A livid paleness wears;

Dim are her radiant eyes, and all her roses fade.

Him bright * Hygeia, in life's early dawn,
Through nature's fav'rite walks with transport led,

Through woods umbrageous, or the op'ning lawn,
Or where fresh fountains lave the flow'ry mead:
There summer's treasures to his view display'd,

What herbs and flow'rs salubrious juice bestow,
Along the lowly vale, or mountain's arduous brow.

The paralytic nerve his art confess'd,
Quick-panting asthma, and consumption pale:
Corrosive pain he soften'd into rest,
And bade the fever's rage no more prevail.
Unhappy art! decreed at last to fail,
Why linger'd then thy salutary pow'r,
Nor from a life so dear repell'd the destin'd
hour?

Your griefs, O love and friendship, how severe!
When high to heav'n his soul pursu'd her flight;
Your moving plaints still vibrate on my ear,
Still the sad vision swims before my sight.
O'er all the mournful scene,
Inconsolable pain,

In ev'ry various form, appear'd express'd:
The tear-distilling eye,
The long, deep, broken sigh,
Dissolv'd each tender soul, and heav'd in ev'ry breath.

Such were their woes, and oh! how just, how due!
What tears could equal such immense distress?
Time, cure of lighter ills, must ours renew,
And years the fence of what we lose increase.
From whom shall now the wretched hope redress?
Religion where a nobler subject find,
So favour'd of the skies, so dear to human kind?

Fair friendship, smiling on his natal hour,
The babe selected in her sacred train;
She bade him round diffusive blessings show'r,
And in his bosom fix'd her fav'rite fane,
In glory thence how long, yet how serene,
Her vital influence spreads its cheering rays!
Worth felt the genial beam, and ripen'd in the blaze.

As lucid streams refresh the smiling plain,
Op'ning the flow'rs that on their borders grow;
As grateful to the herb, descending rain,
That shrunk and wither'd in the solar glow:
So, when his voice was heard,
Affliction disappear'd;
Pleasure with ravish'd ears imbib'd the sound;
Grief with its sweetness's soothing,
Each cloudy feature smooth'd,
And ever-waking care forgot th' eternal wound.

Such elegance of taste, such graceful ease,
Infus'd by Heav'n, through all his manners shone;
In him it seem'd to join what'er could please,
And plan the full perfection from its own:
He other fields and other swains had known,
Gentle as those of old by * Phœbus taught,
When polish'd with his lute, like him they spoke and thought.

Thus form'd alike to bless, and to be bless'd,
Such heav'nly graces kindred graces found;
Her gentle turn the same, the same her taste,
With equal worth and equal candour crown'd:
Long may she search creation's ample round,
The joys of such a friendship to explore;
But, once in him expir'd, to joy she lives no more.

As nature to her works supremely kind,
His tender soul with all the parent glow'd,
On all his race, his goodness unconfined,
One full exhaustless stream of fondness flow'd;
Pleas'd as each genius rose,
New prospects to disclose,
To form the mind, and raise its gen'rous aim;
His thoughts, with virtue warm'd,
At once inspir'd and charm'd;
His looks, his words, his smiles transfus'd the fa-
cred flame.

Say ye, whose minds for long revolving years
The joys of sweet society have known,
Whose mutual fondness ev'ry hour endears,
Whose pains, whose pleasures, and whose souls
are one;

* He was said to polish the sunbeams, when, in revenge for forging the bolt which killed his son, he flew the Cyclops, and was doom'd to keep the stocks of Admetus.

* Daughter of Esculapius, and goddess of health.

O! say, for you can judge, and you alone,
What anguish pierc'd his widow'd comfort's heart,
When from her dearer self for ever doom'd to part.

His children to the scene of death repair,
While more than filial sorrow bathes their eyes;
His smiles indulgent, his paternal care,
In sadly-pleasing recollection rise:
But young Dorinda, with distinguish'd sighs,
Effusing all her soul in soft regret,
Seems, while she mourns his loss, to share a father's fate.

Whether the day its wonted course renew'd,
Or midnight vigils wrapt the world in shade,
Her tender task assiduous she pursu'd,
To sooth his anguish, or his wants to aid;
To soften ev'ry pain,
The meaning look explain,
And scan the forming wish ere yet express'd:
The dying father smil'd
With fondness on his child,
And, when his tongue was mute, his eyes her goodness bless'd.

At length, fair mourner! cease thy rising woe:
Its object still surviving seeks the skies,
Where brighter suns in happier climates glow,
And ampler scenes with height'ning charms surprise:

There perfect life thy much lov'd sire enjoys,
The life of gods, exempt from grief and pain,
Where, in immortal breaths, immortal transports reign.

Ye mourning swains, your loud complaints forbear;
Still he, the genius of our green retreat,
Shall with benignant care our labours cheer,
And banish far each shock of adverse fate;
Mild suns and gentle show'rs on spring shall wait,
His hand with ev'ry fruit shall autumn store:
In Heav'n your patron reigns, ye shepherds
weep no more.

Henceforth his pow'r shall with your * Lares join,
To bid your cots with peace and pleasure smile;
To bid disease and languor cease to pine,
And fair abundance crown each rural toil:
While birds their lays resume,
And spring her annual bloom,
Let verdant wreaths his sacred tomb adorn;
To him, each rising day,
Devout libations pay:
In Heav'n your patron reigns, no more ye shepherds mourn.

THE WISH.

AN ELEGY.

To Uranio.

" Felices ter, et amplius,
" Quos irrupta tenet copula, nec malis
" Divulsus querimoniis
" Suprema citius solvet amor die."

HOR.

LET others travel, with incessant pain,
The wealth of earth and ocean to secure;

* Domestic gods.

Then, with fond hopes, carest the precious bane;
In grandeur abject, and in affluence poor.

But soon, too soon, in fancy's timid eyes,
Wild waves shall roll, and conflagrations spread;
While bright in arms, and of gigantic size,
The fear-form'd robber haunts the thorny bed.

Let me, in dreadless poverty retir'd,
The real joys of life, unenvied, share:
Favour'd by love, and by the muse inspir'd,
I'll yield to wealth its jealousy and care.

On rising ground, the prospect to command,
Unting'd with smoke, where vernal breezes blow;
In rural neatness let my cottage stand;
Here wave a wood, and there a river flow.

Oft from the neighb'ring hills and pastures round,
Let sheep with tender bleat salute my ear;
Nor fox insidious haunt the guiltless ground,
Nor man pursue the trade of murder near:

Far hence, kind Heav'n! expel the savage train,
Inur'd to blood, and eager to destroy;
Who pointed steel with recent slaughter stain,
And place in groans and death their cruel joy.

Ye pow'rs of social life and tender song!
To you devoted shall my fields remain;
Here undisturb'd the peaceful day prolong,
Nor own a smart but love's delightful pain.

For you my trees shall wave their leafy shade;
For you my gardens tinge the lenient air;
For you be autumn's blushing gifts display'd,
And all that nature yields of sweet or fair.

But O! if plaints, which love and grief inspire,
In heav'nly breaths could e'er compassion find,
Grant me, ah! grant my heart's supreme desire,
And teach my dear Urania to be kind.

For her, black sadness clouds my brightest day;
For her, in tears the midnight vigils roll;
For her, cold horrors melt my pow'rs away,
And chill the living vigour of my soul.

Beneath her scorn each youthful ardour dies,
Its joys, its wishes, and its hopes expire;
In vain the fields of science tempt my eyes;
In vain for me the muses string the lyre.

O! let her oft my humble dwelling grace,
Humble no more, if there she deign to shine;
For Heav'n, unlimited by time or place,
Still waits on godlike worth and charms divine.

Amid the cooling fragrance of the morn,
How sweet with her through lonely fields to stray!
Her charms the loveliest landscape shall adorn,
And add new glories to the rising day.

With her all nature shines in heighten'd bloom;
The silver stream in sweeter music flows;
Odours more rich the fanning gales perfume;
And deeper tinctures paint the spreading rose.

With her the shades of night their horrors lose;
Its deepest silence charms if she be by;
Her voice the music of the dawn renews,
Its lambent radiance sparkles in her eye.

A F

How sweet with her, in wisdom's calm recess,
To brighten soft desire with wit refin'd;
Kind nature's laws with sacred Ashley trace,
And view the fairest features of the mind!

Or borne on Milton's flight, as Heav'n sublime,
View its full blaze in open prospect glow;
Bless the first pair in Eden's happy clime,
Or drop the human tear for endless woe.

And when in virtue and in peace grown old,
No arts the languid lamp of life restore;
Her let me grasp with hands convuls'd and cold,
Till ev'ry nerve relax'd can hold no more:

Long, long on her my dying eyes suspend,
Till the last beam shall vibrate on my sight;
Then soar where only greater joys attend,
And bear her image to eternal light.

Fond man, ah! whither would thy fancy rove?
'Tis thine to languish in unpitied scorn;
'Tis thine, alas! eternal scorn to prove,
Nor feel one gleam of comfort warm thy heart.

But if my fair this cruel law impose,
Pleas'd, to her will I all my soul resign;
To walk beneath the burden of my woes,
Or sink in death, nor at my fate repine.

Yet when, with woes unmingled and sincere,
To earth's cold womb in silence I descend;
Let her, to grace my obsequies, appear,
And with the weeping through her sorrows blend.

Ah! no; be all her hours with pleasure crown'd,
And all her soul from ev'ry anguish free:
Should my sad fate that gentle bosom wound,
The joys of Heav'n would be no joys to me.

ON THE DEATH OF MR. POPE.

AN ELEGY.

"Poets themselves must fall, like those they sung;
"Deaf the prais'd ear, and mute the tuneful tongue;
"Ev'n he, whose soul now melts in mournful lays,
"Shall shortly want the gen'rous tear he pays."

POPE'S UNFORTUNATE LADY.

WHILE yet I scarce awake from dumb surprise,
And tepid streams profusely bathe my eyes;
While soul-dissolving sighs my bosom strain,
And all my being sinks oppress'd with pain;
Deign you whose souls, like mine, are form'd to know

The nice poetic sense of bliss and woe;
To these sad accents deign a pitying ear;
Strong be our sorrow, as the cause severe.

O Pope, what tears thy obsequies attend!
Britain a bard deplores, manking a friend:
For thee, their darling, weep th' Aonian choir,
Mute the soft voice, unstrung the tuneful lyre:
For thee the virtuous and the sage shall mourn,
And virgin sorrows bathe thy sacred urn:
One veil of grief o'er Heav'n and earth be thrown,
And vice and envy flaunt in smiles alone.
Erewhile depress'd in abject dust they lay,
Nor with their hideous forms affronted day:
While thy great genius, in their tortur'd sight,
Plac'd truth and virtue cloth'd with heav'nly light:

Now pleas'd, to open sunshine they return,
And o'er the fate exult which others mourn.

Ah me! far other thoughts my soul inspire;
Far other accents breathes the plaintive lyre:
Thee, though the muses bless'd with all their art,
And pour'd their sacred raptures on thy heart;
Though thy lov'd virtue, with a mother's pain,
Deplores thy fate, alas! deplores in vain?
Silent and pale thy tuneful frame remains;
Death seals thy sight, and freezes in thy veins:
"Cold is that breast, which warm'd the world
"before,

"And that Heav'n-prompted tongue shall charm
"no more."^{[choofe;}

Whom next shall Heav'n to share thy honours
Whom consecrate to virtue and the muse?
The muse, by fate's eternal plan design'd
To light exalt and humanize the mind;
To bid kind pity melt, just anger glow;
To kindle joy, or prompt the sighs of woe;
To shake with horror, rack with tender smart,
And touch the finest springs that move the heart.
"Curst he! who, without ecstacy sincere,

The poet's soul effus'd in song can hear:
His aid in vain shall indigence require;
Unmov'd he views his dearest friends expire:
Nature and nature's God that wretch detect;
Unfought his friendship, and his days unblest:
Hell's mazy frauds deep in his bosom roll,
And all her gloom hangs heavy on his soul.

As when the sun begins his eastern way,
To bless the nations with returning day,
Crown'd with un fading splendour, on he flies;
Reveals the world, and kindles all the skies:
The prostrate east the radiant god adore;
So, Pope, we view'd thee, but must view no more.
Thee angels late beheld, with mute surprise,
Glow with their themes, and to their accents rise;
They view'd with wonder thy unbounded aim,
'To trace the mazes of th' eternal scheme:
But Heav'n those scenes to human view denies,
Those scenes impervious to celestial eyes:
Whoe'er attempts the path, shall lose his way,
And, wrapt in night, through endless error stray.

In thee what talent shall we most admire;
The critic's judgment, or the poet's fire?
Alike in both to glory is thy claim;
Thine Aristotle's taste, and Homer's flame.
Arm'd with impartial satire, when thy muse
Triumphant vice with all her rage pursues;
To hell's dread gloom the monster scours away,
Far from the haunts of men, and scenes of day:
There, curs'd and cursing, rack'd with raging woe,
Shakes with incessant howls the realms below.
But soon, too soon, the fiend to light shall rise;
Her steps the earth scarce bound, her head the skies;
Till his red terrors Jove again display,
Assert his laws, and vindicate his sway.

* What we call poetical genius, depends entirely on the quickness of moral feeling: He therefore who cannot feel poetry, must either have his affections and internal senses depraved by vice, or be naturally insensible of the pleasures resulting from the exercise of them. But this natural insensibility is almost never so great in any heart, as entirely to hinder the impression of well-painted passion, or natural images connected with it.

When Ovid's song bewails the Lesbian fair,
Her slighted passion, and intense despair;
By thee improv'd, in each soul-moving line,
Not Ovid's wit, but Sappho's sorrows shine.

When Eloisa mourns her hapless fate,
What heart can cease with all her pangs to beat!

While pointed wit, with flowing numbers grac'd,
Excites the laugh, ev'n in the giddy breast;
The gaudy coxcomb, and theickle fair,
Shall dread the satire of thy ravish'd hair.

Not the * Sicilian breath'd a sweeter song,
While Arethusa, charm'd and list'ning, hung;
For whom each muse, from her dear seat retir'd,
His flocks protecte'd, and himself inspir'd:

Nor he † who sung, while sorrow fill'd the plain,
How Cytherea mourn'd Adonis slain;
Nor † Tityrus, who, in immortal lays,
Taught Mantua's echoes Galatea's praise.
No more let Mantua boast unrivall'd fame;
Thy Wind for now shall equal honours claim:
Eternal fragrance shall each breeze perfume,
And in each grove eternal verdure bloom.

Ye tuneful shepherds, and ye beauteous maids,
From fair Ladona's banks, and Windsor's shades,
Whose souls in transport melted at his song,
Soft as your sighs, and as your wishes strong;
O come! your copious annual tributes bring,
The full luxuriance of the riss'd spring;

Strip various nature of each fairest show'r,
And on his tomb the gay profusion flow'r.
Let long-liv'd pansies here their scents bestow,
The violets languish, and the roses glow;

In yellow glory let the crocus shine,
Narcissus here his love-sick head recline;
Here hyacinths in purple sweetness rise,
And tulips ting'd with beauty's fairest dyes.

Who shall succeed thy worth, O darling swain!
Attempt thy reeds, or emulate thy strain?
Each painted warbler of the vocal grove
Laments thy fate, unmindful of his love:
Thee, thee the breezes, thee the fountains mourn,
And solemn moans responsive rocks return;
Shepherds and flocks protract the doleful sound,
And nought is heard but mingled plaints around.

When first Calliope thy fall survey'd,
Immortal tears her eyes profusely shed;
Her pow'rless hand the tuneful harp resign'd;
The conscious harp her griefs, low-murm'ring,
join'd;

Her voice in trembling cadence died away,
And, lost in anguish, all the goddess lay.
Such pangs she felt, when, from the realms of light,
The fates, in Homer, ravish'd her delight:
To thee her sacred hand consign'd his lyre,
And in thy bosom kindled all his fire:
Hence, in our tongue, his glorious labours dress'd,
Breathe all the god that warm'd their author's breast.

When horrid war informs the sacred page,
And men and gods with mutual wrath engage,
The clash of arms, the trumpet's awful sound,
And groans and clamours shake the mountains
round;

The nations rock, earth's solid bases groan,
And quake heav'n's arches to th' eternal throne.

When Eolus dilates the lawless wind,
O'er nature's face to revel unconfin'd,
Bend Heav'n's blue concave, sweep the fruitful
plain,

Tear up the forest, and enrage the main;
In horrid native pomp the tempests shine,
Ferment and roar, and aestuate in each line.

When Sisyphus, with many a weary groan,
Rolls up the hill the still revolving stone;
The loaded line, like it, seems to recoil, [toil:
Strains his bent nerves, and heaves with his full
But, when resulting rapid from its height,
Precipitate the numbers emulate the flight.

As when creative energy, employ'd,
With various beings fill'd the boundless void;
With deep survey th' omniscient Parent view'd
The mighty fabric, and confess'd it good;
He view'd, exulting with immense delight,
The lovely transcript, as th' idea, bright:
So swell'd the * bard with ecstacy divine,
When full and finish'd rose his bright design;
So, from the Elysian bow'rs, he joy'd to see
All his immortal self reviv'd in thee.

While fame enjoys thy consecrated fame,
First of th' inspir'd, with him for ever reign;
With his each distant age shall rank thy name,
And ev'n reluctant envy his acclaim.

But ah! blind fate will no distinction know;
Swift down the torrent all alike must flow:
Wit, virtue, learning, are alike its prey;
All, all must tread th' irremeable way.

No more fond wishes in my breast shall roll,
Distant my heart, and kindle all my soul,
To breathe my honest raptures in thy ear,
And feel thy kindness in returns sincere;
Thy art, I hop'd, should teach the muse to sing,
Direct her flight, and prune her infant wing;
Now muse be dumb; or let thy song deplore
Thy pleasures blasted, and thy hopes no more.

Tremendous pow'rs! who rule th' eternal state,
Whose voice is thunder, and whose nod is fate;
Did I for empire, second to your own,
Cling round the shrine, and importune the throne?
Pray'd I, that same should bear my name on high,
Through nation'd earth, or all-involving sky?
Woo'd I for me the sun to toil and shine,
The gem to brighten, or mature the mine?
Though deep involv'd in adamantine night,
Ask'd I again to view heav'n's cheerful light?
Pope's love I sought; that only boon deny'd,
O life! what pleasure canst thou boast beside,
Worth my regard, or equal to my pride?

Thus mourns a tim'rous muse, unknown to
fame,

Thus sheds her sweetest incense on thy name;
Whilst on her lips imperfect accents die,
Tear following tear, and sigh succeeding sigh:
She mourns, nor she alone, with fond regret,
A world, a feeling world, must weep thy fate.

Where polish'd arts and sacred science reign,
Where'er the Nine their tuneful presence deign;
There shall thy glory, with unclouded blaze,
Command immortal monuments of praise:
From clime to clime the circling sun shall view
Its rival splendour still his own pursue.

While the swift torrent from its source descends;
While round this globe Heav'n's ample concave bends;
Whilst all its living lamps their course maintain,
And lead the beauteous year's revolving train;
So long shall men thy heav'nly song admire,
And nature's charms and thine at once expire.

ELEGY.

TO THE MEMORY OF CONSTANTIA *.

"His saltem accumulenti donis, et fungari inani
"Munere." _____

VIRGIL.

By the pale glimmer of the conscious moon,
When slumber, on the humid eyes of woe,
Sheds its kind lenitive; what mournful voice
So sadly sweet, on my attentive ear,
Its moving plaint effuses: like the song
Of Philomel, when through the vocal air,
Impell'd by deep inconsolable grief,
She breathes her soft, her melancholy strain;
And nature with religious silence hears?
'Tis she; my wand'ring senses recognize
The well-known charm, and all my list'ning soul
Is expectation. Oh! 'tis that dear voice,
Whose gentle accents charm'd my happier days;
Ere sharp affliction's iron hand had prest
Her vernal youth, and sunk her with the blow.

Tell me, thou heav'nly excellence! whose form
Still rises to my view, whose melting song
For ever echoes on my trembling ear,
Delightful ev'n in misery; O say!
What bright distinguish'd mansion in the sky
Receives thy suff'ring virtue from the storm,
That on thy tender blossom pour'd its rage?
Early, alas! too early didst thou feel
Its most tempestuous fury. From the calm,
The soft serenity of life, how led
An unsuspecting victim! Ev'ry blast
Pierc'd to thy inmost soul, amid the waste
Of cruel fortune left to seek thy way
Unshelter'd and alone; while to thy groans
No gen'rous ear reclin'd, no friendly roof,
With hospitable umbrage, entertain'd
Thy drooping sweetness, uninur'd to pain.
That lib'ral hand, which, to the tortur'd sense
Of anguish, comfort's healing balm apply'd,
To Heav'n and earth extended, vainly now
Implores the consolation once it gave,
Nor suppliant meets redress. That eye benign,
The seat of mercy, which to each distress,
Ev'n by thy foe sustain'd, the gentle tear
A willing tribute paid, now fruitless weeps,
Nor gains that pity it so oft bestow'd.

Thou loveliest sacrifice that ever fell
To perjury and unrelenting hate!
How, in the hour of confidence and hope,
When love and expectation to thy heart
Spoke peace, and plac'd felicity in view;
How fled the bright illusion, and at once

Forsook thee plung'd in exquisite despair!
Thy friends; the insects of a summer-gale
That sport and flutter in the mid-day beam
Of gay prosperity, or from the flow'rs,
That in her sunshine bloom, with ardent suck
Sweetness unearn'd; thy temporary friends,
Or blind with headlong fury, or abus'd
By ev'ry gross imposition, or supine,
Lull'd by the songs of ease and pleasure, saw
Thy bitter destiny with cool regard.
Thy wrongs ev'n nature's voice proclaim'd in vain;
Deaf to her tender importuning call,
And all the father in his soul extinct,
Thy parent sat; while on thy guiltless head
Each various torment, that embitters life,
Exhausted all their force: and, to ensure
Their execrable conquest, black and fell,
Ev'n as her native region, slander join'd;
And o'er thy virtue, spotless as the wish
Of infant souls, inexorable breath'd
Her pestilential vapour. Hence fair truth,
Persuasive as the tongue of seraphs, urg'd
Unheard the cause of innocence; the blush
Of fickle friendship hence forgot to glow.

Meanwhile from these retreats with hapless speed,

By ev'ry hope and ev'ry wish impell'd,
Thy steps explor'd protection. Whence explor'd?
Ah me! from whom, and to what cursed arms
Wert thou betray'd: unfeeling as the rock
Which splits the vessel; while its helpless crew,
With shrieks of horror, deprecate their fate?
O earth! O righteous Heaven! could'st thou behold;

While yet thy patient hand the thunder grasp'd,
Nor hurl'd the flaming vengeance; could'st thou see

The violated vow, the marriage rite
Profan'd, and all the sacred ties, which bind
Or God or man, abandon'd to the scorn
Of vice by long impunity confirm'd?

But thou, perfidious! tremble.—If on high
The hand of justice with impartial scale
Each word, each action poises, and exacts
Severe atonement from th' offending heart;
Oh! what hast thou to dread? what endless
 pangs,

What deep damnation must thy soul endure?
On earth 'twas thine to perpetrate a crime,
From whose grin visage guilt of shameless brow,
Ev'n in its wild career, might shrink appall'd:
'Tis thine to fear hereafter, if not feel,
Plagues that in hell no precedent can boast.
Ev'n in the silent, safe domestic hour,
Ev'n in the scene of tenderness and peace,
Remorse, more fierce than all the fiends below,
In fancy's ears, shall, with a thousand tongues,
Thunder despair and ruin: all her snakes
Shall rear their speckled crests aloft in air,
With ceaseless horrid hiss; shall brandish quick
Their forky tongues, or roll their kindling eyes
With sanguine, fiery glare. Ev'n while each sense
Glow with the rapture of tumultuous joy,
The tears of injur'd beauty, the complaints
Of truth immaculate, by thee expos'd
To wrongs unnumber'd, shall disturb thy bliss;
Shall freeze thy blood with fear, and to thy sight
Anticipate th' impending wrath of heav'n.

* An account, mislead, but unfortunate young lady, of the city of Edinburgh, having, without the consent of her father, married a gentleman, who carried her to the West Indies, she was there cruelly forsaken by him, and lost her life by a mistaken medicine.

In sleep, kind pause of being! when the nerve
Of toil unbends, when, from the heart of care,
Retires the fated vulture, when disease
And disappointment quaff Lethean draughts
Of sweet oblivion; from his charge unblest,
Shall speed thy better angel: to thy dreams
Th' infernal gulf shall open, and disclose
Its latent horrors. O'er the burning lake
Of blue sulphureous gleam, the piercing shriek,
The scourge incessant, and the clanking chain,
Shall scare thee ev'n to frenzy. On thy mind
Its fiercest flames shall prey; while from its depth
Some gnashing fury beckons thy approach,
And, thirsty of perdition, waits to plunge
Thy naked soul, ten thousand fathom down,
Amidst the boiling furies. Such their fate,
Whose hearts, indocile, to the sacred lore
Of wisdom, truth, and virtue, banish far
The cry of soft compassion; nor can taste
Beatitude supreme in giving joy!
Thy race, the product of a lawless flame,
Ev'n while thy fond imagination plans
Their future grandeur, in thy mock'd embrace
Shall prematurely perish; or survive
To feel their father's infamy, and curse
The tainted origin from which they sprung.
For, Oh! thy soul no soft compunction knew,
When that fair form, where all the graces liv'd,
Perfection's brightest triumph, from thy breast,
The sport of milder winds and seas was thrown,
To glow or shiver in the keen extremes
Of ev'ry various climate: when that cheek,
Ting'd with the blush of heav'n's un fading rose,
Grew pale with pining anguish; when that voice,
By angels tun'd to harmony and love,
Trembled with agony; and, in thine ear,
Utter'd the last extremity of woe.

From foreign bounty she obtain'd that aid
Which friendship, love, humanity, at home
Deny'd her blasted worth. From foreign hands
Her glowing lips receiv'd the cooling draught,
To sooth the fever's rage. From foreign eyes
The tear, by nature, love and friendship due,
Flow'd copious o'er the wreck, whose charms, in death

Still blooming, at the hand of ruin smil'd.
Destin'd, alas! in foreign climes to leave
Her pale remains unhonour'd; while the herse
Of wealthy guilt emblazon'd boasts the pride
Of painted heraldry, and sculptur'd stone
Protects or flatters its detested fame.
Vain trappings of mortality! When these
Shall crumble, like the worthless dust they hide;
Then thou, dear spirit! in immortal joy,
Crown'd with intrinsic honours, shalt appear;
And God himself, to list'ning worlds, proclaim
Thy injur'd tenderness, thy faith unstain'd,
Thy mildness long insulted, and thy worth
Severely try'd, and found at last sincere.

But where, Oh! where shall art or nature find,
For smothering sorrow's ever recent wound,
Some blest restorative; whose pow'rful charm
May sooth thy friend's regret, within his breast
Suspend the sigh spontaneous, bid the tear,
By sad reflection prompted, cease to fall!
These, still as moments, days and years revolve,
A consecrated off'ring, shall attend
Thy dear idea uneffac'd by time: . . .

Till the pale night of destiny obscure
Life's wasting taper; till each torpid sense
Feel death's chill hand, and grief complain no
more.

A SOLILOQUY:

*Occasioned by the Author's escape from falling into a deep well, where he must have been irrecoverably lost, if a favourite lap-dog had not, by the sound of its feet
upon the board with which the well was covered, warned him of his danger.*

“ Quid quisque viret, nunquam homini satis
“ Cautum est in horas.”

HORAT.

WHERE am I!—O Eternal Pow'r of heav'n!
Relieve me; or, amid the silent gloom,
Can danger's cry approach no gen'rous ear,
Prompt to redress th' unhappy? O my heart!
What shall I do, or whither shall I turn?
Will no kind hand, benevolent as Heav'n,
Save me involv'd in peril and in night!
Erect with horror stands my bristling hair;
My tongue forgets its motion; strength forsakes
My trembling limbs; my voice, impell'd in vain,
No passage finds; cold, cold as death, my blood,
Keen as the breath of winter, chills each vein.
For on the verge, the awful verge of fate
Scarce fix'd I stand; and one progressive step
Had plung'd me down, unthinkably deep,
To gulfs impervious to the cheerful sun
And fragrant breeze; to that abhor'd abode,
Where silence and oblivion, sisters drear!
With cruel death confed'rate empire hold,
In desolation and primæval gloom. [horror,

Ha! what unmans me thus? what, more than
Relaxes ev'ry nerve, untunes my frame,
And chills my inmost soul?—Be still, my heart!
Nor flutt'ring thus, in vain attempt to burst
The barrier firm, by which thou art confin'd.
Resume your functions, limbs! restrain those knees
From smiting thus each other. Rouse, my soul!
Assert thy native dignity, and dare
To brave this king of terrors; to confront
His cloudy brow, and unrelenting frown,
With steady scorn, in conscious triumph bold.
Reason, that beam of uncreated day,
That ray of Deity, by God's own breath
Infus'd and kindled, reason will dispel
Those fancy'd terrors: reason will instruct thee,
That death is heav'n's kind interposing hand,
To snatch thee timely from impending woe;
From aggregated misery, whose pangs
Can find no other period but the grave.

For Oh!—while others gaze on nature's face,
The verdant vale, the mountains, woods, and
streams;

Or, with delight ineffable, survey
The sun, bright image of his parent God;
The seasons, in majestic order, round
This vary'd globe revolving; young-ey'd spring,
Profuse of life and joy; summer, adorn'd
With keen effulgence, bright'ning heav'n and earth;
Autumn, replete with nature's various boon,
To bless the toiling hind; and winter, grand
With rapid storms, convulsing nature's frame;

Whilst others view heav'n's all-involving arch,
Bright with unnumber'd worlds; and lost in joy,
Fair order and utility behold;
Or, unfatigu'd, th' amazing chain pursue,
Which, in one vast all-comprehending whole,
Unites th' immense stupenduous works of God,
Conjoining part with part, and, through the frame,
Diffusing sacred harmony and joy:
To me those fair vicissitudes are lost,
And grace and beauty blotted from my view.
The verdant vale, the mountains, woods, and
streams,

One horrid blank appear; the young-cy'd spring,
Efulgent summer, autumn deck'd in wealth
To bless the toiling hind, and winter grand
With rapid storms, revolve in vain for me:
Nor the bright sun, nor all-embracing arch
Of heav'n, shall e'er these wretched orbs behold.

O beauty, harmony! ye filter train
Of graces; you, who, in th' admiring eye
Of God your charms display'd, ere yet, transcrib'd
On nature's form, your heav'nly features shone:
Why are you snatch'd for ever from my sight,
Whilst, in your stead, a boundless, waste expanse
Of undistinguish'd horror covers all?
Wide o'er my prospect rueful darkness breathes
Her inauspicious vapour; in whose shade,
Fear, grief, and anguish, natives of her reign,
In social sadness, gloomy vigils keep:
With them I walk, with them still doom'd to share
Eternal blackness, without hopes of dawn.

Hence off the hand of ignorance and scorn,
To barb'rous mirth abandon'd, points me out
With idiot grin: the supercilious eye
Oft, from the noise and glare of prosp'rous life,
On my obscurity diverts its gaze,
Exulting; and, with wanton pride elate,
Felicitates its own superior lot:
Inhuman triumph! hence the piercing taunt
Of titled insolence insisted deep.
Hence the warm blush that paints ingenious shame,
By conscious want inspir'd; th' unpitied pang
Of love and friendship slighted. Hence the tear
Of impotent compassion, when the voice
Of pain, by others felt, quick smites my heart,
And rouses all its tenderness in vain.
All these, and more, on this devoted head,
Have with collected bitterness been pour'd.

Nor end my sorrows here. The sacred fane
Of knowledge, scarce accessible to me,
With heart-consuming anguish I behold;
Knowledge, for which my soul insatiate burns
With ardent thirst. Nor can these useless hands,
Untutor'd in each life-sustaining art,
Nourish this wretched being, and supply
Frail nature's wants, that short cessation know.

Where * now, ah! where is that supporting arm

Which to my weak, unequal infant steps
Its kind assistance lent? Ah! where that love,
That strong assiduous tenderness, which watch'd
My wishes yet scarce form'd; and, to my view,
Unimporun'd, like all-indulging Heav'n,
Their objects brought? Ah! where that gentle voice

* The character here drawn is that of the author's father, whose unforeseen fate had just before happened.

Which, with instruction, soft as summer dew:
Or fleecy snows, descending on my soul,
Distinguish'd ev'ry hour with new delight?
Ah! where that virtue, which, amid the storms,
The mingled horrors of tumultuous life,
Untainted, unsubdu'd, the shock sustain'd?
So firm the oak which, in eternal night,
As deep its root extends, as high to heav'n,
Its top majestic rises: such the smile
Of some benignant angel, from the throne
Of God dispatch'd, ambassador of peace;
Who on his look impress his message bears,
And pleas'd, from earth averts impending ill,
Alas! no wife thy parting kisses flar'd:
From thy expiring lips no child receiv'd
Thy last, dear blessing and thy last advice.
Friend, father, benefactor, all at once,
In thee forsook me, an unguarded prey
For ev'ry storm, whose lawless fury roars
Beneath the azure concave of the sky,
To toss, and on my head exhaust its rage.

Dejecting prospect! soon the hapless hour
May come; perhaps this moment it impends,
Which drives me forth to penury and cold,
Naked, and beat by all the storms of heav'n,
Friendless and guideless to explore my way;
Till on cold earth this poor, unshelter'd head
Reclining, vainly from the ruthless blast
Respite I beg, and in the shock expire.

Me miserable! wherefore, O my soul!
Was, on such hard conditions, life decid'd?
One step, one friendly step, without thy guilt,
Had plac'd me safe in thy profound recess,
Where, undisturb'd, eternal quiet reigns,
And sweet forgetfulness of grief and care.
Why, then, my coward soul! didst thou recoil?
Why floun the final exit of thy woe?
Why shiver at approaching dissolution?

Say why, by nature's unresisted force,
Is ev'ry being, where volition reigns
And active choice, impell'd to shun their fate,
And dread destruction as the worst of ills;
Say, why they shrink, why fly, why fight, why risk

Precarious life, to lengthen out its date,
Which, lengthen'd, is, at best, pretracted pain?
Say, by what mystic charms, can life allure
Unnumber'd beings, who, beneath me far
Plac'd in th' extensive scale of nature, want
Those blessings heav'n accumulates on me?
Blessings superior; though the blaze of day
Pours on their sight its soul-refreshing stream,
To me extinct in everlasting shades:
Yet heav'n-taught music, at whose powerful voice,
Corrosive care and anguish, charm'd to peace,
Forsoke the heart, and yield it all to joy,
Ne'er sooths their pangs. To their insensate view
Knowledge in vain her fairest treasure spreads.
To them the noblest gift of bounteous heav'n,
Sweet conversation, whose enliv'ning force
Elates, defends, and, with un fading strength,
Inspires the soul, remains for ever lost.
The sacred sympathy of social hearts:
Benevolence, supreme delight of heav'n;
Th' extensive wish, which in one wide embrace,
All beings circles, when the swelling soul
Partakes the joys of God; ne'er warms their breasts.

As yet my soul ne'er felt the oppressive weight
Of indigence unaided; swift redress,
Beyond the daring flight of hope, approach'd,
And ev'ry wish of nature amply blest.
Though, o'er the future series of my fate,
Ill omens seem to brood, and stars malign
To blend their baleful fire: oft, while the sun
Darts boundless glory through th' expanse of
heav'n,

A gloom of congregated vapours rise,
Than night more dreadful in her blackest shroud,
And o'er the face of things incumbent hang,
Portending tempest; till the source of day
Again asserts the empire of the sky,
And, o'er the blotted scene of nature, throws
A keener splendour. So, perhaps, that care,
Through all creation felt, but most by man,
Which hears with kind regard the tender sigh
Of modest want, may dissipate my fears,
And bid my hours a happier flight assume.
Perhaps, enliv'ning hope! perhaps my soul
May drink at wisdom's fountain, and allay
Her unextinguish'd ardour in the stream:
Wisdom, the constant magnet, where each wish,
Set by the hand of nature, ever points,
Reckless and faithful, as th' attractive force
By which all bodies to the centre tend.

What then! because th' indulgent fire of all
Has, in the plan of things, prescrib'd my sphere;
Because consummate Wisdom thought not fit,
In assuance and pomp, to bid me shine;
Shall I regret my destiny, and curse
That state, by Heav'n's paternal care, design'd
To train me up for scenes, with which compar'd,
These ages, measur'd by the orbs of heav'n,
In blank annihilation fade away?
For scenes, where, finish'd by the almighty art,
Beauty and order open to the sight
In vivid glory; where the faintest rays
Out-flash the splendour of our mid-day sun?
Say, shall the Source of all, who first assign'd
To each constituent of this wond'rous frame
Its proper powers, its place and action due,
With due degrees of weakness, whence results
Concord inestimable; shall he reverse,
Or disconcert the universal scheme,
The gen'ral good, to flatter selfish pride
And blind desire?—Before th' Almighty voice
From non-existence call'd me into life,
What claim had I to being? what to shine
In this high rank of creatures, form'd to climb
The steep ascent of virtue, unrelax'd,
Till infinite perfection crown their toil?
Who, conscious of their origin divine,
Eternal order, beauty, truth, and good,
Perceive, like their great Parent, and admire.

Hush! then, my heart, with pious cares suppress

This timid pride and impotence of soul:
Learn now, why all those multitudes which crowd
This spacious theatre, and gaze on heav'n,
Invincibly averse to meet their fate,
Avoid each danger; know this sacred truth;
All perfect Wisdom, on each living soul,
Engrav'd this mandate, "to preserve their frame,
And hold entire the gen'ral orb of being."
Then, with becoming reverence let each pow'r,
In deep attention, hear the voice of God;

That awful voice, which, speaking to the soul,
Commands its resignation to his law!

For this, has heav'n to virtue's glorious stage
Call'd me, and plac'd the garland in my view,
The wreath of conquest, safely to desert
The part assign'd me, and with daftard fear,
From present pain, the cause of future bliss,
To shrink into the bosom of the grave?
How then is gratitude's vast debt repaid?
Where all the tender offices of love
Due to fraternal man, in which the heart
Each blessing it communicates enjoys?
How then shall I obey the first great law
Of nature's Legislator, deep impress'd
With double sanction, restless fear of death,
And fondness still to breathe this vital-air?
Nor is th' injunction hard; who would not sink
A while in tears and sorrow, then emerge
With tenfold lustre, triumph o'er his pain;
And with unfading glory shine in heav'n?

Come then, my little guardian genius! cloth'd
In that familiar form, my Phylax, come!
Let me care's thee, hug thee to my heart,
Which beats with joy of life preserv'd by thee.
Had not thy interposing fondness staid
My blind precipitation, now, ev'n now,
My soul, by nature's sharpest pangs expell'd,
Had left this frame; had pass'd the dreadful
bound,

Which life from death divides, divides this scene
From vast eternity, whose deep'ning shades,
Impervious to the sharpest mortal sight,
Elude our keenest search.—But still I err.
Howe'er thy grateful undefining heart,
In ills foreseen, with promptitude might aid;
Yet this, beyond thy utmost reach of thought,
Not ev'n remotely distant couldst thou view.
Secure thy steps the fragile board couldst press,
Nor feel the least alarm where I had sunk:
Nor couldst thou judge the awful depth below,
Which, from thy wat'ry bottom, to receive
My fall, tremendous yawn'd. Thy utmost skill,
Thy deepest penetration here had stopt
Short of its aim; and in the strong embrace
Of ruin struggling, left me to expire.
No—Heav'n's high Sov'reign, provident of all,
Thy passive organs moving, taught thee first
To check my heedless course, and hence I live.

Eternal Providence! whose equal sway
Weighs each event, whose ever-wakeful care,
Connecting high with low, minute with great,
Attunes the wond'rous whole, and bids each part
In one unbroken harmony conspire:
Hail! sacred Source of happiness and life!
Substantial Good, bright intellectual Sun!
To whom my soul, by sympathy innate,
Unweary'd tends; and finds in thee alone,
Security, enjoyment, and repose.
By thee, O God! by thy paternal arm,
Through ev'ry period of my infant state,
Sustain'd I live to yield thee praises due.
O! could my lays, with heav'nly raptures warm,
High as thy throne, re-echo to the songs
Of angels; thence, O! could my pray'r obtain
One beam of inspiration, to inflame
And animate my numbers; heav'n's full choir,
In lost'ring strains, th' inspiring God might sing;

Yet not more ardent, more sincere than mine.
But though my voice, beneath the seraph's note,
Must check its feeble accents, low deprest
By dull mortality; to thee great Soul
Of heav'n and earth! to thee my hallow'd strain
Of gratitude and praise shall still ascend.

MISS  TO THE AUTHOR.

WHILE friendship's gentle pow'rs my bosom fire,
Damon, accept the lays which you inspire:
My long-neglected muse thy worth revives,
And gen'rous ardour from thy flame receives,
Domestic troubles long my mind oppress'd,
And made the muse a stranger to my breast;
Not friendship's softest charms could raise my
song,

Till wak'd to life by thy persuasive tongue.
O Damon, could I boast thy wondrous skill,
Were but my genius equal to my will,
Thy praises I unweary'd would proclaim;
And place thee with the brightest sons of fame.
Sure, Damon, 'tis some god thy breast inspires,
And fills thy soul with those celestial fires:
Thy thoughts so just, so noble, so refin'd,
That elegant, that virtuous turn of mind,
May justly claim the praise of all mankind.

Why am I call'd to leave my native plains,
To range on barren hills with rustic swains?
Far from my fellow nymphs, a sprightly throng,
And far, too far from thy harmonious tongue!
Yet still thy praise shall be my fav'rite theme:
Each echo shall resound with Damon's fame,
And ev'ry tree shall bear his much-lov'd name.

O could I bear thee to Acasto's feat,
To Phœbus and his sons a known retreat;
Acasto, whose great mind and honest soul
No hopes can bias, and no fears controul.
He virtue's patron long has firmly stood,
And, in a vicious age, been greatly good.
Oft has Acasto in some fragrant bow'r
Invok'd Urania, and confess'd her pow'r;
As oft the tuneful maid has own'd his lays,
And blest'd his song with well-deserv'd praise.
Were Damon there, to join the tuneful choir,
With all the beauties of his verse and lyre,
His wit would civilize our savage plains,
Polish our country nymphs and rural swains.
But though hard fate deny my fond request,
It cannot tear thy mem'ry from my breast;
No—while life's blood runs warm in ev'ry vein,
For thee a lasting friendship I'll maintain:
And when this busy scene of life is o'er,
Nor earth retards the soul's excursions more,
I'll joy to meet thee in those happier scenes,
Where unallay'd, immortal pleasure reigns.
There, crown'd with youth unsading, let us stray
Through the bright regions of eternal day;
There, of essential happiness secur'd,
With joy we'll tell the pains we once endur'd.

Some pow'r conduct us through the glorious road,

And lead us safe to that divine abode,
Where bliss eternal waits the virtuous soul,
And joys on joys in endless circles roll.

CLIO.

THE AUTHOR'S ANSWER.

WHEN Clio seem'd forgetful of my pain,
A soft impatience throbb'd in ev'ry vein;
Each tedious hour I thought an age of woe;
So few their pleasures, and their pace so slow:
But when your moving accents reach'd my ear,
Just, as your taste, and as your heart, sincere;
My soul re-cho'd, while the melting strain
Beat in each pulse, and flow'd in ev'ry vein.

Ah! teach my verse, like yours, to be refin'd;
Your force of language, and your strength of mind;
Teach me that winning, soft, persuasive art,
Which ravishes the soul, and charms the heart,
Then ev'ry heighten'd pow'r I will employ
To paint your merit, and express my joy.
Lefs soft the strains, the numbers less refin'd,
With which great Orpheus polish'd human kind;
Whose magic force could lawless vice reprove,
And teach a world the sweets of social love.

When great * Acasto's virtues grac'd your lays,
My soul was lost in the effulgent blaze;
Whose love, like heav'n, to all mankind extends,
Supplies the indigent, the weak defends;
Pursues the good of all with steady aim;
One bright, unweary'd, unextinguish'd flame.
What transport felt my soul, what keen delight,
When its full blaze of glory met my sight!

But soon, too soon, the happy gleam was o'er;
What joy can reign where Clio is no more?
Ah! hapless me! must yet more woes inspire
The mournful song, and tune the tragic lyre?
The last and greatest of the sable train?
Her Clio's absence must the muse complain?
From these intrusive thoughts all pleasure flies,
And leaves my soul benighted, like my eyes.

Yet, while absorb'd in thought alone I stray,
On ev'ry sense while silent sorrows prey,
Or from some arbour, conscious of my pain,
While to the sighing breeze I sigh in vain:
May each new moment, fraught with new delight,
Crown your bright day, and bless your silent night:
May heightning raptures ev'ry sense surprize,
Music your ears, gay prospects charm your eyes:
May all on earth, and all in heav'n conspire
To make your pleasures lasting and entire.
'Tis thine alone can sooth my anxious breast
Secure of bliss, while conscious you are blest.

EPISTLE I.

TO THE SAME.

From Edinburgh.

FROM where bleak north winds chill the frozen
skies,
And lov'd Edina's lofty turrets rise,
Sing heav'nly muse! to thy lov'd Clio sing;
Tune thy faint voice, and stretch thy drooping
wing.

Could I, like Uriel, on some pointed ray,
To your fair distant Eden wing my way,

* A gentleman who then resided in Galloway, distinguished for hospitality, for his inviolable attachment to the interests of his country; and, in short, for all those virtues which adorned his ancestors, and dignify human nature.

Outstrip the moments, scorn the swiftest wind,
And leave ev'n wing'd desire to lag behind;
So strong, so swift, I'd fly the port to gain;
The speed of angels should pursue in vain.

Ah! whither, whither would my fancy stray?
Nor hope sustains, nor reason leads the way:
No, let my eyes in scalding sorrows flow,
Vast as my loss, and endless as my woe:
Flow, till the torrent quench this vital flame,
And, with increasing hours increase the stream.
Yet, Clio, hear, in pity to my smart,
If gentle pity e'er could touch thy heart:
Let but one line suspend my constant care,
Too faint for hope, too lively for despair:
Thee let me still with wonted rapture find
The muses patroness, and poet's friend.

EPISTLE II.

TO DORINDA.

With Venice Preserv'd.

If friendship gains not pardon for the muse,
Immortal Otway, sure, will plead excuse:
For eyes like thine he wrote his moving lays,
Which feel the poet, and which weep his praise.
Whether great Jaffier tender griefs inspires,
Struggling with cruel fate, and high desires;
Or Belvidera's gentler accents flow,
When all her soul she breathes in love and woe:
Drawn from the heart the various passions shine,
And wounded nature bleeds in ev'ry line.
As when some turtle spies her lovely mate
Pierc'd by the ball, or flutt'ring in the net,
Her little heart just bursting with despair,
She droops her wings, and breathes her soul in air.

EPISTLE III.

TO MISS ANNIE RAE,

With the Manual of Epictetus, and Tablature of Cebes.

Go, happy leaves! to Anna's view disclose
What solid joy from real virtue flows;
When, like the world, self-poisd, th' exalted soul,
Unshaken, scorns the storms that round her roll;
And, in herself collected, joys to find
Th' untainted image of th' Eternal Mind.

To bid mankind their end supreme pursue,
On God and nature fix their wand'ring view;
To teach reluctant passion to obey,
Check'd, or impell'd by reason's awful sway;
From films of error purge the mental eye,
Till undisssembled good in prospect lie;
The soul with heav'n-born virtue to inflame:
Such was the Stoic's and Socratic's aim.

O! could they view from yon immortal scene,
Where beauty, truth and good, unclouded, reign,
Fair hands like thine revolve their labour'd
page,

Imbibe their truth, and in their task engage;
With rapture would they hail so fair a sight,
And feel new bliss in heav'n's supreme delight.

• TO MISS D. H.

- IN ANSWER TO A LETTER SHE WROTE THE AUTHOR FROM DUMFRIES.

MAY Heaven's blest blessings on thy head descend,
Whose goodness recollects an absent friend;
Brighter and brighter may thy moments roll,
Joy warm thy heart, and virtue tune thy soul;
With length'ning life still happier be thy state,
As by thy worth, distinguish'd by thy fate.
Oh! if my ardent vows successful prove;
If merit charms, if God himself be love;
Of all the lots his bounty e'er assign'd
To bless the best, the noblest of mankind;
For none shall happier constellations shine,
None boast a sphere of ampler bliss than thine.

Few of thy sex, alas! how wond'rous few,
Bestow those kind regards to virtue due:
A humble name, of wealth too small a share,
A form unseemly, or a clownish air;
These casual faults the squeamish fair disgust,
Who to be thought refin'd, become unjust.
Not such Dorinda's more intense survey,
It looks for charms unconscious of decay;
Surface and form pervades with nobler taste,
And views God's image on the heart impress.
O may I ever share thy kind esteem,
In fortune's change, and life's tumultuous dream:
If future hours be ting'd with colours gay,
There let thy friendship mix its heav'nly ray;
O'er all my fate if adverse planets reign,
O let thy gentle pity sooth my pain:
With this one precious good securely blest,
Let chance or fortune regulate the rest.

Since still to me extend thy gen'rous cares,
My study, health, employment, and affairs;
These ever in the same dull channel flow,
A lazy current, uniformly slow.
Thus still from hour to hour, from day to day,
Life's glimmering taper languishes away;
A doubtful flame, a dim portentous light,
That wastes and sickens into endless night.

The modes of dress, the sophist's keen debate,
The various politics of church and state,
A soul like thine will think but trivial news,
Beneath the care of friendship and the muse.

In vain I urge dull thought from line to line,
Fancy grows restive to the fond design:
Here let the muse her weary pinions rest,
Be ever kind, and oh! be ever blest.

TO MISS A. H.

ON HER MARRIAGE.

I HATE the stiff address, the studied phrase
Of formal compliment, and empty praise,
Where fancy labours to express the heart,
With all the paint and impotence of art:
But when with merit friendship's charms conspire
To bid my hand resume the votive lyre,
Once more my veins their former raptures know,
And all the muses in my bosom glow.

* The young lady to whom the Monody is inscribed.

O thou, whose soul with ev'ry sweetness crown'd,
 Diffuses light, and life, and pleasure round ;
 Whose heart, with ev'ry tender sense endow'd,
 Glows, like creative love, serenely good ;
 Whose easy manners at one view display
 Fancy's quick flash, and reason's steady ray ;
 While each internal charm, with sweet surprise,
 Beams through thy form, and lights thy radiant
 eyes:

Bless'd with those joys, may all thy moments flow,
 Which conscious virtue only can bestow :
 That soft eternal sunshine of the mind,
 Sweet as thy charms, and as thy soul refin'd.
 May Heav'n protect thee with a father's care,
 And make thee happy, as it made thee fair.
 O may the man now sacred to thy choice,
 With all his soul the real blessing prize :
 One common end o'er all your views preside,
 One wish impel you, and one purpose guide ;
 Be all your days auspicious, calm, and bright,
 One scene of tender, pure, unmix'd delight,
 Till time and fate exhaust their endless store,
 And heav'n alone can make your pleasure more.

TO THE REV. MR. JAMESON.

Why mourns my friend, what cause shall I assign?
 Why smarts that tender honest soul of thine ?
 What star, a foe to all that's good and great,
 Dares, with malignant influence, dash thy fate ?
 Why shrinks my heart with fears not understood ?
 What strange portentous sadness chills my blood ?
 O ! breathe thy latent sorrows in mine ear,
 And prompt the starting sympathetic tear.
 As tender mothers with assiduous view,
 Their infant offspring's wand'ring steps pursue,
 As wing'd from heav'n, celestial guardians wait,
 To snatch their sav'rite charge from instant fate :
 Friendship thy close attendant shall remain,
 Prepar'd to soften, or partake thy pain :
 Whether thy form, to pale disease a prey,
 Beneath its pressure pants the tedious day ;
 Or if some tender grief dissolves thy mind,
 Each wish extinguish'd, and each hope resign'd :
 For thee my spirits shall more languid flow ;
 For thee the flame of life suspend its glow ;
 For thee this heart, with sorrows new shall groan,
 And add thy part of anguish to its own.
 Whatever scenes thy pensive walk invite,
 Thither thy friend shall bend his speedy flight.
 Say, shall our social steps together stray
 Through groves that gimmer with a twilight ray ?
 Or through some boundless solitary plain,
 Where melancholy holds her pensive reign ?
 Say, through embow'ring myrtles shall we rove
 Bedew'd with recent tears by hopelefs love ?
 Or, where neglected worth, from men retir'd,
 In uncomplaining agony expir'd ?
 There in the silent cypress shade reclin'd,
 Let each in each a faithful suff'rer find ;
 There let our mingling plaints to heav'n ascend ;
 There let our eyes their ceaselefs currents blend :
 Our mingling plaints shall stop the passing gale,
 And each enamour'd echo sigh the tale.
 For whilst I speak, ev'n in this mortal hour,
 Perhaps relentless death exerts his pow'r,

Perhaps the shaft already wings its way,
 Too surely aim'd, and * Barnet falls its prey.
 Him, nature, with no common care design'd,
 His form embellish'd, and his soul refin'd ;
 Oh ! with what ardour did his piercing view,
 Through ev'ry maze of nature, truth pursue !
 Sacred to virtue, and the muse, his breast
 With Heav'n's own loveliest image was impress'd.
 Like Heav'n's eternal goodness, unconfin'd
 His soul, with one fond wish, embrac'd mankind :
 For them his time, his cares were all employ'd ;
 Their griefs he felt, their happiness enjoy'd ;
 His parents now, in bitterness of pain,
 Shall ask from heav'n and earth their son in vain:
 In vain his friends with pious gifts shall tell
 How gay he blossom'd, and how early fell.
 Through all his frame a fever's fury reigns,
 Consumes his vitals, and inflames his veins,
 In tears the salutary arts retreat,
 And virtue views with pangs her darling's fate.

Here pause, my friend, and with due candour
 own

Affliction's cup not mix'd for thee alone ;
 Others, like thee, its dire contents must drain,
 And share their full inheritance of pain.
 But, O ! may brighter hours thy life attend ;
 Such as from heav'n on happy love descend ;
 Such gleams, as fill on conscious virtue shine,
 By God and man approv'd, be ever thine.
 May reason, arm'd with each persuasive art,
 Inspire thy precept, as she guides thy hearts :
 Nor let thy soul the smallest portion know
 Of all my past distress or present woe.

AN EPITAPH ON HIS FATHER.

HERE drop, benevolence, thy sacred tear,
 A friend of human kind reposes here ;
 A man content himself and God to know ;
 A heart, with every virtue form'd to glow :
 Beneath each pressure uniformly great ;
 In life untainted, unsurpris'd by fate :
 Such, though obscur'd by various ills he shone ;
 Consol'd his neighbours woes, and bore his own :
 Heav'n's law, and snatch'd from fortune's rage its prey,
 To share the triumphs of eternal day.

TO MRS. ANNE BLACKLOCK,

THE AUTHOR'S MOTHER.

With a Copy of the Scotch Edition of his Poems.

O THOU ! who gav'st me first this world t' explore,
 Whose frame for me a mother's anguish bore ;

* Mr. Barnet, an Englishman, a dear and intimate friend of the poet. He was a student of physic in the University of Edinburgh ; and at the time the above epistle was written, lay dangerously ill of a fever, of which he died a few days after, in the bloom of youth, much lamented by all who knew him, but particularly by Blacklock, who scarce ever mentions his name without a tear.

For me, whose heart its vital current drain'd,
Whose bosom nurs'd me, and whose arms sustain'd:
What though thy son, dependent, weak, and blind,
Deplete his wishes check'd, his hopes confin'd?
Though want impending cloud each cheerless day,
And death with life seem struggling for their prey?

Let this console, if not reward thy pain,
Unhappy he may live, but not in vain.

PROLOGUE TO OTHELLO.

SPOKEN BY MR. LOVE,

At the Opening of the Playhouse in Dumfries.

YE FOOLS! by soft humanity inspir'd,
For gen'rous hearts and manners free admir'd;
Where taste and commerce amicably join'd,
Embellish life, and cultivate the mind:
Without a blush, you may support our stage;
No tainted joys shall here your view engage.
To tickle fools with prostituted art,
Debauch the fancy and corrupt the heart,
Let others stoop, such meanness we despise,
And please with virtuous objects virtuous eyes.

The tender soul what dire convulsions tear,
When whip'ring villains gain th' incautious ear;
How heav'nly mild, yet how intensely bright,
Fair innocence, though clouded, strikes the sight;
What endless plagues from jealous fondness flow,
This night our faithful scenes attempt to show:
No new-born whim, no hasty flash of wit;
But nature's dictates, by great Shakspeare writ.

Immortal bard! who with a master hand,
Could all the movements of the soul command;
With pity sooth, with terror shake her frame;
In love dissolve her, or to rage inflame.

To taste and virtue, heav'n-descended pair!
While pleas'd we thus devote our art and care;
To crown our ardour, let your fav'ring smile
Reward our hopes, and animate our toil:
So may your eyes no weeping moments know,
But when they share some Deidemonia's woe.

PROLOGUE TO HAMLET.

SPOKEN BY MR. LOVE, AT DUMFRIES.

INSPIR'D with pleasing hope to entertain,
Once more we offer Shakspeare's heav'nly strain;
While hov'ring round, his laurell'd shade surveys
What eyes shall pour their tribute to his praise;
What hearts with tender pity shall regret
The bitter grief that clouds Ophelia's fate.

Once fair the flourish'd, nature's joy and pride,
But droop'd and wither'd, when a father dy'd.
Severe extremes of tenderness and woe,
When love and virtue mourn—one common blow;
When griefs alternate o'er the bosom reign,
And ev'ry sense, and ev'ry thought is pain!
Here nature triumph'd, on her throne sublime,
And mock'd each pigmy muse of later time;
Till Shakspeare touch'd the soul with all her smart,
And stamp'd her living image on the heart.

From his instructive song we deeply feel,
How vainly guilt its horrors would conceal,
Though night and silence with the fraud conspire,
To bid the crime from human search retire;
Though yet the traitor seem from harm secure,
And fate a while suspend th' avenging hour;
Though fortune nurse him with a mother's care,
And deck her pageant in a short-liv'd glare:
In vain he struggles to disguise his smart,
A living plague corrodes his ulcer'd heart;
While ev'ry form of ruin meets his eyes,
And heav'n's vindictive terrors round him rise.

Such salutary truths their light diffuse,
Where honours due attend the tragic muse;
Deep by her sacred signature impress'd,
They mingle with the soul and warm the breast.
Hence taught of old, the pious and the sage,
With veneration patronis'd the stage.

But, soft! methinks you cry with some surprise,
"How long intend you thus to moralise?"
Our prologue deviates from establish'd rules,
Nor shocks the fair, nor calls the critics fools,
'Tis true; but dully fond of common sense,
We still think spleen to wit has no pretence;
Think impudence is far remote from spirit,
And modesty, though awkward, has some merit.

TO A GENTLEMAN,

WHO ASKED MY SENTIMENTS OF HIM.

An Epigram.

DEAR FABIUS! me if well you know,
You ne'er will take me for your foe;
If right yourself you comprehend,
You ne'er will take me for your friend.

ON PUNCH.

AN EPIGRAM.

*Cf. Johnson, The
no. 34*

HENCE! restless care and low design,
Hence! foreign compliments and wine;
Let gen'rous Britons brave and free,
Still boast their punch and honesty.
Life is a bumper fill'd by fate,
And we the guests who share the treat;
Where strong, insipid, sharp, and sweet,
Each other duly temp'ring meet.
A while with joy the scene is crown'd;
A while the catch and toast go round:
And when the full carouse is o'er,
Death puffs the lights and shuts the door.
Say then, physicians of each kind,
Who cure the body or the mind;
What harm in drinking can there be,
Since punch and life so well agree?

ON MARRIAGE.

AN EPIGRAM.

YOUNG Celia, now a blooming bride,
Sat from her friends apart and cry'd;
Her faithful Chloe view'd her care,
And thus consol'd the weeping fair:

Good heav'n! in tears! for shame! look gay;
 Nor cloud with grief your nuptial day.
 If brides in tears receive their spouses,
 What must the hapless wretch who loses?
 Besides, my dear, you know 'tis reason,
 That all things have a proper season:
 Now 'tis in marriage a plain case,
 That crying holds the second place.
 Let vulgar souls in sorrow sink,
 Who always act and never think;
 But to reflecting minds like you,
 Marriage can sure have nothing new.

EPITAPH

ON A FAVOURITE LAP-DOG.

I NEVER bark'd when out of season;
 I never bit without a reason;
 I ne'er insulted weaker brother;
 Nor wrong'd by force nor fraud another.
 Though brutes are plac'd a rank below,
 Happy for man could he say so!

THE AUTHOR'S PICTURE.

WHILE in my matchless graces wrapt I stand,
 And touch each feature with a trembling hand;
 Deign lovely self! with art and nature's pride,
 To mix the colours, and the pencil guide.
 Self is the grand pursuit of half mankind:
 How vast a crowd by self, like me, are blind!
 By self the fop in magic colours shown,
 Though scorn'd by ev'ry eye, delights his own:
 When age and wrinkles seize the conqu'ring maid,
 Self, not the glass, reflects the flatt'ring shade.
 Then, wonder-working self! begin the lay;
 Thy charms to others as to me display.
 Straight is my person, but of little size;
 Lean are my cheeks, and hollow are my eyes:
 My youthful down is, like my talents, rare;
 Politely distant stands each single hair.
 My voice too rough to charm a lady's ear;
 So smooth a child may listen without fear;
 Not form'd in cadence soft and warbling lays,
 To sooth the fair through pleasure's wanton ways.
 My form so fine, so regular, so new,
 My port so manly and so fresh my hue;
 Oft, as I meet the crowd, they laughing say,
 "See, see Memento Mori crosses the way."
 The ravish'd Proserpine at last, we know,
 Grew fondly jealous of her sable beau;
 But thanks to nature! none from me need fly,
 One thank the devil could wound—so cannot I.
 Yet, though my person fearless may be seen,
 There is some danger in my graceful mien:
 For, as some vessel toss'd by wind and tide,
 Bounds o'er the waves, and rocks from side to side;

In just vibration thus I always move:
 This who can view and not be forc'd to love?
 Hail! charming self! by whose propitious aid
 My form in all its glory stands display'd:
 Be present still; with inspiration kind,
 Let the same faithful colours paint the mind.
 Like all mankind, with vanity I'm blest'd,
 Conscious of wit I never yet possess'd.
 To strong desires my heart an easy prey,
 Oft feels their force, but never owns their sway.
 This hour, perhaps, as death I hate my foe;
 The next I wonder why I should do so.
 Though poor, the rich I view with careless eye;
 Scorn a vain oath, and hate a serious lie.
 I ne'er for satire torture common sense;
 Nor show my wit at God's nor man's expence.
 Harmless I live, unknowing and unknown;
 With well to all, and yet do good to none.
 Unmerited contempt I hate to bear;
 Yet on my faults, like others, am severe.
 Dishonest flames my bosom never fire;
 The bad I pity, and the good admire:
 Fond of the muse, to her devote my days,
 And scribble—not for pudding, but for praise.
 These careless lines if any virgin hears,
 Perhaps, in pity to my joyless years,
 She may consent a generous flame to own;
 And I no longer sigh the nights alone.
 But, should the fair, affected, vain, or nice,
 Scream with the fears inspir'd by frogs or mice;
 Cry, "save us, heav'n! a spectre, not a man!"
 Her hartshorn snatch, or interpose her fan:
 If I my tender overture repeat;
 O! may my vows her kind reception meet!
 May the new graces on my form bestow,
 And with tall honours dignify my brow*!

PREFACE.

WHETHER the author's designs were benevolent or ill-natured, in the writing or publication of this piece to the world, it is unnecessary for him

* The manner in which our author has conducted this piece is very remarkable. None but one possessed of Blacklock's happy temper of mind, would have been so pleasant at his own expence. However, lest the ladies of future ages should think this humorous description real, it may not be improper to tell them, that, if the original had been in the hands of a faithful painter, the picture would by no means have been so ludicrous. R. H.

to discover; for even though he should, with all imaginable candour, express the motives which influenced him, every one will presume upon the same right of judging as if no such discovery had been made. Permithim, therefore, only to say, that this satire is neither absolutely personal, nor comprehensive of all. To attack any particular character, is no less detraction in verse than in prose; or suppose the intention more good-natured, it is confining those moral lessons to one, which may be applicable to a thousand. To attack any sex or species for qualities inseparable from it, is really to write a satire against nature. So that the business of one who would assume a character so delicate and unwelcome, is neither to confine himself to individuals, nor attempt to include the whole.

The author thought it proper to convey his sentiments in an epistolary way, that the eye might still be directed to one principal figure. Such characters and passions as could not thus properly be introduced, are brought in by frequent digressions, with as much ease as possible. For this I need only instance the characters of Flavia and Timandra.

The most effectual way either to gain or preserve the attention of readers in satire, is by a delicate and well preserved irony. This the author has as seldom violated as the subjects he treated, and his own warmth of temper would permit. And thus, under pretence of advising, he exposes to his pupil most of the vices and foibles of the sex; first, in their earliest appearances in the world, then in marriage, as mistresses of a family, as mothers, and the different rules too often observed in dress abroad and at home. This account of our author's plan was thought requisite, lest the reader, when glancing over the poem, might lose himself in it. A. G.

O THOU, whom still in vain I must adore,
To beauty much in debt, to fortune more;
With wit and taste enough thy faults to hide,
To gild thy folly, and to plume thy pride;
Soon shall my heart, a rebel to thy chain,
Assert its freedom, and thy pow'r disdain.
Yet ere kind fate my liberty restore, [more],
(When twice five hundred pounds can charm no
For thee the muse shall tune th' instructive lay,
And through the maze of life direct thy way:
The muse, long study'd in her sex's art,
The head designing, and corrupted heart,
For thee shall sing, nor thou too rashly blame
The last faint struggles of a dying flame.

The maid whom nature with maternal care
Has form'd to scatter ruin ev'ry where,
When first on life her radiant eyes she throws,
Dress, flatt'ry, pleasure, billet-deaux, and beaux;
Then, conscious of her weakness, let her fly
The tender lip, the love-illum'd eye;
Let her alike distrust her strength and art,
And cautious to some maiden aunt impart [heart].
The important charge, her honour and her }
But soon the first emotions of desire
Shall with simplicity and truth retire;
The conscious tongue inspir'd by distant views,
Its first alliance with the soul shall lose;

The blood, by candour taught before to glow,
From other motives to the cheek shall flow;
No more shall looks her sentiments explain,
But ev'ry flexible feature learn to feign.
Then let her issue forth to open light,
In all the blaze of native beauty bright;
Insatiate, conquest let her still pursue,
Secure from harm, and destin'd to undo.
Yet while the first of public toasts she reigns,
While half the nation struggles in her chains,
If not like thee, with fortune's bounty blest,
Let her at last resign the world to rest,
Ere time his empire o'er her charms assume,
And tinge with fainter hue her native bloom.
In vernal youth, and beauty's gayest pride,
The charming Flavia thus becomes a bride.
For what bleis'd youth, O Muse, with truth declare,

Could Fate reserve the conquest of the fair?
To what resistless art, what charms divine,
What soft address, could she her heart resign?
Did youth, good-nature, sense, inflict the wound?
"No—peevish seventy with five thousand pound."
Hail holy ties! by wond'rous charms endear'd,
The paralytic nerve, and hoary beard.
What mighty joys must blefs such equal love,
When hand in hand gay Spring and Winter move?
Beneath the specious semblance of a wife
She flaunts a licens'd prostitute for life.
Why all this hurry? Flavia was afraid
Her fame should wither, or her beauty fade.

Favour'd of Heav'n, far happier stars are thine;
Long as thy wish shall thy meridian shine,
In youth or age still certain to command,
And see thy bloom coeval with thy land.

There is a time to all the sex well known,
When 'tis a wretched thing to be alone;
When pregnant Night with ghosts and spectres
teems,
And sportive fairies prompt tumultuous dreams;
Then, though no lower with thy breast inflame,
Though spotless be thy fancy as thy name,
In solitary fears no longer pine,
But to protecting man thy charms resign.
And now, before the raptur'd swain should cloy

With known embraces, and repeated joy;
Now is the time thy wit, thy pow'rs to strain,
And tease him still some fav'rite boon to gain.
Now with eternal tempest stun his ears,
Now vary all the scene with fits and tears;
Now (pleas'd to view vicissitudes of pain,
To view thy tyranny new force obtain)
To all his tender arts and soft pursuit
Still be thy tongue inexorably mute.

Nor yet thy plagues to one alone confine,
Portending public ruin comets shine:
Angle for hearts, and when you catch the prey,
Long on the line your foolish captive play.
But should thy fond, officious fool be near,
With jealous looks, and with attentive ear;
Should he on ev'ry private hour intrude,
And watch those pleasures he was meant to shroud;
With all thy skill his jealous rage ferment,
The look inviting, and the soft complaint;
With equal favour ev'ry lover blefs,
The gentle whisper, and the fond caress;

Till the weak dupe, in every tender sense,
 Feels, more than hell, the torture of suspense.
 Then if he dares to murmur at his fate,
 Tell him with smiles, repentance is too late.
 But if, with haughty tone, and lordly pride,
 He dictates serious rules thy life to guide;
 With weeping eyes, and melting sounds, regret
 The destin'd sorrows which on woman wait;
 To tyrant man subjected during life,
 A wretched daughter, and more wretched wife;
 Alike unblest'd, whate'er her form inspire,
 Licentious ridicule, or low desire;
 She pines away a life to bliss unknown;
 A slave to ev'ry humour but her own;
 While with despotick nod, and watchful gaze,
 Her jealous master all her steps surveys:
 With strict reserve each lover if she treat,
 Then all her portion is contempt or hate;
 But if more free she spend the cheerful day
 Among the witty, innocent, and gay,
 From all her hopes domestic pleasure flies,
 Suspicion breathes, and lo! her honour dies,
 Such cruel stars on woman still attend,
 And couldst thou hope their fury to suspend?

Perhaps some lover may the soul inflame,
 For nature in each bosom is the same;
 Then, but by slow degrees, his fate decide,
 And gratify at once thy love and pride.
 For love and pride, beneath each dark disguise,
 Heave in your breast, and sparkle in your eyes:
 Howe'er your sex in chastity pretend
 To hate the lover, but admire the friend,
 Desires more warm their natal throne maintain,
 Platonic passions only reach the brain.

Though in the cloister's secret cell immur'd
 By bolts, by ev'ry name in heav'n secur'd;
 Though in the close seraglio's walls confin'd;
 Ev'n there your fancy riots on mankind:
 Your perfs may be fix'd, your forms recluse,
 While minds are faithless, and while thoughts are loose.

Should Love at last (whom has not Love sub-du'd?)

Full on thy sense some killing form obtrude;
 O! then beware, nor with a lavish hand
 Too promptly offer, ere thy swain demand.
 Our mothers, great in virtues as in crimes,
 Disdain'd the venal spirit of our times:
 Vice, oft repell'd, their stubborn hearts essay'd;
 But if at last their yielding soul she sway'd,
 Nor hopes, nor fears, nor int'rest could restrain,
 Heav'n charm'd, hell threaten'd, av'rice brib'd in vain.

Fools they, and folly's common lot they shar'd,
 Instinct their guide, and pleasure their reward:
 Their wiser race pursue a happier scheme,
 Pleasure their instrument, and wealth their aim;
 Nor maid, nor wife, unbrib'd her heart bestows,
 Each dart is tipp'd with gold which Cupid throws.

Thus should the dice invite thy vent'rous hand,
 Or debts of honour fresh supplies demand;
 Should china, monkeys, gems thy heart engage,
 The gilded coach, or liv'ry'd equipage;
 Half meet; half shun his wish; nor free, nor
 nice;

Delay the pleasure, to enhance the price.

While night o'er heav'n and earth extends her
 shade,

And darker female cunning lends its aid,
 Then, but with art, thy schemes of pleasure lay,
 Left Argus with his hundred eyes survey:
 For gales officious ev'ry whisper bear,
 Each room has echoes, and each wall an ear.
 Yet Jealousy, oft fann'd with opiate airs,
 Her charge abandons, and forgets her cares;
 While Love awake exerts his happy pow'r,
 And consecrates to joy the fated hour.

That well-concerted plans command success,
 Learn from Timandra's fortune, and confess,
 The clock strikes ten, in vain Timandra mourns,
 Supper is serv'd, no husband yet returns.
Not yet return'd! Good heav'n avert my fear;
 What unforeseen mischance detains my dear?
 Perhaps in some dark alley, by surprise,
 Beneath a villain's arm he murder'd lies;
 Or by some apoplectic fit deprest,
 Perhaps, alas! he seeks eternal rest,
 Whilst I an early widow mourn in vain:
 Hasten! fly, ye slaves, restore my lord again!
 She spoke, she shriek'd aloud, she rung the bell,
 Then senseless, lifeless, on the couch she fell.
Say, Muse; for Heav'n hides nothing from thy view,

Nor hell's deep track; say, what could then ensue?

Lorenzo, touch'd with sympathy divine,
 Heard the thrill found, and recognis'd the sign;
 He came, he spoke, and if report say true,
 Her life rekindled, and her fears withdrew.
 The lover vanish'd, and the tumult past,
 The unsuspecting husband came at last;
 The spouse with equal joy his transports crown'd,
 Nor on her lips were Cassio's *kisses found.

Let Scandal next no slight attention share,
 Scandal, the fav'rite science of the fair,
 O'er which her fancy broods the summer-day,
 And scheming wastes the midnight-taper's ray;
 The laugh significant, the biting jest,
 The whisper loud, the sentence half suppress'd,
 The seeming pity for another's fame,
 To praise with coldness, or with caution blame;
 Still shall thy malice by those arts succeed,
 And ev'ry hour a reputation bleed.
 Thus shall thy words, thy looks, thy silence wound,
 And plagues be wafted in each whisper round.
 Nor on these topics long let fancy dwell;
 In one unite the pedant and the belle:
 With learned jargon, ever misapp'ly'd,
 Harangue, illustrate, criticise, decide.

For in our days, to gain a sage's name,
 We need not plod for sense, but banish shame:
 'Tis this which opens every fair-one's eyes,
 Religion, sense, and reason to despise;
 'Tis thus their thoughts affected freedom boast,
 And laugh at God, yet tremble at a ghost.
 Truth is the object of each common view,
 The gazing crowd her naked beauties woo;
 The fair such manners scorn, but, brave and free,
 Are damn'd for sacred singularity.

Thee with a mother's name should fortune grace,
 And propagate thy vices in thy race,

* See Othello.

Let whim, not reason, all thy conduct guide,
 And not the parent, but the rod preside:
 In all thy steps each wide extreme unite,
 Capricious tenderness, or groundless spite.
 Hence future ages shall with triumph see
 Bridewell and Tyburn both enrich'd by thee.
 To this our lives their hapless tenor owe, [flow.
 Tint'd with the poison'd source from whence they
 Ah! me, had gracious Heav'n alone consign'd
 A prey to burning wrath your worthless kind;
 Or had the first fair she, to hell ally'd,
 Creation's sole reproach, curs'd Heav'n and dy'd;
 Nor introduc'd in nature's faultless frame
 The wretched heritage of guilt and shame,
 Such the maternal pledges you bestow,
 Expressive earnest of eternal woe.

Still as a constant curse regard thy home,
 Thy pleasure's penance, and thy beauty's tomb;
 Now mad with rage, now languishing with spleen,
 There still in wretched dishabile be seen:
 Long let thy nail its polish'd jet extend,
 Around thy neck the greasy locks descend;
 And round thee, mingling in one spicy gale,
 Kitchen and nurs'ry all their sweets exhale.

But if in more extensive spheres you move,
 With all the glare of dreis your form improve;
 To aid its pomp let either India join,
 Nor once reflect at whose expence you shine;
 New airs, new fashions, new complexions try,
 While paint and affectation can supply,
 For Heav'n and Nature, uniform, and old,
 One settled course in each production hold;
 But belles, by native genius taught to please,
 Correct their Maker's want of taste with ease.

But why this hasty rage, this sudden fright?
 I meant to counsel, and you say I bite.
 Ah! no; Heav'n knows 'twas far from my intent;
 The world's too much a sinner to repent:
 By its example taught, I change my view,
 And swear the fair are right whate'er they do.

HORACE, ODE XIII. BOOK I.

IMITATED.

"Cum tu Lydia, Telephi," &c.

WHEN Cælia dwells on Damon's name,
 Infatiate of the pleasing theme,
 Or in detail admires his charms,
 His rosy neck, and waxen arms;
 O! then, with fury scarce suppress'd,
 My big heart labours in my breast;
 From thought to thought across my soul
 Incessant tides of passion roll;
 My blood alternate chills and glows,
 My wav'ring colour comes and goes;
 While down my cheek the silent tear
 Too plainly bids my grief appear;
 Too plainly shows the latent flame
 Whose slow consumption melts my frame.

I burn, when conscious of his sway,
 The youth elated I survey,
 Presume, with insolence of air
 To frown, or dictate to my fair;
 Or in the madness of delight,
 When to thy arms he wings his flight,
 And having snatch'd a rude embrace,
 Profanes the softness of that face;

That face which heav'n itself imbues
 With brightest charms and purest hues.
 Oh! if my counsels touch thine ear,
 (Love's counsels always are sincere),
 From his ungovern'd transports fly,
 Howe'er his form may please thine eye;
 For conflagrations, fierce and strong,
 Are fatal still, but never long:
 And he who roughly treats the shrine,
 Where modest worth and beauty shine,
 Forgetful of his former fire,
 Will soon no more these charms admire.

How blest'd, how more than blest'd are they
 Whom love retains with equal sway;
 Whose flame inviolably bright,
 Still burns in its meridian height;
 Nor jealous fears, nor cold disdain,
 Disturb their peace, nor break their chain:
 But, when the hours of life ebb fast,
 For each in sighs they breathe their last:

TO A LADY.

WITH HAMMOND'S ELEGIES.

An Elegy.

O FORM'D at once to feel and to inspire
 The noblest passions of the human breast,
 Attend the accent of love's favourite lyre,
 And let thy soul its moving force attest.

Expressive passion, in each sound convey'd,
 Shall all its joy disclose, and all its smart;
 Reason to modest tenderness persuade, [heart.
 Smooth ev'ry thought, and tranquillize the False is that wisdom, impotent and vain, [sign'd,
 Which scorns the sphere by Heav'n to men as-
 Which tears love's purest fires with mock disdain,
 And, human, soars above the human kind.

Silent the muse of elegy remain'd,
 Her plaints untaught by nature to renew,
 Whilst sportive art delusive sorrows feign'd,
 With how much ease distinguish'd from the true!

Ev'n polish'd Waller mourns the constant scorn
 Of Saccharissa, and his fate in vain:
 With love his fancy, not his heart is torn;
 We praise his wit, but cannot share his pain.

Such force has nature, so supremely fair,
 With charms maternal her productions shine;
 The vivid grace and unaffected air,
 Proclaim them all her own, and all divine.

Should youthful merit in such strains implore,
 Let beauty still vouchsafe a gentle tear.
 What can the soul, with passion thrill'd, do more?
 The song must prove the sentiment sincere.

Cold cunning ne'er, with animated strain,
 To other breasts can warmth unselt impart:
 We see her labour with industrious pain,
 And mock the turgid impotence of art.

ODE TO AMYNTA.

By folly led from snare to snare,
 Of bitter grief, suspense, and care,
 A voluntary prey:

With ev'ry flatt'ring good resign'd,
Once more myself and peace to find,
From thee I force my way.

Yet with reluctant step and flow,
From all that's dear while thus I go,
Some pity let me claim!
Less smart th' expiring martyr feels,
While racks distend, or torturing wheels
Tear his devoted frame.

Nor think, like infants prone to change,
From fordid views or weak revenge,
My resolutions flow:
'Tis God's, 'tis nature's great behest,
On every living soul impress'd,
To seek relief from woe;

Nor yet explore, with curious bent,
What, known, would but thy soul torment,
And all its hopes betray:
When painful truths invade the mind,
Ev'n wisdom wishes to be blind,
And hates th' officious ray.

Ye powers, who cordial and serene,
Protect the dear domestic scene,
To your retreats I fly;
At length by yours and reason's aid,
I may to rest this heart persuade,
And wipe the tearful eye.

There nature, o'er the heart supreme,
Shall every tender wish reclaim;
Where'er they fondly stray;
There friendship's arms my fall sustain,
When, languid with excess of pain,
My fainting nerves give way.

With cadence soft the flowing stream,
The fawning breeze, the lambent gleam,
Shall join their various power,
To bid each passion's rising tide
In philosophic ease subside,
And sooth my pensive hour.

AN ELEGY.

INSCRIBED TO C——, S——, ESQ.

O FRIEND, by ev'ry sympathy endear'd,
Which soul with soul in sacred ties unite;
The hour arrives, so long, so justly fear'd,
Brings all its pangs, and sinks each joy in night.

For now from Heav'n my unavailing pray'r
Toss'd devious, mingles with the sportive gale;
No tender arts can move my cruel fair,
Nor all love's silent eloquence prevail.

Though from my lips no sound unmeaning flows,
Though in each action fondness is express'd,
No kind return shall terminate my woes,
Nor heave th' eternal pressure from my breast.

Too well the weakness of my heart I knew;
Too well love's pow'r my soul had felt before:
Why did I then the pleasing ill pursue,
And tempt the malice of my fate once more?

Conscious how few among the fair succeed,
Who boast no merit but a tender heart,
Why was my soul again to chains decreed,
To unrewarded tears and endless smart?

The siren hope, my tardy pace to cheer,
In gay preface the short'ning prospect dress'd,
With art fallacious brought the object near,
And lull'd each rising doubt in fatal rest.

I saw success, or thought at least I saw,
Beck'ning with smiles to animate my speed,
Reason was mute, impress'd with trembling awe,
And mem'ry not one precedent could plead.

How curs'd is he who never learnt to fear
The keenest plagues his cruel stars portent!
Till o'er his head the black'ning clouds appear,
And Heav'n's collected storms at once descend!

What further change of fortune can I wait?
What consummation to the last despair?
She flies, yet shows no pity for my fate;
She sees, yet deigns not in my griefs to share.

Yet the kind heart, where tender passions reign,
Will catch the softness when it first appears;
Explore each symptom of the sufferer's pain,
Sigh all his sighs, and number all his tears.

This tribute from humanity is due, [bestow?
What then, just Heav'n's! what would not love
Yet though the fair insensible I view,
For others bliss I would not change my woe.

O blind to truth, and to reflection blind,
At length to wisdom and thyself return!
See science wait thee with demeanour kind,
Whose frown or absence no fond lovers mourn.

Bounteous and free to all who ask her aid,
Her sacred light anticipates their call,
Points out the precipice on which they stray'd,
And with maternal care prevents their fall.

Daughter of God! whose features all express
Th' eternal beauty whence thy being sprung;
I to thy sacred shrine my steps address, [tongue.
And catch each sound from thy heav'n-prompted

O! take me wholly to thy fond embrace,
Through all my soul thy radiant beams infuse;
Thence every cloud of pleasing error chase;
Adjust her organs, and enlarge her views.

Hence, ever fixt on virtue and on thee,
No lower wish shall her attention claim,
Till, like her sacred parent, pure and free, [came.
She gain the native Heav'n from whence she

O THOU! in whom maturely bright appears

Whom heav'n-born virtue's spotless beauty fires:
Still let these glorious aims engage thy view;
With straining nerves the arduous path pursue;

EXTEMPORE VERSES.

SPOKEN AT THE DESIRE OF A GENTLEMAN.

Thou, genius of connubial love, attend;
Let silent wonder all thy powers suspend;
Whilst to thy glory I devote my lays,
And pour forth all my grateful heart in praise.
In lifeless strains let vulgar satire tell,
That marriage oft is mixt with Heav'n and hell,
That conjugal delight is sour'd with spleen,
And peace and war compose the varied scene;
My muse a truth sublimer can assert,
And sing the triumphs of a mutual heart.
Thrice happy they, who, through life's varied tide,
With equal peace and gentler motion glide;
Whom, though the wave of fortune flunks or swells,
One reason governs, and one wish impels;
Whose emulation is to love the best;
Who feel no bliss, but in each other blest;
Who know no pleasure but the joys they give,
Nor cease to love, but when they cease to live:
If fate these blessings in one lot combine,
Then let th' eternal page record them mine.

TO THE REV. MR. SPENCE.

LATE PROFESSOR OF POETRY AT OXFORD.

Written at Dumfries in the year 1759.

To toms of dull theology confin'd,
(Eternal opiates of the active mind)
Long lay my spirits, lull'd in deep repose,
Incapable alike of verse or prose.
Unmark'd by thought or action, every day
Appear'd, and pass'd in apathy away.
Our friend, the Doctor †, view'd with deep regret,
My sad catastrophe, my lifeless state;
Explor'd each ancient sage, whose labours tell
The force of powerful herb, or magic spell.
Physic in vain its boasted influence try'd;
My stupor incantation's voice defy'd:
No charm could light my fancy's languid flame;
No charm but friendship's voice and Spence's name.
So from the cold embraces of the tomb,
Involv'd in deep impenetrable gloom, [arise,
Should Heav'n's great mandate bid some wretch
How would he view the sun with ravish'd eyes;
Admire each part of nature's beauteous scene,
And welcome life and happiness again!
Amaz'd the doctor stood, and lost in thought,
Nor could believe the wonder he had wrought;
Till, fir'd at last with sacerdotal pride,
" 'Tis mine;—the work is all my own," he cried.

* The late celebrated Mr. Colin M'Laurin.

† Rev. Mr. Jamieson.

" Henceforth some nobler task my might shall
" prove,

" I mean some lofty mountain to remove,
" With woods and fountains bid it wing its way
" Through yielding air, and settle in the sea."
But recollecting, whence the virtue flow'd
To which returning life and sense I ow'd,
He snatch'd his pen, and with majestic tone,
" Hence Indolence and Sloth," he cry'd, "be gone;
" Me, Friendship's spirit, Spence's name inspire,
" My heart is pregnant, and my soul on fire;
" Thought crowds on thought, my brisk ideas flow,
" And much I long to tell, and much to know."

Thus exercis'd, to Lethe's dismal shore
Fled Indolence, and sought her haunts of yore,
With all her train forsook the poet's breast,
And left the man completely dispossest'd.
If to your very name, by bounteous Heav'n,
Such blest, restoring influence has been giv'n,
How must your sweet approach, your aspect kind,
Your soul-reviving converse, warm the mind!

TO DR. BEATTIE.

WITH THE AUTHOR'S POEMS.

O, WARM'D by inspiration's brightest fire,
For whom the muses string their fav'rite lyre,
Though with superior genius blest, yet deign
A kind reception to my humbler strain.

When florid youth impell'd, and fortune smil'd,
The vocal art my languid hours beguil'd:
Severer studies now my life engage;
Researches dull, that quench poetic rage;

From morn to ev'ning destin'd to explore
Th' verbal critic and the scholiast's lore;
Alas! what beam of heav'nly ardour shines
In musty lexicons and school divines?

Yet, to the darling object of my heart,
A short, but pleasing retrospect I dart;
Revolve the labours of the tuneful choir,
And what I cannot imitate, admire.

O could my thoughts with all thy spirit glow;
As thine harmonious, could my accents flow;
Then, with approving ear, might'st thou attend,
Nor in a Blacklock blush to own a friend.

TO THE REV. DR. OGILVIE.

" I decus, i, nostrum, melioribus utere fatis."

VIRGIL.

DEAR to the muses and their tuneful train,
Whom, long pursu'd, I scarce at last regain;
Why should'st thou wonder, if, when life declines,
His antiquated lyre thy friend resigns,
Haply, when youth elate with native force,
Or emulation fires the generous horse,
He bounds, he springs, each nerve elastic strain;
And if not victor, some distinction gains;
But should the careless master of the steed,
Cherish no more his mettle or his speed,
Indignantly he shuns all future strife,
And wastes in indolent regret his life.
Such were his efforts, such his cold reward,
Whom once thy partial tongue pronounc'd a bard;

Excursive, on the gentle gales of spring,
He rov'd, whilst favour imp'd his timid wing:
Exhausted genius now no more inspires,
But mourns abortive hopes and faded fires;
The short-liv'd wreath, which once his temples
grac'd,

Fades at the sickly breath of squeamish taste;
Whilst darker days his fainting flames immure
In cheerless gloom and winter premature.
But thou, my friend, whom higher omens lead,
Bold to achieve, and mighty to succeed,
For whom fresh laurels, in eternal bloom,
Impregnate Heav'n and earth with rich perfume;
Pursue thy destin'd course, assert thy fame;
Ev'n Providence shall vindicate thy claim:
Ev'n nature's wreck, resounding through thy lays,
Shall in its final crash proclaim thy praise.

TO A FRIEND,

OF WHOSE HEALTH AND SUCCESS THE AUTHOR
HAD HEARD, AFTER A LONG ABSENCE.

THOU dearest of friends to my heart ever known,
Whose enjoyments and sufferings have still been my own,

Since early we met in susceptible youth,
When glowing for virtue, and toiling for truth;
To God one petition, with steady regard,
With ardour incessant, my spirit prefer'd,
Thy life to protract, and thy blessings augment,
Now my wish is obtain'd, and my bosom content.

You ask, by what means I my livelihood gain,
And how my long conflict with fortune maintain?
'The question is kind, yet I cannot tell why,
'Tis hard for a spirit like mine to reply.
If a friend with a friend must be free and sincere,
My venture is simple, and sober my cheer;
But though few my resources, and vacant my purse,
One comfort is left me, things cannot be worse.
'Tis vain to repine, as philosophers say,
So I take what is offer'd, and live as I may;
'To my wants, still returning, adapt my supplies,
And find in my hope what my fortune denies.

'To the powerful and great had I keenly apply'd,
Had I toil'd for their pleasures, or flatter'd their
pride,
In splendour and wealth I perhaps might have flam'd,

For learning, for virtue, for ev'ry thing fam'd.
'The gamester, th' informer, the quack, and the smuggler,

The bully, the player, the mimic, the juggler,
The dispenser of libels, the teller of fortunes,
And others of equal respect and importance,
Find high reputation and ample subsistence,
Whilst craving necessity stands at a distance.

But who could determine, in soundness of brain,
By priesthood or poetry, life to sustain?
Our Maker to serve, or our souls to improve,
Are tasks self-rewarded, and labours of love.

Such with hunger and thirst are deservedly paid,
'Tis glorious to starve by so noble a trade:
'Tis guilt and ambition for priests to pretend
Their fame to advance, and their fortune amend;
Their fame and their fortune, by pious mankind,
Are such trifles esteem'd as no mortal should mind.

Nor less by the world is the heav'n-gifted bard,
In his vicious abandon'd to find his reward.

Can sensations of wretchedness ever invade
That breast which Apollo his temple has made?
On the top of Parnassus his hermitage lies;
And who can repine, when so near to the skies?
For him sweet ambrosia spontaneously grows;
For him Aganippe spontaneously flows.
Though the bev'rage be cool, and ethereal the diet,

Fine souls, thus regal'd, should be happy and quiet.
But I, who substantial nutrition require,
Would rather the muses should feed than inspire.
And whilst lofty Pindus my fancy explores,
To earth the wild fugitive hunger restores.

Yet lest what I mean be obscurely express'd,
No call is unanswer'd, no wish unredress'd:
But other resources supplied what was wanting,
Less barren employments than preaching or chanting.

For thee, whom I glory to claim as my friend,
May stars more propitious thy labours attend;
On earth be thy prospect still smiling and bright,
And thy portion hereafter immortal delight.

THE GENEALOGY OF NONSENSE.

WITH long and careful scrutiny in vain,
I search'd th' obscure recesses of my brain;
The muses oft with mournful voice I woo'd,
To find a plea for silence if they could.

But through my search not one excuse appear'd,
And not a muse would answer if she heard.

Thus I remain'd in anxious, sad suspense,
Despairing aid from reason or from sense,
Till from a pow'r, of late well known to fame,
Though not invoc'd, the wish'd solution came.

Now night incumbent shaded half the ball,
Silence assum'd her empire over all,
While on my eyes imperfect slumbers spread
Their downy wings, and hover'd round my head;
But still internal fensic awake remain'd,
And still its first solicitude retain'd;
When lo! with slow descent, obscurely bright,
Yet cloth'd in darkness visible, not light,
A form, high tow'ring to the distant skies,
In mimic grandeur, stood before my eyes:
As after storms waves faintly lash the shore,
As hollow winds in rocky caverns roar, [ear,
Such were the sounds which pierc'd my trembling
And chill'd my soul with more than common fear.

Thus spake the pow'r:—"From you extended
" void,

" Where Jove's creating hand was ne'er employ'd,
" Where soft with hard, and heavy mix'd with
" light,

" And heat with cold, maintain eternal fight;

" Where end the realms of order, form, and day;

" Where night and chaos hold primæval sway;

" Their first, their ever-darling offspring view,

" Who comes thy wanted calmness to renew.

" Ere yet the mountains rear'd their heads on
" high,

" Ere yet the radiant sun illum'd the sky,

" Ere swelling hills, or humble vales were seen,

" Or woods the prospect cheer'd with waving
" green;

" Ere nature was, my wond'rous birth I date,

" More old than Chance, Necessity, or Fate;

" Ere yet the muses touch'd the vocal lyre,

" My reverend mother and tumultuous sire

Beheld my wond'rous birth with vast amaze,
 " And Discord's boundless empire roar'd my praise.
 " In me, what'er by nature is disjoin'd,
 " All opposite extremes involv'd you find:
 " Born to retain, by fate's eternal doom,
 " My fire's confusion, and my mother's gloom.
 " Where'er extend the realms of letter'd pride,
 " With uncontroll'd dominion I preside;
 " Through its deep gloom I dart the doubtful ray,
 " And teach the learned idiots where to stray:
 " The labouring chemist, and profound divine,
 " Err, not seduc'd by reason's light, but mine.
 " From me alone these boast the wond'rous skill
 " To make a myst'ry more mysterious still;
 " While those pursue by science not their own,
 " The universal cure, and philosophic stone.
 " Thus, when the leaden pedant courts my aid,
 " To cover ignorance with learning's shade,
 " To swell the folio to a proper size,
 " And throw the clouds of art o'er nature's eyes,
 " My soporific pow'r the sages own;
 " Hence by the sacred name of Dulness known:
 " But if mercurial scribblers pant for fame,
 " Those I inspire, and Nonsense is my name.
 " Sustain'd by me, thy muse first took her flight,
 " I circumscrib'd its limits and its height;
 " By me she sinks, by me she soars along;
 " I rule her silence, and I prompt her song."
 My doubts resolv'd, the goddess wing'd her flight,
 Dissolv'd in air, and mix'd with formless night.
 Much more the muse, reluctant, must suppress,
 For all the pow'r of time and fate confess;
 Too soft her accents, and too weak her pray'r,
 For time or fate, or cruel posts to hear.

ODE ON MELISSA'S BIRTH-DAY.

YE nymphs and swains, whom love inspires
 With all his pure and faithful fires,
 Hither with joyful steps repair;
 You who his tenderest transports share!
 For lo! in beauty's gayest pride,
 Summer expands her bosom wide;
 The sun no more in clouds enshrin'd,
 Darts all his glories unconfin'd;
 The feather'd choir from every spray
 Salute Melissa's natal day.

Hither ye nymphs and shepherds haste,
 Each with a flow'ry chaplet grac'd,
 With transport while the shades resound,
 And nature spreads her charms around;
 While ev'ry breeze exhales perfumes,
 And Bion his mute pipe refumes;
 With Bion long diffus'd to play,
 Salute Melissa's natal day.

For Bion long deplor'd his pain
 Through woods and devious wilds in vain;
 At last impell'd by deep despair,
 The swain prefer'd his ardent pray'r;
 His ardent pray'r Melissa heard,
 And every latent sorrow cheer'd,
 His days with social rapture blest,
 And sooth'd each anxious care to rest.
 Tune, shepherds, tune the festive lay,
 And hail Melissa's natal day.

With nature's incense to the skies
 Let all your fervid wishes rise,

That Heav'n and earth may join to shed
 Their choicest blessings on her head;
 That years protracted, as they flow,
 May pleasures more sublime bestow;
 While by succeeding years surpass'd,
 The happiest still may be the last;
 And thus each circling sun display,
 A more auspicious natal day.

ODE TO AURORA.

ON MELISSA'S BIRTH-DAY.

Of time and nature eldest born,
 Emerge thou rosy-finger'd morn,
 Emerge, in purest dress array'd,
 And chace from Heav'n night's envious shade,
 That I once more may, pleas'd, survey,
 And hail Melissa's natal day.

Of time and nature eldest born,
 Emerge, thou rosy-finger'd morn:
 In order at the eastern gate
 The hours to draw thy chariot wait;
 Whilst zephyr, on his balmy wings,
 Mild nature's fragrant tribute brings,
 With odours sweet to strew thy way,
 And grace the bland, revolving day.

But as thou lead'st the radiant sphere,
 That gilds its birth, and marks the year,
 And as his stronger glories rise,
 Diffus'd around th' expanded skies,
 Till cloth'd with beams serenely bright,
 All Heav'n's vast concave flames with light;
 So, when, through life's protracted day,
 Melissa still pursues her way,
 Her virtues with thy splendour vie,
 Increasing to the mental eye:
 Though less conspicuous, not less dear,
 Long may they Bion's prospect cheer;
 So shall his heart no more repine,
 Bless'd with her rays, though robb'd of thine.

TO DR. EVANS.

DEAR DOCTOR, as it is most fit,
 Your accusation I admit
 In all its force, nor rack my brain,
 By quirks and subtleties vain,
 To throw my conduct into shade,
 And thus your just rebuke evade.
 But, since convicted now I stand,
 And wait correction from your hand,
 Be merciful as thou art strong,
 And recognize the power of song.
 For, while in accents deep and hoarse,
 She breathes contrition and remorse,
 The muse's penitential strain,
 For pardon cannot sue in vain.
 But, let me, with profound respect,
 A sad mistake of your's correct,
 When once th' Aonian maids discover
 Some favour for a youthful lover,
 You think their passion still as keen
 For him at sixty as sixteen.
 Alas the sex you little know,
 Their ruling passion is a beau.

The wrinkl'd brow, th' extinguish'd eye,
 From female hearts ne'er gain a sigh.
 The brilliant glance, the cheek vermilion,
 Th' elastic nerve, th' enchanting smile,
 These, only these, can hearts confine
 Of ladies human or divine.
 No mind, immortal though it be,
 From life's vicissitudes is free,
 The man who labours to acquit
 Of imperfection human wit,
 Will find he undertakes a task
 That proves what his opponents ask;
 And feel, to his eternal cost,
 His own attempts refute his boast.
 Forc'd, by experience and sensation,
 I make this humble declaration:
 For, should my pride my words restrain,
 These lays would show the fact too plain.
 Cloth'd in a lion's skin, the ass
 At first might for a lion pass;
 But when the stupid creature bray'd,
 His real self he soon betray'd,
 And every stick and every stone
 Were us'd, to show him he was known.
 Thus, batter'd by sarcastic sneers,
 I shut my mouth and hide my ears;
 Bless'd, if unhurt I may elude
 The observation of the crowd.
 Yet, spite of all the ills that prey
 On ebbing life from day to day,
 It warm'd my veins with youthful fire,
 And rais'd my heart a cubit higher,
 To hear your own kind words express
 Your competition and success.
 So, when portentous symptoms threat
 Your patients with impending fate,
 At your approach may they recede,
 And sickness lift its drooping head;
 While health and joy your nod obey,
 And fly where'er you point their way.
 One great achievement still remains,
 One triumph, worthy of your pains;
 Could you the thefts of time restore,
 And make me what I was of yore,
 In spite of fortune's utmost spleen,
 Which bards oft feel to intervene,
 I might, perhaps, as friend with friend,
 At Shrewsbury some evenings spend;
 There, in abuse that meant no harm,
 Assert the soul of humour warm;
 And laugh at those whose lives provoke
 The satire we effuse in joke.
 And now, perhaps, you wish to know,
 With your old friends, how matters go;
 What state of health they still enjoy,
 And how their various hours employ?
 But this detail more glibly flows
 In easy style and humble prose;
 And, with more patience, will be heard.
 To my Melissa when transferr'd,
 If faults acknowledg'd be forgiven,
 And all our former odds made even,
 Pray write me soon, to let me see
 How much superior you can be
 To doctors in divinity.
 Meanwhile, believe me still sincere,
 Whatever guise my conduct wear,
 And still with friendship, no less fervent,
 Your most obedient humble servant.

TO MR. DALZEL,

PROFESSOR OF GREEK IN THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

YE fairy fields, where youthful fancy stray'd,
 Ye landscapes vested in eternal green,
 Cease my reluctant absence to upbraid;
 Each joy I lose, when you no more are seen.
 The raptur'd heart, th' enthusiastic eye, (mind,
 The bright conception darting through the
 From my remotest hopes how far they fly,
 And leave a gloomy solitude behind?
 Ethereal people of each glowing scene,
 Which meditation pictur'd in my sight,
 Of ever beauteous and celestial mien:
 Why sink you thus amid the shades of night?
 No more the harp shall Polyhymnia tune,
 No warbling flute Euterpe's breath inspire,
 Ah! why for ever silent, why so soon
 Should every muse forbear to strike the lyre?
 To me a faded form e'en nature wears;
 Its vivid colours every flow'r resigns,
 The blasted lawns no tint of verdure cheers,
 Shorn of his beams the sun more faintly shines.
 Age, hood-wink'd age, exterminates the whole,
 She o'er the prospect night and horror spreads;
 Her endless winter intercepts the soul,
 From limpid fountains and enchanted meads.
 O come, Dalzel*, whose comprehensive view,
 Whate'er the muse exhibits, can survey,
 The flying phantom teach me to pursue,
 Direct my course, and animate my lay.
 Yet from th' ungrateful bosom of the tomb
 Should Jason's magic wife emerge once more,
 Nor thou, nor she, my genius could resume;
 Nor thou, nor she, the flame of youth restore.

TO DR. DOWNMAN, IN LONDON.

To the fond muse, who sings of rural joys,
 Involv'd in politics, and smoke and noise,
 Her Scottish sister gratulation sends,
 Pleas'd that her taste, not on her place depends.
 For oft contagions in the city breeze,
 Hovering unseen, unfelt, the fancy seize:
 Surrounding objects catch the roving eye,
 And tastes with situations oft comply.
 There party-passion wears the form of truth,
 Pleasure in virtue's mask seduces youth,
 Still handing round the sweet Circean bowl,
 To warp the judgment, and pervert the soul.
 Ye early plans and wishes then adieu,
 We seek not what is fair, but what is new;
 Each former prepossession leaves the heart,
 And nature yields to meretricious art.
 Oh! if in heav'n some chosen curse remain,
 Nor thunders roll, nor lightnings flash in vain,
 Curs'd be the wretch who cites first design'd,
 To blast each native worth of human kind.
 When first Astræa saw their structures rise,
 Fir'd with indignant rage, she sought the skies.

* This gentleman delivered a course of critical lectures on poetry, which did honour to the seminary in which he is engaged, and to the country where he lives.

Th' ingenious wish, that in one wide embrace
 Clasp'd nature's frame, and glow'd for all her race,
 Fair hospitality, in blessing blest,
 Primeval candour, of tranlucent breast,
 With horror shuddering at the baneful sight,
 Retir'd, the vow'd companions of her flight:
 Then from her bosom hell disgorg'd her train,
 The lust of pleasure, and the thirst of gain,
 Then pride luxurious rear'd her crest on high,
 Deceit then forg'd the name, and cogg'd the die,
 Then lawless tyrants from the throne decreed
 Virtue to toil, and innocence to bleed.
 In heart a tyger, though in looks a child,
 Assassination stabb'd his friend, and snul'd;
 While perjury, with unaverted eye,
 Invok'd the God of truth to seal a lie.

O conscious peace! to few indulg'd by fate,
 When shall I find once more thy dear retreat?
 When shall my steps the guiltless scenes explore,
 Where virtue's smiles the age of gold restore,
 Where charity to all her arms extends,
 And as she numbers faces, numbers friends?
 Where unaffected sympathy appears
 In cordial smiles, or undissembled tears?
 Where innocence and mirth, the farmer's wealth,
 Walk hand in hand with exercise and health?
 Nor when the setting sun withdraws his ray,
 And labour closes with the closing day,
 Would I, with haughty insolence, avoid
 The scenes where simple nature is enjoy'd;
 But pleas'd, in frolic, or discourse engage
 With sportive youth, or hospitable age,
 Exert my talents to amuse the throng
 In wond'rous legend, or in rural song.

Thus, by no wish for alteration seiz'd,
 My neighbours pleasing, with my neighbours
 pleas'd,

Exempt from each excess of blifs or woe,
 My setting hours should uniformly flow,
 'Till nature to the dust these limbs consign'd,
 Leaving a short, but well-earn'd fame behind.

For thee, whom nature and the muse inspire
 With taste refin'd, and elegant desire,
 'Tis thine, where'er thou mov'st, thy blifs to find,
 Drawn from the native treasures of thy mind;
 To brighten life with love or friendship's ray,
 Or through the muse's land in rapture's stray.
 Oh! may thy soul her fav'rite objects gain,
 And not a wish aspire to heav'n in vain!
 Full on thy latest hours may genius shine,
 And each domestic happiness be thine!

TO THE SAME.

Yes, 'tis resolv'd, in nature's spite,
 Nay more, resolv'd in rhyme to write:
 Though to my chamber's walls confin'd
 By beating rains, and roaring wind,
 Though lowring, as the wintry sky,
 Involv'd in spleen my spirits lie,
 Though cold, as hyperborean snows,
 No feeble ray of genius glows,
 To friendship tribute let me pay,
 And gratitude's benefits obey.

Whilst man in this precarious station
 Of struggle and of fluctuation,
 Protracts his being, is it strange
 That humour, genius, wit, should change?

The mind which most of force inherits,
 Must feel vicissitude of spirits:
 And happiest they, who least deprest,
 Of life's bad bargain make the best.
 Thus, though my song he can't commend,
 Th' attempt will please, my gentle friend;
 For he of life's uncertain round
 The cloudy and serene hath found.

Cheering, as summer's balmy showers,
 To thirsty herbs and languid flowers,
 Your late epistle reach'd my ear,
 And fill'd my heart with joy sincere.
 Before my eyes in prospect plain
 Appear'd the consecrated fane.
 Where friendship's holy presence shines,
 And grief disarms, and blifs refines.
 Long may the beauteous fabric rise,
 Unite all hearts and charm all eyes,
 Above all contingency and time,
 Stable as earth, as heav'n sublime!
 And while its more than solar light
 Through nature's frame flows piercing bright,
 May we through life's ambiguous maze
 Imbibe its most auspicious rays;
 View unimpair'd its sweet existence,
 By length of years, or local distance;
 And while our hearts revolve the past,
 Still feel its warmest moments last!
 With each kind wish which friendship knows,
 For you Melissa's bosom glows.
 Her heart capacious and sincere,
 Where those once priz'd must still be dear,
 Though long of silence she complains,
 For Thespia all her love retains.

Now, whether prose your fancy please,
 The style of elegance and ease,
 Or whether strains fo debonair,
 As might from anguish charm despair,
 To us at least a pittance deal,
 Who long to see your hand and seal.

TO MELISSA.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1790.

DEAR, welcome sharer of my breast,
 Of friends the kindest and the best,
 What numbers shall the muse employ,
 To speak my gratitude and joy?
 Twice ten times has the circling year,
 And oftener, finish'd its career,
 Since first in Hymen's sacred bands,
 With mingl'd hearts we join'd our hands.

Auspicious hour! from whence I date
 The brightest colours of my fate;
 From whence felicity alone,
 To my dejected heart was known.
 For then, my days from woe to screen,
 Thy watchful tenderness was seen;
 Nor did its kind attentions miss
 To heighten and improve my blifs.

Oft have I felt its pleasing power
 Delude the solitary hour;
 Oft has it charm'd the cruel smart,
 When pain and anguish rack'd my heart.
 Thus may our days which yet remain,
 Be free from bitterness and pain!
 So limpid streams still purer grow,
 For ever bright'ning as they flow.

When death must come, for come it will,
 And I heav'n's purposes fulfil,
 When heart with heart, and soul with soul
 Blending, I reach life's utmost goal,
 When nature's debt this frame shall pay,
 And earth receive my mortal clay;
 Not unconcern'd shalt thou behold
 My ashes mingling with the mold;
 But drop a tear, and heave a sigh,
 Yet hope to meet me in the sky;
 When, life's continual suff'rings o'er,
 We joyful meet, to part no more.

TO TWO SISTERS,

ON THEIR WEDDING-DAY.

An Epistle.

DEAR ladies, whilst the nuptial hour at hand
 Must all your time, and all your thoughts demand.

Though all the Nine my tuneful strain inspir'd,
 My heart though all the force of friendship fir'd,
 Though warm'd with transport for my lovely theme,

I wou'd not long your kind attention claim:
 Yet let me join the gratulating throng,
 And breathe to Heav'n one ardent wish in song.
 That all your future days, serene and bright,
 May flow distinguish'd by sincere delight;
 That full success your wishes may attend,
 And Heav'n's best blessings on your heads descend;
 That love and joy may on each period wait,
 While hoary Time unrolls the page of fate;
 Till all who hear your destiny admire,
 Nor more from Heav'n to make them blest'd require;

Till tender mothers, who your lot survey,
 Thus in the fondness of their souls shall pray:
 "May my fair daughter, or my fav'rite son,
 "Be blest'd, and live and love as these have
 "done."

ESTIMATE OF HUMAN GREATNESS.

IN IMITATION OF A FRENCH EPIGRAM.

ONE night I dream'd, and dreams may oft prove true,
 That to this foolish world I bade adieu.
 With solemn rites, and decent grief deplor'd,
 My friends to mother earth her gift restor'd.
 But O! eternal insult to my shade,
 Clothe by a vile plebeian corpse was laid!
 Enrag'd, confin'd. I try'd to flit my ground;
 But all attempts were unsuccessful found.
 Be gone, gross lump, I cry'd in high disdain,
 No slave of abject birth shall here remain.
 Be distant far—to nobler names give way,
 And mix with vulgar dust thy sordid clay.
 Thou fool! thou wretch! a hollow voice reply'd,
 Now learn the impotence of wealth and pride;
 Hereditary names and honours, here,
 With all their force and force disappear.
 In these dark realms, Death's reptile heralds
 trace
 From one sole origin all human race:

On all the line one equal lot attends;
 From dust it rises and to dust descends.
 Here pale ambition, quitting pomp and form,
 Admits her last—best counsellor, a worm.
 Here nature's charter stands confirm'd alone;
 The grave is less precarious than the throne.
 Then seek not here pre-eminence and state,
 But own and blest th' impartial will of fate;
 With life, its errors and its whims resign,
 Nor think a beggar's title worse than thine.

TO HER GRACE THE DUCHESS OF HAMILTON,

ON HER RECOVERY FROM CHILD-BED,

After the Birth of the Marquis of Clydesdale.

HAIL! nature's loveliest work and darling care,
 Whose worth and beauty equal praises claim,
 Form'd Heav'n's supreme beneficence to share,
 A nation's wonder, and a mother's name.

No venal muse with mercenary praise,
 Insults thy taste, or wounds thy modest ear;
 When Heav'n, or heav'nly beauty prompts her lays,
 As high the theme, the tribute flows sincere.

Blest'd be the hours, which, with auspicious sight,
 Restore thy former health and native bloom;
 To bid the wishing world its eyes delight,
 And tame, with all her mouths, thy praise resume.

O may the infant product of thy pain,
 Beyond a mother's wish to greatness rise;
 The cloudless glories of his race sustain,
 On earth below'd, and honour'd in the skies,

Fraught with the richest, noblest gifts of fate,
 Serenely gay may all thy moments roll;
 To crown thy days let ev'ry pleasure wait,
 Bright as thy charms, and spotless as thy soul,

ODE

ON A FAVOURITE LAP-DOG.

To Miss G———

PRETTY, sportive, happy creature,
 Full of life, and full of play,
 Taught to live by faithful nature,
 Never canst thou miss thy way.

By her dictates kind instructed,
 Thou avoid'st each real smart;
 We, by other rules conducted,
 Lose our joy to show our art.

Undisguis'd, each reigning passion
 When thou mov'st or look'st we see:
 Were the same with us the fashion,
 Happy mortals would we be!

May her favour still pursue thee,
 Who propos'd thee for my theme;
 Till superior charms subdue thee,
 And inspire a nobler flame.

In each other blest'd and blessing,
 Years of pleasure let them live;

Each all active worth possessing,
Earth admires or heav'n can give,

TO A SUCCESSFUL RIVAL,

WHO SAID IRONICALLY, HE PITIED THE AUTHOR.

An Ode.

Thou pity! fond unthinking boy,
Falsely elate with distant joy,
Did e'er thy heart the kind emotion know,
Th' endearing pangs of sympathetic woe!

Yes; as on Nile's prolific shore,
The monsters, cloy'd with recent gore,
Sad e'er the reeking carcase howling lie,
Such tears, sincere as thine, o'erflow the mur-
d'rer's eye.

O lost to virtue! lost to shame!
Beneath fair friendship's holy name,
Impious to tempt, and subtle to betray,
While heav'n and earth the daring crime survey.

What devil arm'd thy front with steel,
To feign a grief thou ne'er couldst feel;
Without a blush, the faithless sigh to heave,
And mourn the mortal stab thy own curs'd dagger gave?

But if to heav'n's impartial throne,
The piercing sigh and bitter groan,
For just redress, on angel wings arise,
Then dread the blasting vengeance of the skies.

Ah, where will rage my soul impel?
How high the tide of fury swell?
Fool! thus to curse the man whose ev'ry smart
Must pierce thy inmost soul, must wound Clarin-da's heart.

CATO UTICENSIS TO HIS WIFE AT ROME.

IN distant regions, freedom's last retreat,
Where Rome and she their final crisis wait,
Cato reflects how much he once was blest,
And greets with health the fav'rite of his breast.

Oh! when my soul with retrospective eyes
Beholds each scene of past enjoyment rise,
Ere vice and Heav'n's irrevocable doom
Shook the firm basis of imperial Rome,
What horrors must this patriot heart congeal!
What must a father and an husband feel!
Ye moments, destin'd to eternal flight,
Who shone on each domestic blessing bright,
Who saw me with earth's legislators join'd,
Balance the sacred rights of human kind,
No more my soul your bless'd return must know,
Consign'd to fetters, insanity, and woe;
Expell'd from Rome, and all that's dear, we fly
Through fruitless deserts, and a flaming sky,
Where thunders roar incessant, lightnings glare,
And plagues unnumber'd taint the boundless air;
Where serpents, children of eternal night,
Ensure perdition with their mortal bite;
Where burning sands to heav'n in surges roll,
And scorching heats evaporate the soul.

Yet pleas'd these harsh extremes of fate we bear;
For liberty, heav'n's noblest gift, is here.
Unaw'd by pow'r, from venal shackles free,
Our hands accomplish what our hearts decree.
Yet here, where anguish, want, and horror reign,
The heav'nly power explores a feat in vain.
Ambitious blood-hounds hold her close in view,
Faithful to scent, and active to pursue.
See o'er the spacious globe their course they bend,
See conquest and success their steps attend.
Oceans in vain to stop their passage flow,
And mountains rise in everlasting snow.
Obsequious hillows own tyrannic sway,
And storms have learn'd to flatter and obey.
Eternal Pow'rs! whose will is nature's guide,
Who o'er high heav'n and earth and hell preside,
Must then that plan of liberty expire,
Which patriot bosoms more than life desire?
Is public happiness for ever fled,
For which the sage explor'd and hero bled?
Shall Pompey's blood the coast of Egypt stain?
Shall civil slaughter load Pharfalia's plain?
With reeking gore shall plunder'd temples flow?
Is Jove or Cæsar god of all below?
Be curs'd the time when pleasure and her train,
O'er Rome extended first their fatal reign;
For O! 'twas then, in that detested hour,
That first the lust of treasure and of power
From public welfare could our views divert,
And quench each virtue in the human heart.

THE CHRONICLE OF A HEART,

IN IMITATION OF COWLEY.

How often my heart has by love been o'erthrown,
What grand revolutions its empire has known,
You ask me, dear friend, then attend the sad strain,
Since you bid me renew such ineffable pain.
Derry down, down, hey derry down.

For who that has got e'er an eye in his pate,
So dismal a tale without tears can relate;
Or who such dire annals recal to his mind,
Without bursting in sighs both before and behind?

This kingdom, as authors impartial have told,
At first was elective, but afterwards fold;
For experience will show whoe'er pleases to try,
That kingdoms are venal when subjects can buy.

Lovely Peggy, the first in succession and name,
Was early invested with honour supreme;
But a bold son of Mars, who grew fond of her form, ^{(stom.}
Swore himself into grace, and surpris'd her by

Maria succeeded in honour and place,
By laughing and squeezing, and fong and grimace,
But her favours, alas, like her carriage was free,
Bestow'd on the whole male creation but me.

Next Marg'ret the second attempted the chase;
Though the small-pox and age had enamell'd her face,

She sustain'd her pretence sans merite et sans loix,
And carried her point by a Je ne sais quoi.

The heart which so tamely acknowledg'd her sway,
Still suffer'd in silence, and kept her at bay,

Till old time had at last so much mellow'd her charms,
That she dropt with a breeze in a liv'ryman's arms.

The next easy conquest, Belinda, was thine,
Obtain'd by the musical tinkle of coin:
But she, more enamour'd of sport than of prey,
Had a fish in her hook which she wanted to play.

High hopes were her baits; but if truth were confess'd,

A good still in prospect is not good possess'd;
For the fool found too late he had taken a tartar,
Retreated with wounds, and begg'd stoutly for quarter.

Urania came next, and with subtle address,
Discover'd no open attempts to possess:
But when fairly admitted, of conquest secure,
She acknowledg'd no law but her will and her pow'r.

For seven tedious years, to get rid of her chain,
All force prov'd abortive, all stratagem vain,
Till a youth with much fatness and gravity blest,
Her person detain'd by a lawful arrest.

To a reign so despotic, though guiltless of blood,
No wonder a long interregnum ensu'd; [plain,
For an ass, though the patientest brute of the Once jaded and gall'd, will beware of the rein.

Now the kingdom stands doubtful itself to surrender.

To Chloe the sprightly, or Celia the slender:
But if once it were out of this pitiful case,
No law but the fatigue henceforth shall take place*.

SONG,

INSCRIBED TO A FRIEND.

In imitation of Shenstone.

CEASE, cease, my dear friend, to explore,
From whence, and how piercing my smart:
Let the charms of the nymph I adore,
Excuse, and interpret my heart:
Then how much I admire, you shall prove,
When like me you are taught to admire;
And imagine how boundless my love,
When you number the charms that inspire.

Thou sunshine more dear to my sight,
To my life more essential than air,
To my soul she is perfect delight,
To my sense all that's pleasing and fair.
The swains who her beauty behold,
With transport applaud ev'ry charm,
And swear that the breast must be cold,
Which a beam so intense cannot warm.

Ah! say, will she slightly forego
A conquest, though humble, yet sure?
Will she leave a poor shepherd to woe,
Who for her ev'ry bliss would procure?
Alas! too presaging my fears,
Too jealous my soul of its bliss;
Methinks she already appears,
To foresee, and elude my address.

* Most of the characters here described are real,
but the passions fictitious.

Does my boldness offend my dear maid?
Is my fondness loquacious and free?
Are my visits too frequently paid;
Or my converse unworthy of thee?
Yet when grief was too big for my breast,
And labour'd in sighs to complain,
Its struggles I oft have suppress'd,
And silence impos'd on my pain.

And oft, while, by tenderness caught,
To my charmer's retirement I flew,
I reproach'd the fond absence of thought,
And in blushing confusion withdrew.
My speech, though too little refin'd,
Though simple and awkward my mien;
Yet still, should thou deign to be kind,
What a wonderful change might be seen.

Ah, Strephon! how vain thy desire,
Thy numbers and music how vain,
While merit and fortune conspire
The smiles of the nymph to obtain?
Yet cease to upbraid the soft choice,
Though it ne'er should determine for thee,
If thy heart in her joy may rejoice,
Unhappy thou never canst be.

ABSENCE,

A SONG,

In the Manner of Shenstone.

YE rivers so limpid and clear,
Who reflect as in cadence you flow,
All the beauties that vary the year,
All the flow'rs on your margins that grow!
How blest on your banks could I dwell,
Were Melissa the pleasure to share,
And teach your sweet echoes to tell
With what fondness I doat on the fair!
Ye harvests that wave on the breeze
As far as the view can extend!
Ye mountains, umbrageous with trees,
Whose tops so majestic ascend!
Your landscape what joy to survey,
Were Melissa with me to admire!
Then the harvest would glitter, how gay,
How majestic the mountains aspire!
In pensive regret, whilst I rove,
The fragrance of flow'rs to inhale;
Or watch from the pasture and grove,
Each music that floats on the gale.
Alas! the delusion how vain!
Nor odours nor harmony please
A heart agonizing with pain,
Which tries ev'ry posture for ease.
If anxious to flatter my woes,
Or the languor of absence to cheer,
Her breath I would catch in the rose,
Or her voice in the nightingale hear.
To cheat my despair of its prey,
What object her charms can assume?
How harsh is the nightingale's lay,
How insipid the rose's perfume?
Ye zephyrs that visit my fair,
Ye sun-beams around her that play,
Does her sympathy dwell on my care?
Does she number the hours of my stay?
First perish ambition and wealth,
First perish all else that is dear,

Ere one sigh should escape her by stealth,
 Ere my absence should cost her one tear.
 When, when shall her beauties once more
 This desolate bosom surprize?
 Ye fates! the blest moments restore
 When I bask'd in the beams of her eyes,
 When, with sweet emulation of heart,
 Our kindness we struggled to show;
 But the more that we strove to impart,
 We felt it more ardently glow.

PROLOGUE TO SIR HARRY GAYLOVE*.

MAY one in conscience credit what you say?
 A Scotch production! Heaven and earth! a play!
 What mortal prov'd so hardy to achieve it.
 Repeat your tale to such as will believe it.
 Yet this can, sure, be no insidious art,
 No bite, the modern way of being smart:
 You tell me every actor has his part.

This night, you say, the critics may abuse
 A female comedy, a virgin muse.
 Luxurious scandal! let me join the fray,
 In its damnation hiss my breath away;
 Teach native taste and genius to subside,
 And yield the palm to literary pride.
 With easy, flowing, unaffected wit,
 This muse, it seems, aspires to charm the pit;
 On truth and nature for success depends,
 And takes the friends of virtue for her friends.
 Truth, nature, virtue; insolent pretence!
 Deep shall she feel, and curse her weak defence;
 By sad, yet sure experience taught ere long,
 How soon a catcal dissipates the throng.
 As ghosts recede before the morning ray;
 As falling snows in summer melt away,
 So swift these thin chimeras wing their flight
 From braying dulness, and from hissing spite.
 Yet some, perhaps, by prepossession led,
 In Aristotle and Longinus read,
 May hear her voice with rapture and surprize,
 And swear she is Thalia in disguise.
 Others whom patriot views with zeal inspire,
 May wish with praise to fan her native fire,
 Till wide diffus'd the heav'nly splendor rise,
 Immense as ocean, lofty as the skies.
 But you, for nobler enterprises born,
 Who virtue, taste, and nature hold in scorn,
 With loud incessant hiss exert your rage,
 Till vice and dulness triumph on the stage.

A PANEGYRIC ON GREAT BRITAIN.

SHOULD all the angry fates decree
 To damn their wretched progeny,
 And for that purpose give them birth
 In the most cursed spot of earth,
 Where, in heav'n's eyes, even Sodom might Appear, as virtue, pure and bright;
 They could not choose a place more fit than
 The self-devoted isle of Britain.
 So sung a bard devour'd with spleen;
 But prejudic'd his song I ween,
 And slander all from top to toe
 As by induction we shall show.

* Written by Miss Marshall, author of "Clairinda Catcart," "Alicia Montague," &c. and published at Edinburgh by subscription in 4to, 1772. The Epilogue was given by Dr. Downman.

Come, then, ye souls who love to dwell
 With Meditation in her cell;
 Or you, through virtue's walks who range
 With more delight than through th' Exchange.
 With me this tablature survey,
 This art's and nature's coup d'essai.
 Then say, kind reader, on thy soul,
 From th' Arctic to th' Antarctic pole,
 From climate to climate, from zone to zone,
 Can such a heav'n on earth be shown,
 Where tempests never lift their voices,
 But every thing that lives rejoices?
 Nor can they doubt, that they exist
 Who feel themselves supremely blest:
 So free from error, pain, or vice,
 Is this terrestrial paradise.

Perhaps, indeed, the curious eye
 May vestiges of want desire;
 But men, who would be good and wise
 Too dearly cannot freedom prize;
 And what our share of liberty,
 Unless to starve, we may be free?

Compassion has been much address'd
 For indigence by wealth oppress'd;
 But hungry maws and empty purses
 By souls alone are reckon'd curses:
 Wouldst thou for ever be secure
 From luxury?—continue poor.
 To those whom various wants depress,
 In vain temptation courts access;
 In rags and leanness safe they lie,
 Nor brothels haunt, nor boroughs buy;
 Nor rashly at 'Change Ally play
 Their credit, cash, and souls away.

Detraction basely may complain
 Of vice's triumph, virtue's bane;
 Genius and learning paint disgrac'd,
 And mourn the sad decline of taste:
 But wisdom takes a different tone,
 And asks, "how virtue may be known;"
 Untray'd, alike all men appear
 Endu'd with rectitude sincere;
 And to distinguish what is best
 Probation is the only test.
 Hence, if the charmer we exclude
 To meagre meals and solitude,
 Her importunities refuse,
 And for her sake her friends abuse
 Heaven knows, 'tis with reluctant heart
 We give her 'infamy or smart;
 Conscious her lustre must increase,
 Proportion'd to her deep distress.

Was ever learning, even of yore,
 Rever'd or cultivated more?
 Did the more wonders e'er display,
 Or e'er diffuse a brighter day?
 Each ancient sage a system form'd,
 Which with success his followers storm'd,
 Display'd its folly in one word,
 To rear another as absurd.
 But we, by stronger wings sustain'd,
 Have nature's penetralia gain'd;
 And from our deep research agree
 That all is blank nonentity.

To observation we appeal
 If taste could ever more prevail:
 What two legg'd thing can strike your sight
 But arrogates a critic's right?

How harsh this period runs, he cries,
 With foaming mouth and glaring eyes?
 This epithet is without grace;
 That simile quite out of place;
 These verses walk not, but are driven;
 This quantity is false, by heaven;
 This sentence is involv'd and dark;
 These portraitures no colours mark;
 These sentiments absurd and dull;
 Confound the author's leaden skull.

Hither Aonian maids repair;
 No theme can more deserve your care;
 Intoxicate your vot'ry's brain
 With liberal draughts from Hippocrene;
 Tune every lyre, expand each wing;
 A nobler game you cannot spring;
 Ranack your magazine of rant,
 For British commerce next we chant.

See how she mounts her paper pinions,
 And soars through nature's wide dominions!
 Keen to import from every where
 Whate'er is beauteous, rich, or rare.
 Hark! she commands, and to the skies
 A thousand magic structures rise;
 But if her fiat she reverse,
 At once the mighty domes disperse,
 Their evanescent forms impair,
 And lose themselves in gloomy air:
 So boys, amus'd with empty show,
 Of soap and water bubbles blow;
 At first a while, when upward sent,
 They grace the fluid element;
 But quickly bursting in the wind
 A dirty moisture leave behind.

Metal with heads of kings impress'd
 Much hocus pocus once possess'd;
 Could merit, soul, and conscience buy,
 Could purchase all beneath the sky.
 The potent queen beheld its force
 Establish'd firm as nature's course;
 Nor long indifferent could survey;
 Resolv'd her puissance to essay,
 With sorceries that might puzzle hell,
 To paper she transferr'd the spell.
 Swift as Cumæan Sibyl's lay
 Th' emphatic billets wing'd their way;
 Each man indulg'd the fond opinion,
 That he alone was fortune's minion;
 Till from experience sad and late,
 He felt, and curs'd his alter'd state:
 Thus, if Dan Gay has told us true,
 The wight who kept the ghost in view*,
 Of treasure dream'd, but waking found
 What, smell'd, the nicer sense would wound.

Of credit crack'd and failing trade
 A mighty pother has been made:
 The whining crowd insult their betters,
 And bankrupts call insolvent debtors.
 But say, what mortal could refuse
 His all in such a way to lose?
 In thin attire and simple fare
 You bid adieu to anxious care;
 Wealth, only wealth, in terror pines;
 Broods o'er her coffers and her mines;

* See the visible tale from which this allusion is drawn, in Gay's poems, vol. i. p. 55.

The beggar, from such panic free,
 Is blest in hopeless poverty.

Hail, Anglia! thrice and four times hail!
 Calm be thy seas and fair thy gale,
 That wafts, replete with various store,
 Thy floating domes from shore to shore,
 Till they, for trifles well resign'd*,
 Fraught with the spoils of human kind,
 At length their native coast regain,
 And mock the tumults of the main;
 The main by nature form'd like thee
 To bellow Wilkes and liberty?

But who in numbers most sublime
 Thy glory's arduous height can climb?
 What fire, what energy of speech
 Thy flaming patriot zeal can reach?
 The patriot sons of Greece and Rome
 Shall in oblivion's deepest gloom
 Henceforth retire, with grief and shame,
 Eclips'd by thy superior fame.
 Who can thy glorious Wilkes describe,
 Who never gave nor took a bribe,
 For thee is cruel, false, and lewd,
 And damns his soul for public good!
 Or who thy sapient Junius paint,
 From heav'n to teach our rulers sent!
 Thy Junius, whose prolific pate
 Teems with philosophy of state.

Through all his road the circling sun,
 Though posting since the world begun,
 Could ne'er behold so blest a realm,
 Such skilful pilots at its helm;
 Premiers whose only private good
 Is public interest well pursu'd;
 Courtiers to each parole so just,
 Such objects of implicit trust;
 Voters, whose honour is so nice,
 Not worlds of gems could pay their price;
 And representatives so chosen,
 Heav'n's bliss can ne'er forborn their voice.

Thy gen'rous spirit still disdains
 Illiberal prepossession's chains,
 Uncircumscrib'd by times or places.
 The spacious universe embraces:
 This let thy sister realm declare,
 Inur'd thy love, thy praise, to share;
 With local jealousy untainted,
 How are her wants by thee prevented!
 Her sons, as of one common nation,
 Admitted to participation
 Of all emoluments and honours;
 Yet how ungrateful to their donors!

Let those in equal strains, who can,
 Delineate thy domestic plan:
 What scorn of all dishonest gains,
 Even in thy meanest peasant reigns?
 With what desire, what taste refin'd
 Each yeoman cultivates his mind?
 When to thy hospitable dome,
 As to their known, their native home,
 Thy neighbours and thy friends repair,
 Festivity and mirth to share;
 Reason sedate, experience hoar,
 And peace protect the sacred door;

* The contemptible trinkets, exchanged in trade with barbarous nations, for substantial and valuable commodities, are too well known to be here recapitulated.

While abstinence with mild control
Supplies thy board and fills thy howl.
From aqueous draughts and sober cheer
Eternal smiles thy features wear:
Rich wines and sapid viands feed
The leper and the suicide.
Far distant from thy tranquil shore
Thou hear'st the hydra faction roar,
While firm accord within thy states
Each council forms and regulates:

If, life's dull uniform to shun,
Thy youths a course more vary'd run;
In hopes to thrive by art's alchymic,
Thy brave disorders too we mimic;
With willing heart, though awkward grace,
Thy maxims and thy modes embrace.
We call for bills we cannot pay;
Lose wealth we ne'er possess'd at play;
As peacock's proud, as church-rats poor,
Yet bucks and bloods in miniature:
Thus, in his car, the pageant god *
Along the brazen convex rode,
Cut in mock thunder many a caper,
And brandish'd high the flaming taper;
'Till crush'd by real bolts he fell,
The hiss and ridicule of hell.

Let pedagogues assert, that knowledge
Frequents alone the dusty college,
As if recluse, the heav'nly fair,
In cobwebs, dirt, and putrid air,
Were pleas'd to glean, from musty pages,
The refuse of pedantic ages,
Collecting with incessant pains
The feculence of stupid brains.
In its pretended seminary
We scorn to hunt the noble quarry,
And nature's theatre explore,
The only source of genuine lore.
The dull results of time and thought
May puzzle idiots, as they ought;
From active life experience flows,
And with experience wisdom grows;
Her we pursue, with sails unfurl'd,
Through her academy, the world.

Our laws so strict, so multifarious,
Justice can never be precarious;
Besides, should former statutes fail,
We still enact, and ne'er repeal †.
That these administer'd may be
With most religious equity,
Deceit and rapine to withstand,
The sons of Themis swarm the land.
It has indeed been urg'd by spite,
When two heroic mailiffs fight,
To both the combatants unknown,
A third may come and snatch the bone;

* This mythological catastrophe is elegantly described in Virgil's Æneid, book vi. ver. 585.

† At an early period of the Roman empire, multiplicity of laws was complained of as an intolerable grievance.
The laws of every free state must certainly be the voice of its representatives; but if these are not from time to time abridged, they must swell to an extent so enormous, that the study will become incomprehensible even to lawyers themselves; statutes contradictory to each other may be enacted; and he liesg can set on or never act with security, lest ignorantly they should incur their penalties.

When affluence property confounds,
And men forget its proper bounds,
Redundancies with skill resign'd
Secure the fortunes left behind.

How much her power is here confess'd,
Let modest excellence attest,
When from the nameless crowd selected
She shines admir'd, carefs'd, respect'd;
While fools and knaves, depriv'd of fame,
Though wealth and int'rest urge their claim,
No more for eminence contend,
But to their native rank descend.

Sweet Heav'n! what kind attachments here
Neighbours, relations, friends, endear!
What tender intercourse they hold!
With love that never waxes cold!
So blest, so perfect is their unity,
(Since none from pain can boast immunity)
That if one heart or head but ache,
The rest in sympathy partake;
Nor on his woe themselves obtrude,
But mourn the sad vicissitude;
Or that against such misadventure
Their other friends may caveat enter,
In Christian charity they tell
By what misconduct it befel;
Yet, though by manners interdicted,
They cease to visit th' afflicted,
Still each request they freely grant,
Except the boon their suppliants want;
For such demands should they provide,
Patience in life could ne'er be try'd.

Our maids and matrons, chaste and pure,
Not ev'n the shade of man endure,
But think the highest heav'n's unclean,
If stain'd with creature's masculine:
Their grossest thoughts, were they express'd all,
Might well become a dying vestal.
Their very names a charm might be
To cure the rage of jealousy.
Behold with wonder and surprise,
How quick through virtue's scale they rise,
Nor with a slow progressive motion,
By all the ardour of devotion!

Yet, ostentation to avoid,
What blest expedients are employ'd!
No worth in native guise display'd,
But exercis'd in masquerade;
Not the monastic veil so pious,
Through which ev'n envy cannot spy us;
And whilst at large our virtues play,
Behind the shade our persons stay.

Say conscience! if not quite extinct,
While reason, sense, and int'rest wink'd;
Say, conscience! for thou truly know'st,
How much religion we can boast:
Enough to paint the Deist's jeers;
Enough to set us by the ears;
Enough a decent cloak to fashion
For fraud or feuds to put fresh on;
Enough to manage guileless hearts
By priestcraft's prostituted arts;
Enough the mobile to enrage
Against the sin of patronage;
Enough for fools or knaves to swear by,
And give its sanction to a mere lie.
To crowd a potentate's levee
With endless importunity,

Is deem'd impertinent and rude :
 Why then on Heav'n's repose intrude ?
 For this we seldom go to prayers,
 But leave to gods their own affairs ;
 At church improvement ne'er pursue ;
 The pulpit yields us nothing new ;
 And institutions, well we know,
 By frequent use insipid grow.
 To us the tavern or the stews
 Afford more edifying views ;
 For there, without, and eke within,
 Appears the turpitude of sin.
 Thus, lavish in my country's praise,
 The pleasing task itself repays.
 Whate'er for preference appeals,
Natale Solum still prevails ;
 Still to my heart my country whispers,
 (Not like our modern female lispers,
 But with a voice more sweet than song)
 " O ! love me much, and love me long ;"
 Deep mingling with the purple tide,
 Through all my veins her accents glide.
 For this polarity of mind,
 Would she be grateful, just, or kind,
 From Church or State no perquisite
 I ask my wishes to complete.
 Let pensions, posts, douceurs accrue
 To those whose service makes them due :
 I only from her bounty crave
 A decent fate, and peaceful grave.

THE GRAHAM :

AN HEROIC BALLAD,

In Four Cantos.

CANTO I.

In former days, when Scotia hurl'd
 Against her sister realm the spear,
 When on her frontiers war unfurl'd
 His bloody flag from year to year ;
 When wonder fill'd th' attentive world
 Her glorious conflicts charm'd to hear,
 By native virtue sav'd from thrall,
 Whilst wealth and power conspir'd her fall,

Of noble soul and lineage high,
 Amongst her chiefs was Graham rever'd :
 But wan his cheek, and dim his eye ;
 Keen smart he prov'd, yet keener fear'd :
 No Howard echoed sigh for sigh,
 No plighted maid his bosom cheer'd :
 His love, his confidence abus'd
 He deem'd, and thus his soul effus'd.

" Rise, winds of heav'n, to tempest rise ;
 Flames flash, and cataracts descend !—
 No storms convulsing earth and skies,
 Like those which now my bosom rend :
 Should chaos order's reign surprize,
 And heaven, and earth, and ocean blend,
 No anarchy could vex the void,
 Like sacred peace of mind destroy'd.

Sweet peace of mind ! seraphic guest !
 How long thy absence shall I mourn ?
 From yon bright mansions of the blest
 With all thy placid train return :

For hell is center'd in my breast,
 There still its hottest fervours burn.
 No more, ye tortur'd ghosts, repine,
 Since less acute your pains than mine.

Of all the ills that rage so rife,
 (And ha ! from ills what state is free ?)
 Of all the plagues that prey on life,
 God's heaviest curse is jealousy ;
 Of love and hate eternal strife :
 When shall it cease to torture me ?
 Oh ! when shall streams of blood atone
 For Scotia's wrongs and for my own ?

Just God ! that he, to whom my heart,
 Accessible as light and air,
 Was fond its wishes to impart,
 With whom its inmost thoughts to share,
 These confines falsely should desert,
 Though precient of his friend's despair ;
 Unseen desert, and basely steal
 What, lost to madnels I must feel !"

Thus Graham, inexorably bent
 His rival or himself to slay,
 Then shap'd his course with fell intent
 To where Northumbria's warriors lay ;
 Nor night his journey could prevent,
 Nor danger intercept his way ;
 He reck'd not how he sped, nor where :
 They dread no ruin who despair.

Singly (for such was his command)
 He meant to meet his gallant foe ;
 But chosen men, a worthy band,
 Who vow'd to share his weal or woe,
 When he his hardy purpose plann'd
 Th' important secret chanc'd to know ;
 Remotely these his steps pursue,
 Unseen, yet keep him still in view.

Determin'd on revenge or death,
 And guided by a dubious ray,
 Through many a rough and winding path
 Th' intrepid hero held his way ;
 Upbraiding much his easy faith,
 Which arts so flimsy could betray ;
 At length he reach'd the wide campaign
 Where fix'd Northumbria's tents remain.

And now the genial hours prepare
 To yoke Aurora's rosy team ;
 Her blushes ting'd through humid air
 The rising hill and crystal stream ;
 While with increasing light more fair,
 More sweet the opening prospect seem :
 But souls involv'd in sorrow's gloom
 No landscapes charm, no rays illumine.

When now the hostile camp he spy'd,
 In silence solemn and profound ;
 " Here, here the miscreant rests (he cry'd)
 Who gave my peace its mortal wound ;
 A while the wretch who heav'n defy'd,
 May with success in guilt be crown'd ;
 Yet crimes like these though long secure,
 At last for vengeance prove mature."

No emblematic signs pourtray'd
 Within its orb his buckler bore ;

Nor then the variegated plaid
Around his manly chest he wore ;
His name, his form, no mark betray'd,
Which jealous caution might explore:
Thus through the strong and watchful guard
He pass'd unquestion'd, undebarr'd.

" By all the glories of my race
'Tis Graham himself! (young Howard said) ;
He comes to brave me face to face,
He comes to claim the rescu'd maid ;
So may my soul in heaven find grace
When most she needs her powerful aid,
As I his challenge shall receive,
Since one or both must feast the grave.

And thou by early fate remov'd
From all that renders being dear,
Oh still remember'd, still belov'd,
My vow, fraternal spirit, hear !
That vengeance, which so tardy prov'd,
Scotia at last shall learn to fear,
Shall expiate from unnumber'd veins
A brother's blood, a captive's chains."

He snatch'd his sword, he pois'd his shield,
He issu'd to confront the foe,
As bickering flames involve a field
Where arid heath and stubble grow ;
His breast, with native courage steel'd,
On fear could ne'er one thought bestow :
Yet e'er his steps could far proceed,
The Scot advanc'd and check'd his speed.

" Blush, traitor, blush (enrag'd he said),
If still susceptible of shame,
If benefits with wrongs repaid
From heav'n and earth just vengeance claim :
But fools and cowards may upbraid,
In speeches fierce, in action tame ;
The righteous Pow'r that rules on high
And arms alone our cause can try."

He ceas'd ; and Howard thus reply'd :
" Impetuous boy, thy rage restrain !
Ere now thy force I had defy'd,
But other talks my arm detain :
For know, to mortify thy pride,
Thou' ow'st thy life to my disdain ;
Thy country first I meant to quell,
Then destin'd thee for death and hell.

How well it suits the heart of Graham
To doubt his friend, though known sincere !
That heart which base designs inflame,
Such base designs may justly fear :
From all the various mouths of fame
Thy vile suspicions reach my ear.
Now if unscourg'd thy crime remains.
No more eternal justice reigns.

Traitor, my soul retorts with scorn
On thy opprobrious clans and thee.
The nymph thou seek'st I found forlorn,
From base attempts I set her free ;
When hence by brutal ruffians borne,
For aid she call'd on Heav'n and me.
Where then was that vindictive arm
Portending now such mortal harm ?

In vain that rage which bends thy brow,
Thy boasts, thy menaces are vain ;
By Heav'n's omnipotence I vow,
Nor perjury my soul shall stain ;
Not all thy country's force, nor thou ;
The beauteous capture shall regain :
Mine now she is, and mine shall be,
Indignant Scot, in spite of thee.

But whilst in Heav'n's unerring scale
Our quivering destinies appear,
And which shall fall, and which prevail,
By no decision yet seems clear ;
I could unfold a wond'rous tale,
Whose lightest word demands thy ear :—
But haste we hence where friends nor foes
Can in our quarrel interpose."

" Damn'd subterfuge to make me swerve !
(Thus Graham resum'd with fervid ire) :
These arts for weaker dupes reserve,
They raise my indignation higher :
When wretches, who in dungeons starve,
Nor light, nor air, nor food desire,
Then may my heart its wrath suspend
Till thy insidious tale shall end."

" Me brandst thou with evasive fright,
(Cry'd Howard with pretended steel) ;
Who for thy fury or thy might
Supreme contempt alone can feel !
Which heart shall now decline the fight,
Which beats with fears it would conceal,
Th' impending instant shall display ;
Hark ! hov'ring ravens croak for prey."

Now front to front the champions stood,
And hew'd and lash'd, and thunder'd blows ;
Whilst through th' adjacent hills and wood,
The propagated clangour rose ;
Anna, with eyes in tears bedew'd,
Had heard them talk, and seen them close ;
With pallid cheek, and trembling frame,
Between the combatants she came.

" For Heav'n's sweet sake, ere you engage,
Attend to love's, to friendship's call !
If blood alone can quench your rage,
Mine, mine I offer, take it all.
Could I have form'd the sad preface,
That one of two so dear should fall,
Ere I this curst hour survey'd,
To fate that tribute I had paid.

Oh Graham ! in whom for ever dwells
Concenter'd all my soul's delight,
What frenzy now thy mind impels
To urge this inauspicious fight ?
That fury which thy bosom swells,
May in his blood its conquest write ;
But say, is this his noblest meed
Who rescued me, by Graham to bleed ?

While full of thee I lonely stray'd,
With tears and anxious vigils spent,
To breathe in some sequester'd shade
The grief with which my heart was rent,
Villians, who lay in ambushade,
And watch'd and wish'd for this event,

My person seiz'd, and bore away,
To lawless force a feeble prey.

In vain my eyes with sorrow stream'd,
In vain my threats, in vain my pray'r,
In vain to heav'n and earth I scream'd,
And beat my breast, and tore my hair;
But when each hope extinct I deem'd,
Extinct in ruin and despair,
This Howard like an angel came,
And sav'd at once my life and fame.

Nor thou, as heav'n supremely good,
Refuse my plaints thy gentle ear;
Should Graham beneath thy hand subdu'd
Expire by destiny severe,
Say, can that hand in blood embru'd,
In Graham's warm blood, to me be dear?
Or can the life of him I love
To me a grateful offering prove?

Now hear my voice, ye chieftans, hear,
Eternal fate is in the sound;
Let each these hated broils forbear,
In leagues of holy friendship bound:
Should either lift the hostile spear,
And stretch his rival on the ground,
First heav'n and hell shall be ally'd
Ere I became the victor's bride."

CANTO II.

SHE ended: and her varying charms
A thousand agitations show;
When all at once they heard alarms
As from a fierce advancing foe:
To arms! the camp resounds, to arms!
Wide and more wide the tumults grow;
From heart to heart contagion flies,
And all in wild disorder rise.

What felt the valiant heart of Graham
When he descri'd the mad'ning throng?
Conflicting passions shook his frame;
He knew th' opponent army strong.
Rapid as heaven's explosive flame,
To stop his friends, he stepp'd along;
Whilst rushing on, with rapid view,
He recogniz'd his faithful few.

"What mean my foldiers? (loud he cry'd)
Behold your leader safe restor'd.
Would heav'n! in anguish I had died,
Ere conscious of this deed abhorr'd!
Thus unprovok'd, unsanctify'd,
What right had you to draw the sword?
Rash men! was expiation due
For private wrongs to me or you?"

Thus he rebuk'd though in despair
Their gallant ardour to refrain;
Loft in th' expanse of turbid air
Expostulation prov'd in vain;
Discord and havoc every where
In luxury of triumph reign;
The groan of death, th' exulting roar,
The suppliant shrieks, heav'n's concave tore.

A storm of lances now they threw,
Whilst on each point destruction flies;

And starting from th' elastic yew
A cloud of shafts obscure the skies.—
"Ye hosts of heav'n, what blasts my view?
(With voice exerted, Howard cries):
What laurels can these dastards gain,
When handfuls fall by myriads slain?"

Hence, execrable cowards, hence!
Shrink to your holes, and tremble there!
Whose blood is spilt without expence,
Whom mercy hardly deigns to spare,
This band (so mighty, so immense)!
To hungry dogs and fowls of air,
My troop alone shall quickly throw:
Hear Percy's voice in mine, and go."

This Elliot heard, for war renown'd,
In danger's front severely try'd:
He grasp'd his sword, he groan'd profound,
Then with sarcastic smile reply'd:
"Yes, if your words like darts could wound,
If foes were vanquish'd when descri'd,
Trophies from hence you might extort,
Like those obtain'd at Agincourt.

Such trophies let your annals boast,
Their truth I mean not to refute;
Yet were those precious archives lost,
Our juniors might the facts dispute,
Unless your formidable host
More recent wonders execute:
Yet Edward play'd a safer game;
And filch'd a bloodless diadem."

He spake: and rear'd his shining blade,
With mortal prowess to descend;
Nor vainly had his might essay'd,
In death the hero to extend;
But by the shiv'ring steel betray'd,
His stroke abortive mis'd its end;
Yet stunn'd and giddy Howard reel'd,
And thund'ring press'd the sanguine field.

Him, staggering, Elliot thus address'd:
"If yet unhurt thy life remains,
If yet of wonted strength possess'd,
Nor wound thy vital current drains,
(Advantage o'er a foe depress'd,
Though in her power, my soul disdains)
Arise, thy scatter'd arms resume,
Nor prostrate share a vulgar doom."

He said; and with extended hand,
At once from earth the chieftan rears,
Though circled by a furious band
Of foes, with quivers arm'd and spears,
Then fear first Howard's soul unmann'd,
For Elliot's life; nor vain his fears;
An arrow from an unknown bow,
Struck deep, and laid the hero low.

Long torpid o'er the bleeding corse,
Howard in silent horror hung;
Depriv'd of sense, depriv'd of force,
And all his soul with anguish wrung:
Not with more exquisite remorse
Did guilt e'er feel her bosom stung,
Than Howard felt intense regret,
Though guiltless of the warrior's fate,

As fires in some volcano pent,
That on its melting inwards prey,
With struggling rage explore a vent,
And burst resistless into day;
So now, impatient of restraint,
In tears his anguish found its way:
By grief his soul to madness driv'n,
Thus wild expostulates with heav'n:

"Ye powers that o'er this orb preside!
Must worth thus perish premature?
Should chance the helm of nature guide,
What greater ills could man endure?
His hoary fire, his blooming bride,
His orphan babes, in hope secure,
Shall view him cold and lifeless earth,
Then curse the period of their birth.

Of a fever the Scots have told,
Before whose heav'n-directed eyes
Remote events of things, enroll'd
By destiny, successive rise;
Why could not he this stroke behold,
Which now to heav'n for pity cries?
But victims to the future blind,
We must pursue the course assign'd.

Detested instrument of ill,
And whilst his vital warmth remains,
From nature tears enough distil,
Condemn'd inherent woes to mourn.
O thou! whose dear remains must fill,
Instead of mine, th' untimely urn,
Would I had felt the sad decree,
And yielded up my soul for thee!

Yet bear, my soldiers, bear him hence,
And whilst his vital warmth remains,
Aid nature, struggling in suspense,
And stop th' effusion of his veins;
Cherish returning life and sense;
For if the chief his strength regains,
Honour and wealth on him shall wait,
Whose hand retards th' approach of fate."

As when two adverse blasts descend
To strive for empire o'er the main,
This way, and that, the surge they bend,
While both their native force retain;
Thus arms to arms oppos'd contend
For conquest on th' empurpled plain;
Yet unfatigu'd with wounds and toil,
Nor these advance, nor those recoil.

Still struggling with superior pow'rs,
The hardy Scots maintain their ground,
Though fate its pregnant quiver show'rs,
And death in carnage wantons round.—
While on his forehead vengeance lows,
Forth Percy issues with a bound;
His wrathful eyes perdition dart,
And thus he pours his pregnant heart:

"God's splendour! shall a lawless crew
Of vagrant thieves your might restrain?
Shall hands so feeble, troops so few,
Repel this vast, this martial train?
Or do my senses tell me true,
Or have enchantments turn'd my brain?
Better in death my eyes were seal'd,
Than see my country's spirit yield.

But you, oh England's spurious race!
In other feats distinguish'd shine:
The trembling arm and lily face
For other fights their stars design.
Vile offspring! destin'd to disgrace
Your native soil, your generous line:
To heav'n and earth, say, shall I tell,
In what achievements you excel?

To gorge the feast, to drain the bowl,
To loiter near the blazing fire;
To waste the night without controul,
Indulging gross or lewd desire:
For these, though doom'd in flames to howl,
To joys no nobler you aspire;
These are your sov'reign bliss alone,
The heav'n you seek, the god you own.

But if unchastis'd hence you fly,
Though dogg'd with penitence and shame,
The death of cowards let me die,
And slander blast my spotless fame.
Oh curse, that form should men belie,
In visage, not in heart the same!
Shall honour, life, and soul at stake,
No spark of English valour wake?"

With spirit from their chief inhal'd
Whilst all their might his troop exert,
A piercing shriek their ears assail'd,
Sad emphasis of female smart.
At this the soul of Howard fail'd;
Cold horror thrill'd his boding heart,
When lo! his swimming eyes explore
Their nearest object stain'd with gore:

Her rescue nobly Graham essay'd,
And interpos'd a massy shield:
But impotent his single aid,
His hands employ'd, no sword could wield;
Nor could his utmost force pervade,
Th' embattel'd ranks that throng'd the field:
This, torn with anguish, Howard saw,
Nor could remain, nor durst withdraw.

"Oh list, for mercy's sake! (he cry'd);
Mercy, chief glory of the brave!
Suspend your strife by him who died,
From endless death your souls to save!
Else beauty's blossom, virtue's pride,
Scarce blown, must wither in the grave.
Oh let me to her aid be gone,
Prevent her fate, or seek my own!"

Then, by the sacred name abjur'd,
Suspense prevail'd in ev'ry mind;
Whilst Graham, no more by troops immur'd,
A passage free rejoic'd to find:
His lovely charge, from harm secur'd,
He in a neighbouring tent resign'd:
Thence through the habitations round,
Relief he sought, relief he found.

Of matrons now, a weeping train,
Attended round the fair ditreit:
With skilful hand, and care humane,
The blood they stop, the wound they dress,
The more they view'd, the less their pain,
For slightly was the hurt impiest,
And, should her mind serene endure,
Susceptible of speedy cure.

By undefigning fury thrown,
The weapon, ere it reach'd the fair,
Had through a spacious distance flown,
And idly spent its force in air.
When to the rivals this was known,
What joy they felt, from what despair!
So joy the guilty when from heaven
They hear pronounc'd their sins forgiv'n.

CANTO III.

AND now in milder tasks engag'd.
The wants of nature to repair;
No longer war the armies wag'd,
Their dead and wounded claim'd their care;
In truce their mutual honour pledg'd,
Both pleas'd, the common safety share;
While Graham and Howard in one tent,
The tranquil hour in parley spent.

Thus Graham began: "Let local hate
And jealous rage, be cancell'd here;
And now that mystery of fate,
Whose lightest word demands my ear,
In this calm interval, relate
With temper candid and sincere;
Each dark event minutely show,
And how I stand concern'd, to know."

To whom his rival: "From my tongue
Expect the story but in part:
Of Caledonian lineage sprung,
Thou deem'st the charmer of thy heart;
There thou beheld'st her first when young,
There first thou felt'st the pleasing smart,
Which since o'er all thy bosom reigns,
And constitutes its joys or pains.

But erst, when urg'd by youthful heat
To satisfy a brother's shade,
I plung'd myself beyond retreat,
Where all its horrors war display'd.
And by this conduct indiscreet,
To Scotland pris'ner was convey'd:
A fire with years and honours grac'd,
To me her various fortunes trac'd.

For as by chance our way she cross'd,
"Thou view, (said he) that lovely maid,
"Heaven's darling image, nature's boast,
"Virtue by beauty's hand array'd;
"Yet in the storms of fortune tost,
"When heaven's blest beam the scarce survey'd;
"Her from the womb no fire embrac'd,
"No gladness hail'd, no splendour grac'd.

"With England's troops, in hostile guise,
"A godlike youth adorn'd the field,
"Who, till he gain'd some high emprise,
"His name and pedigree conceal'd:
"But partial fortune oft denies
"The meed which bright desert should yield;
"Rushing unguarded on the fray,
"Too soon depress'd by wounds he lay.

"Him Elliot, hospitable knight,
"Convuls'd with pain, and drench'd in gore,
"Beheld, and through the shock of fight,
"Surviving to his mansion bore:

"His daughter, melting at the sight,
"The blooming hero to restore,
"Apply'd each salutary art,
"And cur'd his wound, but pierc'd his heart.

"For in his chamber, while confin'd,
"And tended by the pitying fair,
"With anguish more intense he pin'd,
"Than that extinguish'd by her care.
"He breath'd the torment of his mind,
"Nor she reluctant heard his pray'r:
"A priest (unknown to Elliot) came,
"And with heaven's sanction crown'd their flame.

"By honour call'd, impell'd by hope,
"Once more in arms the hero rose,
"Renown's eternal worth to crop,
"Which high on danger's summit grows:
"But doom'd with mightier force to cope,
"And circled by a world of foes;
"My life, my love, my hopes, farewell!"
"He said; and crush'd by numbers, fell.

"The father every worth confest,
"Which the young bridegroom's soul adorn'd;
"Yet, for his country preposse's'd,
"All overtures from England scorn'd;
"Nor ceas'd the stranger to detest,
"Who from his arms his child suborn'd,
"Nor view'd with nature's fond regard,
"Her soul depress'd, her form impair'd;

"Her period of gestation o'er,
"And nature struggling for relief,
"Her orphan babe the mother bore,
"Sad heir of indigence and grief!
"Then, banish'd from her father's door,
"By mandates from the angry chief,
"Within a convent's walls confin'd,
"Her suff'ring spirit she resign'd.

"Yet instinct, pow'ful in his breast,
"(Though with determin'd hate inflam'd)
"The smiling infant he care's'd,
"And for his once-lov'd Anna nam'd:
"His hand her slightest wants redress'd,
"His heart her plan of culture fram'd;
"Yet would not own the charming maid,
"Till nature's debt his daughter paid.

"Then 'gan his stubborn soul to melt;
"Emotions till that hour unknown,
"Through all his alter'd mind he felt,
"Which injur'd nature might atone;
"Still in his breast the parent dwelt,
"Now reign'd triumphant and alone;
"Transferr'd from fortune's barren waste,
"His eyes she charm'd, his mansion grac'd."

"Thus far the chief, nor more he knew;
For hid in night's impervious veil,
The youth's descent eludes our view,
Nor can we gain this sad detail,
Where first that vernal blossom grew,
Whose ruin hostile eyes bewail:
His birth from England all attest,
Deep secrecy involves the rest."

Whilst thus in Scotland I remain'd
A wretched captive on parole,

Her charms my raptur'd eyes detain'd,
Her virtues conquer'd all my soul:
Oh! what is liberty regain'd,
When endless chains the mind controul?
Fulfil, just Heav'n, thy fix'd decree,
And strike me dead, or set me free?

By public sanction thence releas'd,
As to our camp I bent my way,
With fond anticipation pleas'd;
My late dishonour to repay;
Each sense the voice of anguish seiz'd,
Anguish that could not brook delay;
I saw my Anna's struggling charms
Encircled in a ruffian's arms.

O'Braian of Hebernian race,
A robber fam'd and fear'd around,
To gain the prize had watch'd the place,
And now presum'd his wishes crown'd:
Thither, enrag'd, I urg'd my pace,
And made the felon bite the ground;
His timid train his fall survey'd,
Nor to revenge their leader staid.

With indignation and despair,
All pale and faint my charmer lay;
I rais'd her with fraternal care,
And gently sooth'd her deep dismay;
I begg'd, nor did she slight my pray'r;
But, sweet companion of my way,
By my protecting arm sustain'd,
At length secure the camp she gain'd.

Nor, though the maid for thee declares,
Let passion joys in prospect feign;
Divided hearts, divided cares,
Domestic bliss can ne'er maintain:
An English heart thy Anna shares;
Still in her breast shall England reign:
Hence woes entail'd on all thy line,
Shall prove a curse to thee and thine.

But now in heav'n's high vault no star
To gild the dark horizon glows;
No sound ambiguous, heard from far,
Through air's thin texture trembling flows:
Nature fatigu'd with toils and war,
Courts the dear blessing of repose:
Soon shall the light's officious glare
Restore the world to grief and care."

While thus their languid pow'rs to cheer,
Grateful recess the warriors sought,
Thither extended on a bier,
An agonizing chief was brought:
But as he now advanc'd more near,
Elliot, whom dead before they thought,
Elliot himself they recognize,
And melt in tears, and burst in sighs.

" You see me still, though still alive;
(In groans th' expiring hero said);
From duty, strength my pow'rs derive,
To dear departed worth unpaid;
This done, with fate no more I strive,
But sink beneath its peaceful shade;
Enough of life kind Heav'n bestows,
When fame and virtue grace its close.

VOL. XI.

Thy audience, Howard, let me claim;
To thee my message is address;
For when my sister's languid frame
The bed of death reclining prest,
Her long lamented husband's name
To me her dying lips confess;
Thy ill-starr'd brother (rashly brave)!
To Anna's charms existence gave.

How light these last convulsions seem;
That show my mortal crisis near!
But nature's voice in this extreme,
Her pleading voice, what heart can bear!
This, this is agony supreme:
Ten thousand deaths are less severe:
Great God! whose smile is more than life,
Console my tender babes and wife.

How long shalt thou, my country! smart,
For whom my blood spontaneous flows!
Thrice happy could my pangs impart
A lasting cure for all thy woes;
These plagues, benignant pow'r, avert,
And grant sincere, though late repose,
Where wrath and devastation sway,
Let arts of peace their charms display!

For me, my friends, your sorrows spare;
I go in regions more sublime,
A nobler destiny to share,
Above the sphere of chance and time.
Howard, be Anna's bloom thy care
In this inhospitable clime."
His parting soul, while this he said,
Angels to bliss in heav'n convey'd.

CANTO IV.

Now with immortal splendour gay,
The sun his wonted course resumes,
To pour th' exhaustless flood of day,
Which heaven's majestic arch illumines:
From ev'ry bush the vernal lay,
From ev'ry opening flow'r perfumes
Impregnate wide the sportive gale,
And joy exults in hill and dale.

Not so the hosts on yonder plain;
Their hearts of comfort felt no ray,
For conquest each had toil'd in vain;
Nor hop'd the dear decisive day:
Sadden'd with labour, want, and pain,
Th' interminable prospect lay;
But chief in ev'ry English soul
Sedition rag'd without controul.

Thus to his mate each soldier cries:
" What curse this fruitless war extends!
At home each field uncultur'd lies,
On which our daily bread depends:
Alike the Scot his wants supplies,
Where'er his devious course he bends,"
Mov'd by such views their heralds came,
A new cessation to proclaim.

" Ye quiver'd Scots, our words attend;
Pacific overtures we bring:
Shall groans and carnage never end?
Shall blood from rills perennial spring?"

4 H

Let either nation envoys fend,
For peace to importune its king."
The hofts for peace exclaim around:
Peace heav'n, and earth, and fea refound.

In holy fervour now entranc'd,
From Scotia's bands a rev'rend sage,
Half way between the troops advanc'd,
In all the dignity of age:
With ardent eyes, on both he glanc'd,
That lighten'd with prophetic rage,
Then on a point of empty space,
Their beams directing stopp'd his pace.

"The god! the flaming god! (he cry'd)
I feel him all my pow'rs controul.
Oh! gently on my spirit glide,
Nor into nothing flash my soul!
O'er heav'n and earth one boundless tide
Of glory sweeps from pole to pole:
Inferutable to groffer eyes.
The book of fate expanded lies.

Two chiefs I fee of noble name,
Whose hearts in friendship once were join'd,
Competitors for love and fame,
Now glow with passions more unkind;
Whilst told fufpicion, mutual blame,
Embitter each diffever'd mind:
Such ills on human fpirits prey,
By cruel error led aftray.

To truth eternal and fevere,
Howard, thy docile ear incline!
Nature's great interdict revere;
For nature's mandate fpeaks in mine:
By kindred blood ally'd fo near,
To kindred love thy with confine;
Else fhall thy days in anguish flow,
And God and man pronounce thee foe.

See, Graham, of Anna's charms poffefft,
My foul's enlighten'd view furveys:
Each night fhall give thee facred reft,
Each day to light thy joys fhall blaze:
With all a father's tranfports bleff,
I fee thy offspring fix thy gaze;
And with ineffable delight,
Behold your lovely forms unite.

Dispatch'd from heaven's ethereal height,
By her eternal father's fmile,
Fair peace accelerates her flight,
To blefs this long diftracted ifle:
Fell anger and corrofive fpite,
No more inur'd to war and fpoil,
In adamant fets bound,
With clamour fhake their cells profound.

But as with defultory fire
Along th' aerial current borne,
When fcarce its luftre we admire,
The meteor leaves our fight forlorn:
So, blafled, peace fhall foon retire,
And Britain, ftill by faction torn,
Shall mark with horrors ev'ry age,
And glut with civil blood its rage.

Where am I wrapt, eternal pow'r:
What ecftacies my foul dilate!

Emerge thou bright auspicious hour,
Elude the flow results of fate.
The rofe, gay fummer's fav'rite flow'r,
No more with tumid pride inflate,
Shall throw each prejudice afide,
And with the thistle be ally'd.

By fanguine proof, ye nations, taught
What various ills from difcord rife,
Difcord with all the curfes fraught
That earth can feel or hell devise;
With facred vigilance of thought,
Your union cultivate and prize;
Union, eternal fource of joy,
Which nought can leffen or deftroy.

England! for induftry and toil,
Wifdom, and polifh'd arts, renown'd,
Whose happy clime and grateful foil
Diffufe exhaustlefs plenty round;
So from thy fhores may foes recoil,
Involv'd in fhame, and grief profound,
As thou behold'ft with placid eyes
Thy fifter kingdom's glory rife.

Scotia! to earth's remotest verge,
By each conspicuous virtue known,
Whose glorious deeds, whose talents large,
Enrich all climates but thy own;
To him thy duty firft difcharge,
From whose paternal hand alone
Thy bleffings, which no meafure know,
Thy freedom, wealth, and fafety flow.

Nor let feducive pleafure's charms,
From wifdom's ways thy foul allure,
Nor quench thy gen'rous thirft of arms,
Nor all thy recent fame obfcure:
Thy breaft, while noble arduour warms,
For facred faith, and virtue pure,
Till heav'n and earth fhall pafs away,
Thy glory ne'er fhall feel decay.

ON DR. BLACKLOCK'S BIRTH-DAY*.

BY MRS. BLACKLOCK.

PROFITIOUS day! to me for ever dear;
Oh! may'ft thou ftill return from year to year,
Replete with choicest bleffings Heav'n can fend,
And guard from ev'ry harm my deareft friend.
May we together tread life's various maze,
In ftrictest virtue, and in grateful praife
To thee, kind Providence, who haft ordain'd
One for the other sympathetic friend.
And when life's current in our veins grows cold,
Let each the other to their breaft enfold
Their other dearer felf; with age oppreff,
Then, gracious God, receive us both to reft.

She gather'd from its native bed,
As there it grew, a rose-bud red.
Mean time Calliopé came by,
And Hymen, with obsequious eye,
Watching her looks, gallantly trod;
Fair was the muse, and bright the god.
The mortal, at th' unwonted sight
Was struck with dread, as well the might.
When thus the queen: "How could'st thou dare
" Without my passport, venture here?
" That rose-bud cast upon the plain,
" And seek thy pristine shades again."
But Hymen thus the muse bespoke:
" Oh! Goddess dear, thine ire revoke!
For, if I err not, on my life,
This wanderer is our Blacklock's wife.
At which the smiling milder grew,
For him of yore full well she knew.
Then Hymen thus address'd the dame;
" She pardons, though the still must blame.
" But take the rose-bud in your hand,
" And say, you bring, at my command,
" That present from Parnassus' grove,
" A grateful flower of married love."

LOCK.

EDINA's walls can fancy see,
And not, my Blacklock, think on thee?
Ere I that gentle name forget,
This flesh must pay great nature's debt.
Hail! worthiest of the sons of men,
Not that the muses held thy pen,
And plac'd before thy mental sight
Each hue of intellectual light:
But that a gen'rous soul is thine,
Richer by far than Plutus' mine;
With utmost niceness fram'd to feel
Another's woe, another's weal;
Where friendship heap'd up all her store;
That glorious treasure of the poor,
To grovelling vanity unknown,
Not to be purchas'd by a throne;
Where patience, resignation's child,
Misfortune of her power beguil'd;
Where love her purple cestus bound
Where a retirement virtue found,
Contentment a perpetual treat,
And Honour a delightful seat;
Religion could with Pleasure feast,
And met no bigot, though a priest.

TO MR. THOMAS BLACKLOCK.

To fame and to the muse unknown
Where arts and science never thone,
* A hamlet stands secure:
Her rustic sons, to toil inur'd,
By blooming health and gain allur'd,
Their grateful soil manure.

cal genius, which she never pretended to possess, but as an expression of her affection for her husband, and her veneration for that amiable disposition, and that divine gift of poetry, with which he was so eminently blessed.

* Rockliffe, a little country village near Carlisle, in the county of Cumberland.

What means my heart!—'Tis nature's pow'r:
Yes, here I date my natal hour,
My bursting heart would say:
Here sleep the swains from whom I sprung,
Whose conscience fell remorse ne'er stung;
For nature led their way.

Simplicity, unstain'd with crimes,
(A gem how rare in modern times;)
Was all from them I bore:
No founding titles swell'd my pride;
My heart to mis'ry ne'er was ty'd,
By heaps of shining ore.

Heedless of wealth, of pow'r, of fame;
Heedless of each ambitious aim,
Here flow'd my boyish years.
How oft these rains I've thoughtless prest;
Whistled, or sung some fair * distrest,
Whose fate would steal my tears!

Thus rude, unpolish'd, unrefin'd
While, plung'd in darkest night, my mind
Uncultivated lay;
With pity mov'd, my fate you view'd;
My way to light, to reason show'd,
And op'd the source of day:

You loos'd and form'd my infant thought;
Your skill, your matchless goodness taught,
Where truth and bliss to find:
Painted, by thee, in all her charms,
Each gen'rous heart fair virtue warms,
And swells the ravish'd mind.

Hail bright celestial, all divine!
O come! inspire this breast of mine.
With all thy heav'nly pow'r:
Lead, lead me to thy happiness;
Point out thy path to that blest place,
Where grief shall be no more.

RICHARD HEWITT †.

* Alluding to a sort of narrative songs, which make no inconsiderable part of the innocent amusements with which the country people pass the winter nights, and of which the author of the present piece was a faithful re-bearer.

† This little poem can bear a quality which commendatory verses are not supposed always to possess, to wit; perfect sincerity and gratitude in the author. He was a poor native of a village in the neighbourhood of Carlisle, whom Mr. Blacklock had taken to lead him, and whom, finding him of promising parts, and of a disposition to learn, he endeavoured to make a scholar. He succeeded so well, as to teach young Hewitt the Latin, Greek, and French languages, and some knowledge in the sciences. The lad bore his master that warm affection which his kindness seldom failed to procure from his domestics, and left him, with unwillingsness, to enter the service of Lord Milton (then Lord Justice Clerk), whose secretary he became. The fatigue of that station hurt his health, and he died in 1764.

AN EPISTLE FROM DR. BEATTIE,

TO THE REVEREND MR. THOMAS BLACKLOCK*.

“ Monstro quod ipse tibi possis dare; semita certe
 “ Tranquilla per virtutem patet unica vitæ.

JUVENAL, SAT. X.

HAIL to the poet! whose spontaneous lays
 No pride restrains, nor venal flattery sways:
 Who, nor from critics, nor from fashion's laws,
 Learns to adjust his tribute of applause;
 But bold to feel, and ardent to impart
 What nature whispers to the generous heart,
 Propitious to the moral song, commends,
 For virtue's sake, the humblest of her friends.

Peace to the grumblers of an envious age,
 Vapid in spleen, or brisk in frothy rage!
 Critics, who, ere they understand, defame;
 And friends demure, who only do not blame;
 And puppet-prattlers, whose unconscious throat
 Transmits what the pert witling prompts by rote,
 Pleas'd to their spite or scorn I yield the lays
 That boast the sanction of a Blacklock's praise.
 Let others court the blind and babbling crowd:
 Mine be the favour of the wise and good.

O thou, to censure, as to guile unknown!
 Indulgent to all merit but thy own!
 Whose soul, though darkness wrap thine earthly
 frame,

Exults in virtue's pure ethereal flame;
 Whose thoughts, congenial with the strains on high,
 The muse adorns, but cannot dignify;
 As northern lights, in glittering legions driven,
 Embellish, not exalt the starry heaven:
 Say thou, for well thou know'st the art divine
 To guide the fancy, and the soul refine,

* Vide Dr. Beattie's Poems, edition 1766, p. 135.

What heights of excellence must he ascend,
 Who longs to claim a Blacklock for his friend;
 Who longs to emulate thy tuneful art;
 But more thy meek simplicity of heart;
 But more thy virtue patient, undimay'd,
 At once though malice and mischance invade;
 And, nor by learn'd nor priestly pride confin'd,
 Thy zeal for truth, and love of human kind.

Like thee, with sweet ineffable controul,
 Teach me to rouse or sooth th' impassion'd soul,
 And breathe the luxury of social woes;
 Ah! ill-exchang'd for all that mirth bestows.
 Ye slaves of mirth, renounce your boasted plan,
 For know, 'tis sympathy exalts the man.

But, midst the festive bower, or echoing hall,
 Can riot listen to soft pity's call?
 Rude he repels the soul-ennobling guest,
 And yields to selfish joy his harden'd breast.

Teach me thine artless harmony of song,
 Sweet, as the vernal warblings borne along
 Arcadia's myrtle groves; ere art began,
 With critic glance malevolent, to scan
 Bold nature's generous charms, display'd profuse
 In each warm cheek, and each enraptur'd muse.
 Then had not fraud impos'd, in fashion's name,
 For freedom lifeless forms, and pride for shame;
 And, for th' o'erflowings of a heart sincere,
 The feature fix'd, untarnish'd with a tear;
 The cautious, slow, and unenliven'd eye,
 And breast inur'd to check the tender sigh.
 Then love, unblam'd, indulg'd the guiltless smile;
 Deceit they fear'd not, for they knew not guile.
 The social sense unaw'd, that scorn'd to own
 The curb of law, save nature's law alone,
 To godlike aims, and godlike actions fir'd;
 And the full energy of thought inspir'd;
 And the full dignity of pleasure, given
 T' exalt desire, and yield a taste of heaven.

ECLOGUE *

IN THE MANNER OF OSSIAN.

O COME, my love! from thy echoing hill; thy rocks on the mountain wind!

The hill-top flames with setting light; the vale is bright with the beam of eve. Blithe on the village green the maiden milks her cows. The boy shouts in the wood, and wonders who talks from the trees. But echo talks from the trees, repeating his notes of joy. Where art thou, O Morna! thou fairest among women? I hear not the bleating of thy flock, nor thy voice in the wind of the hill. Here is the field of our loves; now is the hour of thy promise. See, frequent from the harvest-field the reapers eye the setting sun: but thou appearest not on the plain.—

Daughters of the bow! Saw ye my love, with her little flock tripping before her? Saw ye her, fair moving over the heath, and waving her locks behind like the yellow sun-beams of evening?

Come from the hill of clouds, fair dweller of woody Lumon!

I was a boy when I went to Lumon's lovely vale. Sporting among the willows of the brook, I saw the daughters of the plain. Fair were their faces of youth; but mine eye was fixed on Morna. Red was her cheek, and fair her hair. Her hand was white as the lily. Mild was the beam of her blue eye, and lovely as the last smile of the sun. Her eye met mine in silence. Sweet were our words together in secret. I little knew what meant the heavings of my bosom, and the wild wish of my heart. I often looked back upon Lumon's vale, and blest the fair dwelling of Morna. Her name dwelt ever on my lip. She came to my dream by night. Thou didst come in thy beauty, O maid! lovely as the ghost of Malvina, when, clad with the robes of heaven, she came to the vale of the moon, to visit the aged eyes of Ossian king of harps.

Come from the cloud of night, thou first of our maidens! come—

The wind is down; the sky is clear: red is the cloud of evening. In circles the bat wheels over head; the boy pursues his flight. The farmer hails the signs of heaven, the promise of halcyon days: joy brightens in his eyes. O Morna! first of maidens! thou art the joy of Salgar! thou art his one desire! I wait thy coming on the field. Mine eye is over all the plain. One echo spreads on every side. It is the shout of the shepherds folding their flocks. They call to their companions, each on his echoing hill. From the red cloud rises the evening star.—But who comes yonder in light, like the moon the queen of heaven? It is she! the star of stars! the lovely light of Lumon! Welcome, fair beam of beauty, for ever to shine in our valleys!

Morna.

I come from the hill of clouds. Among the green rushes of Balva's bank, I follow the steps of my beloved. The foal in the meadow frolics round the mare: his bright mane dances on the mountain wind. The leverets play among the green ferns, fearless of the hunter's horn, and of the bounding gray-hound. The last strain is up in the wood.—Did I hear the voice of my love? It was the gale that sports with the whirling leaf, and sighs in the reeds of the lake. Blessed be the voice of winds that brings my Salgar to mind. O Salgar! youth of the rolling eye! thou art the love of maidens. Thy face is a sun to thy friends: thy words are sweet as a song: thy steps are stately on thy hill: thou art comely in the brightens of youth; like the moon, when she puts off her dun robe in the sky, and brightens the face of night. The clouds rejoice on either side: the traveller in the narrow path beholds her, round, in her beauty moving through the midst of heaven. Thou art fair, O youth of the rolling eye! thou wast the love of my youth.

Salgar.

Fair wanderer of evening! pleasant be thy rest on our plains. I was gathering nuts in the wood for my love, and the days of our youth returned to mind; when we played together on the green, and flew over the field with feet of wind. I tamed the blackbird for my love, and taught it to sing in her hand. I climbed the ash in the cleft of the rock, and brought you the doves of the wood.

Morna.

It is the voice of my beloved! Let me behold him from the wood-covered vale, as he sings of the times of old, and complains to the voice of the rock. Pleasant were the days of our youth, like the fongs of other years. Often have we sat on the old gray stone, and silent marked the stars, as one by one they stole into the sky. One was our wish by day, and one our dream by night.

Salgar.

I have found an apple-tree in the wood. I planted it in my garden. Thine eye beheld it all in flower. For every bloom we marked, I count an apple of gold. To-morrow I pull the fruit for you. O come, my best beloved.

Morna.

When the gossamour melts in air, and the furze crackle in the beam of noon, O come to Cona's funny side, and let thy flocks wander in our valleys. The heath is in flower. One tree rises in the midst. Sweet flows the river by its side of age. The wild bee hides his honey at its root, Our words will be sweet on the funny hill. Till gray evening shadow the plain, I will sing to my well-beloved.

ODE TO A FOUNTAIN *.

● FOUNTAIN of the wood! whose glassy wave
Slow-swelling from the rock of years,
Holds to heav'n a mirror blue,
And bright as Anna's eye.

With whom I've sported on the margin green:
My hand with leaves, with lilies white,
Gaily deck'd her golden hair,
Young naiad of the vale.

Fount of my native wood! thy murmurs greet
My ear, like poets heav'nly strain:
Fancy pictures in a dream
The golden days of youth.

○ state of innocence! O paradise!
In hope's gay garden, fancy views
Golden blossoms, golden fruits,
And Eden ever green.

Where now, ye dear companions of my youth!
Ye brothers of my bosom! where
Do ye tread the walks of life,
Wide scatter'd o'er the world?

Thus winged larks forsake their native nest,
The merry minstrels of the morn;
New to heav'n they mount away,
And meet again no more.

All things decay; the forest like the leaf;
Great kingdoms fall; the peopled globe,
Planet-struck shall pass away,
Heav'n's with their hosts expire:

But hope's fair visions, and the beams of joy,
Shall cheer my bosom: I will sing
Nature's beauty, nature's birth,
And heroes on the lyre.

* This and the three following odes, Dr. Robertson ascribes to Logan.

Ye naiads! blue-eyed sisters of the wood!
Who by old oak, or storied stream,
Nightly tread your mystic maze,
And charm the wand'ring moon,

Beheld by poet's eye; inspire my dreams
With visions, like the landscapes fair
Of heav'n's bliss, to dying faints
By guardian angels drawn.

Fount of the forest! in thy poet's lays
Thy waves shall flow: this wreath of flow'rs,
Gather'd by my Anna's hand,
I ask to bind my brow.

DANISH ODE.

THE great, the glorious deed is done!
The foe is fled! the field is won!
Prepare the feast; the heroes call;
Let joy, let triumph fill the hall!

The raven clasps his sable wings;
The bard his chosen timbrel brings;
Six virgins round, a select choir,
Sing to the music of his lyre.

With mighty ale the goblet crown;
With mighty ale your sorrows drown;
To-day, to mirth and joy we yield;
To-morrow, face the bloody field.

From danger's front, at battle's eve,
Sweet comes the banquet to the brave;
Joy shines with genial beam on all,
The joy that dwells in Odin's hall.

The song bursts living from the lyre,
Like dreams that guardian ghosts inspire;
When mimic shrieks the heroes hear,
And whirl the visionary spear.

Music the medicine of the mind;
The cloud of care give to the wind;
Be ev'ry brow with garlands bound,
And let the cup of joy go round.

The cloud comes o'er the beam of light;
We're guests that tarry but a night:
In the dark house, together press'd,
The prince's and the people rest.

Send round the shell, the feast prolong,
And send away the night in song;
Be blest below, as those above,
With Odin's and the friends they love.

ANOTHER.

IN deeds of arms, our fathers rife
Illustrious in their offspring's eyes:
They fearless rush'd through Ocean's storms,
And dar'd grim death in all its forms;
Each youth assum'd the sword and shield,
And grew a hero in the field.

Shall we degenerate from our race;
Inglorious in the mountain chase?
Arm, arm in fallen Hubba's right;
Place your forefathers in your fight;

To fame, to glory fight your way,
And teach the nations to obey.

Assume the oars, unbind the sails;
Send, Odin! fend propitious gales.
At Loda's stone, we will adore
Thy name with songs, upon the shore;
And, full of thee, undaunted dare
The foe; and dart the bolts of war.

No feasts of shells no dance by night,
Are glorious Odin's dear delight:
He, king of men, his armies led,
Where heroes strove, where battles bled;
Now reigns above the morning-star,
The god of thunder and of war.

Bless'd who in battle bravely fall!
They mount on wings to Odin's hall;
To music found, in cups of gold,
They drink new wine with chiefs of old;
The song of bards records their name,
And future times shall speak their fame.

Hark! Odin thunders! haste on board;
Illustrious Canute! give the word.
On wings of wind we pass the seas,
To conquer realms, if Odin please:
With Odin's spirit in our soul,
We'll gain the globe from pole to pole.

ODE TO PAOLI.

WHAT man, what hero shall the muses sing,

On classic lyre or Caledonia string,
Whose name shall fill th' immortal page;
Who fir'd from heav'n with energy divine,
In sun-bright glory bids his actions shine
First in the annals of the age?

Ceas'd are the golden times of yore;
The age of heroes is no more;
Rare, in these latter times, arise to fame
The poet's strain inspir'd, or hero's heav'nly flame.

What star arising in the southern sky,
New to the heav'ns, attracting Europe's eye,
With beams unborrow'd, shines afar?
Who comes with thousands marching in his rear,
Shining in arms, shaking his bloody spear,
Like the red comet, sign of war?

Paoli! sent of heav'n to save
A rising nation of the brave;
Whose firm right hand his angels arm, to bear
A shield before his host, and dart the bolts of war.

He comes! he comes! the faviour of the land!
His drawn sword flames in his uplifted hand,
Enthusiast in his country's cause;
Whose firm resolve obeys a nation's call,
To rise deliverer, or a martyr fall
To liberty, to dying laws.

Ye sons of freedom! sing his praise;
Ye poets! bind his brows with bays;
Ye scepter'd shadows! cast your honours down,
And bow before the head that never wore a crown.

Who to the hero can the palm refuse!
Great Alexander still the world subdues,
The heir of everlasting praise.

But when the hero's flame, the patriot's light;
When virtues human and divine unite;
When olives twine among the bays,
And, mutual, both Minerva's shine;
A constellation so divine,
A wond'ring world behold, admire, and love,
And his best image here, th' Almighty marks above.

As the lone shepherd hides him in the rocks,
When high heav'n thunders; as the tim'rous flocks
From the descending torrents flee;
So flies a world of slaves at war's alarms,
When zeal on flame, and liberty in arms,
Leads on the fearless and the free,
Resistless; as the torrent flood,
Horn'd like the moon, uproots the wood,
Sweeps flocks, and herds, and harvests from their base. [place.
And moves th' eternal hills from their appointed

Long hast thou labour'd in the glorious strife,
O land of liberty! profuse of life,
And prodigal of priceless blood.
Where heroes bought with blood the martyr's
crown,
A race arose, heirs of their high renown.
Who dar'd their fate through fire and flood;
And Gaffori the great arose,
Whose words of pow'r disarm'd his foes;
And where the filial image smil'd afar,
The fire turn'd not aside the thunders of the war.

O liberty! to man a guardian giv'n,
Thou best and brightest attribute of Heav'n!
From whom descending, thee we sing.
By nature wild, or by the arts refin'd,
We feel thy pow'r essential to our mind;
Each son of freedom is a king.
Thy praise the happy world proclaim,
And Britain worships at thy name,
Thou guardian angel of Britannia's isle!
And God and man rejoice in thy immortal smile.

Island of beauty! lift thy head on high;
Sing a new song of triumph to the sky!
The day of thy deliverance springs!
The day of vengeance to thy ancient foe.
Thy sons shall lay the proud oppressor low,
And break the head of tyrant kings.
Paoli! mighty man of war!
All bright in arms, thy conqu'ring car
Ascend; thy people from the foe redeem,
Thou delegate of Heav'n; and son of the Supreme!

Rul'd by th' eternal laws, supreme o'er all,
Kingdoms, like kings, successive rise and fall.
When Cæsar conquer'd half the earth,
And spread his eagles in Britannia's sun,
Did Cæsar dream the savage huts he won
Should give a far-sam'd kingdom birth?
That here should Roman freedom light;
The western muses wing their flight;
The arts, the graces find their fav'rite home;
Our armies awe the globe, and Britain rival Rome?

Thus, if th' Almighty say, "Let freedom be,"
Thou, Corsica! the golden age shalt see.
Rejoice with songs, rejoice with smiles!"

Worlds yet unfound, and ages yet unborn,
 Shall hail a new Britannia in her morn,
 The queen of arts, the queen of isles :
 The arts, the' beauteous train of peace,
 Shall rise and rival Rome and Greece ;
 A Newton nature's book unfold sublime ;
 A Milton sing to heav'n, and charm the ear of time.

THE LAST DAY *.

HIS second coming, who at first appear'd
 To save the world, but now to judge mankind
 According to their works, the trumpets found,
 The dead arising, the wide world in flames,
 The mansions of the blest, and the dire pit
 Of Satan and damnation, muse unfold.

O Thou whose eye the future and the past
 In one broad view beholdest, from the first
 Of days, when o'er this rude unformed mass
 Light, first-born of existence, smiling rose,
 Down to that latest moment when thy voice
 Shall bid the sun be darkness, when thy hand
 Shall blot creation out, assist my song.
 Thou only know'st, who gave these orbs to roll
 Their destin'd circles, when their course shall fet,
 When ruin and destruction fierce shall ride
 In triumph o'er creation. This is hid,
 In kindness unto man. Thou giv'st to him
 The event certain : Angels know not when.

"Twas on an autumn's eve, calm and serene,
 I walk'd, attendant on the funeral
 Of an old swain ; around, the village crowd
 Loquacious chatted, till we reach'd the place
 Where, shrouded up, the sons of other years
 Lie silent in the grave. The sexton there
 Had digg'd the bed of death, the narrow house,
 For all that live appointed. To the dust
 We gave the dead. Then moralizing, home
 The swains return'd, to drown in copious bowls
 The labours of the day, and thoughts of death.

The sun now trembl'd at the western gate,
 His yellow rays stream'd o'er the fleecy clouds.
 I sat me down upon a broad flat stone,
 And much I mused on the changeful state
 Of sublunary things. The joys of life,
 How frail, how short, how passing. As the sea,
 Now flowing, thunders on the rocky shore,
 Now lowly ebbing, leaves a tract of sand,
 Waste, wide, and dreary : So is this vain world.
 Through every varying state of life we toils
 In endless fluctuation till tir'd out
 With sad variety of bad and worse,
 We reach life's period, reach the blissful port,
 Where change affects not, and the weary rest.

Then sure the sun which lights us to our throud,
 Than that which gave us first to see the light,
 Is happier far, as he who hopeless long
 Hath rode th' Atlantic billow, from the mast,
 Skirting the blue horizon, sees the land,
 His native land approach, joy fills his heart,
 And swells each throbbing vein ; so, here confin'd,
 We weary tread life's long, long toilsome maze,
 Still hoping, vainly hoping for relief,
 And rest from labour. Ah ! mistaken thought,
 To seek in life what only death can give.

* Communicated by Mr John Birrel of Kinrosswood.

But what is death ? Is it an endless sleep,
 Unconscious of the present or the past ;
 And never to be waken'd ? sleeps the soul ;
 Nor wakes e'en in a dream ? If it is so,
 Happy the sons of pleasure ; they have liv'd,
 And made the most of life : And foolish he,
 The sage who, dreaming of hereafter, grudg'd
 Himself the tasting of the sweets of life ;
 And call'd it temperance, and hop'd for joys
 More durable and sweet, beyond the grave.
 Vain is the poet's song, the soldier's toil ;
 Vain is the sculptur'd marble and the bust.
 How vain to hope for never dying fame,
 If souls can die : But that they never die,
 This thirst of glory whispers. Wherefore gave
 The great Creator such a strong desire
 He never meant to satisfy. These stones,
 Memorials of the dead, with rustic art,
 And rude inscriptions cut, declare the soul
 Immortal. Man, form'd for eternity,
 Abhors annihilation, and the thought
 Of dark oblivion. Hence, with ardent wish
 And vigorous effort, each would fondly raise
 Some lasting monument, to save his name
 Safe from the waste of years. Hence Caesar fought ;
 Hence Raphael painted ; and hence Milton sung.

Thus musing, sleep oppress'd my drowsy sense,
 And wrapt me into rest : Before mine eyes,
 Fair as the morn, when up the flaming east
 The sun ascends, a radiant seraph stood,
 Crown'd with a wreath of palm, his golden hair
 Wav'd o'er his shoulders, girt with shining plumes ;
 From which, down to the ground, loose floating
 trail'd,

In graceful negligence, his heavenly robe :
 Upon his face, flush'd with immortal youth
 Unfading beauty bloom'd, and thus he spake :

" Well hast thou judg'd ; the soul must be immortal !

" And that it is, this awful day declares ;
 " This day, the last that ere the sun shall gild :
 " Arrested by Omnipotence, no more
 " Shall he describe the year. The moon no more
 " Shall shed her borrow'd light. This is the day
 " Seal'd in the rolls of fate, when o'er the dead
 " Almighty power shall wake, and raise to life
 " The sleeping myriads. Now shall be approv'd,
 " The ways of God to man, and all the clouds
 " Of Providence be clear'd ; now shall be shown
 " Why vice in purple oft upon a throne
 " Exalted sat, and shook her iron scourge
 " O'er virtue, seated lowly on the ground.
 " Now deeds committed in the sable shade
 " Of eyeless darkness, shall be brought to light,
 " And every act shall meet its just reward."

As thus he spake, the morn arose, and sure
 Methought ne'er rose a fairer. Not a cloud
 Spotted the blue expanse, and not a gale
 Breath'd o'er the surface of the dewy earth.
 Twinkling with yellow lustre, the gay birds
 On every blooming spray sung their sweet notes,
 And prais'd their great Creator. Through the fields

The lowing cattle graz'd, and all around
 Was beauty, happiness, and mirth, and love.
 " All these thou seest," (resum'd th' angelic power),
 " No more shall give thee pleasure. Thou must leave
 " This world, of which now come and see the end."

This said, he touch'd me, and such strength in-fuf'd,
 That as he soared up the pathless air,
 I lightly followed. On the awful peak
 Of an eternal rock, beneath whose feet
 The founding billows beat, he set me down.
 I heard a noise, loud as a rushing stream,
 When o'er the rugged precipice it roars,
 And foaming thunders on the rocks below.
 Astonish'd, I gaz'd around, when lo!
 I saw an angel down from Heaven descend.
 His face was as the sun, his dreadful height
 Such as the statue by the Grecian plan'd
 Of Philip's son, Athos, with all his rocks,
 Moulded into a man. One foot on earth,
 And one upon the rolling sea, he fix'd.
 As when at setting sun the rainbow shines
 Refulgent, meting out the half of Heaven,
 So flood he; and, in act to speak, he rais'd
 His shining hand. His voice was as the sound
 Of many waters, or the deep mouth'd roar
 Of thunder, when it bursts the riven cloud,
 And bellows through the ether. Nature flood
 Silent in all her works, while thus he spake:
 "Hear, thou that roll'st above, thou glorious sun;
 "Ye Heavens and earth attend, while I declare
 "The will of th' Eternal. By his name
 "Who lives, and shall for ever live, I swear
 "That time shall be no longer."
 He disappear'd. Fixt in deep thought, I stood,
 At what would follow. Strait another found,
 To which the Nile, o'er Ethiopia's rocks,
 Rushing in broad cataract, were nought.
 It seem'd as if the pillar that upheld
 The universe, had crack'd, and all these worlds
 Unhing'd, had strove together for the way,
 In cumbrous crashing ruin. Such the roar!
 A sound that might be felt! It pierc'd beyond
 The limits of creation. Chaos roar'd,
 And Heaven and earth return'd the mighty noise.
 "Thou heard'st," said then my heavenly guide,
 "The sound
 "Of the last trumpet. See where, from the clouds,
 "Th' archangel Michael, one of the seven
 "That minister before the throne of God,
 "Leans forward; and the son'rous tube inspires
 "With breath immortal. By his side the sword
 "Which, like a meteor, o'er the vanquish'd head
 "Of Satan hung, when he rebellious rais'd
 "War, and embroil'd the happy fields above."
 A pause ensu'd; the fainting fun grew pale,
 And seem'd to struggle through a sky of blood;
 While dim eclipse impair'd his beam: The earth
 Shook to her deepest centre; ocean rag'd,
 And dash'd his billows on the frighted shores.
 All was confusion; heartless, helpless, wild,
 As flocks of tim'rous sheep, or driven deer,
 Wand'ring, the inhabitants of earth appear'd.
 Terror in every look, and pale affright
 Sat in each eye; amaz'd at the pain,
 And for the future trembling. All call'd great,
 Or deem'd illustrious by erring man,
 Was now no more. The hero and the prince
 Their grandeur lost, now mingling with the crowd;
 And all distinctions, those except from faith
 And virtue flowing. These upheld the soul,
 As ribb'd with triple steel. All else was lost!

Now, vain is greatness! as the morning clouds,
 That, rising, promis'd rain: Condens'd they stand,
 Till, touch'd by winds, they vanish into air.
 The farmer mourns; so mourns the hapless wretch,
 Who, cast by fortune from some env'y'd height,
 Finds nought within him to support his fall.
 High as his hope had rais'd him, low he sinks
 Below his fate, in comfortless despair.
 Who would not laugh at an attempt to build
 A lasting structure on the rapid stream
 Of foaming Tygris? the foundations laid
 Upon the glassy surface: Such the hopes
 Of him whose views are bounded by this world;
 Immur'd in his own labour'd work, he dreams
 Himself secure; when, on a sudden, down,
 Torn from its sandy ground, the fabric falls!
 He starts, and, waking, finds himself undone.

Not so the man who on religion's safe
 His hope and virtue builds. Firm on the rock
 Of ages his foundation laid, remains
 Above the frowns of fortune or her smiles,
 In every varying state of life, the same. [hopes.
 Nought fears he from the world, and nothing
 With unassuming courage, inward strength
 Endu'd; resign'd to Heaven, he leads a life
 Superior to the common herd of men,
 Whose joys, connect'd with the changeful flood
 Of fickle fortune, ebb and flow with it.

Nor is religion a chimera: Sure
 'Tis something real. Virtue cannot live,
 Divided from it. As a fever'd branch,
 It withers, pines, and dies. Who loves not God,
 That made him, and preserv'd, nay more, re-
 deem'd,

Is dangerous. Can ever gratitude
 Bind him who spurns at these most sacred ties?
 Say, can he, in the silent scenes of life,
 Be sociable? Can he be a friend?
 At best, he must but feign. The worst of brutes
 An atheist is; for beasts acknowledge God.
 The lion, with the terrors of his mouth,
 Pays homage to his Maker; the grim wolf,
 At midnight, howling, seeks his meat from God.

Again th' archangel rais'd his dreadful voice,
 Earth trembl'd at the sound. "Awake ye dead,
 "And come to judgment." At the mighty call,
 As armies issue at the trumpet's sound,
 So rose the dead. A shaking first I heard,
 And bone together came unto his bone,
 Though sever'd by wide seas and distant lands.
 A spirit liv'd within them. He who made,
 Wound up, and set in motion the machine,
 To run unhurt the length of fourscore years,
 Who knows the structure of each secret spring,
 Can he not join again the sever'd parts,
 And join them with advantage? This to man
 Hard and impossible may seem; to God
 Is easy. Now, through all the darken'd air
 The living atoms flew, each to his place,
 And none was missing in the great account;
 Down from the dust of him whom Cain slew,
 To him who yesterday was laid in earth,
 And scarce had seen corruption; whether in
 The bladed grass they cloth'd the verdant plain,
 Or smil'd in opening flowers; or, in the sea,
 Became the food of monsters of the deep,
 Or pass in transigrations infinite.
 Through ev'ry kind of being none mistakes

His kindred matter; but, by sympathy
 Combining, rather by Almighty power
 Led on, they closely mingle and unite.
 But, chang'd, now subject to decay no more,
 Or dissolution, deathless as the soul,
 The body is; and fitted to enjoy
 Eternal bliss, or bear eternal pain.

As when in Spring the sun's prolific beams
 Have wak'd to life the insect tribe that sport
 And wanton in his rays at ev'ning mild,
 Proud of their new existence, up the air,
 In devious circles wheeling, they ascend,
 Innumerable. The whole air is dark.
 So, by the trumpets rous'd, the sons of men
 In countless numbers cover'd all the ground,
 From frozen Greenland to the southern pole,
 All who ere liv'd on earth. See Lapland's sons,
 Whose zenith is the pole, a barbarous race,
 Rough as their storms, and savage as their clime,
 Unpolish'd as their bears, and but in shape
 Distinguish'd from them. Reason's dying lamp
 Scarce brighter burns than insinct in their breast.
 With wandring Russians, and those who dwell
 In Scandinavia, by the Baltic sea;
 The rugged Pole, with Prussia's warlike race;
 Germania yields her numbers, where the Rhine
 And mighty Danube pour their flowing urns.

Behold thy children, Britain! hail the light;
 A manly race, whose business was arms;
 And long unciviliz'd, yet train'd to deeds
 Of virtue, they withstood the Roman power,
 And made their eagles droop. On Morven's coast,
 A race of heroes and of bards arise.
 The mighty Fingal and his mighty son,
 Who launch'd the spear, and touch'd the tuneful
 harp;

With Scotia's chiefs, the sons of later years,
 Her Kenneths and her Malcolms, warriors fam'd;
 Her generous Wallace, and her gallant Bruce,
 See in her pathless wilds, where the grey stones
 Are rais'd in mem'ry of the mighty dead.
 Armies arise of English, Scots, and Picts;
 And giant Danes, who, from bleak Norway's coast,
 Ambitious came, to conquer her fair fields,
 And chain her sons; but Scotia gave them graves.
 Behold the kings that fill'd the English throne,
 Edwards and Henrys, names of deathless fame,
 Start from their tombs. Immortal William, see
 Surrounding angels point him from the rest;
 Who sav'd the state from tyranny and Rom.
 Behold her poets, Shakspeare, fancy's child;
 Spenser, who, through his smooth and moral tale,
 Ypoints fair virtue out; with bim who sung
 Of man's first disobedience, Young lifts up
 His awful head, and joys to see the day,
 The great, th' important day of which he sung.

See where imperial Rome exalts her height:
 Her senators and gowned fathers rise.
 Her consuls, who, as ants without a king,
 Went forth to conquer kings; and at their wheels
 In triumph led the chiefs of distant lands.
 Behold, in Cannæ's field what hostile swarms,
 Burst from th' ensanguin'd ground where Hannibal
 Shook Rome, through all her legions: Italy
 Trembled unto the capital. If fate
 Had not withstood th' attempt, the now had bow'd
 Her head to Carthage. See Pharsalia points
 Her murder'd thousands, who in the last strife

Of Rome, for dying liberty were slain,
 To make a man the master of the world.

All Europe's sons throng forward, numbers vast;
 Imagination fails beneath the weight.
 What numbers yet remain! Th' enervate race
 Of Asia, from where hoary Tanais rolls
 O'er rocks and dreary wastes his foaming stream,
 To where the eastern ocean thunders round
 The spicy Java: with the tawny race
 That dwelt in Afric, from the Red sea north
 To the Cape south, where the rude Hottentot
 Sinks into brute; with those who long unknown,
 Till by Columbus found, a naked race,
 And only skill'd to urge the sylvan war,
 That peopl'd the wide continent that spreads
 From rocky Zembla, whiten'd with the snow
 Of twice three thousand years, south to the straits
 Nam'd from Magellan, where the ocean roars
 Round earth's remotest bounds. Now had not He
 The great Creator of the universe,
 Enlarg'd the wide foundations of the world,
 Room had been wanting to the mighty crowd
 That pour'd from ev'ry quarter. At his word,
 Obedient angels stretch'd an ample plain,
 Where dwell his people in the Holy Land,
 Fit to contain the whole of human race.
 As when the Autumn yellow on the fields
 Invites the sickle forth, the farmer sends
 His servants to cut down and gather in
 The bearded grain; so by Jehovah sent,
 The angels, from all corners of the world,
 Led on the living and th' awaken'd dead
 To judgment. As in the Apocalypse
 John, gather'd, saw the people of the earth,
 And kings, to Armageddon: Now look round,
 Thou whose ambitious heart for glory beats,
 See all the wretched hearts on earth call'd great,
 And lifted up to gods; how little now
 Seems all their grandeur! See the conqueror,
 Mad Alexander, who his victor arms
 Bore o'er the then known globe, then sat him down
 And wept, because he had no other world
 To give to desolation. How he droops!
 He knew not, hapless wretch, he never learn'd,
 The harder conquest, to subdue himself.
 Now is the Christian's triumph, now he lifts
 His head on high; while down the dying heart
 Of sinners helpless sink; black guilt distracts
 And wrings their tortur'd souls; while ev'ry
 thought

Is big with keen remorse, or dark despair.

But now a nobler subject claims the song;
 My mind recoils at the amazing theme;
 For how shall finite speak of infinite;
 How shall a stripling, by the muse untaught,
 Sing heav'n's Almighty, prostrate at whose feet
 Archangels fall: unequal to the task,
 I dare the bold attempt; assist me Heaven.
 From thee began, with thee shall end the song:
 For now, down from the op'ning firmament,
 Seated upon a sapphire throne, high rais'd
 Upon an azure ground, upheld by wheels
 Of emblematic structure, as a wheel
 Had been within a wheel, studded with eyes
 Of flaming fire, and by four cherubs led;
 I saw the Judge descend: Around him came
 By thousands, and by millions, heaven's bright host;
 About him blaz'd unsufferable light,

Invisible as darkness to the eye;
 His car above the mount of Olives stay'd,
 Where last he with his disciples convers'd,
 And left them gazing as he soar'd aloft;
 He darkness as a curtain drew around,
 On which the colours of the rainbow shone
 Various and bright, and from within was heard
 A voice as deep mouth'd thunder, speaking thus:
 "Go Raphael, and from these reprobate,
 "Divide my chosen saints; go separate
 "My people from among, as the wheat
 "Is in the harvest sever'd from the tares;
 "Set them upon the right, and on the left
 "Leave these ungodly. Thou Michael choose
 "Forth from the angelic host a chosen band,
 "And Satan with his legions hither bring
 "To judgment, from hell's caverns; whither fled,
 "They think to hide from my awaken'd wrath,
 "Which chas'd them out heaven, and which they
 "dread

"More than the horrors of the pit, which now
 "Shall be redoubld sevenfold on their heads."
 Swift as conception, at his bidding flew
 His ministers, obedient to his nod;
 And as a shepherd who all day hath fed
 His sheep and goats promiscuous, but at eve
 Dividing shuts them up in different folds.
 So now the good was parted from the bad;
 For ever parted; never more to join
 And mingle as on earth, where often pass'd
 For other each, ev'n close hypocrisy
 Escapes not, but unmask'd, alike the scorn
 Of vice and virtue, stands now separate.
 Upon the right appear'd a dauntless, firm,
 Composed number, joyful at the thought
 Of immortality, they forward look'd
 With hope into the future; conscience pleas'd,
 Smiling reflects upon a well spent life;
 Heav'n dawns within their breast. The other crew
 Pale and dejected, scarce lift up their heads
 To view the hated light; his trembling hand
 Each lays upon his guilty face, and now
 In gnawings of the never dying worm,
 Began a hell that never shall be quench'd.

But now the enemy of God and man,
 Cursing his fate, comes forward, led in chains
 Infrangible of burning adamant,
 Hewn from the rocks of hell, with all the bands
 Of rebel angels, who long time had walk'd
 The world, and by their oracles deceiv'd
 The blinded nations; or by secret guile
 Wrought men to vice, came on, raging in vain,
 And struggling with their fetters, which, as fate
 Compell'd them fast, they wait their dreadful doom.

Now from his lofty throne, with eyes that blaz'd
 Intolerable day, th' Almighty Judge
 Look'd down awhile upon the subject crowds;
 As when a caravan of merchants led
 By thirst of gain to travel the parch'd sands
 Of waste Arabia, hears a lion roar,
 The wicked trembled; at his view, upon
 The ground they roll'd in pangs of wild despair,
 To hide their faces, which not blushes mark'd;
 But livid horror; conscience, who asleep
 Long time had lain, now lifts her snaky head,
 And frights them into madness, while the list
 Of all their sins she offers to their view;

For she had power to hurt them, and her sting
 Was as a scorpion's: He who never knew
 Its wound is happy, though a fetter'd slave
 Chain'd to the oar, or to the dark damp mine
 Confin'd, while he that sits upon a throne
 Under her frown, is wretched. But the damn'd
 Alone can tell what 'tis to feel her scourge,
 In all its horrors, with her poison'd sting
 Fix'd in their hearts. This is the Second Death.
 Upon the book of life he laid his hand,
 Clos'd with the seal of heaven, which op'd, he read

The names of the elect; God knows his own,
 Come (looking on the right he smiling said),
 Ye of my Father blessed; ere this world
 Was moulded out of chaos; ere the fons
 Of God exulting sung at nature's birth;
 For you I left my throne, my glory left,
 And shrouded up in clay, I weary walk'd
 Your world, and many miseries endur'd;
 Death was the last. For you I died, that you Might live with me for ever, and in heav'n sit
 On thrones, and as the sun in brightness, shine
 For ever in my kingdom: Faithfully
 Have ye approv'd yourselves; I hungry was,
 And thirsty, and ye gave me meat and drink;
 Ye cloth'd me naked; when I fainting lay,
 Ye cheer'd me with the tenderness of friends;
 In sickness and in prison me reliev'd:
 Nay, marvel not that thus I speak, when e'er
 Led by the dictates of fair charity,
 Ye help'd the man on whom keen poverty
 And wretchedness had laid their meagre hands,
 And for my sake, ye did it unto me.
 They heard with joy, and shouting rais'd their voice
 In praise of the Redeemer; loos'd from earth
 They soar'd triumphant, and at the right hand
 Of the great Judge sat down; who on the left
 Now looking stern, with fury in his eyes,
 Blasted their spirits, while his arrows fix'd
 Deep in their hearts, in agonizing pain
 Scorch'd their vitals, thus their dreadful doom,
 (More dreadful from the lips than us'd to bliss)
 He awfully pronounced; earth at his frown
 Convulsive trembled, while the raging deep
 Hush'd in a horrid calm his waves. Depart,
 (These, for I heard them, were his dreadful words!)

Depart from me, ye curs'd! Oft have I strove
 In tenderness and pity to subdue
 Your rebel hearts; as a fond parent bird
 When danger threatens, flutters o'er her young;
 Nature's fond impulse beating in her breast;
 Thus ardent did I strive, but all in vain,
 Now will I laugh at your calamity,
 And mock your fears; as oft in stupid mirth,
 Harden'd in wickedness, ye pointed out
 The man who labour'd up the steep ascent
 Of virtue, to reproach. Depart to fire,
 Kindled in Tophet for the arch enemy,
 For Satan and his angels; who by pride
 Fell into condemnation; blown up now
 To sevenfold fury by th' Almighty breath;
 There in that dreary mansion, where the light
 Is solid gloom, darkness that may be felt,
 Where hope, the lenient of the ills of life
 For ever dies; there shall ye seek for death,
 And shall not find it, for your greatest curse

Is immortality; Omnipotence

Eternally shall punish and preserve.

So said he, and his hands high lifted, hurl'd
The flashing lightning and the flaming bolt
Full on the wicked, kindling in a blaze
The scorched earth, behind, before, around,
The trembling wretches burst the quiv'ring flames:
They turn'd to fly, but wrath divine pursu'd
To where beyond creation's utmost bound,
Where never glimpse of cheerful light arriv'd,
Where scarce e'en thought can travel, but absorb'd,
Falls headlong down th' immeasurable gulf
Of chaos wide, and wild their prison flood
Of utter darkness, as the horrid shade
That clouds the brow of death, its open'd mouth
Belch'd sheets of livid flame and pitchy smoke;
Infernal thunders with expulsion dire
Roar'd through the fiery concave, while the waves
Of liquid sulphur beat the burning shore
In endless ferment; o'er the dizzy steep
Suspended, wrapt in suffocating gloom,
The sons of black damnation shrieking hung.
Curse unutterable fill'd their mouth,
Hideous to hear, their eyes rain'd bitter tears
Of agonizing madness, for their day
Was past, and from their eyes repentance hid
For ever! Round their heads their hissing brand
The furies wav'd, and o'er the whelming brink
Impetuous urg'd them, in the beating surge
They headlong fell; the flashing billows roar'd,
And hell from all her caves re-echo'd back;
The gates of flint and tenfold adamant,
With bars of steel, impenetably firm,
Were shut forever: The decree of fate
Immutable made fast the pond'rous door.

"Now turn your eyes," my bright conductor said,
"Behold the world in flames, so fore the bolts
Of thunder launch'd by the Almighty arm
Hath smote upon it: up the blackened air
Ascend the curling flames and billowy smoke,
And hideous crackling bloated the face of day
With foul eruption; from their inmost beds
The hissing waters rise, whatever drew
The vital air, or in the spacious deep [crash:
Wanton'd at large, expires. Heard'st thou that
There fell the tow'ring Alps, and dashing down
Lay bare the centre: see the flaming mines
Expand their treasures, no rapacious hand
To seize the precious bane: Now look around.
Say, canst thou tell where stood imperial Rome,
The wonder of the world, or where the boast
Of Europe, fair Britannia, stretch'd her plain
Encircl'd by the ocean. All is want,
Is darkness. As (if great may be compar'd
With small), when, o'er Gomorrhah's fated field
The flaming sulphur, by Jehovah rain'd,
Sent up a pitchy cloud, killing to life,
And tainting all the air. Another groan,
'Twas Nature's last; and see th' extinguish'd sun,
Falls devious through the void, and the fair face
Of Nature is no more: with fullen joy
Old Chaos views the havoc, and expects
To stretch his sable sceptre o'er the blank
Where once Creation smil'd, o'er which perhaps,
Creative energy again shall wake,
And, into being call a brighter sun,
And fairer worlds, which for delightful change,

The saints, descending from the happy seats
Of bliss, shall visit. And behold they rise
And seek their native land; around them rise
In radiant files Heaven's host, immortal wreaths
Of Amaranth and roses crown their head,
And each a branch of ever-blooming palm
In triumph holds. In robes of dazzling white,
Fairer than that by wintry tempests shed,
Upon the frozen ground, array'd they shine,
Fair as the sun, when up the steep of heaven
He rides in all the majesty of light.
But who can tell, and though an angel could,
Thou couldst not hear the glories of the place,
For their abode prepar'd. Though oft on earth
They struggl'd hard against the stormy tide
Of adverse fortune, and the bitter scorn
Of harden'd villany, their life a course
Of warfare upon earth, these toils, when view'd
With the reward, seem nought: The Lord shall guide

Their steps to living fountains, and shall wipe
All tears from ev'ry eye: The wint'ry clouds
Thatrown'd on life, rack up. A glorious sun
That ne'er shall set, arises in a sky
Unclouded and serene; their joy is full,
And sickness, pain, and death, shall be no more.

Dost thou desire to follow? does thy heart
Beat ardent for the prize? then tread the path
Religion points to men. What thou hast seen,
Fix'd in thy heart retain, for, be assur'd,
In that last moment, in the closing act
Of nature's drama, ere the hand of Fate
Drop the black curtain, thou must bear thy part
And stand in thine own lot."

This said, he stretch'd
His wings, and, in a moment, left my sight.

PHILOCLEES:

AN ELEGY ON THE DEATH OF MR. WILLIAM DRYBURGH.*

WAITING, I sit on Leven's sandy shore,
And sadly tune the reed to sounds of woe;
Once more I call Melpomene! once more
Spontaneous teach the weeping verse to flow.

The weeping verse shall flow in friendship's name,
Which frindship asks, and frindship fain would pay;

The weeping verse which worth and genius claim;
Begin then, muse! begin the mournful lay.

Aided by thee, I'll twine a rustic wreath
Of fairest flowers, to deck the grafs-grown grave

Of Philocles, cold in the bed of death,
And mourn the gentle youth I could not save.

Where lordly Forth divides the fertile plains,
With ample sweep, a sea from side to side;
A rocky bound his raging course restrains,
Forever lash'd by the resounding tide.

There stands his tomb upon the sea-beat shore,
Afar discern'd by the rough sailor's eye,

* Communicated by the Rev. Dr. Baird.

Who, passing, weeps, and stops the founding oar,
And points where Piety and Virtue lie.

Like the gay palm on Rabbah's fair domains,
A cedar overshadowing Carmel's flow'ry side;
Or, like the upright ash on Britain's plains,
Which waves its stately arms in youthful pride.

So flourish'd Philocles; and as the hand
Of ruthless woodman lays their honours low,
He felt in youth's fair bloom by Fate's command,
'Twas Fate that struck, 'tis ours to mourn the blow.

Alas! we fondly thought that Heav'n design'd
His bright example mankind to improve;
All they should be, was pictur'd in his mind,
His thoughts were virtue, and his heart was
love.

Calm as a summer's sun's unruff'd face,
He look'd unmov'd on life's precarious game,
And smil'd at mortals toiling in the chase
Of empty phantoms, opulence and fame.

Steady he follow'd virtue's onward path,
Inflexible to error's devious way,
And firm at last in hope and fixed faith,
Through death's dark vale he trod without dif-
may.

Thy gloomy vale he trod, relentless death!
Where waste and horrid desolation reign,
The tyrant humbl'd, there resigns his wrath,
The wretch elated, there forgets his pain.

There sleeps the infant, and the hoary head,
Together lie the oppressor and the oppress'd;
There dwells the captive, free among the dead;
There Philocles, and there the weary rest.

The curtains of the grave fast drawn around,
Till the loud trumpet wake the sleep of death,
With dreadful clangor through the world resound,
Shake the firm globe, and burst the vaults beneath.

Then Philocles shall rise, to glory rise,
And his Redeemer, for himself, shall see;
With him in triumph mount th' azure skies,
For where he is his followers shall be.

Hence then these sighs! and whence this falling tear,

To sad remembrance of his merit just?
Still must I mourn, for he to me was dear,
And still is dear, though buried in the dust.

LOCHLEVEN NO MORE.

TO THE TUNE OF "LOCHABER NO MORE."

FAREWEL to Lochleven and Gairny's fair stream,
How sweet, on its banks, of my Peggy to dream;
But now I must go to a far distant shore,
And I'll never return to Lochleven no more.

No more in the spring shall I walk with my dear
Where gowans bloom bonny, and Gairny runs
clear,

Far hence must I wander, my pleasures are o'er,
Since I'll see my dear maid and Lochleven no
more.

No more do I sing, since far from my delight,
But in sighs spend the day and in tears the long
night;

By Devon's dull current stretch'd mourning I'll lie,
While the hills and the woods to my mourning reply.

But wherever I wander, by night or by day,
True love to my Peggy still with me shall stay;
And ever and ay my loss I'll deplore,
Till the woodlands re-echo Lochleven no more.
Though from her far distant, to her I'll be true,
And still my fond heart keep her image in view:
O could I obtain her, my griefs were all o'er,
I would mourn the dear maid and Lochleven no
more.

But if Fate has decreed it ne'er shall be so,
Then grief shall attend me wherever I go;
Till from life's stormy sea I reach death's silent
shore,
Then I'll think upon her and Lochleven no more.

ELEGIAC VERSES ON THE DEATH OF MICHAEL BRUCE *.

Why vainly bid the animated bust,
Why bid the monumental pile to rise,
Too often genius, doom'd by fate unjust,
Unnotic'd lives, unwept, unhonour'd dies!
Too oft the poet in whose sacred breast,
With ardour glow the muse's purest fires,
Contemn'd by pride, by penury oppress'd,
In anguish lives, and in neglect expires!
Too oft, alas! in some sequester'd ground,
Silent and cold the poet's ashes sleep,
No pomp of funeral is seen around,
No parasite to praise, no friend to weep!
Such, Bruce, the feelings in my breast that rise,
While guided by the muse I wander near,
Mark the lone spot where youthful genius lies,
And give thy fate the tribute of a tear.
Obscure thy birth, yet in thy early breast,
How deep and ardent glow'd the muses flame,
How strongly in thy bosom was impress'd
The poet's genius, and the poet's fame!
Such was thy fame, but, ah! upon thy frame
Disease relentless urg'd its growing way,
Fled was each joy of health, each hope of fame,
And thou the victim of a slow decay:
Like some fair flower, that owes the desert birth,
Whose buds foretell the beauty of its prime,
But sinks unshelter'd, sinks unseen to earth,
Chill'd by the blast, or crot before its time!
Perhaps thus blasted by unfriendly doom,
Thy genius foster'd in a milder air,
Matur'd by age in all the pride of bloom,
Had spread luxuriant, and had flourish'd fair!
But, ah, no more the poet now remains,
Cold is the breast that glow'd with sacred fire,
Mute is the tongue that glow'd in tuneful strains,
Check'd is the hand, and silent is the lyre!
For him, who now laments thy early tomb,
Like thee inspir'd with youthful love of lays,
Though now he mourns, he soon may share thy
doom,
May soon require the tribute which he pays.
